The French having for a conſiderable time formed a project to join their colony of Canada to that of Louiſiana, and alſo to obtain a port in the Ocean, they for thoſe ends began very early after the treaty of Utrecht to extend their limits on that continent; and although the fifteenth article of that treaty had abſolutely excluded them from moleſting or encroaching on the five Indian nations of the Iroquois, as being particularly ſubject to the Britiſh crown; yet in this year they ſeized on the moſt important paſs of Niagara, and fortified the ſame, whereby they were the better able to command the lakes, and to form the plan of extending their power to the river Ohio, and to carry their chain of forts and ſettlements from thence to the Miſſiſſippi. This fort they held till the year 1759. In the mean time, they had, by a thouſand arts, debauched theſe five Indian nations ſo far, that they were brought to murder great numbers of our people who had ſettled amongſt them.

Nothing more material paſſed either at home or abroad, in reſpect to Engliſh affairs, this ſummer. The parliament being aſſembled again on the nineteenth day of October, continued ſitting till the month of March, when the ſupplies being granted, and the buſineſs of the ſeſſion diſpatched as the court was pleaſed to dictate, it was diſſolved, and another convoked by proclamation. The moſt remarkable tranſaction of this ſeſſion was, the reſolving, on account of the great abuſe that had been made of the liberty of proteſting, that ſuch lords as might enter proteſtations, with reaſons, ſhould do it before two o'clock the next day, and ſign them before the houſe riſes. It was the earl of Sunderland who made the motion that led to this reſolution. Thus ended the firſt ſeptennial parliament, and which had, during its exiſtence, ſet a ſtrong example of implicit ſubmiſſion to the will of a court. In the election of members for the enſuing parliament, the Whigs, by their ſuperior intereſt, gained an inconteſtible majority, and conſequently the ſame diſpoſitions prevailed in this aſſembly as in the preceding one.

On the nineteenth of April, 1722, died Charles Spencer, earl of Sunderland, groom of the ſtole to his majeſty, and who had been ſecretary of ſtate, preſident of the council, and held other high offices under the government. He quitted life under the load of popular odium, from his ſuppoſed connexions with the directors of the South Sea company. He was a miniſter of abilities, but violent, impetuous, and headſtrong. His death was ſoon followed by that of his father-in-law the great duke of Marlborough, whoſe faculties had been for ſome time greatly impaired: he was interred in Weſtminſter abbey, with ſuch profuſion of funeral pomp as evinced the pride and oſtentation, much more than the taſte and concern of thoſe who directed his obſequies. He was ſucceeded as maſter of the ordnance and colonel of the firſt regiment of foot-guards by the earl of Cadogan.

In the beginning of May the nation was alarmed with the report of a new conſpiracy formed againſt his majeſty's perſon and government. It was ſaid that the king had received the firſt information of it from the duke of Orleans, regent of France. Theſe general reports were adjudged ſufficient to ſpread the certainty of a plot univerſally. The troops were aſſembled, augmented, and encamped in ſeveral parts of the kingdom: a fleet was fitted out with the greateſt diligence: lieutenant-general M'Cartney was diſpatched to Ireland, to bring over ſome troops from that kingdom; ſome ſuſpected perſons were apprehended in Scotland; the States of Holland were deſired to have their auxiliary or guaranty troops in readineſs to be embarked; and colonel Churchill was ſent to the court of France with a private commiſſion. The lord Townſhend wrote a letter to the mayor of London, by the king's command, ſignifying his majeſty's having received unqueſtionable advices, that ſeveral of his ſubjects had entered into a wicked conſpiracy, in concert with traitors abroad, for raiſing a rebellion in favour of a popiſh pretender; but that he was firmly aſſured the authors of it neither were, or would be ſupported by any foreign power. This letter was immediately anſwered by an affectionate addreſs from the court of aldermen: the example of London was followed by many other cities and boroughs. The king had determined to viſit Hanover, and actually ſettled the regency, in which the prince of Wales was not included: but now this intended journey was laid aſide; the court was removed to Kenſington, and the prince retired to Richmond. In a word, ſuch precautions were taken, as if the utmoſt danger threatened the ſtate, and the pretender, at the head of an innumerable armed force, had already ſet foot in the kingdom.

In order to ſtamp the appearance of reality upon this imaginary conſpiracy, and to juſtify the meaſures that had occaſioned ſuch a conſternation, it was neceſſary to produce a number of perſons as agents or promoters of it. The two firſt perſons taken up on ſuſpicion were Mr. Chriſtopher Layer, a young counſellor of the Temple, and Dr. Atterbury, biſhop of Rocheſter. This prelate could not boaſt of an illuſtrious deſcent; but this defect, if it may be allowed ſo to call it, was amply compenſated by the eminent virtues and ſhining qualities which adorned his character. To his merit alone he was indebted for the high rank he held in the church: he was a conſummate divine, an eloquent preacher, and endowed with the moſt accompliſhed and refined talents; he was an admirer and patron of polite literature, which he ever encouraged in thoſe who cultivated it. To theſe qualifications he joined an inflexible honeſty, which no circumſtances of time or intereſt could alter, by which he had juſtly acquired the love and eſteem of the moſt reſpectable perſonages in the kingdom: but he was unfortunate enough to have incurred the hatred of the miniſtry by being at the head of the rigid Tories. His ſentiments with regard to monarchical power and the high-church had firſt diſplayed themſelves under the preceding reign; he was one of the moſt zealous advocates for Dr. Sacheverel, in that grand affair which proved the downfall of Marlborough and the Whig faction. In a word, his high rank, and the great influence he had over the Tory party, ſeems to have been his principal crime; and by all that can be gathered from the accounts of this period, it was in order effectually to remove him out of their way that the Whigs invented a plot, which made ſo great a noiſe at the time of its pretended diſcovery, and which, by the event, ſeems to have exiſted only in the minds of thoſe who claimed the merit of its detection; for the perſons ſaid to be concerned in it, muſt have been infatuated to a degree of frenzy, ſince they were charged with having made application to the regent of France, who was well known to be intimately connected with the king of Great Britain. It is by no means improbable, that the party who firſt ſet this pretended plot on foot, might have provided ſuch letters for the inſpection of his majeſty, as might induce him to give credit to the report, and have occaſioned his expreſſing himſelf in the manner he did, as well in his letter to the city, as afterwards to the two houſes on the aſſembling of the new parliament.

However this might be, the biſhop of Rocheſter was, immediately on his being apprehended, committed to the Tower for high-treaſon, and was ſoon after followed by the earl of Orrery, the lord North and Grey, Mr. Cochran, and Mr. Smith, from Scotland: Mr. George Kelly an Iriſh clergyman, Mr. Robert Cotton of Huntingdonſhire, Mr. Bingley, Mr. Fleetwood, Neynoe, an Iriſh prieſt, and ſeveral other perſons, were alſo taken into cuſtody; and Mr. Shippen, the perpetual arraigner of miniſterial meaſures, had his houſe ſearched. Loud and univerſal were the complaints of all moderate perſons, and thoſe who had a true regard for our happy conſtitution, at ſeeing meaſures purſued that favoured rather of deſpotic power, than the regular proceedings of juſtice in a free country. Theſe clamours, however, were induſtriouſly kept from the ears of the ſovereign, who, doubtleſs, conſcious of the rectitude of his own conduct, paſſed the ſummer of this year in pleaſurable progreſſes through the kingdom, in which he was attended by the prince of Wales.

The new parliament aſſembling on the ninth of October, his majeſty laid before them the nature of the conſpiracy: he ſaid, the conſpirators had, by their emiſſaries, made the ſtrongeſt inſtances for ſucours from foreign powers, but were diſappointed in their expectations: nevertheleſs, confiding in their numbers, they reſolved once more, upon their own ſtrength, to attempt the ſubverſion of his government: he ſaid, they had provided conſiderable ſums of money, engaged great numbers of officers abroad, ſecured large quantities of arms and ammunition; and had not the plot been timely diſcovered, the whole nation, and particularly the city of London, would have been involved in blood and confuſion: he expatiated upon the mildneſs and integrity of his government, and inveighed againſt the ingratitude, the implacability, and madneſs, of the diſaffected; concluding with an aſſurance, that he would ſteadily adhere to the conſtitution in church and ſtate, and continue to make the laws of the realm the rule and meaſure of all his actions.

When we repeat that the miniſtry had procured an undoubted majority in the houſe of commons, it may be ſuppoſed that the addreſs on this occaſion was ſuch as thoſe in power thought proper to dictate; and, as a finiſhing ſtroke, a bill was brought into the houſe for ſuſpending the Habeas Corpus act for one whole year. Complaiſant as the parliament were, they were by no means unanimous in agreeing to ſuch an unuſual length of time, which was, in effect, arming the miniſters with an unlimited power, during that period, over the liberties of the people. The houſe of commons in particular ſhewed themſelves ſo much averſe to ſuch an unconſtitutional meaſure, that Mr. Walpole, now the faſt friend of the miniſtry, had recourſe to ſtate tricks to alarm their apprehenſions; and a dreadful ſtory was coined of a deſign to ſeize the Bank and the Exchequer, and then proclaim the pretender in the Royal Exchange. Abſurd as ſuch a notion muſt appear to every man of common underſtanding, it had its effect: the bill was paſſed, and, we may readily ſuppoſe, did not wait long for the royal aſſent. New attachments, in conſequence of freſh informations, were now iſſued forth againſt ſeveral perſons of rank and diſtinction: the duke of Norfolk was brought from Bath under cuſtody of a king's meſſenger, examined before the council, and committed to the Tower on ſuſpicion of high-treaſon.

As a further proof of the plot, the original and printed copy of a declaration ſigned by the pretender, was ſent to the houſe of peers; a production that ſeemed rather the effect of a diſtempered brain, than the mature or ſerious propoſal of a perſon who had been taught to look upon himſelf as an injured prince, and would have been moſt properly replied to by ſilent contempt. The lords, however, thought proper to give it a ſerious peruſal, and to paſs a ſolemn reſolve, importing, that it was a falſe, ſcandalous, and traitorous libel, and ordered it to be burnt at the Royal Exchange. The commons too concurred in this reſolve, and joined the lords in an addreſs, ſignifying their aſtoniſhment and indignation at the inſolence of the pretender, and aſſuring his majeſty that they were determined to ſupport his title to the crown with their lives and fortunes. Let us, however, peruſe this doughty performance, which was judged worthy the animadverſions of the moſt reſpectable aſſembly in the univerſe. It was dated at Lucca, on the 20th day of September 1722, and appeared to be a propoſal addreſſed to the ſubjects of Great Britain and Ireland, as well as to all foreign princes and ſtates. In this paper the pretender, who thought proper to aſſume the title of James Rex, affected to talk of the late violations of the freedom of elections; conſpiracies invented to give a colour to new oppreſſions; infamous informers; and the ſtate of proſcription, in which he ſuppoſed every honeſt man to be. He then very gravely propoſed, that, if king George would reſign to him the throne of Great Britain, he would, in return, beſtow upon him the title of king in his native dominions, and invite all other ſtates to confirm it. He likewiſe promiſed to leave to king George his ſucceſſion in the Britiſh dominions ſecure, whenever, in due courſe, his natural right ſhould take place.

On the twenty-firſt of November, Layer, one of thoſe who had been confined as accomplices in the plot now under conſideration, was brought to his trial at the bar of the King's Bench. His indictment ſet forth, "That he had been employed in forming a moſt traitorous and horrid plot and conſpiracy againſt his majeſty and his government, by enliſting men for the pretender's ſervice, in order to ſtir up a rebellion; and alſo that he had held correſpondence with the pretender, by carrying letters and treaſonable papers to him beyond ſeas, and from him to the diſaffected in this kingdom." After a trial of ſeventeen hours he was brought in guilty by the jury, and received ſentence of death. He was reprieved from time to time, in hopes of his making diſcoveries; but he either could not or would not ſatisfy theſe expectations, and was at length drawn on a ſledge to Tyburn, and there hanged and quartered, his head being afterwards fixed up at Temple-Bar.

Bills were now brought in for inflicting pains and penalties againſt John Plunket and George Kelly, who were by theſe acts to be kept in cloſe cuſtody during his majeſty's pleaſure, in any priſon in Great Britain; and that they ſhould not attempt to eſcape, on pain of death, to be inflicted upon them and their aſſiſtants.

Mr. Yonge made a motion in the houſe of commons for a bill of the ſame nature againſt the biſhop of Rocheſter, of whoſe guilt there was no other evidence but conjectures and hearſay; all the proofs that could be brought againſt that prelate being reduced to two copies of letters in cyphers, directed to him, to which his proſecutors gave ſuch turn as beſt ſuited their views. The biſhop, finding how matters were likely to go in the lower houſe, ſent a letter to the ſpeaker (Mr. ſpeaker Compton) importing, that he ſhould decline giving the houſe any trouble, contenting himſelf with the opportunity of making his defence before another, of which he had the honour to be a member. Counſel being then heard upon the bill, it was committed to a grand committee, on the ſixth day of April, 1723, when moſt of the Tory members having abſented themſelves from the houſe, as not chuſing to give a ſanction by their preſence to meaſures they thought unjuſt, and knew they could not over-rule; it was then moved that the biſhop ſhould be deprived of his office and benefice, baniſhed the kingdom, and be guilty of felony if he returned; and that it ſhould not be in the king's power to pardon him, without the conſent of parliament; but that he, nevertheleſs, ſhould not forfeit his goods and chattels.

The bill being paſſed, was ſent up to the lords: the biſhop was brought to his trial before them on the ninth of May, when, after he had been heard by himſelf and counſel, the houſe, reſolving itſelf into a grand committee, went through the bill, and on the fifteenth had the third reading, when a motion being made for paſſing it, there aroſe a very long and warm debate. The bill was ſupported by the duke of Argyll, the earl of Seafield, and the lord Lechmere, who uſed every argument they could deviſe to ſhew the guilt of the biſhop, and prove the ſufficiency of the evidence brought to ſupport the charge. On the other hand, earl Cowper, lord Bathurſt, the duke of Wharton, and lord Gower, defended him with no leſs energy. They demonſtrated the danger and injuſtice of ſwerving in ſuch an extraordinary manner as was now done, from the fixed rules of evidence: that ſuch a practice would for ever ſully the luſtre and glory of that illuſtrious houſe: that the admitting of the precarious and uncertain evidence of the clerks of the Poſt-office, was a very dangerous precedent, eſpecially as in this caſe it was taken for granted that thoſe clerks might carry the ſimilitudes of hands four months in their minds. They deſired to know from whom theſe clerks had received the authority to intercept and open letters, eſpecially thoſe of a lord of parliament; and whether the clerks who copied theſe letters had themſelves intercepted the originals? and whether they had received them from any other perſon? They applauded the biſhop for his noble firmneſs in refuſing to anſwer before the houſe of commons, whoſe proceedings (ſaid earl Cowper) in this unprecedented manner againſt a peer of the realm, is ſuch an incroachment on the prerogative of the peerage, that if this houſe ſubmits to it by paſſing the bill, we may be termed the laſt of Britiſh peers, for giving up our privileges *. Notwithſtanding theſe and many other reaſons, equally obvious and forcible, the bill was paſſed by a majority, and afterwards received the royal aſſent. Doctor Freind, the celebrated phyſician, who was a member of the lower houſe, and had exerted himſelf in a diſtinguiſhed manner in defence of the perſecuted biſhop, was, ſoon after the trial, taken into cuſtody, on ſuſpicion of treaſonable practices.

* Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords. Debates in Parliament.

Two other affairs, which made a great talk, was brought before the parliament this ſeſſion; the one was the Harburgh lottery, and the other the Oſtend Eaſt India company. The lottery took its name from the place where it was to be drawn, the town and port of Harburgh, on the river Elbe, within the king's German dominions, where the projector was to ſettle a trade for the woollen-manufacture between England and Germany. The houſe of commons having appointed a committee to examine into this, and other lotteries then carrying on in London, found that this latter was an infamous fraudulent undertaking, ſet on foot with a deſign to enſnare the unwary, many of whom had been drawn in, to their great loſs; whereupon a bill was brought into the lower houſe, and paſſed, to ſuppreſs this lottery, and to oblige the managers of it to refund to the contributors the ſum they had deluded them of. At the ſame time that houſe reſolved to expel from amongſt them the lord viſcount Barrington, of the kingdom of Ireland, for having been concerned in carrying on that fraudulent undertaking *.

The affair of the Oſtend company was as follows: The emperor Charles VI. deſirous to get over the inconvenience he was put to in time of war, for raiſing the neceſſary ſums to carry it on, turned his attention towards commerce, and took ſuch meaſures as he thought moſt likely to eſtabliſh it in his dominion. Oſtend, a ſea-port town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, offered him all the advantages that could favour ſuch a deſign, by the beauty and commodiouſneſs of its harbour. The emperor therefore fixed upon it to be the center of that commerce he had propoſed, and began to eſtabliſh an Eaſt India company there, offering to thoſe who became contributors, ſuch advantages as were moſt likely to allure perſons of a mercantile diſpoſition. There was indeed one obſtacle to the eſtabliſhment of this company which the imperial council had not foreſeen, or at leaſt thought proper to take no notice of; this was, that by the treaty of Munſter the inhabitants of the Netherlands, then under the dominion of the crown of Spain, were expreſsly excluded from all right of trading to the Eaſt Indies. This clauſe had been inſerted at the poſitive inſtances of the Dutch, who were apprehenſive, that if their neighbours were allowed to trade directly to the Indies, they would in time bring into their ports all the riches which had hitherto centered in thoſe of Holland. The Engliſh alſo thought themſelves equally intereſted to oppoſe ſuch a trade; and therefore, upon the emperor's firſt erecting this company in 1716, both they and the Dutch made loud complaints at the court of Vienna, but without receiving any redreſs; and the Oſtenders ſtill continuing their trade to the Eaſt Indies under the emperor's protection and commiſſion, the parliament taking into conſideration the great detriment the Engliſh Eaſt India company had already received, and was likely farther to receive, by this Oſtend company, an act was paſſed this ſeſſion, entitled, "An act for the better ſecuring the lawful trade of his majeſty's ſubjects to and from the Eaſt Indies, and for the more effectual preventing all his majeſty's ſubjects from trading thither under foreign commiſſions;" by which any ſubject ſubſcribing, or being concerned in encouraging any ſubſcription to promote the Eaſt India company in the Auſtrian Netherlands, was declared guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor †. Notwithſtanding this prohibition, many merchants of England engaged in the ſcheme, and the company was actually eſtabliſhed, to the great damage of the Engliſh, French, and Dutch companies.

About the ſame time an act paſſed, by which the two millions of the South-ſea company which had been annihilated, were revived, added to the capital, and divided among the proprietors. A third law was made, for the more effectual execution of juſtice in that part of Southwark called the Mint, where a great number of debtors had taken ſanctuary, on pretence of its being a privileged place. On the twenty-ſeventh day of May the king cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked the parliament for the repeated inſtances they had given of their zeal and affection for his perſon and government, and of their inviolable attachment to the intereſt and welfare of their country ‡.

His majeſty having been detained in England all the laſt year by the affair of the plot, ſet out for his German dominions the very inſtant the parliament broke up. Lords-juſtices were appointed to govern in his abſence; but the prince, though now in his forty-firſt year, was ſtill excluded from the regency; a ſufficient proof that the ſuppoſed reconciliation in the royal family exiſted only in outward appearance. It is remarkable, that the lord Harcourt, formerly ſo ſtrictly united with the earl of Oſtend and queen Anne's other miniſters, and who had defended them with ſo much zeal, was one of the lords juſtices. Before the king left England, he was pleaſed to raiſe the ſon of Mr. Robert Walpole to the peerage, an honour the father had refuſed. Several church-promotions were alſo made; and thoſe who were in confinement on account of the plot, were either releaſed or admitted to bail. A man of war was appointed to convoy the biſhop of Rocheſter over to France, the place he had pitched upon for his aſylum during his exile; and the royal pardon was granted to lord Bolingbroke, who owed this indulgence to the earneſt ſollicitation of the lord Harcourt, though it was vehemently oppoſed at the council-board by Mr. Walpole. On the third day of June his majeſty embarked for Holland, and after ſtaying two days with his brother the biſhop of Oſnabrug, he arrived in perfect health at his palace of Herenhauſen in Hanover, on the eleventh of the ſame month ‡.

The king was attended to Hanover by the ſecretaries of ſtate, the lords Townſhend and Carteret, who were eſteemed able negotiators. Affairs now ſeemed to take a new turn on the continent. A congreſs had been held at Cambray, and another at Brunſwick, in order to ſettle the intereſts of the ſeveral princes of Europe; but matters had been drawn out to ſuch a tedious length, that theſe princes entered into ſeparate negotiations to attain their ſeveral purpoſes.

* Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons. Tindal.
† See Stat. 5 Geo. I.
‡ Ibid. Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons.
§ Hiſt. Reg. Annals Geo. I. Tindal.

The czar and the court of Sweden were on the point of concluding a treaty that ſeemed to threaten the loſs of Bremen and Verden, lately annexed to the electorate of Hanover: the regent of France, and Philip V. king of Spain, had adjuſted all their differences, and their reconciliation was cemented by a double marriage, mademoiſelle de Montpellier, ſecond daughter to the duke of Orleans, being betrothed to the prince of Aſturias, and another daughter to Don Carlos, eldeſt ſon of Philip V. by his ſecond wife. Theſe two princes offered new treaties to England, more advantageous than thoſe already ſubſiſting; but at the ſame time peremptorily demanded the reſtitution of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon; and alſo deſired that his Britannic majeſty would openly declare againſt the Oſtend company. King George was not a little embarraſſed how to act amidſt ſuch jarring intereſts: he was fearful that if he diſguſted the emperor, he might join the czar and the court of Sweden, and promote the deſigns they had formed in favour of the duke of Holſtein's pretenſions to Sleſwick, which our king had guarantied to his Daniſh majeſty. All Italy at this time exclaimed againſt the treaty of London. Memorials were ſent againſt the proceedings of the congreſs of Cambray from the pope, the king of Sardinia, the dukes of Tuſcany, Parma, and Modena, whoſe claims upon the houſe of Auſtria were now ſupported by France: in fine, every thing preſaged a ſudden and ruinous war. In this critical dilemma, king George acquitted himſelf in a manner that was the ſurprize and admiration of all Europe; by his artful and prudent negotiations, he prevented the diſagreeing powers from breaking out into an open rupture: he could not indeed prevail on the court of Vienna to relax in its diſputes with Spain, nor to give up the Oſtend Company; but the emperor promiſed faithfully to obſerve the treaties which he had concluded. His majeſty made a journey to the court of Berlin, while the two Britiſh ſecretaries of ſtate who attended him had frequent conferences with the king of Pruſſia's miniſters, in order to conclude an alliance, to prevent the deſigns of the czar in favour of the duke of Holſtein; but this never took effect *.

While his majeſty continued abroad, he received advice of the death of Philip duke of Orleans, regent of France; an event which gave the king no little concern, as a mutual eſteem had long prevailed between them, owing in a great meaſure to their circumſtances and intereſts being a good deal alike. His majeſty, apprehenſive that the death of the duke might occaſion an alteration in the ſentiments of the French court not altogether for his intereſt, determined to return as ſoon as poſſible to England; but being detained ſome time in Holland by contrary winds, he had, during his abode there, the ſatisfaction to receive the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from France of the good diſpoſition of that court to cultivate, and even improve, the union eſtabliſhed by the late duke of Orleans between the two crowns.

During the king's abſence, the nation loſt a worthy nobleman by the death of earl Cowper, who had twice diſcharged the high office of lord-chancellor with equal diſcernment and integrity. He was profoundly ſkilled in the laws of his country, was bleſſed with a great and penetrating apprehenſion, and diſtinguiſhed by the clearneſs and preciſion of his judgment.

The king arrived in England on the nineteenth day of December, and on the ninth of January, 1724, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech, in which he recommends to the commons the care of the public debts, and expreſſes his ſatisfaction at ſeeing the ſinking fund improved and augmented ſo as to put the debt of the nation into a method of being ſpeedily and gradually diſcharged. We may here, not improperly, take notice of the increaſe of the famous ſinking fund, erected by act in the parliament in the year 1717, named the Sinking Fund; which increaſe proceeded from the ſurpluſſes of the other three already deſcribed funds, either by paying off part of their capital or principal debt, or elſe by a reduction of the rate of their intereſt, payable by the public. The ſaid Sinking Fund therefore, we may obſerve, was now encreaſed to ſix hundred and fifty-three thouſand pounds, and was ſtill more conſiderably augmented afterwards. And now the commons, in compliance with his majeſty's intimation in his ſpeech, proceeded to take into conſideration the public debts of the kingdom, and a bill was brought in for leſſening the ſame; by which it was provided, that the annuities of five per cent. charged on the general fund by a former act, except ſuch as had been ſubſcribed into the South-ſea, together with the unſubſcribed blanks of the lottery in the year 1714, ſhould be paid off at Lady-day 1724, with the money ariſing from the Sinking Fund. The ſupplies next engroſſed the attention of the commons, who acquitted themſelves therein to the entire ſatisfaction of the court. They voted ten thouſand ſeamen at four pounds per month each, and the army was continued on the ſame footing as laſt year. This latter affair, however, was not determined without occaſioning great altercations, ſeveral worthy patriots oppoſing, with all their might, the keeping up ſo large a force in time of peace; yet it was carried againſt them, as indeed almoſt every other meaſure now was, by the venal retainers of the miniſtry; and it was reſolved that the number of effectual men for the year 1724 (including one thouſand eight hundred and fifteen invalids) ſhould be eighteen thouſand two hundred and ſixty-four: the expence of the year was provided for by the land-tax and malt-tax.

There had been for ſome time very loud complaints made, by the trading part of the nation, of the abuſe of protections granted by foreign miniſters, peers, and members of parliament, under which profligate perſons uſed to ſcreen themſelves from the proſecution of their legal creditors. It was therefore reſolved by the lower houſe, on taking this matter into their ſerious conſideration, that all protections granted by members of that houſe ſhould be declared void, and immediately withdrawn; that none ſhould be granted for the future; and that if any member ſhould preſume to contravene this order, he ſhould make ſatisfaction to the party injured, and be liable to the cenſure of the houſe. The lords made a declaration to the ſame purpoſe, with an exception of menial ſervants, and thoſe neceſſarily employed about the eſtates of peers.

No matter of importance now remaining to be diſcuſſed by the great aſſembly of the nation, his majeſty, on the twenty-fourth of April, came to the houſe of peers, and, after a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, in which he particularly thanked the commons for the care and pains they had taken towards augmenting the Sinking Fund, and improving the public revenues, by putting them under a ſtricter management, the parliament was prorogued †.

A little before the cloſe of the ſeſſion, his majeſty was pleaſed to make ſome alterations in the great offices, by appointing the duke of Newcaſtle to be ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of the lord Carteret, who was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland; the duke of Grafton was appointed lord-chamberlain; the lord Falmouth and Mr. Edgcombe, vice-treaſurers of Ireland; Mr. Yonge, a commiſſioner of the Treaſury; and Mr. Pelham, ſecretary at war. Sir Robert Raymond was made a judge of the court of King's Bench, and was ſucceeded in his former poſt of attorney-general by ſir Philip Yorke (afterwards earl of Hardwick, and lord-chancellor of England); and ſir Clement Wearg was made ſollicitor general, in the room of ſir Philip Yorke. About the ſame time, Mr Horatio Walpole, brother to Mr. Robert Walpole, was ſent to the court of France with the character of ambaſſador-extraordinary‡.

I ſhould think myſelf inexcuſable, did I paſs over unnoticed the ſtriking proof his majeſty gave at this time of his royal regard for the encouragement and promotion of learning, in his circular letter of May 16 this year, (1724) ſent to the two univerſities; wherein, having taken notice that no proviſion had hitherto been made in either for the ſtudy of Modern Languages and Modern Hiſtory, and of the inconveniencies ariſing from that defect, he ſays, "In order to remedy theſe and the like inconveniencies, we have determined to appoint two perſons, of ſober converſation and prudent conduct, of the degree of Maſter of Arts, Bachelor of Laws, or of ſome higher degree in one of the ſaid univerſities, ſkilled in modern hiſtory, and in the knowlege of modern languages, to be nominated by us, to be our profeſſors of modern hiſtory, one in the univerſity of Cambridge, and the other for that of Oxford, who ſhall be obliged to read lectures in the public ſchools at ſuch times as ſhall be appointed. And we have farther determined, That each of the ſaid profeſſors ſhall have a ſtipend of four hundred pounds per annum each, and out of the ſaid ſtipend ſhall be obliged to maintain, with ſufficient ſalaries, in the univerſity, perſons at leaſt well qualified to teach and inſtruct in writing and ſpeaking the ſaid languages; which ſaid teachers ſhall be under the direction of the profeſſors reſpectively, and be obliged to inſtruct gratis, in the modern languages, twenty ſcholars in each univerſity, to be nominated by us; and each ſcholar ſo nominated ſhall be obliged to learn two at leaſt of the ſaid languages, &c." Accordingly, Mr. Gregory of Chriſt-church, Oxford, and Mr. Samuel Harris, Fellow of Peter-houſe, Cambridge, were nominated and appointed the two firſt profeſſors. For a farther encouragement to the univerſities, the king was pleaſed to order that his lord-almoner ſhould chuſe, out of the members of Oxford and Cambridge, twenty-four preachers, to officiate alternately in the chapel at Whitehall, with a ſalary of thirty pounds per annum each.

On the twenty-firſt of May this year died Robert Harley, earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer, who had been a munificent patron of genius and literature; and the month following the famous Dr. Henry Sacheverel, who had made ſo great a noiſe during the laſt reign, departed this life, after having bequeathed a legacy of five hundred pounds to his friend and patron Dr. Atterbury, the deprived biſhop of Rocheſter.

As to foreign affairs, one of the moſt remarkable events this year, was the abdication of Philip V. of Spain, who, retiring with his queen to the monaſtery of St. Ildefonſo, ſent the marquis de Grimaldi, his principal ſecretary of ſtate, to his ſon don Lewis, prince of Aſturias, with a ſolemn renunciation of the crown, and a letter of advice, in which we can diſcern nothing remarkable, either in the ſtyle or ſentiments. Amongſt other inſtructions, he ſays, "Preſerve ever a great devotion for the moſt holy Virgin, and put yourſelf, as well as your kingdom, under her protection, ſeeing you cannot by any other means better obtain what may be needful for you and for them." We conceive that this will be a ſufficient ſpecimen to our readers, of the abilities and good ſenſe of this monarch. The renunciation was publiſhed throughout the whole Spaniſh monarchy, and the council reſolved, that Lewis, as acknowleged prince of Spain, might aſſume the reins of government without aſſembling the cortes, or eſtates of the kingdom *.

This year a moſt bloody edict was publiſhed in France againſt the proteſtants reſiding in that kingdom, ordering, "that whoever performed any exerciſe of the reformed religion, if a man, ſhould be ſent to the gallies; if a woman, ſhould be ſhaved and committed to priſon; that the proteſtant preachers and teachers ſhould be put to death; and all who held communication directly or indirectly with them, be condemned to the gallies. Our government intereſting itſelf in the ſufferings of their perſecuted brethren, ſent orders to Mr. Horace Walpole, to make preſſing inſtances to the French court in behalf of the proteſtants: all the anſwer he could obtain, however, was, "that the king's edicts muſt be obeyed."

Great Britain at this period enjoyed profound tranquility. The government had triumphed over all oppoſition, and, notwithſtanding the heavy load of taxes under which the people laboured, yet, ſuch is the ſpirit and genius of the Britiſh nation for commerce, it was obſerved ſtill to be conſtantly flouriſhing ¶.

¶ Eraſmus Philips, eſq. an author of good credit, gives us an inſtance thereof in his pamphlet, publiſhed in the year 1726, entitled, "The ſtate of the nation in reſpect to her common debts and money;" wherein he acquaints us, that from the year 1701, to the year 1723, the amount of the Britiſh cuſtoms was ſo conſiderable, that the neat money paid into the Exchequer, on an average, for the ſaid twenty-three years, was one million four hundred forty-ſix thouſand twenty-two pounds per annum, even excluſive of ſeizures; and with ſeizures it amounted to one million four hundred ſixty-ſeven thouſand five hundred and ninety-three pounds neat money per annum.

This

This year being barren of ſuch events as deſerve a place in hiſtory, we ſhall therefore only mention the parliament, which met on the twelfth of November, and ſeemed to be aſſembled for no other purpoſe than that of eſtabliſhing funds for the expence of the enſuing year; though the ſeſſion was diſtinguiſhed by one remarkable incident, namely, the trial of the earl of Macclesfield, who, on the reſignation of the earl Cowper, in 1718, had been made lord high-chancellor. There having been great complaints concerning ſome abuſes in relation to the maſters in chancery, which, though practiſed before, were now grown to an enormous height, the earl of Macclesfield, who had incurred the general reproach of the nation on account of his connivance at certain venal practices touching the ſale of places and the money of ſuitors depoſited in the court of Chancery, found it neceſſary to reſign the great-ſeal in the beginning of January, 1725. He was afterwards impeached for high crimes and miſdemeanors; and being found guilty, on trial, of the above mal-practices, he was fined thirty thouſand pounds, and committed to the Tower till he ſhould pay the ſum, which he did at the end of ſix weeks, and was then diſcharged. Sir Peter King, created baron of Oakham, ſucceeded him in the office of chancellor; and an act was paſſed for the relief of the ſuitors in the court of Chancery.

Whilſt the earl of Macclesfield's affair was under conſideration, the famous act was paſſed "for regulating elections in the city of London, and for preſerving the peace, good order, and government of the city." In this law, which is now the rule for all the elections in the city, there is a clauſe, by which the right of election of aldermen and common-council men belongs to freemen being houſholders, paying ſcot and lot to the amount of thirty ſhillings, provided they have inhabited houſes of ten pounds per annum rent, twelve calendar months. This, and ſome other particulars, occaſioned a petition of the freemen of London againſt the bill, while it was depending; and when paſſed into an act, it gave great offence to the citizens, who proceeded ſo riotouſly on the occaſion, that the government thought proper to double the guards at St. James's, Leiceſter and Somerſet-houſes; and ſuch other precautions were taken, as reduced all things to their former ſtate of tranquility. In this ſame ſeſſion Henry St. John, lord viſcount Bolingbroke (who, having made his peace with his majeſty, was come over to England) was, upon his humble petition, after ſome debate, admitted to enjoy his eſtates, and an act paſſed for that purpoſe, though he was never reſtored to his title.

On the eighth of April, his majeſty ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons by Mr. Robert Walpole, importing, "that having been engaged in ſome extraordinary expences, he hoped he ſhould be enabled to raiſe a ſum of money by making uſe of the funds lately eſtabliſhed for the payment of the civil liſt annuities, in order to diſcharge the debts contracted in the civil government." This meſſage occaſioned very warm debates in the houſe. Mr. William Pulteney (afterwards ſo very famous for his oppoſition to the Walpolian adminiſtration, and ſubſequent degeneracy), who was then cofferer of the houſhold, and began to be diſſatisfied with the meaſures of the miniſtry, moved for an addreſs, "That an account ſhould be laid before the houſe, of all moneys paid for ſecret ſervice, penſions, and bounties, from the twenty-fifth of March, 1701, to the twenty-fifth of the ſame month in the preſent year." His motion was agreed to; the addreſs was voted; and it was then moved to conſider the king's meſſage; but Mr. Pulteney urged, that this conſideration ſhould be poſtponed until the houſe ſhould have examined the papers that were the ſubject of the addreſs. "He could not (he ſaid) without ſurprize hear of a debt of above five hundred thouſand pounds being contracted in three years: but there was no room to wonder (he continued) at the earneſtneſs ſome perſons ſhewed to make good the deficiencies of the civil liſt, the revenues of which were in a manner ſhared between them and their friends." He concluded with expreſſing his deſire of being informed, whether this ſum of half a million was all that was due? Theſe ſarcaſms were evidently aimed at Walpole, who, with unembarraſſed compoſure (which he ever oppoſed to all the darts levelled at him by his opponents) took upon him to anſwer Mr. Pulteney's objections. The reſult of this debate was, that the majority paſſed a bill, enabling his majeſty to raiſe a ſum not exceeding one million, by exchequer bills, loans, or otherwiſe, on the credit of the deductions of ſix pence per pound, directed by an act of parliament of the ſeventh year of his majeſty, and of the civil-liſt revenues, at an intereſt not exceeding three pounds per cent. till payment of the principal.

An act being paſſed for diſarming the Scottiſh Highlanders, that for the elections of the city of London, a third for reducing the intereſt of ſeveral Bank annuities from five to four per cent. with ſome other bills of a private nature, the parliament was prorogued in May, after the king had, in a ſpeech to both houſes, thanked them, in the moſt cordial manner, for the repeated inſtances they had given of their duty and affection to him, and their zeal for the honour and intereſt of their country. Then, having appointed lords-juſtices to rule the nation in his abſence, he ſet out, on the third of June, for his German dominions *.

Immediately after this ſeſſion of parliament, the king revived the order of knights of the Bath, of which prince William (the late duke of Cumberland) was the firſt, and the duke of Montague was appointed grand-maſter. Among the knights were Mr. Robert Walpole, and his ſon lord Walpole. The whole number was thirty-eight, including the ſovereign. Several promotions were likewiſe made: Mr. Methuen was appointed treaſurer of the houſehold, and the earl of Lincoln cofferer in the room of Mr. Pulteney, who reſigned that place in diſguſt. Soon after ſir Robert Walpole was honoured by his majeſty with the order of the Garter.

The ſtate of affairs on the continent had by this time undergone a conſiderable change. Lewis the young king of Spain, dying ſoon after his advancement to the throne, his father Philip reſumed the ſovereign rule, which he had quitted, and now reſigned himſelf entirely to the hands of the queen, a princeſs of deep intrigue and unbounded ambition. The long-depending mediation of Great Britain and France at the congreſs of Cambray, for compromiſing the differences between the emperor and the king of Spain, coming to nothing, by the Spaniſh court's being extremely irritated at the French king, Lewis XV. for ſending back the infanta of Spain, to whom he had been eſpouſed; and king George declining to act without France; the queen of Spain, diſappointed in this quarter, propoſed a private negociation to the court of Vienna, which readily accepted the offer. The conferences were immediately opened, and conducted under the direction of the baron de Riperda, a native of Holland, who had renounced the proteſtant religion, and engaged in the ſervice of his catholic majeſty. The firſt treaty of Vienna, as it is called, was quickly concluded, and ſigned the thirteenth of April, 1725, and the next day a treaty of commerce was alſo ſigned.

By the treaty of peace, the emperor acknowleged Philip as king of Spain and the Indies, and promiſed not to moleſt him in the poſſeſſion of thoſe dominions that were ſecured to him by the treaty of Utrecht. Philip renounced all pretenſions to the dominions in Italy and the Netherlands, adjudged to the emperor by the treaty of London, 1722. Charles granted the inveſtiture of the dukedoms of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, to the eldeſt ſon of the queen of Spain, failing heirs in the preſent poſſeſſors, as maſculine fiefs of the empire. Spain guarantied the Auſtrian ſucceſſion, according to the pragmatic ſanction, by which the dominions of that houſe were ſettled on the emperor's heirs of either ſex, and declared to be a perpetual, indiviſible, and inſeparable feoffment to the primogeniture.

None of the powers of Europe had any reaſon to take umbrage at this treaty; but the caſe was very different with the treaty of commerce, which was deemed highly prejudicial to the intereſt of Great Britain, as the Oſtend company, which the emperor had eſtabliſhed, was to be ſupported by it; and the reſtitution of Gibraltar and Port Mahon to the Spaniards ſeemed to be the conſequence thereof; and it was even ſaid, that there were ſecret articles in favour of the pretender. However that might be, all Europe was aſtoniſhed to ſee Philip V. and Charles VI. formerly irreconcileable enemies, now united in the ſtrongeſt bonds of friendſhip; and affairs deviated from their natural courſe to ſuch a degree, that the miniſtry of Madrid governed the court of Vienna for a whole year.

By the treaty concluded at Vienna, already related, we have ſeen, that the imperial court, whoſe intention had conſtantly been to exclude the French branch which reigned over Spain, from all acceſs to Italy, ſo far loſt ſight of its firſt views, as to admit a ſon of Philip V. (duke of Anjou) and Elizabeth of Parma, his ſecond wife, into that very country, from which they formerly laboured to exclude every Frenchman and every Spaniard. Though the ſucceſſion of Parma and the grand-duchy of Tuſcany was not made public, don Carlos was introduced with ſix thouſand Spaniards, and it coſt Spain only twenty thouſand piſtoles, which were paid at Vienna. The imperial forces were now augmented to a conſiderable number, and other powers were ſolicited to engage in this alliance, to which the czar actually acceded*.

This imprudent ſtep of the emperor's council was by no means one of thoſe, which, in ſome inſtances, are productive of happy conſequences: it coſt Charles very dear in the ſequel. In the mean time the king of Great Britain took the alarm, and, in order to counteract the deſigns of theſe new allies, he projected a defenſive treaty between England, France, and Pruſſia, known by the name of the treaty of Hanover. This alliance, limited to the term of fifteen years, was ſigned at Hanover, while his majeſty was there, on the third of September, 1725. It contained a mutual guaranty of the dominions poſſeſſed by the contracting parties, their rights and privileges, thoſe of commerce in particular, with an agreement to procure ſatisfaction to the proteſtants of Thorn, in Poland, who had been oppreſſed by the papiſts, contrary to the treaty of Oliva. Nothing can be more clear, than that the apprehenſion of the emperor's making ſome attempts upon king George's German dominions, had been the principal motive for concluding the treaty of Hanover; though, in order to make it go down with the Engliſh at home, and ſecure the approbation of the Britiſh parliament, the miniſtry repreſented it as an engagement that had been contracted purely for the advantage and glory of England.

His majeſty having taken theſe neceſſary precautions at Hanover, ſet out on his return to England in the middle of December, and came to Helvoetſluys, where ſir John Norris waited with the convoy and yachts, and where his majeſty embarked in the Carolina yacht on New-year's day, about one in the afternoon. Towards ſeven that evening there aroſe a moſt violent tempeſt, which continued ſo high, and the ſea ſo boiſterous for thirty-ſix hours, that the whole fleet was in the utmoſt danger; at length, however, his majeſty with great difficulty landed at Rye, on the fourth day, from whence he proceeded by land to London.

In the courſe of this year was erected Guy's hoſpital, at the ſole expence of Thomas Guy, formerly a bookſeller in London, afterwards member of parliament for Tamworth, who left a benefaction of two hundred thouſand pounds for the ſupport of that charitable eſtabliſhment.

The duke of Wharton having ruined his fortune by riot and debauchery, repaired this year to the court of Vienna, from whence he proceeded to Rome, and offered his ſervice to the pretender, where he received the order of the Garter, and the title of duke of Northumberland. He was ſent by the pretender, with credentials, to the court of Madrid, where king George was no ſooner informed of his arrival, than he diſpatched a meſſenger with a letter under the privy-ſeal, commanding him, upon his allegiance, to return immediately to England. This letter being delivered to him, as he rode through the ſtreets in a coach, he loudly exclaimed againſt the inſolence of a Britiſh officer of juſtice in executing a ſummons upon him within ſight of his Catholic majeſty's palace; he even threatened to preſent a memorial on the ſubject to the court of Spain, and demand juſtice againſt the Engliſh meſſenger; but Philip, being privately acquainted with the matter, abſolutely refuſed to interpoſe his authority. The duke afterwards abjured the Proteſtant religion, married a lady of the queen of Spain's bed-chamber, and obtained the rank and appointments of a lieutenant-colonel in the Spaniſh ſervice*.

On the twentieth of January, 1726, the parliament met, when his majeſty, in his ſpeech, gave them to underſtand, "That the diſtreſſed condition of ſome of their proteſtant brethren abroad, and the negociations and engagements contracted by ſome foreign powers, which ſeem to have laid the foundation of new troubles and diſturbances in Europe, and to threaten his ſubjects with the loſs of ſeveral of the moſt advantageous branches of their trade, had obliged him to concert with other powers ſuch meaſures as might give a check to the ambitious views of thoſe who were endeavouring to render themſelves formidable, and put a ſtop to the farther progreſs of ſuch dangerous deſigns. He told them, that the enemies to his government were already very buſy by their inſtruments and emiſſaries in thoſe courts, whoſe meaſures ſeemed moſt to favour their purpoſes, in ſoliciting and promoting the cauſe of the pretender; but he perſuaded himſelf, notwithſtanding the countenance and encouragement they might either have received, or expected to receive, that the proviſion made by his parliament for the ſafety and defence of his kingdoms, would effectually ſecure them from all danger of foreign invaſion, or domeſtic inſurrection: that, when the world ſhould ſee, that they would not ſuffer the Britiſh crown and nation to be inſulted with impunity, thoſe, who moſt envied the tranquility and happineſs of this kingdom, and were endeavouring to make it ſubſervient to their ambitious projects, would have ſome regard to their own intereſt and circumſtances, before they preſumed to make any attempt upon ſo brave a people, ſtrengthened and ſupported by powerful alliances, and, however deſirous of peace, able and ready to defend themſelves againſt all aggreſſors: that ſuch reſolutions, and ſuch meaſures, if timely taken, would, he was ſatisfied, be the moſt effectual means of preventing a war, and preſerving to his people the bleſſings of peace and proſperity†".

Addreſſes ſuitable to this ſpeech were preſented by both houſes; and the commons proceeded to conſider of the ſupply, when, in ſpite of all the oppoſition made by Pulteney, who now began to ſet himſelf up to thwart every meaſure of the court, the ſame number of land-forces, and the ſame proviſion for them, were voted. Mr. Pulteney then endeavoured to get a committee appointed for taking the ſtate of the public debts; but in this he was likewiſe baffled, moſt of the Tories then in the houſe being againſt it.

The treaties of Hanover and Vienna being laid before the commons, they were debated in a very full houſe, no leſs than four hundred and twenty members being preſent. The debate was opened by Mr. Horace Walpole, ambaſſador at the court of France, who, in a long and ſtudied ſpeech, entered into a detail of the affairs of Europe ſince the treaty of Utrecht. He recapitulated the ſubſtance of the barrier-treaty; the defenſive alliance with the emperor; another with the moſt Chriſtian king and the States-general; a ſubſequent convention; the quadruple alliance; the congreſs of Cambray; the treaty of Vienna, and that of Hanover: he explained the motive of each agreement. The treaty of commerce between the emperor and Spain had been entered into, he ſaid, chiefly with a deſign to countenance and ſupport the Eaſt India company eſtabliſhed at Oſtend, which interfered ſo eſſentially with the Eaſt India companies of England and Holland, and was directly contrary to ſeveral ſolemn treaties in force. He expatiated on the dangers to which the ballance of power would be expoſed, ſhould the iſſue male of the projected marriage between the emperor's eldeſt daughter and don Carlos, the infant of Spain, ever poſſeſs the imperial dignity and the kingdom of Spain together. He finiſhed with ſaying, "That it had been in order to prevent the farther progreſs and final execution of theſe dangerous and deſtructive deſigns, that the king had concluded the treaty of Hanover, the nature of which had been already laid before them; and that from a candid compariſon of all circumſtances, he believed he might ſafely infer, that his majeſty had diſcovered the moſt conſummate wiſdom in all the meaſures he had taken." One cannot without ſome degree of indignation reflect, that this very man, who now expreſſed ſuch apprehenſion at the proſpect of the power of the houſe of Auſtria and Spain being immediately united in one perſon, had been the moſt violent in exclaiming againſt that article of the treaty of Utrecht, which prevented the union of thoſe two crowns. For this and other inſtances of verſatility, this gentleman became afterwards to be ludicrouſly termed the Balance Maſter.

This ſpeech, however, occaſioned a great debate: it was alleged by the members in the oppoſition, that the treaty of Hanover would engage the Britiſh nation in a war for the defence of the king's German dominions, contrary to an expreſs proviſion in the act of limitation. To this it was replied by the other ſide, that the true meaning and intent of that limitation, was not wholly and for ever to deprive his majeſty's foreign dominions of any aſſiſtance from this nation, but only to reſtrain the ſovereign for the future from engaging the nation in a war for the defence of any dominions not belonging to the crown of Great Britain, without the conſent of parliament. Mr. Pelham ſaid, that, for his own part, he was of opinion, that if, in the preſent juncture of affairs, his majeſty's foreign dominions ſhould be attacked or inſulted, this nation ought to ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty againſt all his enemies; he therefore moved for an addreſs to his majeſty, approving the alliance he had concluded at Hanover, in order to obviate and diſappoint the dangerous views and conſequences of the treaty of peace between the emperor and the king of Spain, and promiſing to ſupport his majeſty againſt all inſults and attacks that ſhould be made upor any of his territories, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain ‡.

In vain did Mr. Shippen, and others of the Tory members, exhauſt all their eloquence to impreſs on the minds of the aſſembly a ſenſe of the dangerous conſequences to this kingdom that muſt attend our having a connexion with the concerns of the continent; the oppoſition was ſo inconſiderable, that the addreſs was voted by a majority of two hundred and eighty-five againſt one hundred and ſeven, and was preſented on the nineteenth of February, to which his majeſty returned the following anſwer:

"Gentlemen,

"I return you my thanks for this particular mark of your duty, affection, and confidence in me: your aſſurances, not to ſuffer my foreign dominions to be expoſed or inſulted, on account of the meaſures I have taken for the intereſt of theſe kingdoms, will, I hope, be a means to preſerve the tranquility of Europe. I have no views of ambition to gratify; I have no thought of aggrandizing myſelf, or extending any part of my dominions at the expence of the other; and as my honour is the common cauſe and concern of my ſubjects, their particular intereſt ſhall, upon all occaſions, be my conſtant care."

There was a pretty warm debate in the houſe of lords about the treaty of Hanover, but as the court party was all-powerful, they carried an addreſs, to much the ſame purport as that of the commons, which was preſented at the ſame time, and received the like anſwer from the throne *.

The extenſion of the malt-tax to Scotland was productive of great diſturbances in that kingdom, the people abſolutely refuſing to pay it. At Glaſgow, in particular, the populace roſe, and in a riotous manner broke into and rifled the houſe of Mr. Daniel Campbell, their repreſentative in parliament, who had voted for the bill, and maltreated ſome exciſemen who had attempted to viſit the houſes of the maltſters. Upon this the commiſſioners had recourſe to general Wade, commander in chief of the Britiſh forces in Scotland, who ordered captain Buſhel, with two companies of foot, to march to Glaſgow, in order to appeaſe this diſturbance. The captain obeyed his orders; but the rabble aſſembling in a prodigious multitude, and arming themſelves with ſuch offenſive weapons as they could pick up, attacked this ſmall detachment with the utmoſt fury. The captain, conſcious of his own inability to reſiſt ſuch a numerous and enraged multitude, thought proper to retreat to Dunbarton, where he got in ſafety, though purſued by the mob to the diſtance of ſix miles.

No ſooner was general Wade informed of this tranſaction, than, aſſembling a good body of forces, and being accompanied by Duncan Forbes, lord-advocate, he marched into and took poſſeſſion of Glaſgow, when, being informed that the magiſtrates had been moſt ſhamefully remiſs in their duty, on occaſion of the late riot, he thought proper to have them apprehended and conveyed priſoners to Edinburgh caſtle: they were, however, ſoon releaſed from their confinement by the lords juſticiaries, who having taken cognizance of the affair, declared them innocent. Some of the rabble however, were puniſhed for the riot, and four of them ſentenced to be ſcourged and tranſported ‖.

This diſturbance had happened towards the cloſe of the laſt ſummer; and Mr. Daniel Campbell having petitioned the houſe of commons this ſeſſion, that he might be indemnified for the damage he had ſuſtained from the mob, a bill paſſed in his favour, granting him a certain ſum, to be raiſed by an impoſition of two pennies Scots upon all beer and ale brewed within the city of Glaſgow.

A bill was alſo brought in, empowering the commiſſioners of the Treaſury to compound with Mr. Richard Hampden, late treaſurer of the navy, for a debt he owed to the crown, amounting to forty-eight thouſand pounds. This deficiency was occaſioned by his engaging in the South ſea ſcheme. The king recommended his petition; and the houſe complied with his requeſt, in conſideration of his great-grandfather, the famous John Hampden, who made ſuch a noble ſtand againſt the arbitrary impoſition of ſhip money in the commencement of the civil war §.

On the twenty-fourth day of March the king ſent a meſſage to the houſe by ſir Paul Methuen, deſiring the aſſiſtance of his parliament, by an extraordinary ſupply, to enable him to encreaſe his naval force, and to take ſuch other meaſures as ſhould be found neceſſary in the preſent critical conjuncture of affairs. This meſſage occaſioned a debate of ſix hours, but it was at laſt reſolved, by a very great majority, to comply with his majeſty's demand †: but as this demand had not been communicated to the lords, though the king mentioned "the aſſiſtance of the parliament," it gave great umbrage to many of the peers.

The earl of Strafford in particular inſiſted that the meſſage was unprecedented, and ſtruck at the ancient privileges of the peers, who are the great ſtanding council of the ſovereign, the hereditary guardians of the liberties and properties of the people, and, next to their ſovereign, the principal part of the legiſlature; therefore ought to be conſulted in all matters of public concern. His lordſhip therefore moved that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, to know who adviſed him to ſend ſuch a meſſage to the commons, without at the ſame time communicating it to the peers.

Lord Bathurſt alſo obſerved, that the appellation of parliament being given to the commons excluſively of the lords, was certainly a new and unprecedented ſtile, and very different from the language of former times. If the lords, he ſaid, ſuffered themſelves to be overlooked and neglected in this inſtance, they might come at laſt to be voted uſeleſs, as had formerly been the caſe; and therefore, leſt any conſequence of this kind ſhould enſue, he was for the addreſs. Theſe efforts of the oppoſite party, however, were very little regarded by the miniſtry: the affair was dropt; and the ſupplies ordinary and extraordinary being granted, with every thing elſe which the court thought proper to aſk, his majeſty diſmiſſed the parliament on the twenty-fourth of May 1726 ‡.

I ſhall now take a ſhort view of the ſtate of affairs abroad.

As ſoon as the courts of Vienna and Madrid apprehended that their views were croſſed, and the ends propoſed by their conjunction utterly diſappointed, by the counter-alliance at Hanover, they immediately reſolved to have recourſe to ulterior negotiations, in order to increaſe the number of their allies; and when they ſhould find themſelves

ſufficiently

ſufficiently powerful, to reſort to open force. To render this ſcheme more effectual, the emperor began to execute projects in the North, in which he met at firſt with ſome extraordinary ſucceſs. Peter the Great, czar of Muſcovy, was now dead ‡, and his empreſs Catherine had ſucceeded him on the throne. This princeſs had conceived a diſtaſte to the Britiſh court, and had, by ſome Scottiſh people about her, been drawn to believe it might prove no difficult matter to ſet up the ſon of the late king James II. and ſo overturn the government in Britain. The ſame ſcheme had been propoſed and countenanced at the imperial court by ſome of the miniſters. The Spaniſh court readily adopted that or any other expedient which might procure them Gibraltar, and facilitate their acquiſitions in Italy, then, and ſtill, the great objects of their policy. Thus the Hanover alliance, originally contrived for the ſecuring that electorate, proved the means of bringing it into ſome degree of danger. It has generally been ſaid, and I believe with truth, that the ſecretary of ſtate, then abroad with his majeſty, was the ſole, or at leaſt the principal, adviſer in that affair, which gave a new turn to our politics, and engaged us in a ſcheme for humbling the houſe of Auſtria, which we had ſo long, and even ſo lately, ſupported.

However this might be, the Engliſh miniſtry, who had now all things in their own power, and were at full liberty to act as they thought fit, reſolved to ſupport the Hanoverian alliance; and therefore, as ſoon as they were informed of the ſchemes planning by the allies of Vienna, they exerted their utmoſt efforts to diſappoint them; and, without truſting to their good allies the French, or to their ſlow aſſiſtance, they choſe the ſhorteſt and moſt expeditious method poſſible of aſſerting themſelves. With this view it was reſolved to ſend a ſtrong fleet into the Baltic, to awe the czarina, to bring round Denmark, and to keep ſteady Sweden. It was likewiſe thought requiſite to have another ſtrong ſquadron on the coaſt of Spain, to intimidate his Catholic majeſty, and render any efforts he might make for the recovery of Gibraltar ineffectual: and, to ſum up all, as they very well knew that money was not only the ſinews of war, but the great bond of friendſhip among princes, they determined to ſend a conſiderable force to the Indies, in order to block up the galleons, as the ſhorteſt means of diſſolving the union between their Imperial and Catholic majeſties; being ſatisfied, if the former could not receive his ſubſidies, the latter could never rely on his aſſiſtance §. Such were the plans on both ſides at this critical juncture. We come now to ſee how theſe were carried into execution.

The command of the fleet intended for the Baltic was given to ſir Charles Wager, vice-admiral of the red, who had under him ſir George Walton, rear-admiral of the blue. The ſquadron they were to command conſiſted of twenty ſhips of the line, one frigate, and two fire-ſhips. Sir Charles having received his final inſtructions, ſet ſail from the Nore on the ſeventeenth of April, and on the twenty-third of the ſame month the fleet came to an anchor in the road of Copenhagen. The next day ſir Charles preſented to the king of Denmark a letter, with which he was charged by king George; and ſoon after quitting Copenhagen, he anchored with his fleet near Stockholm. Having had an audience of his Swediſh majeſty, by whom he was moſt graciouſly received, he ſailed with his ſquadron to the iſland of Narginan, within a few leagues of Revel. About the ſame time a ſquadron of Dutch men of war ſailed from Copenhagen for the iſland of Bornholm, in order to join the Britiſh ſquadron.

Sir Charles Wager took the firſt opportunity of ſending a letter he had been charged with to the czarina, incloſed to her admiral Apraxin, who was then lying in the road of Cronſlot with ſixteen Ruſſian men of war, beſides a great number of gallies. Our king, in his letter to the czarina, expoſtulated very freely with her majeſty on the ſubject of the armaments by ſea and land which ſhe had been for ſome time preparing, as alſo on the intrigues which her miniſters had lately entered into with the agents of the pretender. The Ruſſian court was not a little nettled at this appearance of a Britiſh fleet upon their coaſts, and was inclined to have come to extremities rather than endure it: but maturer reflection convincing them that the Ruſſian fleet was in no condition to venture an engagement with that of Great Britain, it was reſolved in council to order the ſhips and gallies to be laid up; and the empreſs wrote a letter to king George, by way of anſwer to that which ſhe had received from him. In this letter ſhe expreſſed her ſurprize that ſhe had not received his majeſty's letter until his fleet was at anchor in one of her ports, ſince it would have been more agreeable to the cuſtom eſtabliſhed among ſovereigns, and to the amity which had ſo long ſubſiſted between her kingdoms and the crown of Great Britain, to expoſtulate with her on her armaments, and expect her anſwers, before he had proceeded to ſuch an offenſive meaſure. She aſſured him that nothing was farther from her thoughts than any deſign to trouble the peace of the North; and with regard to the pretender, it was, ſhe ſaid, a frivolous and ſtale accuſation, which had been frequently uſed as a pretext to cover all the unkind ſteps taken againſt the Ruſſian empire.

This letter was dated the fifteenth of June, 1726; and our fleet being ſoon after joined by the Daniſh ſquadron, they both remained before Revel till the twenty-eighth of September, when admiral Wager, having received certain intelligence that the Ruſſians would not be able to attempt any thing that year, ſailed for Copenhagen, and from thence home, arriving ſafely at the Nore on the firſt of November ¶.

The fleet that was ſent to the coaſt of Spain was commanded by ſir John Jennings, and conſiſted of nine large ſhips of war, which were afterwards joined in the Mediterranean by ſeveral ſhips that were cruizing there. The admiral ſailed on the twentieth of July from St. Helen's with a good body of land-forces on board, and on the third of Auguſt entered the bay of St. Antonio; then he viſited Liſbon, from whence he directed his courſe to the bay of Bulls, near Cadiz, and cruized off Cape St. Mary's, ſo as to alarm the coaſt of Spain, and fill Madrid with conſternation.

‡ The czar died on the 28th of January, 1726. § Polit. Stat. Campbell. ¶ Hiſt. Reg. Annal. Tindal. Naval Hiſt.

It would be tedious, and little intereſting, was I to enter into a minute detail of the motions of this ſquadron, which returned to Spithead ſoon after. It is ſufficient to obſerve, that it anſwered perfectly the ends propoſed by it, by alarming the court of Spain to ſuch a degree as to make them diſavow the engagements they had entered into with the court of Vienna, to the prejudice of Great Britain, and abandon the deſigns they had formed in favour of the pretender, at the inſtigation of the dukes of Ormond and Wharton, and the earl Mariſchal, who were then at Madrid. Philip even diſmiſſed from his ſervice the duke de Ripperda, who had been lately prime miniſter, and was the perſon who had negotiated the treaty of Vienna, and by whoſe intrigues the Spaniſh court and ours had been embroiled. The duke dreading the reſentment of his enemies, took ſhelter, at the time of his diſgrace, in the houſe of colonel Stanhope, (afterwards earl of Harrington) then our ambaſſador at Madrid; and though he was taken from thence by force, yet the terror of a Britiſh ſquadron upon the coaſt prevailed on the Spaniſh court to lay aſide all thoughts of proceeding againſt him capitally, which they before intended, for having betrayed to the Britiſh miniſtry thoſe very deſigns which had occaſioned the ſending of this fleet; and he ſoon after made his eſcape from the caſtle of Segovia, and took refuge in England *. Such were the events that attended the expedition of ſir John Jennings on the coaſt of Spain. Let us proceed to the tranſactions in the Weſt Indies.

The command of the ſquadron deſtined for this ſervice was conferred upon rear-admiral Hoſier, an excellent officer. He ſailed from Plymouth on the ninth of April; and though he had a very quick paſſage, yet the Spaniards had previous notice of his deſign, by an advice-boat from Cadiz; ſo that before he reached the Baſtimentos, the treaſure which had been on board the galleons, amounting to about ſix millions and an half ſterling, and which he had been ſent to intercept, or at leaſt to prevent their ſailing for Europe, was unladen and carried back to Panama, on the other ſide the Iſthmus. However, the admiral, who arrived at Porto-Bello in the beginning of June, continued there ſix months, till his ſquadron, which had been the terror, became the jeſt of the Spaniards. A little before Chriſtmas he weighed, and ſailed for Jamaica, after having loſt the greateſt part of his men †.

In the mean time our court complained loudly of the violation of the law of nations, in taking by force, out of the houſe of the Britiſh ambaſſador, the duke de Ripperda, who had fled for ſhelter thither. This act the Spaniſh miniſters attempted to excuſe. Memorials and letters paſſed between the two courts, and every thing ſeemed to portend an immediate rupture. The king of Spain purchaſed ſhips of war, began to make preparations for ſome important undertaking, and aſſembled an army of twenty thouſand men at St. Roch, on pretence of rebuilding the caſtle of Old Gibraltar, which is on the oppoſite ſide of the bay to the garriſon of that name in our poſſeſſion. In the month of Auguſt this year the States-general acceded to the treaty of Hanover; but the king of Pruſſia, though his majeſty's ſon-in-law, ſuffered himſelf to be detached from the alliance by the emperor, who promiſed to ſupport his pretenſions to the duchies of Bergues and Juliers ‡.

Such was the ſituation of affairs abroad, when the parliament of Great Britain met on the ſeventeenth day of January, 1727. The king opened the ſeſſion with a long energetic ſpeech, highly reflecting upon the princes of whom mention was made. He obſerved, that the proceedings and tranſactions of the emperor and the king of Spain, and the ſecret offenſive alliances concluded between them, had laid the foundations of a moſt exorbitant and formidable power: that they were directly levelled againſt the moſt valuable and darling intereſts and privileges of the Engliſh nation, which muſt either give up Gibraltar to Spain, and acquieſce in the emperor's uſurped exerciſe of commerce, or reſolve vigorouſly to defend their undoubted rights againſt thoſe reciprocal engagements, contracted in defiance and violation of all national faith, and the moſt ſolemn treaties. He aſſured them that one of theſe ſecret articles was the placing the pretender on the throne of Great Britain; and another, the reduction of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon. Theſe fatal combinations, he ſaid, were not confined to thoſe parts of the world alone, but had alſo extended themſelves to Ruſſia; and that nothing but the timely appearance of the Engliſh fleet had prevented the execution of ſuch deſigns as would have opened a way to the invaſion of theſe kingdoms. He exhorted the commons to grant ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be neceſſary for the defence of their country, and for enabling him to make good his engagements with his allies, after acquainting them that the king of Spain had ordered his miniſter reſiding in England to quit the kingdom, and that he had left a memorial little ſhort of a declaration, in which he inſiſted upon the reſtitution of Gibraltar. Then addreſſing himſelf to both houſes, he concluded his ſpeech thus: "If preſerving a due balance of power in Europe; if defending the poſſeſſions of the crown of Great Britain, of infinite advantage to her trade and commerce, againſt dangerous and unlawful encroachments; and if the preſent eſtabliſhment, the religion, liberties, and properties of a proteſtant people, are any longer worthy the care and attention of a Britiſh parliament, I need ſay no more to incite my loyal and faithful houſes of parliament to exert themſelves in defence of all that is dear and valuable to them."

The moſt warm and affectionate addreſſes flowed in from both houſes in return to this ſpeech, ſo well calculated to touch the ſtrings which moved their paſſions: they expreſſed the higheſt reſentment at the inſolent deſigns of his majeſty's enemies, and the moſt entire approbation of the meaſures he had taken, in order to defeat and diſappoint them. The commons voted twenty thouſand ſeamen, and twenty-ſix thouſand three hundred and eighty-three men for the land-ſervice; and to defray the expence of theſe armaments, a tax of four ſhillings in the pound was granted §.

§ Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons. Tindal.

The moſt intereſting debates during this ſeſſion were agitated in the houſe of lords, and aroſe from that houſe calling for and examining the letters and memorials between the miniſters of Great Britain, France, and Spain, and the papers relating to the treaty of Hanover. When theſe papers were peruſed by the houſe, the lord Bathurſt obſerved, that the States-general had acted with remarkable caution and circumſpection in this whole affair; that they had not fully and entirely acceded to the treaty of Hanover, ſince they had formally and expreſsly excuſed themſelves from the general guaranty of the treaties of Weſtphalia and Oliva, in which they ſaid they were never engaged; that in effect the Dutch having engaged themſelves to nothing, what they had done did not deſerve the name of acceſſion; and the rather becauſe they had made it an expreſs condition, that their act of acceſſion ſhould be approved and ratified by the king of Great Britain, the Moſt Chriſtian king, and the king of Pruſſia; that though this laſt potentate was one of the principal contractors in the treaty of Hanover, yet as no mention had been made of him, he could not tell what to ſay to that particular. This however was certain, that the miniſter of his Pruſſian majeſty had refuſed to ſign the act of acceſſion, which was therefore of no effect; and if the court of France ſhould for the ſame reaſon think itſelf diſengaged from the Hanover alliance, Britain alone would be obliged to bear the burthen of an expenſive war againſt two of the greateſt potentates of Europe. He declared he could not ſee any juſt cauſe for a rupture with Spain: at all events, methods of accommodation ought to be tried for adjuſting the differences between the two crowns before the kingdom was plunged into a war, which muſt be attended with dangerous conſequences: he therefore deſired their lordſhips to conſider the matter before them, which was of the laſt importance to the whole nation, ſince, he ſaid, nothing could be gained by the war, ſhould it ſucceed even to the beſt of their wiſhes; and if it proved unproſperous, every thing would be loſt.

Lord Townſhend replied to this ſpeech. He affirmed that his majeſty had received poſitive and certain information with reſpect to the ſecret articles of alliance between the courts of Vienna and Madrid, in favour of the pretender; but that the ſafety of the ſtate would not permit him to lay theſe advices before the parliament. His lordſhip alſo affirmed, that his majeſty never had made any promiſe to reſtore Gibraltar, although the marquis de Puzzo Bueno had, in a memorial he had left behind him, made mention of ſuch a promiſe, and that it had been a good deal commented upon by the noble lord who ſpoke laſt. He then recapitulated the ſeveral ſteps the Imperial and Spaniſh courts had taken in prejudice to his majeſty and this kingdom; and concluded with ſaying, that from all theſe circumſtances he hoped it would evidently appear, that his majeſty was under an abſolute neceſſity of adopting the vigorous reſolutions which he had already embraced.

After theſe and ſeveral other ſpeeches, their lordſhips reſolved, that the meaſures which his majeſty had thought fit to take, were honourable, juſt, and neceſſary, for preventing the execution of the dangerous engagements entered into in favour of the pretender; for preſerving the dominions belonging to the crown of Great Britain by ſolemn treaties, particularly of Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca; and for maintaining to his people their moſt valuable rights and privileges of commerce, and the peace and tranquillity of Europe. Several lords entered a proteſt againſt this reſolution *.

The oppoſition in the lower houſe conſiſted chiefly in making motions for addreſſes on ſeveral ſubjects; in particular, one for deſiring the engagements which his majeſty was ſaid to have entered into with Spain, concerning the reſtitution of Gibraltar, might be laid before the houſe; for although lord Townſhend had affirmed in the houſe of peers that no ſuch promiſe had been made, ſir Robert Walpole, it ſeems, owned ſuch a promiſe in the houſe of commons, though he qualified it by ſaying, that he was ſure that promiſe was upon certain conditions, which not having been performed within the limited time, it was thereby become invalid: he however ſtrongly oppoſed the addreſs moved for, as the communication deſired was, he ſaid, altogether impracticable and unprecedented, the private letters of princes being as ſacred as their perſons. After a debate, the motion was rejected. After this the lord Morpeth moved "for an addreſs for copies of all ſuch memorials or repreſentations to his majeſty, from the crowns of Sweden and Denmark, as did induce him to ſend the ſquadron laſt year into the Baltic." This motion was oppoſed by Mr. Horace Walpole, and it was finally rejected. In the account of the money granted for the ſervice of the laſt year, there was an article of one hundred and twenty-five thouſand pounds charged in general terms, as iſſued out for other engagements and expences, over and above ſuch as were ſpecified. Mr. William Pulteney moved for an addreſs on this ſubject, but the motion was rejected without a diviſion; and the majority concurred in an addreſs to his majeſty, much to the ſame purport with that of the lords, with the promiſe of ſupporting his majeſty in all ſuch further meaſures as he ſhould find neceſſary and expedient for preventing a rupture, and for the honour and advancement of theſe kingdoms †.

If the king's ſpeech gave riſe to ſome diſputes at home, it excited the higheſt degree of indignation and reſentment in the breaſts of thoſe powers who were reflected upon in it. The court of Vienna in particular was ſo exaſperated at the manner in which it found itſelf there treated, that the emperor commanded M. Palms, his reſident at London, to preſent a memorial to his Britannic majeſty, expreſſed in the boldeſt terms. The king was therein charged with having declared from the throne, as certain and undoubted facts, ſeveral things, ſome of which were wreſted to a wrong ſenſe; ſome entirely diſtant from the intentions of his Catholic majeſty; and laſtly (which, adds the memorialiſt, affect much more ſenſibly than all the reſt) ſome things abſolutely void of all foundation. The memorialiſt then proceeds to affirm that the treaty of Vienna was built on the quadruple alliance, and therefore could not with

with any reaſon give umbrage to the king or people of Great Britain: that the treaty of commerce was calculated to promote the mutual and lawful advantages of both parties, agreeable to the laws of nations, and in no reſpect prejudicial to Great Britain. He inſiſts that there was no alliance concluded between the two crowns; and that the ſuppoſed ſecret article in favour of the pretender was a downright falſhood. He ſaid, the hoſtilities committed in the Weſt Indies, and elſewhere, againſt the king of Spain, in violation of treaties, ſeemed to furniſh a very juſt pretence for that prince's undertaking the ſiege of Gibraltar; but, with regard to the inſinuation, as if his maſter (the emperor) had agreed to aſſiſt his Catholic majeſty in the reduction of that place, it was abſolutely without the leaſt foundation, the emperor having made no other engagements with the king of Spain than what were ſpecified in the treaty communicated to the king of Great Britain. The memorialiſt concludes as follows: "Which things being thus, the injury offered to truth, the honour and dignity of his Sacred, Imperial, and Catholic majeſty, require that they ſhould be expoſed to your majeſty, to the kingdom of Great Britain, and to the whole world; and his Sacred Imperial majeſty demands that reparation which is due to him by all manner of right, for the great injuries which have been done by thoſe many imputations."

The emperor, not thinking it enough that his miniſter ſhould preſent this bold memorial to the king, ordered him to publiſh it to the whole nation, as an appeal to the people againſt their ſovereign. Our court, which might naturally be expected, were highly incenſed at this laſt ſtep: the two houſes of parliament, then ſitting, joined in an addreſs, expreſſing their indignation at the affront offered to his majeſty by the memorial of M. Palms, and at his inſolence of diſperſing the ſame throughout the kingdom. "The endeavouring," ſaid they in their addreſs, "to inſtil into the minds of any of your majeſty's faithful ſubjects, the leaſt diſtruſt or diffidence of your majeſty's moſt ſacred royal word, or to make a diſtinction between your majeſty and your people, is an attempt as vain, as it is preſumptuous. If time has not effaced the memory of the glorious exploits confeſſed to have been performed by Britons in ſupport of the emperor, gratitude, eſteem, and affection for this nation, will be beſt manifeſted by doing honour to the king, whom the people honour, and juſtice to the people whoſe rights and privileges the beſt of kings is now defending againſt the invaſions and incroachments that have been made upon them."

M. Palms was immediately ordered to depart the kingdom: the moſt bitter remonſtrances were preſented by the miniſters of the emperor and the king of Great Britain to the diet of the empire at Ratiſbon; and the reſentment of the two potentates was ſuch as ſeemed to exclude all hopes of a reconciliation.

Apprehenſive that he had now raiſed a ſtorm which might burſt big with ruin upon his hereditary dominions, George ſought to ſtrengthen himſelf, by contracting more ſtrict engagements with his good ally Lewis XV. and the king of Sweden, to the latter of whom he agreed to pay fifty thouſand pounds per annum, on condition of his holding in readineſs a body of ten thouſand troops for the occaſions of the alliance. He alſo concluded a freſh treaty with the king of Denmark, who engaged to furniſh a certain number of auxiliaries, on account of a large ſubſidy granted by the king of France. On the other hand, his Britannic majeſty engaged for twenty-four thouſand men, and a ſtrong ſquadron to be ſent to the Baltic. He made a convention with the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, who undertook to provide eight thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe, in conſideration of ſeventy-four thouſand pounds to be paid by Great Britain immediately, and fifty thouſand pounds more in caſe the troops ſhould be required, beſides their pay and ſubſiſtence.

All theſe treaties could not be concluded without bringing a heavy charge upon England; but the attachment the people were known to have for their religion, rights, and liberties, ſo happily ſecured to them by the acceſſion of the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, was a pleaſing earneſt of their ready concurrence in furniſhing the ſupplies neceſſary to ſupport theſe mercenaries, who were to defend the new countries to which this kingdom was now wedded. Accordingly, Mr. Scroope, ſecretary of the Treaſury, moved in the houſe of commons, by the direction of the miniſtry, that in the malt-tax bill they ſhould inſert a clauſe of appropriation, empowering the king to apply ſuch ſums as ſhould be neceſſary for defraying the expences and engagements which had been or ſhould be made before the twenty-fifth of December following, in concerting ſuch meaſures as he ſhould think moſt conducive to the ſecurity of trade and navigation, and reſtoring the peace of Europe.

This motion gave birth to a violent debate. It was alleged on the one hand, that his majeſty was ſo unwilling to put his ſubjects to any extraordinary expence, that he had aſked no more ſupplies in this ſeſſion than what he judged neceſſary for the ſervice of the year; but in the preſent poſture of affairs, ſome unforeſeen accidents might require a further expence, for which no eſtimate could now be made; becauſe ſome treaties which his majeſty had thought fit to conclude were not fully completed; that therefore the houſe ought to enable his majeſty to anſwer ſuch contingencies; that they had frequently repoſed in him ſuch a confidence, which he had never abuſed; and that what was now demanded was limited to a very ſhort time.

To this, thoſe on the oppoſite ſide of the queſtion anſwered, that it was altogether unparliamentary to aſk or to grant ſupplies without the proper eſtimates being firſt made out and laid before the houſe; and that as to the clauſe now propoſed, it was inconſiſtent with that part of the bill which forbade the iſſuing the ſupplies to any other purpoſes than thoſe ſpecified; and precluded that appropriation of the public money, which every parliament had ſo cautiouſly guarded againſt, in order to prevent miſapplication, which they ſaid was, in this caſe, the more to be feared, as the legiſlature had made no proviſion for bringing to account any perſon in regard to the diſpoſal of the money granted by this clauſe. It was urged that the parliament had already granted very great ſums, ſuch as were amply ſufficient, ſo far as appeared to them at preſent, to anſwer all contingencies; and if any unexpected emergency ſhould ſupervene which might call for an extra ſupply, that houſe, upon ſuch a caſe being laid before them, could be at no loſs to provide for it in the uſual manner, without leaving any thing to the arbitrary diſpoſition of a miniſtry, which ſeemed to conſult their own ends rather than the true intereſts of the nation: that this parliament had already given ſo many inſtances of their zeal and affection for his majeſty, that they had left no room to doubt of their readineſs to make good whatever he ſhould expend in concerting ſuch meaſures as he ſhould think moſt conducive to the intereſt and advantage of his people; but that they could not anſwer to that duty they owed their conſtituents, to grant ſuch an unlimited and abſolute power as this clauſe conferred, but in caſes of abſolute neceſſity, when the very being of the ſtate was in danger. Powerful as theſe objections were, the majority over-ruled them; the motion was carried; and the bill being ſent up to the lords, made its way thro' that houſe likewiſe, though not without a vigorous oppoſition.

Two days after ſir William Yonge moved, that towards the ſupply granted to the king, the ſum of thirty-ſeven thouſand pounds ſhould be raiſed by loans on Exchequer-bills, to be charged on the ſurplus of the duties on coal and culm, which was reſerved for the diſpoſition of parliament, This motion was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by Mr. Pulteney and ſir Joſeph Jekyll, who repreſented, that by ſeveral acts and votes of parliament, all the exceedings or ſurpluſſes of public funds were to be applied towards diſcharging the public debts, or increaſing the Sinking Fund. This diſpoſition, they alleged, could not be altered without injuring public credit, which was already extremely low, ſince the taking off any part of the mortgage could not but weaken the ſecurity of the debt. It was ſomewhat ſtrange, it was ſaid, that ſuch a motion ſhould come from the miniſtry, of all other perſons, ſince it was hardly poſſible they could have forgotten what his majeſty had ſo ſtrongly recommended from the throne at the opening of the ſeſſion; namely, that the produce of the Sinking Fund might be immediately applied to the uſes for which it was ſo wiſely contrived, and to which it ſtood at preſent appropriated; and, finally, that this motion was ſtill more ſurpriſing, after the large and unlimited power which the parliament had lately conferred upon his majeſty. Theſe objections were anſwered in the uſual way by the miniſtry, namely, by inſiſting upon the queſtion; which being put, the majority were for the motion, and it paſſed *.

The parliament having now diſpatched all the buſineſs before them, his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion on the fifteenth day of May, 1727, with this his laſt ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I acquainted you at the opening of this ſeſſion with the dangers which threatened this kingdom, and the peace and liberties of Europe. I am now to return you my thanks for the zeal and diſpatch with which you have proceeded upon the ſeveral points I then recommended to your care; for the confidence you have repoſed in me; and for the aſſurances you have given me of your ſupport and aſſiſtance, in vindication of my honour, and in the maintenance and defence of the undoubted rights and privileges of this nation, ſo openly and notoriouſly invaded and attacked.

"The ſiege of Gibraltar proves, beyond all diſpute, the end and deſign of the engagements entered into by the emperor and the king of Spain; but the preparations I had made for the defence of that place, and the bravery of my troops, will, I doubt not, convince them of the raſhneſs and folly of that undertaking. However, the love of peace has hitherto prevailed upon me, even under this high provocation, to ſuſpend in ſome meaſure my reſentments; and, inſtead of having immediate recourſe to arms, and demanding of my allies that aſſiſtance which they are engaged and ready to give me, I have concurred with the moſt Chriſtian king and the States-general in making ſuch overtures of accommodation as muſt convince all the world of the uprightneſs of our intentions, and of our ſincere diſpoſition to peace, and demonſtrate to whoſe ambition and thirſt of power the calamities of a war are to be imputed, if theſe juſt and reaſonable propoſitions are rejected. In the mean time, I have the pleaſure to acquaint you, that the crown of Sweden has acceded to the treaty of Hanover; and the convention between me, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, and the king of Denmark, is actually ſigned.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"The vigour and chearfulneſs you have ſhewn in raiſing ſo effectually, and upon ſuch eaſy terms, the neceſſary ſupplies for the ſervice of the current year, are not only inſtances of your zeal and affection to me, but demonſtrate the eſtabliſhed credit, power, and ſtrength of this kingdom.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It would have been a great ſatisfaction to me, if, before your ſeparation, I had been able to ſpeak to you more poſitively, and with greater certainty, upon the preſent poſture of affairs. But, as you have now diſpatched the public buſineſs, and as the ſeaſon of the year requires your going into your reſpective counties, I chuſe rather to put an end to the ſeſſion, than to keep you any longer together unneceſſarily. The proviſions you have made, and the perfect union and harmony between me and my allies, will, I hope, enable me, by the Divine aſſiſtance, either to withſtand and defeat the deſigns of our enemies, if their conduct ſhould bring upon us the neceſſity of a war; or to improve the bleſſings of peace, if peace can, with any juſtice, honour, and ſecurity, be obtained."

We may perceive from this ſpeech, that notwithſtanding the preparations for war, made as well on the ſide of the Hanover allies as thoſe of Vienna, that the contending powers were reſpectively deſirous of peace; and that ſome overtures had actually been made towards a mutual accommodation, each of them having declared that the preſervation of the tranquility of Europe was the ſole end of their proceedings.

The Spaniard, in order to ſhow that he was not intimidated by the mighty naval armaments of the Engliſh, proceeded in the ſcheme he had formed of attacking the important fortreſs of Gibraltar; and on the 11th of February, 1727, the trenches were actually opened before that place by the Conde de las Torres, captain-general of his Catholic majeſty's forces in Andaluſia, at the head of twenty thouſand men, well provided with all ſorts of artillery and warlike ammunition proportioned to the ſtrength of the place, from which the Spaniards expected a ſtout reſiſtance. Our miniſtry at home having had previous intelligence of this deſign, had ordered a ſquadron to be got ready at Portſmouth; the command of which was given to ſir Charles Wager. The earl of Portmore, governor of Gibraltar, notwithſtanding his advanced age, having been a colonel near forty years, reſolved to repair in perſon to his government, and embarked on board this fleet; which ſailing in the month of March, arrived at Gibraltar in the beginning of April, when the troops which had been ſent over from England were landed, with a great quantity of ammunition, warlike ſtores, and twenty-four pieces of cannon. At the ſame time five hundred men arrived from Minorca; ſo that the garriſon now amounted to ſix thouſand effective men, who being plentifully ſupplied with freſh proviſions from the coaſt of Barbary, ſet all the efforts of the beſiegers at defiance *.

The firſt uſe made of the extraordinary ſupplies granted by the parliament, was to ſend once more a fleet up the Baltic, where it was ſaid the czarina was preparing to attack the Swedes, and afterwards to proceed to the execution of other deſigns prejudicial to the intereſt of Great Britain and her allies. The command of this fleet was beſtowed upon ſir John Norris, who had under him two new made admirals, Maurice and Hughes; the one rear-admiral of the white, the other rear-admiral of the blue. Sir John arrived at Elſineur in the beginning of May, where he was joined by a Daniſh ſquadron; but the czarina dying on the ſeventeenth of the ſame month, the court of Peterſburgh thought proper to lay aſide their armament †.

About the ſame time the court of Vienna having ſhewn a diſpoſition to make ſome attempts upon the barrier of the States-general in the Netherlands, theſe latter applied to our court to hold in readineſs, in caſe of neceſſity, the ten thouſand auxiliaries which England was obliged by treaty to ſend to their aſſiſtance. Hereupon the forces of Great Britain were augmented with thirty new-raiſed companies.

Notwithſtanding all theſe hoſtile appearances, the treaty of Hanover being merely defenſive, left the powers engaged therein at full liberty to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to bring about an amicable accommodation. Accordingly, Lewis XV. king of France, firſt undertook this friendly office, which was conducted by the duke de Richelieu, his ambaſſador at Vienna, who, in concert with the Britiſh and Dutch miniſters, drew up twelve preliminary articles, which were ſigned on the twentieth of May at Paris by the miniſters of the allies, and afterwards at Vienna by the Imperial and Spaniſh ambaſſadors. They imported, that hoſtilities ſhould immediately ceaſe; that the charter of the Oſtend company ſhould be ſuſpended for ſeven years; and that a congreſs ſhould in four months be opened at Aix la Chapelle, for adjuſting all differences, and eſtabliſhing the peace of Europe.

This congreſs was afterwards transferred to Soiſſons, for the conveniency of the French miniſter, whoſe preſence was neceſſary at his own court. The ſiege of Gibraltar was raiſed, after it had laſted four months, during which above one half of the Spaniſh army had periſhed either by ſlaughter or ſickneſs; while the Engliſh, who defended the place, did not loſe above five hundred men. The court of Madrid, however, ſtarting new difficulties, and refuſing to reſtore the Prince Frederic, the Engliſh South-ſea ſhip which had been detained at La Vera Cruz in the Weſt Indies, Sir Charles Wager continued to cruize on the coaſt of Spain, after the raiſing the ſiege of Gibraltar. At length, after many cavils and delays, theſe obſtructions were removed.

Two years had now elapſed ſince king George had viſited his German dominions; ſo that he reſolved to embrace the preſent opportunity of enjoying that pleaſure. Accordingly, having appointed a regency, he embarked at Greenwich on the third day of June, and landing in Holland on the ſeventh, ſet out on his journey to Hanover. On the road his majeſty was ſuddenly ſeized with a paralytic diſorder, which terminating in a lethargy, he was carried in a ſtate of inſenſibility to Oſnabrug, where he expired at his brother's palace, on Sunday the eleventh day of June, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign over theſe kingdoms, and was interred at Hanover among his anceſtors.

We have, in the beginning of this reign, given a ſketch of the character of George I. at the time he acceded to the Britiſh throne. As to his conduct after that acceſſion, we muſt repeat, that his miniſters were entirely accountable for it, he having conſtantly ſignified his intention to govern according to the laws of the country over which he was called to rule, and with a view ſolely to the good of his people. George I. was plain in his perſon, and ſimple in his addreſs: though generally grave and compoſed in his public deportment, in his hours of relaxation he was eaſy, familiar, and even facetious.

† Naval Hiſt.

We think we cannot conclude this reign more pleaſingly than with a ſhort account of the ſtate of literature in this kingdom, from the death of Charles II. to this period, as given us by a modern writer †.

" Dr. Atterbury (afterwards biſhop of Rocheſter) and Dr. Clarke diſtinguiſhed themſelves in divinity; Mr. Whiſton wrote in defence of Arianiſm; John Locke ſhone forth the great reſtorer of human reaſon; Cudworth traced the whole labyrinth of metaphyſical argumentation; the earl of Shafteſbury raiſed an elegant, though feeble, ſyſtem of moral philoſophy; Berkeley, afterwards biſhop of Cloyne in Ireland, ſurpaſſed all his cotemporaries in ſubtlety and variety of metaphyſical arguments, as well as in the art of deduction; lord Bolingbroke's talents as a metaphyſician have been queſtioned ſince his poſthumous works appeared; great progreſs was made in mathematics and aſtronomy by Wallis, Halley, and Flamſtead; the art of medicine owed ſome valuable improvements to the claſſical Dr. Freind and the elegant Dr. Mead."

[It is with ſome degree of ſurprize that we find the name of the great ſir Iſaac Newton omitted by this author in his liſt of the improvers of aſtronomy and mathematics, ſince he was probably the greateſt philoſopher, and undoubtedly the greateſt mathematician in Europe. We are far from pretending to draw his character entire: ſuffice it to ſay, in one word, that he has not left his equal perhaps on the face of the whole earth, having, even by the learned of foreign nations, been allowed the pre-eminence, and to be the unrivalled glory of the Britiſh name and nation!]

" Among the poets of this æra we number John Philips, author of a didactic poem called Cyder; a performance of real merit: he lived and died in obſcurity. William Congreve, celebrated for his comedies, which are not ſo famous for ſtrength of character and power of humour, as for wit, elegance, and regularity: Vanbrugh, who wrote with more nature and fire, though with leſs art and preciſion: Steele, who in his comedies ſucceſsfully engrafted modern characters on the antient drama: Farquhar, who drew his pictures from fancy rather than from nature, and whoſe chief merit conſiſts in the agreeable pertneſs and vivacity of his dialogue: Addiſon, whoſe fame as a poet greatly exceeded his genius, which was cold and enervate, though he yielded to none in the character of an eſſayiſt, either for ſtile or matter: Swift, whoſe muſe ſeems to have been mere miſanthropy; he was a cynic rather than a poet, and his natural dryneſs and ſarcaſtic ſeverity would have been unpleaſing, had he not qualified them by adopting the extravagant humour of Lucian and Rabelais: Prior, lively, familiar, and amuſing: Rowe, ſolemn, florid, and declamatory: Pope, the prince of lyric poetry, unrivalled in ſatire, ethics, and poliſhed verſification: the agreeable Parnel: the wild, the witty, and the whimſical Garth: Gay, whoſe fables will vie with thoſe of La Fontaine, in nature, humour, eaſe, and ſimplicity, and whoſe genius for paſtoral was truly original.

" The moſt remarkable political writers were Davenant, Hare, Swift, Steele, Addiſon, Bolingbroke, and Trenchard.

" Dr. Bentley ſtood foremoſt in the liſt of critics and commentators: ſir Chriſtopher Wren raiſed ſome noble monuments of architecture: in a word, during the period we have run over, England made a conſiderable figure in every branch of learning and the liberal ſciences.

GEORGE II. A. D. 1727.

GEORGE II. on aſcending the throne, had the happineſs to find the minds of his new ſubjects in general prepoſſeſſed in his favour: they had with pleaſure contemplated in him, while prince of Wales, many amiable qualifications, which promiſed them all the felicity they could wiſh, when he ſhould one day come to rule over them. Although, during the life-time of his father, who ſeemed to have conceived ſome jealouſy of him, he had been in a manner excluded from all ſhare in the government, yet a more than common diſcernment ſupplied the defect in this part of his education; and his natural talents being improved and ripened by years, his majeſty being in the forty-fourth year of his age at the death of his royal father, he ſeized the reins of government with full abilities to manage them.

At this time alſo conjunctures were particularly favourable to the new monarch. Commerce, the great idol of this nation, and to which ſhe ſacrifices every other conſideration, flowed uninterrupted through all her channels, bringing daily a ſpring-tide of wealth into the capital, from whence it circulated through the moſt diſtant parts of the kingdom, producing riches and eaſe: that ſuch was really the ſituation of the country at this period, may be demonſtrated by numberleſs proofs; a few only will ſuffice. It is an unalterable maxim, that when in any ſtate money bears but a low intereſt, and that the value of lands is every day increaſing, there muſt be great plenty of money in that ſtate: now this was at preſent the very caſe with regard to England. The intereſt of money was not now at more than three and a half or four per cent. at the moſt; the price of lands, which not many years before was at twenty and twenty-one years purchaſe, were now raiſed to twenty-five, twenty-ſix, and twenty-ſeven years purchaſe; an evident proof that there were more perſons able and ready to purchaſe lands than formerly. dence of the increaſed wealth of Britain was, the great ſums of late expended in the incloſing and improving lands, and the erecting of magnificent edifices. To this if we add the great increaſe of jewels, plate, and other rich moveables, much beyond former times; and, laſtly, conſider the increaſe in the tonnage of ſhipping, which in the laſt ſix years exceeded the preceding ſix years two hundred and thirty-eight thouſand tons, we have undoubted proofs of Great Britain being in a moſt flouriſhing ſtate, and, by conſequence, her people rich and proſperous.

By the attention which had been ſhewn during the laſt reign to maritime affairs, our fleet was now on the moſt reſpectable footing; near two hundred ſail of ſhips of war, as well of the line as frigates, fire-ſhips, &c. were either cruizing upon different parts of the ocean, or ready to ſail from the ſeveral ports at the firſt warning, for the purpoſe of protecting our commerce, or annoying the enemy. Several regiments of well-diſciplined troops were cantoned in different parts of the three kingdoms, ſo as to overawe the diſaffected, and ſecure the peace and tranquility of the whole, while it ſtrengthened the hands of government, and gave the new ſovereign an aſcendancy that had been unknown to his predeceſſors on the Engliſh throne for many years.

The parliament too, that body in other times ſo formidable to the ſovereign, and who had for ſo many centuries been a conſtant check upon the regal power, under pretext of maintaining the rights of the people, now ſeemed to be a mere machine actuated by miniſterial ſprings, and hardly waiting for the demand, laviſhed ſupplies upon the crown without end or limitation.

On the other hand, the ſtate of affairs in Europe were every day growing more and more favourable to the peace and ſecurity of George, as well with reſpect to his Britiſh as his German dominions. Spain recovering at length from the illuſion in which it had been held by the court of Vienna, became ſenſible how much it was her true intereſt to be heartily reconciled to Great Britain, and reſtore all the commercial privileges they enjoyed before the rupture between the two crowns, eſpecially, as by keeping fair with king George ſhe alone could hope to ſecure to Don Carlos, afterwards king of the Two Sicilies, the ſucceſſion to the valuable duchy of Tuſcany, and thoſe of Parma and Placentia. To obtain this was the object of the treaty of Seville.

The emperor Charles VI. far from perſiſting to trouble the repoſe of Great Britain, readily gave up the new Oſtend company; and by that conceſſion obtained from his Britannic majeſty the guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction, a family-law of which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more particularly in the courſe of this hiſtory.

Holland, more cloſely united than ever with the Engliſh, her antient good friends and allies, blended her intereſts with theirs, and ſincerely rejoiced at their proſperity, as the certain pledge of her own.

France, which was at this time principally governed by cardinal de Fleury, ſeemed deſirous of peace, in order to repair the loſſes ſhe had ſuffered, and to enrich herſelf at leiſure by the extenſive commerce ſhe now carried on, without ſeeking to make any innovation.

The pretender, abandoned to his ill fortune, led an obſcure life in the papal dominions, deſpairing to find any potentate in Europe weak enough to hazard his own tranquility, in ſupport of the imaginary rights of a forlorn wanderer againſt a powerful monarch, actually in poſſeſſion of the crown to which he aſpired.

Thus, as I have already obſerved, George II. acceded to the crown under ſuch favourable circumſtances, as promiſed the moſt laſting happineſs to himſelf, and the higheſt advantages to his people; yet (ſuch is the precarioufneſs of all human proſpects) few reigns exhibit a greater variety of diſagreeable events, both to the ſovereign and the people, as will be abundantly manifeſted in the courſe of this hiſtory, the thread of which I ſhall now reſume.

His late majeſty's deceaſe was not known in England till three or four days after it happened: but on the fourteenth of June an expreſs arrived with the melancholy advice to ſir Robert Walpole, who was then at his houſe at Chelſea. He immediately waited upon the prince and princeſs of Wales at Richmond, with the important intelligence; and they thereupon repaired to Leiceſter-houſe, where they had for ſome time kept their court. Here they were received by a number of the lords of the privy-council, and other perſons of quality and diſtinction, who drew up and ſigned an inſtrument for proclaiming his royal highneſs king of theſe realms; and the ceremony of the proclamation was performed the next morning (Thurſday June 15) at the uſual places, with all the accuſtomed ſolemnities. His majeſty in the interim cauſed all the lords and others of the late king's privy-council to be ſworn of his privy-council: he likewiſe was pleaſed to make a declaration in council, in which, among other things, he had the following expreſſion: "The religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom, are moſt dear to me; and the preſervation of the conſtitution in church and ſtate, as it is now happily eſtabliſhed, ſhall be my firſt, and always my chief care." On the evening of the fourteenth his majeſty took and ſubſcribed the oath relating to the ſecurity of the church of Scotland, according to the forms preſcribed by the laws of that kingdom. On the fifteenth the earl of Scarborough was ſworn of the privy-council, and appointed maſter of the horſe to his majeſty.

The next day the court of lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London waited on the king and queen, with their compliments of condolance on the death of his late majeſty, and congratulation upon their new ſovereign's acceſſion to the crown. The example of the capital was quickly followed by moſt of the cities, towns, boroughs, and corporations in the three kingdoms and the plantations. On the nineteenth of June his majeſty was proclaimed with great ſolemnity at Edinburgh and Dublin.

The parliament of Great Britain aſſembled on the firſt news of the late king's death, in purſuance of the act made for that purpoſe in the fourth year of queen Anne, but was immediately prorogued by commiſſion to the twenty-ſeventh day of the month. All the great officers of ſtate were continued in their places; ſir Robert Walpole kept poſſeſſion of the Treaſury; and the ſyſtem of politics eſtabliſhed by the late king was ſtill ſtrictly adhered to.

The

The ſupreme direction of affairs was not yet conſigned to any ſingle miniſter. The lord viſcount Townſhend was in general conſidered as the principal manager of foreign tranſactions relating to treaties and negotiations, for which he was on all hands allowed to be very capable. The duke of Newcaſtle, his colleague, though not poſſeſſed of ſo extenſive a fund of knowlege in theſe matters, had ingratiated himſelf with his ſovereign by his exemplary zeal for the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the illuſtrious line of Hanover.

The interior government of Great Britain was chiefly managed by ſir Robert Walpole, a man of extraordinary talents, and who had, from his firſt obtaining a ſeat in parliament, declared himſelf a ſtrenuous partizan of the Whig party. As a public ſpeaker, he was cool and clear; and though he might not, in a claſſical ſenſe, be termed eloquent, he poſſeſſed that happy kind of elocution which ſeldom failed to perſuade his audience into a belief of what he advanced. He was indeed inclined to ſpeak rather too frequently for a man of his exalted ſtation; but then he did it from a perſuaſion that he was better acquainted with the nature of the ſubject he handled than any of his friends who would have ſpoke for him. Few men better underſtood the nature of the public funds, and the iniquitous myſtery of ſtock-jobbing; by which means he frequently counteracted the ſchemes of thoſe who conſulted their own intereſts at the expence of the public good; a charge which the moſt inveterate of his enemies could not make good againſt him. He was remarkable for his diſcernment of characters. In this diſtinguiſhing mark of a political genius he ſtood unrivalled by any miniſter we read of in hiſtory; but the greateſt reproach (perhaps the greateſt misfortune) of his adminiſtration, was, his applying himſelf only to the knowlege of men as they could be immediately uſeful in parliament. By this knowlege he could convert the degeneracy of the times to his own advantage, and always keep the venal part of the repreſentatives of the nation in his intereſt, by gratifying them with profitable conſiderations for voting as he dictated. From the deaths of the earls of Sunderland and Stanhope, in the late reign, he had been making long ſtrides towards the office of prime miniſter, to which he finally attained ſoon after the acceſſion of George II. and kept poſſeſſion of longer than any miniſter recorded in the Engliſh annals. If, during his long adminiſtration, his meaſures were frequently reprehenſible, thoſe of his antagoniſts were not always right; for in the heat of their animoſity to him they oppoſed, without diſtinction, the juſtifiable as well as the queſtionable ſchemes he ſet on foot. But to return.

The parliament, agreeable to the royal proclamation, met on the twenty-ſeventh of June, 1727, and the ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech delivered from his majeſty's own mouth; in which he gave an early omen of that paternal care he ever after exerted for the welfare of his people: among many other gracious expreſſions, he aſſured the two houſes, that it ſhould be his conſtant care to preſerve the conſtitution in church and ſtate inviolable in all its parts, and to ſecure to all his ſubjects the free enjoyment of their religious and civil rights.

Addreſſes of condolance and congratulation being drawn up and preſented by both houſes, the commons, in a committee of the whole houſe, took into conſideration a motion for eſtabliſhing the civil liſt, for the better ſupport of the honour and dignity of the crown. On this occaſion ſir Robert Walpole, as chancellor of the Exchequer, reminded the houſe, that the annual ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, which had been ſettled on the late king, had fallen ſhort every year, inſomuch that the houſe had been obliged to make up the deficiencies; and his preſent majeſty's expences, he ſaid, muſt neceſſarily be expected to increaſe, as he had a large family: he therefore moved, that the entire revenues of the civil liſt, which produced about eight hundred and thirty thouſand pounds, ſhould be ſettled on the king during his life. This motion was violently oppoſed by all the anti-courtiers; but no one diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much as Mr. Shippen, who was an avowed enemy to the reigning miniſtry, and was an intrepid, ſhrewd, and ſarcaſtic ſpeaker: he urged, that this motion was inconſiſtent with the truſt repoſed in that houſe as repreſentatives of the people, who ought to be very frugal in exerciſing the right of giving away the public money: he obſerved, that the civil liſt branches in queen Anne's reign did not often exceed five hundred and fifty thouſand pounds; nevertheleſs, ſhe called upon her parliament but once in a reign of thirteen years to pay the debts contracted in her civil-government; and theſe were occaſioned by very extraordinary acts of piety and generoſity, which ſhe had exhibited on ſundry occaſions, particularly in the caſe of the poor clergy, towards the augmentation of whoſe livings ſhe had given up the firſt-fruits and tenths, ariſing to nineteen thouſand pounds per annum; and immediately before her death ſaid ſhe had formed a plan of retrenchment, which would have reduced her yearly expences to four hundred and fifty-nine thouſand pounds per annum. He affirmed, that a million a year would not be ſufficient to carry on the exorbitant expences of a profuſe and vain-glorious adminiſtration. As none of the large ſums which had been already granted were accounted for, but had all been ſunk in the bottomleſs gulph of ſecret ſervice, thoſe ſums, he ſaid, had in all probability been employed in ſervices not fit to be owned, in perverting from their public duty thoſe who were weak or wicked enough to ſell themſelves as the tools and hirelings of a corrupt miniſtry. No anſwer was made to any of the particulars inſiſted upon in this ſpeech. Antiminiſterial aſſociation was now reduced too low to be thought worthy ſuch a mark of notice. The queſtion was put. The houſe agreed to ſir Robert's motion, and a bill was brought in upon the following reſolutions; "Firſt, That towards the ſupply granted to his majeſty for the ſupport of his houſhold, the ſame revenues which were payable to his late majeſty during his life, be granted and continued to his preſent majeſty during his life. Secondly, That the ſaid revenues be continued from the death of his late majeſty."

While this bill was depending, a meſſage was delivered by ſir Paul Methuen, the treaſurer of the houſhold, from the king, recommending the making further proviſion for the queen, in caſe of his majeſty's demiſe. The ſucceſs of this meſſage was conſidered as the touchſtone of the diſpoſition of the commons, who left it not long in ſuſpence; for, after conſidering the meſſage in a grand committee mittee of their houſe, they reſolved, " 1. That a proviſion be made for the queen, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive his majeſty, of one hundred thouſand pounds per annum during her life, together with his majeſty's palace of Somerſet-houſe, and the lodge and lands at Richmond Old Park. 2. That his majeſty be enabled to charge the ſaid one hundred thouſand pounds on all or any of the duties and revenues, for the better ſupport of her majeſty's houſhold, &c. which ſhall ſubſiſt after his majeſty's deceaſe."

Purſuant to theſe reſolutions, bills were brought in and paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent on the ſeventeenth of July; as alſo an act " to enable his majeſty to be governor of the South-ſea company," and an act " for continuing the impriſonment of Robert Blackburne and others, for the aſſaſſination-plot againſt king William." The ſame day his majeſty made a moſt gracious ſpeech to both houſes, which ſufficiently demonſtrated the pleaſure their proceedings had given him. He thanked the members for the proviſion they had made for the ſupport of his family and civil-government, and for the ample proviſion they had made for the queen. He then ſubjoins the following remarkable paragraph:

" My lords and gentlemen,

" It is a great happineſs to me to ſee the nation in ſo proſperous and flouriſhing a condition; at the higheſt pitch of glory and reputation; of great weight in holding the balance of Europe; defending themſelves in their juſt privileges and poſſeſſions; and vindicating the honour of the crown of Great Britain."

His majeſty having concluded his ſpeech, the lord-chancellor, by the royal command, declared the parliament prorogued to the twenty-ninth day of Auguſt; but on the ſeventh day of that month it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs were iſſued for convoking another.

In the interim, ſome changes were made in different departments of civil oeconomy. George Byng, lord viſcount Torrington, was placed at the head of the admiralty; the earl of Weſtmoreland was appointed firſt lord-commiſſioner of trade and plantations; Philip-Dormer Stanhope, earl of Cheſterfield, was nominated ambaſſador to the Hague; and the lord Carteret obtained the place of lord-lieutenant of Ireland: the duke of Devonſhire was dignified with that of preſident of the council; and the duke of St. Albans was appointed maſter of the horſe.

On the eleventh of October their majeſties coronation was performed with great ſplendor and ſolemnity: the biſhop of Oxford preached on the occaſion, and the day was celebrated in every part of his majeſty's dominions with the moſt extraordinary rejoicings. On the thirtieth, being lord-mayor's day as well as the king's birth-day, conformable to an humble invitation from the city, their majeſties, the princeſs-royal, and princeſs Carolina, accompanied by the great officers of ſtate, and other ſuitable attendants, dined with the lord-mayor at Guildhall, were preſent at a ball, and returned to St. James's in the ſame ſtate with which they entered the city, at eleven o'clock the ſame night.

The other domeſtic tranſactions of this year are of little importance to a general hiſtory of England: we ſhall therefore paſs on to a view of foreign affairs during the remaining part of this year.

The reader may remember, that towards the cloſe of the laſt reign we took notice of certain articles, preliminary to a general pacification, being ſigned at Paris on May 20-31, 1727, on the part of the emperor, his Britannic majeſty, the moſt Catholic king, and the States-general, by which a mutual ceſſation of hoſtilities was ſtipulated for ſeven years; and that within four months after ſigning this convention, a congreſs ſhould be formed, in which all the rights and pretenſions of the contracting parties ſhould be examined, diſcuſſed, and determined: but as ſoon as the articles were produced in public, it was immediately foreſeen that the dark and ambiguous manner of wording them would give occaſion to many cavils and diſputes.

Accordingly, the preliminaries were no ſooner ſigned than new diſputes began to be ſtarted about the meaning of them, and ſuch interpretations to be put upon the words of theſe articles as utterly deſtroyed the intent and deſign of them. The Spaniards inſiſted that a mere ceſſation of hoſtilities, as ſtipulated by the preliminaries, did not imply an actual raiſing of the ſiege of Gibraltar; and that the reſtitution of the South-ſea ſhip Prince Frederic, with her cargo, was not mentioned or included in them. Beſides this, the court of Spain demanded an indulto of twenty per cent. on the effects of private perſons embarked in the Flotilla.

Theſe points having been warmly litigated by the different parties for eight or nine months, they were at length adjuſted by another convention negotiated by the count de Rothemberg, miniſter of France, and ſigned at the Pardo, near Madrid, the ſixth of March, 1728. This inſtrument contained an explanation of the preliminaries: and it was once more ſolemnly ſtipulated, that all the reſpective pretenſions on each ſide ſhould be produced, debated, and decided in the congreſs to be held at Soiſſons, with a particular engagement that their Britannic and Catholic majeſties would abide by what ſhould be there regulated.

In the mean time, it was agreed that the Britiſh ſquadrons ſhould be ordered, without delay, to withdraw from the ſeas of Old and New Spain; in conſideration of which, his Catholic majeſty likewiſe engaged that the blockade of Gibraltar ſhould be immediately raiſed; that a clear and expreſs order ſhould be ſent without delay for reſtoring the ſhip Prince Frederic, with her cargo, to the agents of the South-ſea company; and that the effects of the Flotilla ſhould be forthwith delivered to the reſpective proprietors.

Theſe conditions being accepted on both ſides, his Catholic majeſty ratified the preliminaries; but before the ratifications were exchanged, ſome new diſputes aroſe concerning the orders agreed to be ſent to the Weſt Indies, in purſuance of this convention. Theſe freſh difficulties took up ſome time longer, but were likewiſe got over by the count de Rothemberg and M. Vandermeer, the miniſter from the States-general, who managed all our affairs at the court of Spain; and the congreſs was opened at Soiſſons on the fourteenth of June, 1728, of which more in its place.

While theſe negotiations were on foot, a treaty or convention, which afterwards made a great noiſe in the world, was concluded at Weſtminſter, between his Britannic majeſty and the duke of Brunſwic-Lunenburg-Wolfenbuttel. By this convention the Serene duke engaged to guaranty all his majeſty's dominions in Great Britain, Ireland, and Germany; and likewiſe to furniſh a body of five thouſand men, for which our king engaged to pay the ſaid duke a yearly ſubſidy of twenty-five thouſand pounds, for four years. By a ſeparate article in this convention it was ſtipulated, that the duke's troops were not to be obliged to paſs over to Great Britain or Ireland, but ſhould be employed either in replacing troops that might be drawn from his majeſty's German dominions, or be put into the garriſons of the States-general, in caſe any of their troops ſhould be ſent over to Great Britain.

The elections in England and Scotland for the new parliament having gone entirely in favour of the miniſtry, the two houſes met on the twenty-third day of January, 1728, when the commons unanimouſly choſe for their ſpeaker Arthur Onſlow, eſq. knight of the ſhire for the county of Surry; a gentleman of extenſive knowlege, approved integrity, and abilities every way equal to the diſcharge of that honourable and important office, and who afterwards fully juſtified the choice of that reſpectable body, by his conduct in a longer ſeries of public and irreprehenſible ſervices in that ſtation than any man had ever done before him.

The king, in his ſpeech to this new parliament, declared, that he was very ſenſible of the diſagreeable and uneaſy ſituation in which their affairs were at preſent placed, and had been greatly concerned to ſee many of the inconveniencies of a war attending his ſubjects, without any opportunity of reſenting the injuries they had ſuſtained, or gaining, in return, any of thoſe advantages which the vigorous proſecution of ſo juſt a cauſe, and the ſucceſs of his arms, might probably have ſecured to them: that many difficulties had occurred to impede the execution of the preliminaries; and tho' there was great reaſon to believe that the congreſs would ſoon be opened, and all obſtructions removed, yet was it abſolutely neceſſary to continue their warlike preparations, which had hitherto prevented a general rupture in Europe, and procured to the Engliſh nation many advantages, which would be entirely loſt through a diſcontinuance of their armaments: that he was extremely deſirous of reducing the national expences, and would not fail to ſet about this neceſſary and important work, as ſoon as the intereſt of his people would permit: he earneſtly recommended to their conſideration the increaſe and encouragement of ſeamen in general, that they might be invited, rather than compelled, to enter into the ſervice of their country; a conſideration, he ſaid, well worthy the repreſentatives of a people great and flouriſhing in trade and commerce: that he hoped they would make an addition to the fund of Greenwich hoſpital, and proceed in all their deliberations with ſuch unanimity, zeal, and diſpatch, as to convince the world that none of them could be induced, from any views or motives whatever, to wiſh the diſtreſs of their country, or to give occaſion, from the proſpect of diviſions that might be excited and fomented at home, to interrupt or diſappoint their expectations from abroad.

The two houſes ſeemed to vie with each other in expreſſions of loyalty and affection to his majeſty. The lords in their addreſs complimented him in the higheſt ſtrains of applauſe, as the beſt of kings, and the true father of his country. The commons, not to be behind with them, poured forth their grateful acknowlegements for the bleſſings they enjoyed under his auſpicious reign (in which it ſhould ſeem they rather over-ſhot the mark, as it was hardly eight months old). They approved of all his tranſactions, promiſed to ſupport him in all his undertakings, and declared they would chearfully grant whatſoever ſupplies ſhould be wanted for the public ſervice.

Theſe warm profeſſions of the commons drew from the king a moſt gracious anſwer, in which he gave them thanks for their very loyal and affectionate addreſs: "Such returns of duty and gratitude from his faithful commons, he ſaid, would add, if any thing poſſibly could, to his reſolution of promoting and conſulting upon all occaſions the welfare and proſperity of his people. The entire confidence you place in me (continues his majeſty) will engage me more ſtrictly to make uſe of the power and truſt you have repoſed in me for your intereſt, and to your ſatisfaction; and you ſhall always find my readineſs to eaſe and reduce the expences of the public to your expectations." This anſwer was ſo highly pleaſing to the houſe, that they unanimouſly reſolved to return their moſt humble thanks for it by another addreſs.

Nor did they confine themſelves to words alone; for having conſidered the eſtimates which were laid before them by order of his majeſty, they voted twenty-two thouſand nine hundred and fifty-five men for the land-ſervice, and fifteen thouſand ſeamen. They granted two hundred and thirty thouſand nine hundred and twenty-three pounds for the maintenance of twelve thouſand Heſſian troops; a ſubſidy of fifty thouſand pounds to the king of Sweden; and another of half that ſum to the duke of Wolfenbuttel. The expence of the year amounted to three millions ſeven hundred and ninety-nine thouſand four hundred and fifty-four pounds ſixteen ſhillings, raiſed by the land-tax, the malt-tax, and by a loan from the Bank of one million ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, for which annuities, to the amount of ſeventy thouſand pounds, to be raiſed by the duty on coals imported into the city of London, were granted to that corporation.

We muſt not, however, ſuppoſe that theſe very liberal grants paſſed unoppoſed: the number of land-forces occaſioned a debate, and great heats aroſe about allowing the Heſſian auxiliaries. In regard to the loan of the Bank, Mr. W. Pulteney obſerved, that the ſhifting of funds was in effect only perpetuating taxes, and putting off the evil day; that although ſome perſons had arrogated great merit to themſelves in having erected the Sinking Fund, it appeared that the national debt had been increaſed ſince the ſetting up of that project. This ſubject occaſioned ſome warm altercation between this gentleman and ſir Robert Walpole.

On

On the twenty-ſixth of February the city of London preſented a petition to the houſe of commons on the affair of the coal-tax, ſetting forth, "That the duties already laid upon coal and culm imported into the port of London only affect their trade; and the inequality of the burthen thereof is a great diſcouragement to their manufactures, as well as an hardſhip upon the whole trading people in and about the city of London; and praying the houſe would give them ſuch relief as to their wiſdom ſhould ſeem meet." As the granting this petition would have entirely defeated the loan, it was rejected by the majority, and the tax was impoſed.

Great heats and debates aroſe in the houſe of commons this ſeſſion about the application of part of the public money. The commons having addreſſed the king for a particular account of the diſtribution of the money that had been granted the preceding year, a ſtate of it was laid before them; but finding a charge of two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, ſaid in general terms to have been iſſued "for ſecuring the trade and navigation of the kingdom," they preſented a ſecond addreſs, deſiring a more exact and diſtinct ſpecification of the diſburſement of that ſum. To this addreſs ſir P. Methuen, by his majeſty's command, returned for anſwer, that the laſt parliament having given the late king, his majeſty's royal father, a power to iſſue and apply ſuch ſums of money as he ſhould find neceſſary for diſcharging ſuch expences, and fulfilling ſuch engagements as had been or ſhould be made for the ſecurity of his kingdom, and the preſervation of the peace of Europe, ſome part of the money mentioned in the addreſs had been iſſued and diſburſed by his late majeſty for theſe great and neceſſary purpoſes, and the remaining part had been applied by his preſent majeſty for the like ſervices. His majeſty therefore hoped that the houſe would repoſe the ſame confidence in him as they had done in his royal father, and reſt aſſured that the money had been faithfully and neceſſarily expended, purſuant to the power given him by act of parliament, and for the uſes and purpoſes therein directed; but that a particular and diſtinct account thereof could not be given, without manifeſt prejudice to the public ſervice.

Such a meſſage, though perhaps not unprecedented, was certainly very little agreeable to the eſtabliſhed methods of proceeding between king and parliament, and would, under ſome reigns, have been conſtrued into an unpardonable ſtretch of the regal power: it was indeed too glaring to eſcape the animadverſions of the gentlemen in the oppoſition. Mr. W. Pulteney in particular inveighed againſt it, as vague, frivolous, and altogether unparliamentary, and ſuch as might be made uſe of to defeat every enquiry which that houſe might think proper to ſet on foot concerning the diſpoſal of public money. "If we allow of ſuch anſwers, ſaid he, we may reſign our moſt precious privilege as a parliament, that of enquiring into the diſtribution of public money, and the conduct of corrupt miniſters, who ought to be the objects of our cenſure." To this the advocates for the miniſtry replied, that the anſwer was conformable to another returned in the late reign to a like addreſs: there was no more reaſon, they ſaid, for diſtruſting his preſent majeſty, than there was for diſtruſting his royal father: that the commons were ſo well ſatisfied on that occaſion, that inſtead of expreſſing any diſſatisfaction, they returned the king an addreſs of thanks for his gracious anſwer. Sir Robert Walpole ſaid, that if the gentlemen on the other ſide of the queſtion would but maturely conſider the various and complicated intereſts actually ſubſiſting on the continent, they would find it abſolutely impoſſible that the public ſervice could be carried on if every ſhilling of the money, expended for the benefit of the common cauſe, and the maintenance of the balance of Europe, ſhould be laid open to all the world. In the end, the houſe reſolved, by a great majority, to accept of the anſwer returned by his majeſty.

On the fourth day of March the commons took into conſideration the ſtate of the national debt; on which affair the houſe, reſolving itſelf into a grand committee, examined the accounts, and interrogated the proper officers, when a court-member moved for the following reſolution, "That it appears to this houſe that the monies already iſſued and applied towards diſcharging the national debts incurred before Chriſtmas 1716, together with the ſum of ſix hundred and fifty-five thouſand pounds to be iſſued at Lady-day next, amount to ſix millions ſix hundred and forty-eight thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-two pounds five ſhillings and one penny farthing." The bent of this motion was evidently to appeaſe the clamour which had been raiſed, that the public debts had increaſed ſince the eſtabliſhment of the Sinking Fund. The anti-miniſterial party, on the other hand, exerted all their abilities, which are allowed to have been very great, to expoſe the fallacious tendency of this motion. Mr. Daniel Pulteney, who was at that time in high credit for his great knowlege of public buſineſs and foreign tranſactions, put himſelf at the head of the debate upon this occaſion. He was ſupported by his relation Mr. William Pulteney, Mr. Shippen, and in general by all the heads of the oppoſition.

Mr. Daniel Pulteney was a cold, but weighty ſpeaker; and tho' other members in the oppoſition had brighter parts, none of them poſſeſſed ſuperior, if equal, abilities; becauſe his capacity, which was ſound and vigorous, had been improved by ſtudy. Mr. William Pulteney inherited from nature a good underſtanding, which he had ſtudiouſly cultivated: he was well read both in hiſtory and politics, and deeply ſkilled in the Britiſh conſtitution: he was maſter of a rapid and overpowering eloquence, and ſpoke with great freedom and courage. Mr. Shippen was calm, intrepid, ſhrewd, and ſarcaſtic. Sir William Wyndham was nervous, manly, and full of ſenatorial dignity.

Theſe great men declaimed in the warmeſt terms upon the profuſe miſmanagement of the public money: they inſiſted, that notwithſtanding the very liberal grants which had been made by parliament during the laſt and preſent reign, notwithſtanding the eſtabliſhment of the Sinking Fund, the national debt was annually increaſing, and that too in a time of profound peace; a circumſtance which yielded a very melancholy proſpect, ſince at this rate the public debts muſt encreaſe farther in caſe of a foreign war, or domeſtic commotion; ſo that the heavy and numerous taxes, under which the people at preſent laboured, ſeemed likely to be entailed on them to lateſt poſterity.

In ſupport of theſe aſſertions, they demonſtrated ſeveral fraudulent artifices uſed in drawing up the accounts: they ſhewed that thoſe who had prepared them had, in order to render more capital the ſum ſaid to have been iſſued and applied toward the diſcharge of the public debts incurred before Chriſtmas 1716, added no leſs than three millions for the advanced price given in 1720, to convert the irredeemable debts into redeemables, which they urged could not with any propriety be called a payment of thoſe debts: that on the other hand, in the account of the preſent national debt, or of the increaſe of that debt ſince Chriſtmas 1716, ſeveral large ſums were omitted, particularly one million upon the credit of the civil liſt, and ſeveral deficiencies in the land-tax, malt-tax, and other funds, which certainly ſtill remain a public debt.

After having exhauſted all their rhetoric, however, the miniſterial party carried their point; for a ſecond motion being made by the oppoſition for the ſpeaker to reſume the chair, it was carried in the negative by a very great majority; in conſequence of which the firſt motion was approved without any diviſion.

The great debt due to the navy was another intereſting object of this parliament; and therefore, on the twenty-ninth of April, the houſe came to the following reſolution; "That in order to the more regular, conſtant, and punctual payment of ſeamens wages for the future, a ſum, not exceeding five hundred thouſand pounds, be granted to his majeſty, towards paying off and diſcharging ſuch part of the debt of the navy as is due upon the head of ſeamens wages."

And now the miniſter, though ſenſible that he had greatly the ſuperiority of numbers in the houſe in his favour, reſolved to eſtabliſh his credit without doors, which had been of late very ſeverely handled from the preſs, of which his opponents had in a manner the entire poſſeſſion, while he was inconceivably negligent in this reſpect: he looked upon writing to be a mechanical kind of buſineſs, and took up with the firſt pen he could find in public offices, or whom he could oblige by private liberality; and it was very ſeldom he ever read over the pamphlets or papers that were wrote even in defence of his own meaſures. But to return: Sir Robert Walpole knew that the writers for the oppoſition had, by numbers and calculations, perſuaded the people that the Sinking Fund, which had been extolled as a growing treaſure, ſacred to the diſcharge of national incumbrances, had, by a ſhameful miſapplication, proved of little or no ſervice to the purpoſe for which it was originally intended. Such a notion prevailing among the public, could by no means be favourable to the adminiſtration. The miniſter therefore, in order to retrieve his character, made a ſolemn appeal to the tribunal of majeſty itſelf, by cauſing a repreſentation to be drawn up, containing a particular detail of the national debts diſcharged and incurred ſince the twenty-fifth day of December 1716, with a ſtate of the Sinking Fund and of the public credit.

It was a very elaborate performance, and began with ſome very ſevere reflections againſt the arts which had been practiſed in order to miſlead the people in this important point: then, after ſtating the whole of the national debt, it repreſented to his majeſty, that the ſeveral national debts incurred before the twenty-fifth of December 1716, which have been ſince diſcharged, after deducting the ſum of twenty-two thouſand three hundred and fifty-ſeven pounds eight ſhillings and four-pence, do amount in the whole to ſix millions ſix hundred and twenty-ſix thouſand four hundred and four pounds ſixteen ſhillings and nine pence half-penny; and that the ſeveral national debts incurred ſince the ſaid twenty-fifth of December, 1716, and now ſubſiſting, amount together to the ſum of three millions nine hundred and twenty-ſeven thouſand nine hundred and eighty-eight pounds ſeven ſhillings and one penny three farthings, which being deducted out of the amount of the debts diſcharged, the difference is ſo much real decreaſe of the national debt ſince the twenty-fifth of December 1716, being two millions ſix hundred ninety-eight thouſand four hundred and ſixteen pounds nine ſhillings and ſeven-pence three farthings. The repreſentation then goes on to ſhew, "That by the ſeveral reductions from ſix to five, and from five now to four per cent. on the greateſt part of the public debts; ſo great ſavings of intereſt have been made, that the Sinking Fund may now be eſtimated to be about one million two hundred thouſand pounds per annum, and will be every year increaſing, from the farther ſavings of the intereſt of the remaining debts from time to time, as they ſhall be paid off: which increaſe of the Sinking Fund, from four hundred thouſand pounds to about one million two hundred thouſand pounds (ſince Midſummer 1727) being in the hands of government, and applicable from time to time to the diſcharge of the principal, makes a gain and profit to the public equal to the diſcharge of one third of the principal debt; ſo that the ſaid additional eight hundred thouſand pounds to the Sinking Fund, if valued at twenty-five years purchaſe, at which rate all annuities are now currently ſold, makes a real profit to the public of twenty millions: and if, notwithſtanding the many difficulties this nation has laboured under by an unnatural rebellion, and by the many heinous plots and conſpiracies ſince formed for overturning the religion and liberties of our country, and notwithſtanding the embroiled condition of the affairs of Europe, we have been able to diminiſh the national debts ſo much already, what may we not hope for (concludes this paper) in regard to a ſpeedy diſpatch of them for the future?"

Such was the purport of this famous repreſentation, upon which we ſhall only in brief remark, with the moſt approved writers on the other ſide of the queſtion, that although the then adminiſtration, and thoſe which ſucceeded it, had afterwards many ſuch difficulties to ſtruggle with as are enumerated in the above repreſentation, more ſurely might have been done for increaſing the Sinking Fund, by abſolutely preſerving it inviolable; although it muſt be allowed, that it would have been attended with many and great difficulties, conſidering that a ſecond rebellion, and two very expenſive wars, have happened ſince that repreſentation was made. What is paſt needs not to be enlarged upon; but ſurely hereafter (eſpecially in times of peace) a determined national frugality ought to be cultivated with the utmoſt attention; and it is earneſtly to be hoped and wiſhed, that in order to increaſe the Sinking Fund, the public might be benefited by a rational reduction of the ſalaries of many uſeleſs offices and employments in the revenue, &c. the fee-ſimple whereof would probably amount to a greater ſum than many may apprehend, were a ſtrict enquiry made thereinto.

The repreſentation being approved of by the houſe, was preſented to his majeſty, who returned a very remarkable and favourable anſwer, importing, that he was highly pleaſed with this repreſentation, which could not fail to give general ſatisfaction to all his people, by removing thoſe groundleſs jealouſies and apprehenſions which had been propagated and diſperſed throughout the kingdom: that the happy effects of the flouriſhing ſtate of the public credit were too ſenſibly felt and ſeen, not to be confeſſed and acknowleged by every impartial perſon: that the proviſion made for gradually diſcharging the national debt was now become ſo certain and conſiderable, that nothing but ſome unforeſeen event could alter or diminiſh it; a circumſtance that afforded the faireſt proſpect of ſeeing the old debts diſcharged without the neceſſity of incurring new incumbrances: and that they might be well aſſured, that it ſhould ever be his particular care and ſtudy to maintain and preſerve the public credit, and improve the Sinking Fund, and to avoid all occaſions of laying new burdens upon his people.

This anſwer, fraught with ſo many expreſſions of fatherly tenderneſs for his ſubjects, paved the way for a meſſage from his majeſty to the houſe of commons, which was delivered on the fourth day of May by ſir P. Methuen, and conſiſted in a demand of a vote of credit, to fulfil certain engagements entered into and concerted with the advice and concurrence of the laſt parliament, for ſecuring the trade and navigation of the kingdom, and for reſtoring and preſerving the peace of Europe. This meſſage was productive of a long and violent debate; but notwithſtanding all the efforts of the oppoſition, it was carried by a majority of two hundred and thirty-ſeven againſt one hundred and one, that his majeſty's requeſt ſhould be granted. This compleated the triumph of the miniſter, who now ſeemed to have ſet his foot upon the neck of his adverſaries.

They returned, however, to the attack, not ſo much from any view of being able to make a ſucceſsful ſtand, as from a determined reſolution to render the miniſter as unpopular as poſſible. With this view a motion was made on the ſeventeenth of May, for an account of the ſale of woods, and grants of falls of woods, by his late majeſty, from Chriſtmas 1715 to January 1727, and how the ſame had been accounted for. This motion however had a negative put upon it, though it was repreſented that great waſte had been made in the royal foreſts, at a time when the nation was in the utmoſt want of timber to ſupply and ſupport the navy.

Little elſe material of public buſineſs happened this ſeſſion of parliament, if we except an addreſs of the commons to the king to purchaſe the Carolina charter, of which take the following ſhort account:

Towards the cloſe of the late reign the colonies of South and North Carolina were terribly harraſſed by the incurſions of the Indians in their neighbourhood, the inhabitants being unable, with what aſſiſtance they could procure from the adjoining colonies, to withſtand thoſe ſavages; and the lords proprietors, unwilling to take upon themſelves the expence of this Indian war, the deputies of the ſuffering colonies humbly beſought his majeſty to take them under his royal protection. The duke of Beaufort, the lord Craven, ſir John Colleton, and others, the repreſentatives of the original proprietors of thoſe two provinces, having alſo declared by petition to his majeſty their willingneſs to ſurrender their charter to the crown for a valuable conſideration; the commons thereupon addreſſed the king to contract with the ſaid lords proprietors of Carolina for the purchaſe and ſurrender of their title to that province, promiſing to make good the expence out of the next aids granted by parliament. In conſequence of this addreſs, an act was paſſed this ſeſſion, by which (for the trifling ſum of twenty-two thouſand five hundred pounds) theſe fine provinces were made regal from after the 1ſt of June 1729: and in this regal ſtate Carolina has amazingly flouriſhed and increaſed in trade and commerce, and has extended its plantations farther back or weſtward. Proper ſupplies have been ſent thither by the crown from time to time, whereby the neighbouring Indians were compelled to live in a peaceful manner, till ſome few years ago, when they were again reduced to reaſonable terms, though not without much bloodſhed *.

During this ſeſſion the parliament were chiefly employed in examining copies of ſeveral treaties and alliances which the king had laid before them. They likewiſe made an attempt to amend the ſtatute of limitations, which however miſcarried in the ſequel. They paſſed the mutiny-bill, together with thoſe relating to the public ſupplies, and ſome others of a private nature. Theſe having received the royal aſſent, the king cloſed the ſeſſion on the twenty-eighth day of May, when he thanked the commons for the effectual ſupplies they had raiſed, and in particular for having empowered him to borrow five hundred thouſand pounds for the diſcharge of wages due to the ſeamen employed in the navy.

Towards the cloſe of this ſeſſion his majeſty was pleaſed to raiſe the following gentlemen to the degree of barons of this kingdom: ſir John Monſon, by the title of lord Monſon: ſir Thomas Wentworth, by that of lord Malton: ſir John Hobart, by that of lord Hobart: and ſir Thomas Coke, by that of lord Lovel.

In the ſpring of this year the king made an excurſion to New-market, where he was waited upon by the univerſity of Cambridge, with Dr. Lambert, their vice-chancellor, at their head, who beſought his majeſty to honour them with his preſence at dinner; which invitation he moſt graciouſly accepted. At a ſmall diſtance from the town of Cambridge he was met by the mayor and corporation in their formalities, who conducted him through it to the Regent-walk, where he was received by the duke of Somerſet, then chancellor of the univerſity, attended by the whole body of that illuſtrious ſeminary in their proper robes and habits. At the ſenate-houſe he ordered ſeveral degrees to be conferred; at King's-college chapel he heard divine ſervice, and dined at Trinity-college with great magnificence. His majeſty made a preſent of two thouſand pounds to the univerſity, and retired in the evening to New-market, from whence he returned to St. James's the fifth day after his having left it.

England was at this time quite barren of remarkable events. In the beginning of July ſignior Como, agent from the duke of Parma, was ordered to depart the kingdom in two days, his maſter having offered a groſs inſult to king George, by inviting the pretender to reſide in his dominions, and having received him with the honours due to the king of Great Britain.

In Auguſt ſeveral perſons were taken into cuſtody, and ſome of them ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory, and to be committed to Bridewell to hard labour, on account of printing and publiſhing Miſt's Journal of Auguſt 24, which, under colour of relating the affairs of the Perſian empire, was deemed to contain very groſs and ſcandalous reflections upon the government, and the happy eſtabliſhment in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover. Edward Farley, printer of the Exeter Journal, for reprinting Miſt's Journal, had a bill of indictment found againſt him for high-treaſon; but upon a petition to the queen, after lying near a year in priſon, without bail or mainprize, he obtained a noli proſequi, and was cleared thereupon in open court.

The king's uncle Erneſt Auguſtus, prince of Brunſwic, duke of York, and biſhop of Oſnabrug, died at his palace of Oſnabrug on the third day of Auguſt, and was ſucceeded in the biſhopric by the elector of Cologn, according to the paction by which Oſnabrug is alternately poſſeſſed by the houſe of Brunſwic and that elector.

In the beginning of December following the nation was agreeably ſurprized by the ſudden and unexpected arrival in England of his royal highneſs prince Frederic, his majeſty's eldeſt ſon, who ſet out from Herenhauſen on the twenty-fourth of November, attended by the marquis de la Foreſt, his lord-chamberlain, and lieutenant-colonel Delaunay, of the Hanoverian guards, who had been ſent by his majeſty, they being then at the Engliſh court, to bring over his royal highneſs, ſome doubts having been urged in the privy-council concerning the non-reſidence of a prince of Wales in Great Britain. The marquis paſſed for an Engliſh gentleman, named Compton, and the prince for his ſon. Arriving in this manner incognito at Helvoetſluys, they went on board a packet then ready to ſail for Harwich, where his royal highneſs arrived on the third of December, lodged at Colcheſter that night, came to Whitechapel the next day about ſeven in the evening, and proceeded thence very privately in a hackney-coach to St. James's. The next day he was introduced to the privy-council, and created prince of Wales; and there was a brilliant and numerous court to congratulate his royal highneſs on his ſafe arrival, who was ſoon after addreſſed on the ſame occaſion from all parts of the kingdom.

The eyes of all Europe were now fixed upon the congreſs which was opened at Soiſſons on the 18th of June O. S. this year. The Britiſh miniſters were, William Stanhope, eſq. afterwards earl of Harrington; Horatio Walpole, eſq. and Stephen Poyntz, eſq. Thoſe of the emperor were, the counts Zinzendorf and Windiſgratz, and the baron Pentenreedter. Thoſe of the French court were, the cardinal de Fleury, the marquis de Fenelon, and the count de Brancas. From Spain were ſent the duke de Bournonville, the marquis de Santa Cruz, and Don Ignatio de Bernachea. The Dutch, the Swedes, the Danes, the Ruſſians, the Poles, the dukes of Holſtein, Parma, Bavaria, and the count Palatine, had likewiſe their ſeveral ambaſſadors there. But this numerous train of plenipotentiaries did little more than aſſemble in form, and produce their credentials; after which, having ſpent five or ſix months in ceremonies and diverſions, they broke up, and ſeparated without adjuſting any one material point in diſpute.

It is true, indeed, that a certain plan of accommodation, called a proviſional treaty, was framed by the miniſter of the Hanover alliance during this aſſembly, and ſent to the reſpective courts for their approbation: but as this draught of a treaty was neither reliſhed at home, nor accepted abroad, it does not deſerve much notice. I ſhall only obſerve in general, that it was little more than the preliminaries new-modelled, and digeſted into the form of a treaty, without any ſpecific explanation of thoſe points which moſt immediately affected the intereſts of Great Britain. Thus the fate of Europe was ſtill left in ſuſpence; the Engliſh fleet lay inactive in the Weſt Indies; the ſailors periſhed miſerably, without daring to revenge their country's wrongs; for the miniſtry were unwilling to engage in a war; and in the mean time the Spaniſh guarda coſtas committed daily depredations on our merchant ſhips in that quarter of the world.

Through the natural infirmities of the king of Spain, who had betaken himſelf to a peeviſh recluſe ſort of life, his queen, an Italian by birth, had engroſſed all power into her own hands. This princeſs was reſerved, reſolute, cunning, and dexterous in executing the moſt daring projects, even when attended with the moſt unpromiſing circumſtances: ſhe had fixed her heart upon the recovery of Gibraltar and Minorca; and procuring a ſettlement for her ſon Don Carlos in Italy. This made her very indifferent in regard to a reconciliation with England: but ſhe had been very aſſiduous in renewing a good underſtanding with the court of France, and now ſought to ſtrengthen her intereſt by a double marriage with the royal family of Portugal. The prince of Aſturias, eldeſt ſurviving ſon of the king of Spain by his firſt queen, now eſpouſed the infanta of Portugal; while the Spaniſh infanta, formerly affianced to the French king, but ſent back by him, was matched to the prince of Brazil, eldeſt ſon of his Portugueze majeſty. But it is now time to attend domeſtic affairs.

The parliament of Great Britain met, according to their laſt prorogation, on the twenty-firſt day of January, 1729, when his majeſty, in a ſpeech to both houſes, acquainted them, "That the plan of a proviſional treaty had already been approved by him and his allies, but that no ſatisfactory anſwer had as yet been returned by the courts of Vienna and Madrid: that this circumſtance created a ſtate of uncertainty, which gave him great uneaſineſs: but he hoped they would believe, that nothing but a regard for the eaſe and intereſt of his his people could have prevailed upon him, rather to ſuffer ſome temporary inconveniencies, with the daily proſpect of obtaining a ſafe and honourable peace, than precipitately to kindle a war in Europe, and to plunge the nation into ſtill greater and more enormous expences: that he was ſorry to find that the ſtate of affairs obliged him to continue the public expences, in order to enable him, as events might require, to act with vigour, and in concert with his allies, who had all of them reſolved to make the ſame preparations, and to keep on foot all their extraordinary forces: that he had ſome reaſon to believe, that the courts of Vienna and Madrid had been encouraged in their dilatory proceedings by the hopes which were given them from hence of creating diſcontents and diviſions among his ſubjects; but he was perſuaded, that their known affection for him, and a juſt regard for their own honour, and for the intereſt and ſecurity of the nation, would determine them effectually to diſcourage the unnatural and pernicious practices of ſome few, who ſuggeſted the means of diſtreſſing this country, and afterwards clamoured at the inconveniencies which they themſelves had occaſioned."

A man muſt have very little diſcernment, or elſe be miſerably blinded by prejudice, not to obſerve in this ſpeech the hand of the miniſter, labouring to render odious and unpopular all thoſe who ſet themſelves up to oppoſe him. The artifice had its deſired effect; the two houſes, all compliance with the will of thoſe at the helm, joined in addreſſes that could not fail of being agreeable: purſuing the hint that had been given them, they profeſſed their deteſtation and abhorrence of thoſe who went about to diſtreſs their country, by unfair repreſentations of the ſtate of things, and clamoured at the inconveniencies they themſelves had occaſioned. The eſtimates having been examined in the uſual form, the houſe voted fifteen thouſand ſeamen for the enſuing year; but the motion for continuing the ſame number of land-forces which had been allowed in the preceding year, and which amounted to near twenty-three thouſand men, begat a warm diſpute, in which Mr. W. Pulteney and Mr. Shippen particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves: they laboured to prove, from hiſtory and experience, the dangers into which a ſtanding army brought the conſtitution: they urged, that the court of Vienna having readily agreed to the preliminaries for a general pacification, there ought to be a reduction of that augmentation of the army, which the differences lately ſubſiſting with the houſe of Auſtria had induced the parliament to agree to. Theſe arguments, however, were anſwered and repreſented as abſurd by Mr. Horatio Walpole, and other ſtaunch adherents of the miniſter, who ſaid, that as no definitive reſolution in favour of peace had been made by the courts of Vienna and Madrid, the reduction of our national troops during ſuch a ſtate of indeciſion, would only encourage the powers with whom we were at variance to inſiſt upon higher terms: in a word, the motion for continuing the army upon the ſame footing it then was, paſſed by a great majority.

The ſubſidies to Sweden, Heſſe-Caſſel, and Wolfembuttel, were continued, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of ſir Joſeph Jekyll, Mr. Lutwyche, and Mr. Pulteney; which laſt obſerved, that as the Landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel and the duke of Brunſwick-Wolfembuttel uſually maintained a certain number of troops in their pay, it was but reaſonable that Great Britain ſhould defray the expence only of the additional forces which thoſe powers had raiſed, in conſequence of their conventions with the king of England. Sir Robert Walpole perceiving that this remark made an impreſſion on the houſe, thought it neceſſary to vindicate his meaſure: he expatiated on the wiſdom of the late king in concluding the Hanover alliance: he affirmed that the convention with Heſſe-Caſſel had prevented a war in the empire, for which the court of Vienna had made great preparations: that the emperor had not only augmented his own forces by the help of Spaniſh ſubſidies, but alſo retained the troops of three electors; and if he had not been overawed by the Heſſians, would certainly have rejected the preliminaries, and all other advances towards a pacification: that therefore they ought not to grudge an expence which had already proved ſo beneficial to the tranquility of Europe. The queſtion being put, the court carried their point by a great majority. It was then voted to grant the pay for the twelve thouſand Heſſians, and for the duke of Wolfembuttel's troops, and five hundred thouſand pounds ſubſidy to Sweden. The houſe of commons, however, thought proper on this occaſion to addreſs his majeſty, that whenever it ſhould be neceſſary to take any foreign troops into his ſervice, he will be graciouſly pleaſed to uſe his endeavours that they may be cloathed with the manufactures of Great Britain. The ſupplies were raiſed by a continuation of the land-tax, the duties upon malt, cyder, and perry, an additional impoſition on unmalted corn uſed in diſtilling, and by the ſale of annuities to the Bank, not exceeding fifty thouſand pounds per annum.

All this time the Spaniards continued to commit great depredations on our ſhips and ſettlements in America, which ſet the Engliſh on fire to repel theſe inſults; but the miniſtry, who were entirely devoted to peace, urged, that as ſomething deciſive muſt happen ere long, it was moſt eligible, as the nation had waited ſo long, to wait a little longer before it broke out into open hoſtilities. The oppoſition taking advantage of the popular ſentiments, let ſlip no opportunity of reviling and expoſing the government, who, for the ſake of one man, ſacrificed the honour and intereſt of their country. In order to counteract theſe attempts, ſir George Oxenden made a motion in the lower houſe for an addreſs to his majeſty, in anſwer to his ſpeech from the throne, to acknowlege his majeſty's great goodneſs and wiſdom in endeavouring to avoid all difficulties and delays, by concerting the moſt expeditious methods of bringing the negotiations at Soiſſons to a ſpeedy and honourable concluſion; expreſſing their grateful ſenſe of his majeſty's watchful care for the eaſe and intereſt of his people, in declining to plunge the nation into an expenſive war, as long as there was any proſpect of obtaining a ſafe and honourable peace; and, finally, aſſuring him that the houſe, in an entire confidence of his majeſty's tender regard for his own honour, and that of the nation, reſted fully ſatisfied that, as ſoon as neceſſity required, he would would not fail to take the firſt opportunity of doing juſtice to himſelf and the nation, in ſecuring the trade and commerce of the kingdom.

The oppoſition, however, were prepared for this counter-ſtroke, and endeavoured to return it back upon the miniſtry, by rendering them obnoxious to the trading part of the kingdom. With this view they moved for an amendment in ſir George's propoſed addreſs, and that the word reſtore ſhould be ſubſtituted in the room of ſecure the commerce of the kingdom. This cavil, it muſt be confeſſed, did little honour to thoſe who raiſed it, being at beſt but a poor quibble upon words. However, it ſo far anſwered the end, as to raiſe a warm debate upon a point the miniſtry were not very able to defend, their paſſive behaviour in regard to the inſults of the Spaniards. Sir William Yonge was at this time a frequent and a ready ſpeaker, and his oratory was florid and captivating. Some part of his private life, however, had been ſuch as had created him many enemies; and the prepoſſeſſion which prevailed againſt him, had extended itſelf to his parliamentary and miniſterial character, though in this point of view he certainly exhibited many ſtrong abilities. On this occaſion he ſet himſelf with all his ſtrength to refute the arguments brought by the oppoſition in ſupport of their amendment. He ſaid, that the diſtinction between reſtoring and ſecuring commerce, was a diſtinction without a difference; becauſe ſuppoſing (which however he would by no means admit) the Britiſh commerce was ruined, it might be reſtored before it could be ſecured. He obſerved, that whatever was juſt in the outcry againſt the Spaniſh depredations, was in a great meaſure owing to the intolerable avarice of ſome Engliſh interlopers, who carried on an unlawful traffick with the ſubjects of Spain in America, in defiance of treaties and the law of nations, as well as to the manifeſt prejudice of the fair Britiſh trader.

The oppoſition were ſtrengthened in this diſpute by ſir Joſeph Jekyll, maſter of the rolls. He was eſteemed an upright judge, and an uncorrupt ſenator. His knowlege both in law and equity were conſummate; but he was a weak politician, and a very indifferent ſpeaker. His prepoſſeſſions in favour of the old Whig principles were ſo ſtrong, that he could not bear the thoughts of England detaching herſelf from the houſe of Auſtria, and joining her intereſt with that of Bourbon. This was a revolution in politics which he could not comprehend; and which, in his opinion, endangered the conſtitution of the kingdom, the ſecurity of which, he ſaid, ought to be ſtill more dear to them than the ſecurity of commerce. In a word, the ableſt ſpeakers on both ſides exerted their utmoſt abilities in this debate; but the queſtion being at laſt put, whether the addreſs ſhould ſtand in its original form, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of two hundred and ninety-four againſt eighty-ſeven.

It happening, however, that the Spaniards made prize of ſome of our ſhips engaged in a lawful trade, the indignation of the public could be no longer reſtrained: petitions were delivered to the houſe of commons from the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Briſtol, complaining of the interruption they had ſuffered in their trade for ſeveral years, by the depredations of the Spaniards in the Weſt Indies. Theſe being conſidered, the houſe ordered the lords of the admiralty to produce the other memorials of the ſame kind which they had received, that they might be laid before the congreſs at Soiſſons; and addreſſed his majeſty for copies of all the letters and inſtruments which had been ſent to admiral Hoſier, and thoſe who ſucceeded him in the command of the Weſt India ſquadron. Having obtained theſe neceſſary informations, they enquired into the particulars, examined evidence, and drew up an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring he would be graciouſly pleaſed to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for preventing ſuch depredations, for procuring juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction, and for ſecuring to his ſubjects the free exerciſe of commerce and navigation to and from the Britiſh colonies in America. The king aſſured them, he would uſe his beſt endeavours to anſwer the deſires and expectations of his people in an affair of ſo much importance; and they in another addreſs thanked him for his gracious anſwer.

The commons having made farther progreſs in the enquiry, and received freſh petitions from the merchants, agreed to the following reſolutions; that ſeveral ſhips, merchandizes, and effects belonging to the merchants of this kingdom, trading to Spain, Portugal, and Italy, had been taken by the Spaniards, in manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns, for which no reſtitution had as yet been made; and that the maſters and crews of ſeveral ſhips had been barbarouſly and inhumanly treated: that, in order to take the neceſſary care of the intereſts and properties of his majeſty's ſubjects and thoſe of his allies, who were deeply concerned in the cargo and effects belonging to the flota and galleons; and to the end that the ſaid treaſure ſhould not be employed in carrying on and ſupporting dangerous meaſures and engagements againſt his majeſty and his allies, the orders and inſtructions given to vice-admiral Hoſier to block up the flota and galleons, and to endeavour to ſecure and detain them without embezzlement, until juſtice and ſatisfaction ſhould be given to his majeſty and his allies, were juſt, prudent, and neceſſary, tending very much to prevent an open rupture, and to preſerve the peace and tranquillity of Europe. Theſe reſolutions were communicated in an addreſs to his majeſty, who was again requeſted to uſe his endeavours to procure ſatisfaction to the unhappy ſufferers; and he aſſured the houſe that he would not fail to comply with their requeſt.

The Spaniſh miniſtry, on the other hand, inſiſted that the Engliſh, being excluded by treaty from any right to cut logwood in the bay of Campeachy, or of trading to that bay, their cruizers and guarda coſtas were warrantable in ſeizing and detaining all ſuch veſſels as they ſhould find purſuing that illicit trade. To ſet this matter, which was the foundation of moſt of our diſputes with the Spaniſh court, in a true light, I ſhall preſent my readers (from Mr. Anderſon's celebrated Treatiſe on Commerce, and other authorities) with a ſhort hiſtorical deduction of the right claimed by the Britiſh nation, to retain a colony, and to cut logwood in the bay of Campeachy.

It was in the year 1662 that the Engliſh, from their colonies on the north continent of America, firſt began to cut down the logwood trees, growing in infinite quantities on the uninhabited coaſts of the province of Jucatan, and more eſpecially in the bay of Campeachy, where they made a ſettlement for that end, as it was not near to any Spaniſh ſettlement or inhabitants. Their firſt ſettlement was near Cape Catoche, next the Laguna di Terminos, which was found more convenient, and where the Engliſh buccaneers afterwards found themſelves obliged to ſettle, upon the treaty of Madrid between England and Spain in 1667; which treaty, though it made no particular mention of America by name, expreſsly ſtipulated "A general, firm, and perpetual amity between the two crowns, as well by land as by ſea, and between all the countries under the obedience of either of the kings." By the year 1669 that Engliſh ſettlement was conſiderably increaſed, and much logwood was carried from thence both to New England and Jamaica. In the year 1670 was concluded at Madrid, by ſir W. Godolphin, the firſt treaty between England and Spain which expreſsly related to America, and therefore is uſually called the American treaty.

By this convention the then poſſeſſions of both nations in America are confirmed. This gave encouragement to more of our people to ſettle with the above-mentioned logwood cutters, as it was in a deſolate and unplanted country, and that the Spaniards had not hitherto made any complaints about it: for it was not till the year 1672 that the Spaniards began to interrupt our logwood cutters there, or to make the leaſt remonſtrances to our court againſt their ſettling in that bay. Soon after, however, the Spaniards became ſo uneaſy at that ſettlement, and our cutting the logwood, that they actually made prize of all Engliſh veſſels they met in the American ſeas which had any of that commodity on board; of which the earl of Arlington, the Engliſh ſecretary of ſtate, loudly complained to the Spaniſh court by a letter, in the year 1674: for, as the ſole advantage our court had in view by concluding the American treaty was, that our people might, without interruption, trade to our own colonies, and peaceably enjoy our then poſſeſſions in America, we were herein greatly fruſtrated by the court of Spain's conduct; ſo that this American treaty has ever ſince afforded a handle or pretence to that court to ſeize on our ſhips ſailing along their American coaſts, although with no intention of carrying on any contraband trade. It has occaſionally been farther improved by Spain, to the having any quantity of pieces of eight to be ſeized, when found on board our ſhips near their American coaſts; yet (excepting two or three months in the year 1680 that the Spaniards, by a conſiderable force, diſlodged our logwood-cutters from the Laguna di Terminos, and the iſland de Triſt) our people have remained in poſſeſſion thereof. In the year 1717 the marquis de Monteleone delivered a memorial againſt the Britiſh ſubjects ſettlements in the iſle of Triſt, and one near the Laguna di Terminos, in the province of Jucatan and bay of Campeachy, where they continued to cut logwood; declaring, that if in the ſpace of eight months they do not leave the ſaid place, they ſhall be looked upon and treated as pirates. Hereupon the matter was referred by the king to the board of trade: they gave it as their opinion, that the Engliſh had a right to cut logwood there; which opinion was founded on the principles above related, confirmed by the treaty of Utrecht; wherein, after confirming the American treaty, a ſtipulation is inſerted, that the ſame ſhall be without any prejudice to any liberty or power which the ſubjects of Great Britain enjoyed before, either through right, ſufferance, or indulgence.

The attention of the commons was not ſo wholly engroſſed by affairs of a public nature as to ſuffer them to neglect certain matters of a domeſtic kind, which were about this time brought before them, and which were very important and intereſting objects. Some public-ſpirited gentlemen, at the head of whom was Mr. (afterwards general) Oglethorpe, having received intimations of the cruelties and oppreſſions practiſed throughout almoſt all the goals in the kingdom upon priſoners, particularly in his majeſty's priſon of the Fleet; Mr. Oglethorpe, who was a member of the commons, laid the information he had received before the houſe; upon which a committee was appointed, with Mr. Oglethorpe for their chairman, to enquire into the ſtate of all the gaols over the kingdom; and on the twenty-ſeventh of February they repaired to the Fleet priſon, that they might examine the priſoners in their own perſons. In conſequence of this viſitation, what before ſeemed juſtly alarming, now roſe into circumſtances of ſuch complicated guilt, as filled the committee with horror. Whereupon the houſe came to ſeveral reſolutions, and committed Huggins and Bambridge, the late and preſent wardens, with ſeveral of their underſtrappers, cloſe priſoners to Newgate. A ſtate of the Fleet priſon was publiſhed, which diſplayed a lamentable ſcene of cruelty and barbarity. Huggins and Bambridge were tried for many crimes and miſdemeanors, as well as murder; but were unexpectedly acquitted. One Acton, farmer of and clerk to the Marſhalſea, was alſo tried for murder, and acquitted. The iſſue of the whole was, that the gaols were put under proper regulations, and our unhappy fellow-ſubjects beneath the preſſure of misfortunes, delivered from the gripe of villains who had made a practice of adding miſery, torment, and extortion, to wretchedneſs.

Complaints having been made of the deficiency of the civil liſt revenue, ſome members moved for an addreſs to his majeſty, intreating him to order an account of theſe revenues for one year to be laid before the houſe. The addreſs was preſented, the account produced, and the houſe reſolved itſelf into a grand committee, to take the affair into conſideration. The miniſtry affirmed that they fell ſhort of the eight hundred thouſand pounds ſettled upon his majeſty; and therefore moved that the ſum of one hundred and fifteen thouſand pounds ſhould be granted to the king on account of thoſe deficiencies and arrears.

This motion was vehemently oppoſed by all the members of the anti-miniſterial party: they inſiſted, from the examination of the officers of the revenue at their bar, with ſeveral accounts that had been delivered to the houſe, that this ſum of eight hundred thouſand pounds and more was actually ſtanding out in arrears which would be ſoon paid into the Exchequer. The pretence of a deficiency was therefore given up, and the one hundred and fifteen thouſand pounds were in a manner begged by way of ſalvo, to the credit of thoſe who firſt demanded it as a juſt debt. Nay, for their honour, there is a clauſe inſerted in the act which grants it, ſhewing it to be true; for it is there enacted, that the ſum of one hundred and fifteen thouſand pounds ſhall be repaid out of any arrears of the civil liſt at his majeſty's demiſe.

The ſum of ninety-three thouſand nine hundred and forty pounds of the late queen's civil liſt lottery, which remained unſubſcribed to the South-ſea company, being entirely paid off in the year 1728, by the thirty-five thouſand per annum appropriated for this ſervice; and there being an annual ſum of ſixteen thouſand four hundred pounds then remaining more than what anſwered the bare intereſt of that part of the lottery which was ſubſcribed into the South-ſea company, this annual ſum of ſixteen thouſand four hundred pounds was judged to belong to the civil liſt, and accordingly was taken, though, by an act of the ſixth Geo. I. the whole thirty-five thouſand pounds were appropriated for ever, with the other branches of the Sinking Fund, towards the payment of the national debt. Few perſons, however, were ſurpriſed at the frequent neceſſities of the civil liſt, notwithſtanding that ample revenue which was ſettled on the crown in the preceding reign, when it was found that no leſs a ſum than one million three hundred and thirty-ſix thouſand pounds was paid in four years, from March 1721 to March 1725, for penſions, bounties, and ſecret ſervice-money, which is annually above half the civil liſt revenue.

It was from a reflection on the damage that muſt accrue by ſuch profuſion to both prince and people, and even to the miniſters themſelves, as it induced a corrupt dependence thro' all ranks and degrees of men, that the moſt reputable members in the oppoſition reſolved to make a ſtand againſt this torrent, and, if poſſible, leſſen the miniſterial influence. With this view a bill was produced by Mr. Watkyns-William Wynn, for the more effectually preventing bribery and corruption in parliamentary elections. The title of this bill being ſo truly unexceptionable, the miniſter, fearful of encreaſing too much the popular clamour againſt him ſhould he oppoſe it, though, on the other hand, if he ſuffered it to paſs, his influence would be greatly diminiſhed thereby, was for ſome time at a loſs how to act: at length his prudence determined him to give it no oppoſition, and the bill accordingly paſſed through the lower houſe with great diſpatch.

When it came into the houſe of peers, that auguſt aſſembly thought proper to raiſe the penalty upon a corrupt voter, party, or agent, in the election for a member of parliament, from fifty to five hundred pounds; and the perſon ſo convicted to be for ever diſabled to vote in any election, and diſqualified from holding any office or franchiſe as a member of any city, borough, town-corporate, or cinque-ports. The lords likewiſe added to this bill the following clauſe: "That ſuch votes ſhall be deemed to be legal, which have been ſo declared by the laſt determination in the houſe of commons, concerning any county, ſhire, city, borough, cinque-port, or place, and ſhall be final to all intents and purpoſes whatſoever, any uſage to the contrary notwithſtanding."

In the mean time their lordſhips had taken into their conſideration the ſtate of the nation, particularly the poſitive demand made by the court of Spain for the reſtitution of Gibraltar, grounded on a letter written by the late king to his Catholic majeſty, a copy of which was laid before the houſe. The lords engaged in the oppoſition took occaſion from this letter to declaim violently againſt the miniſtry; and moved to reſolve, that for the honour of his majeſty, and the preſervation and ſecurity of the trade and commerce of this kingdom, effectual care ſhould be taken in the treaty now depending, that the king of Spain do renounce all claim and pretenſion to Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca, in plain and ſtrong terms.

This motion however was oppoſed by the lords of the court-party, who inſiſted, in the firſt place, that the pretenſions of the court of Madrid were in themſelves abſurd and frivolous, ſince it appeared by the copy of the letter before them, that his majeſty had only ſaid that he would make uſe of the firſt favourable opportunity to regulate the article of the reſtitution of Gibraltar, with the conſent of his parliament; the promiſe therefore was no other than conditional, and could not in any ſenſe be binding to his Britannic majeſty, unleſs his parliament ſhould give their conſent. Furthermore, they ſaid, that in their opinion Great Britain had a much better right, by the treaty of Utrecht, to Gibraltar and Minorca, than ſhe poſſibly could have by any perſonal act or renunciation of his Catholic majeſty. The deſiring therefore any ſuch act would imply a kind of invalidity of the right by which theſe poſſeſſions were already held. It was not to be doubted, they ſaid, that the king and kingdom of Spain would readily embrace the firſt opportunity of endeavouring to recover theſe places; nor would any renunciation, however ſtrong and peremptory, prevent their ſeizing ſuch an opportunity whenever it ſhould offer. Beſides, ſhould his Catholic majeſty, as there was reaſon to believe he would, refuſe to grant any ſuch renunciation as was now propoſed, all Europe would be apt to think that Great Britain held theſe conqueſts by a very weak and invalid title. After theſe and other arguments, the queſtion being put, a negative was put upon the motion, though not without a ſpirited proteſt on the part of ſeventeen peers.

The court-party, however, had ſo much prudence in the midſt of their triumph, as not to ſuffer a matter of ſo much importance to paſs wholly neglected. Poſſibly the miniſter might think that all his power and influence would not be able to counterbalance the indignation which the people in general muſt have felt on the appearance of a ſettled deſign to give up theſe two valuable poſſeſſions. It was therefore reſolved to proceed on the affair in the moſt ſolemn manner: a meſſage was ſent to the commons, inviting them to a free conference in the Painted Chamber, relating to the ſubject in debate, which was agreed to on the part of the latter, when the lords deſired their concurrence to the following reſolution; "That they do entirely rely upon his majeſty that he will, for the maintaining the honour and ſecuring the trade of this kingdom, take effectual care in the preſent treaty to preſerve his undoubted right to Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca."

The oppoſition in the lower houſe, however, were not to be moved from their firſt principles: they inſiſted ſtrenuouſly upon a ſpecifical renunciation of thoſe places on the part of Spain; they ſpoke the voice of the nation, who could not without out concern ſee this eſſential object left liable to conteſt and altercation. The energy, the clearneſs of argument made uſe of by the minority on this occaſion, brought over many members from the court-ſide, as appeared from the putting of the queſtion, when the miniſtry carried their point only by a majority of two hundred and ſixty-ſeven againſt one hundred and eleven.

The commons thus agreeing with the peers in their reſolution, a joint addreſs was preſented to the king from both houſes on the twenty-fifth of March, 1729, when his majeſty was pleaſed in his anſwer to promiſe them, "That he would take care to ſecure his undoubted right to Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca."

When the lords took under their examination the papers relating to the Spaniſh depredations, many ſevere reflections were thrown out againſt the conduct of the miniſtry; and a motion was made to reſolve, That admiral Hoſier's expedition was an unreaſonable burden on the nation; but this too was rejected, and occaſioned another proteſt. Nor did the clauſe for granting one hundred and fifteen thouſand pounds to his majeſty, to make good the deficiency in the civil liſt, paſs thro' the houſe of peers without warm oppoſition. Divers lords alleged (as had before been done by ſome of the commons) that inſtead of a deficiency in the civil liſt revenues, there was a conſiderable ſurplus: that this was a new grant, and a new burden on the people: that the nation was loaded, not to complete, but to augment the ſum deſigned for the civil liſt; and this at a time when the public debts were increaſed, and when the taxes were heavily felt in all parts of the country. They obſerved, that if the produce of the civil liſt revenue ſhould not amount to the yearly ſum of 800,000 l. the deficiency muſt be made good to his majeſty by the public; whereas no proviſion was made by which, if the produce of thoſe revenues ſhould exceed that ſum, the ſurplus ſhould accrue to the benefit of the public: that by this precedent, not only real deficiencies were to be made good, but alſo ſupplies were to be given for arrears ſtanding out at the end of every year, which ſhould come on before the ſupplies could be granted, though the ſupply given to make good arrears in one year, would certainly encreaſe the ſurpluſages in another: that the revenues of the civil liſt were variable in their own nature; and even when there is no deficiency in the produce, there might be arrears in the receipt: theſe might eaſily be increaſed by the management of deſigning miniſters, by private directions to receivers, and by artful methods of ſtating accounts. All theſe arguments, all theſe objections, however, ſerved only to evince the weakneſs of the oppoſition, and the overbearing influence of the miniſter. Every motion made by the oppoſition was baffled: every motion propoſed by the court-party was carried by an amazing majority.

At length the complicated buſineſs of this ſeſſion being ſpun out to its utmoſt length, altercation was out of breath: each party wiſhed to retire from the buſtle of buſineſs; the one to enjoy its triumph, the other to brood over its diſcontent. His majeſty, on May 14, after giving, among a number of other acts, the royal aſſent to one enabling the queen to be regent of the kingdom during his abſence, without taking the oaths; and another for the relief of inſolvent debtors, and to thirty-two private bills, put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech, in which he ſignified his intention of viſiting his German dominions; and ſet out for Hanover on the twentieth day of the ſame month.

Great Britain at this time enjoyed uninterrupted repoſe, and commerce continued to increaſe. In the beginning of June the fleet at Spithead, under the command of ſir Charles Wager, was joined by eleven Dutch ſhips of war under vice-admiral Somerſdyke. This ſquadron was intended for the coaſt of Spain, in caſe affairs did not take a favourable turn with that court; but the treaty of Seville being agreed upon towards the end of the ſummer, the Dutch ſquadron returned to Holland in the beginning of October, and the Engliſh fleet ſeparated ſoon after.

The people of Ireland found themſelves happy under the government of lord Carteret; and their parliament aſſembling in the month of September, conducted their deliberations with the true ſpirit of patriotiſm. They ſettled funds for the diſcharge of their national debts, and for anſwering the exigencies of government: they gave all poſſible encouragement to manufacture, trade, and agriculture; and enacted ſeveral wiſe and wholeſome laws for the improvement of domeſtic oeconomy. The ſeſſion in that kingdom being cloſed, lord Carteret repaired to England, and was ſucceeded as lord-lieutenant of Ireland by the duke of Dorſet. Colonel Stanhope, who was about this time created earl of Harrington, was appointed one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, in the room of lord Townſhend, who reſigned; ſo that ſir Robert Walpole now ſaw himſelf without a rival in the miniſterial ſphere. The earl of Waldegrave was appointed ambaſſador to France, to congratulate Lewis XV. on the birth of a dauphin, which filled that court with inexpreſſible joy.

Savoy at this time furniſhed the world with an extraordinary ſight. Victor Amadeus II. king of Sardinia, and duke of Savoy, the ſame who was ſometimes the ally and ſometimes the friend of France and Auſtria, and whoſe wavering conduct had paſſed for policy, being tired of the burden of public affairs, and weary of himſelf, abdicated, through mere caprice, in the month of September this year, at the age of ſixty-four, a crown which he had worn the firſt of his family. He reſigned the regal authority to his ſon Charles Emanuel, prince of Piedmont, and reſerving to himſelf a revenue of one hundred thouſand piſtoles per annum, retired to the caſtle of Chamberry, and eſpouſed his favourite miſtreſs the counteſs dowager of St. Sebaſtian, who declined the title of queen, but aſſumed that of marchioneſs of Somerive.

In October Peter II. czar of Muſcovy, and grandſon of Peter I. died in the fifteenth year of his age, at Moſcow, and was ſucceeded on the throne by the princeſs Anne-Ivanowna, ſecond daughter of Ivan (John) Alexowitz, elder brother of the firſt Peter, and widow of William duke of Courland. The following month died pope Benedict XIII. in whoſe room cardinal Laurentio Corſini was raiſed to the pontificate, and aſſumed the name of Clement XII.

All this time the negotiations at Soiſſons ſeemed at a ſtand: at length it was agreed to open conferences at Seville between the plenipotentiaries of England, England, France, and Spain. The earl of Harrington, who had this year been nominated ambaſſador extraordinary to his Catholic majeſty, had the management of this treaty on the part of Great Britain, together with Mr. Keen, our plenipotentiary at the court of Madrid, the Spaniſh plenipotentiaries being the marquis de la Paz, and Don Joſeph Patinho.

By this treaty, which was ſigned on the ninth day of November, 1729, N. S. it was ſtipulated that all former treaties and conventions between the crowns of Great Britain and Spain ſhould be as amply confirmed as if they had been expreſsly repeated: that their Britannic and Catholic majeſties ſhould guaranty to each other their reſpective dominions; and in caſe either of them ſhould be attacked, the other ſhould furniſh to the party ſo invaded a body of twelve thouſand men: that all ſuch engagements contracted by his Britannic majeſty, in conſequence of the treaty of Vienna, as were inconſiſtent with the treaties ſubſiſting between the crowns of England and Spain, antecedent to the year 1725, ſhould be rendered void and invalid: that the commerce of the Engliſh and French nations, both in Europe and the Indies, ſhould be reſtored to its former footing, and orders ſhould be inſtantly diſpatched on all ſides for that purpoſe: that his Catholic majeſty ſhould make reparation for all the damages that had been done by his ſubjects to thoſe of the other two parties: that commiſſaries ſhould be nominated, with ſufficient powers, on the part of their Britannic and Catholic majeſties, who ſhould aſſemble at the court of Spain, within the ſpace of four months after the ratification, or ſooner, if poſſible, to decide whatever concerned the ſhips and effects taken on either ſide: that the ſaid commiſſioners ſhould likewiſe examine and decide, according to treaties, the reſpective pretenſions which relate to the abuſes that were ſaid to have been committed in commerce, as well in the Indies as in Europe, and all other reſpective pretenſions in America founded on treaties, whether with reſpect to the limits or otherwiſe: that the ſaid commiſſioners ſhould likewiſe diſcuſs and decide the pretenſions which his Catholic majeſty might have by the treaty of 1721, to the reſtitution of the ſhips taken by the Engliſh fleet in 1718: that the ſaid commiſſioners, after having examined, diſcuſſed, and decided the above-mentioned claims and pretenſions, ſhould make a report of their proceedings to their Britannic and Catholic majeſties, who by the preſent treaty promiſed, that in the ſpace of ſix months after making the ſaid report, they would cauſe to be executed punctually and exactly what ſhould have been ſo decided by the ſaid commiſſioners. His Catholic majeſty engages to ſend ſix thouſand of his troops, without loſs of time, to garriſon Leghorn, Porto Ferraro, Parma, and Placentia, for the better ſecuring and preſerving the ſucceſſion of thoſe ſtates in favour of Don Carlos, and to be ready to withſtand any enterprize and oppoſition that might be formed to the prejudice of what had already been regulated touching the ſucceſſion. The contracting powers alſo promiſe to take the ſofteſt and moſt effectual means of perſuading the dukes of Tuſcany and Parma to admit theſe garriſons, upon their promiſing to take an oath to be faithful to the reigning powers in every thing that ſhould not be contrary to the right of ſucceſſion reſerved to the infanta Don Carlos; and upon their engaging not to meddle directly nor indirectly in the government of the places where they ſhould be garriſoned, and to pay to the dukes of Tuſcany and Parma all the honours due to ſovereigns in their own dominions; and as ſoon as the ſucceſſion of theſe territories ſhould be quietly ſettled in the perſon of Don Carlos, his Catholic majeſty engages to withdraw his troops from the ſaid garriſons: the contracting princes agree, on their parts, to become guarantees to Don Carlos for the quiet poſſeſſion and enjoyment of the ſaid ſtates of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, after he ſhall have once obtained them.

By the thirteenth article of this treaty the kings of England and France promiſe to ratify and guaranty all the particular regulations that ſhall be concerted between his Catholic majeſty and the two dukes of Tuſcany and Parma, relating to the aforeſaid garriſons. The fourteenth and laſt article ſtipulates, that the States-general of the United Provinces ſhall be invited to accede to the treaty, the ratifications of which were to be diſpatched within the ſpace of ſix weeks at fartheſt.

Beſides theſe, there were two ſeparate articles, by which it was expreſsly ſtipulated, for the greater exactneſs, that the treaties of peace and commerce at Utrecht between Great Britain and Spain, in which are compriſed the treaty of 1669 and of 1715; as alſo the Aſſiento contract of 1713, and its farther explanation, anno 1716, ſhall from this day (even during the examination by the commiſſaries) remain in their full force and vigour, for which end the Catholic king ſhall diſpatch his cedulas to his vice-roys, &c. in America as well as in Europe; as alſo his Britannic majeſty to his governors, &c. for the releaſe of all ſhips and merchandize, and particularly the South-ſea company's ſhip Prince Frederic and her cargo, ſhall be immediately reſtored: all which under the before-named guarantee.

In the acceſſion of the States-general (which was performed in this ſame month) they were to furniſh only four thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe; and on the part of the other allies, they were to guaranty the aboliſhing the Oſtend Eaſt India company; and the Catholic king engages that entire ſatisfaction ſhall be given them (the Dutch) for their grievances, as well in the Weſt Indies as in Europe, and to re-eſtabliſh their commerce, agreeable to former treaties; and, laſtly, to grant them all the commercial privileges enjoyed by the nations moſt favoured.

Such were the contents of the famous treaty of Seville, which afterwards produced ſuch an alteration in the ſyſtem of Europe, by the concurrence of other events.

His majeſty having returned to England from his German dominions, in the beginning of September, opened the ſeſſion on the third of January, 1730, with a ſpeech, in which he informed them, That he had concluded an abſolute peace with Spain, and thereby prevented the miſeries and calamities inſeparable from a war. He aſſured them, that the peace was agreeable to the purport and intention of former treaties, and calculated to render effectual the ſtipulations of the quadruple alliance: that ſufficient proviſion had been made for the indemnification and future ſecurity of the trading intereſt: and that he had given orders for making an immediate reduction both of his land and ſea-forces. He then concluded with recommending to their conſideration the ſtate of public credit, and the hardſhips of poor artificers and manufacturers.

The commons being returned to their houſe, ſir Robert Walpole laid before them the treaty of Seville, when lord Fitzwilliams made a motion for a loyal addreſs of thanks to the throne, conceived in much the ſame terms as the ſpeech. This motion, however, was vehemently oppoſed by the country party, who propoſed ſimply to aſſure his majeſty of the ſteady and zealous attachment of the houſe to his royal perſon, government, and family, and of their readineſs to ſupport him in all meaſures which ſhould be neceſſary for the honour and dignity of the crown, and for the intereſt and welfare of his people. In ſupport of this allegation they threw out many ſevere and bitter reflections againſt the ſubſtance of the treaty: they urged, that the miniſtry had impoſed upon his majeſty in calling the peace an abſolute peace, inaſmuch as the moſt important intereſts of Great Britain were left to a future deciſion. It was no wonder indeed, they ſaid, that the miniſter and his friends, who triumphed ſo much the year before on the mere project or draught of a treaty, ſhould diſcover the ſame ſpirit of exultation upon procuring a formal one, actually ſigned, though there was ſtill wanting the acceſſion of one power, whoſe conſent was moſt neceſſary to the putting it in execution; for, as the introduction of ſix thouſand Spaniſh forces into the ſtrong places of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, inſtead of ſix thouſand neutrals ſtipulated by the quadruple alliance, was the baſis of the Seville treaty, the concurrence of the emperor, to whom the feodality of theſe ſtates belonged, was certainly requiſite to the amicable execution of it; and yet he was not ſo much as complimented in the treaty with an invitation to accede, as the Dutch were by an expreſs article. The miniſter maintained that the peace was abſolute, and that no difficulties could happen in the execution of it, unleſs the Spaniards and other powers were encouraged to raiſe them, by the diſſenſions that might happen amongſt us at home: he attempted to prove, that this treaty under conſideration was framed to anſwer every deſirable purpoſe, could give the emperor no diſguſt, ſecured our right to Gibraltar and Minorca, and would procure reparation to our merchants; aſſertions which, however, appear not to have been juſtified by the events. The queſtion being at laſt put, whether to draw up the addreſs in the original form propoſed, the majority carried it in the affirmative.

After both houſes had preſented their addreſſes of thanks and congratulation to his majeſty on the peace of Seville, the lords took that treaty into conſideration, and it did not paſs without ſevere animadverſions. The lords in the oppoſition obſerved, firſt, that the merchants of Great Britain were ſubjected to great inconveniencies, by being obliged to make proof of their loſſes at the court of Spain. They ſaid, that this ſtipulation was not only a hardſhip on Britiſh ſubjects, but alſo diſhonourable to the nation: that few would care to undertake ſuch a troubleſome and expenſive journey, eſpecially as they had reaſon to apprehend their claims would be counterbalanced by the Spaniards; and after all, they would have no more but the ſlender comfort of hoping to obtain that redreſs by commiſſaries, which they had not been able to procure by plenipotentiaries. They thought it very extraordinary that Great Britain ſhould be bound to ratify and guaranty whatever agreement ſhould be made between the king of Spain and the dukes of Parma and Tuſcany, concerning the garriſons once eſtabliſhed in their countries: that the Engliſh ſhould be obliged to aſſiſt in effectuating the introduction of ſix thouſand Spaniſh troops into the towns of Tuſcany and Parma, without any ſpecification of the methods to be taken, or the charge to be incurred in giving that aſſiſtance: that they ſhould guaranty for ever, not only to Don Carlos, but even to all his ſucceſſors, the poſſeſſion of the eſtates of Tuſcany and Parma; a ſtipulation which, they ſaid, would in all probability involve Great Britain in endleſs quarrels and diſputes, about a country with which they had no concern. They affirmed, that the treaty of Seville, inſtead of confirming other treaties, was contradictory to the quadruple alliance, particularly in the introducing Spaniſh troops into Tuſcany and Parma in the room of neutral forces, ſtipulated by the former alliance, and agreeing that they ſhould remain there until Don Carlos and his ſucceſſors ſhould be ſecure and exempt from all hazards.

The court-party, on the other hand, inſiſted that there neither was nor could be any eſſential difference, if the emperor was ſincerely and heartily diſpoſed to fulfil the terms of the quadruple alliance, with regard to the eventual ſucceſſion of the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia: that introducing Spaniſh inſtead of neutral troops into the garriſons of thoſe dominions, could make no material difference, eſpecially as the treaty had in the ſtrongeſt manner ſtipulated the recalling thoſe troops, as ſoon as the ſucceſſion to the duchies, which was a main object of the quadruple alliance, ſhould be ſecured: and finally, that though there was an immaterial difference, which might give umbrage to the court of Vienna, between the treaty in queſtion and the quadruple alliance; yet the preſervation of the tranquillity of Europe, and the obtaining ſatisfaction and ſecurity to our commerce, were conſiderations that ought infinitely to outweigh any apprehenſions from a reſentment that could be founded only on pride and ambition.

In anſwer to this plea of the miniſterial advocates, it was obſerved by the oppoſition, firſt, that ſuppoſing this treaty ſo deviating from the former alliance, not to be prejudicial to the intereſts of his Imperial majeſty, yet that the manner of making the alteration without his conſent, and by way of triumph over him as a great ſtroke in politics, would be thought a reflection upon his honour at leaſt, and muſt be attended with very fatal conſequences. They likewiſe undertook to prove that the introduction of Spaniſh troops would be really prejudicial to the emperor and the empire, even according to the method of reaſoning adopted by the advocates for this meaſure, they having plainly intimated that the deſign of the Seville treaty was to reſtrain the emperor's power in Italy; and conſequently it was his intereſt to defeat that deſign, however it might be the intereſt of others to put it in execution. They obſerved furthermore, that this avowed end of the Seville treaty was aggravated by another, which had likewiſe been cried up by the friends of the miniſter as a maſter-piece of politics, namely, the ſeparation of Spain from the emperor, and thereby diſſolving the Vienna alliance, which had been repreſented ſo advantageous to the latter. Did not this, they aſked, affect the intereſts of his Imperial majeſty? or could it be reaſonably expected that he would not reſent it?

The country party went ſtill farther, and ſhewed that the variation from neutral to Spaniſh troops (without inſiſting on the affront, or having any regard to the Vienna alliance) was highly prejudicial both to the emperor and the empire; for the neutral troops ſtipulated by the quadruple alliance, were deſigned not only to leave the eventual ſucceſſion of Don Carlos, but likewiſe the rights of ſovereignty eſtabliſhed in the emperor and empire over theſe ſtates. Now this part of the condition was entirely reverſed by the variation in diſpute. To this it was added, that his Imperial majeſty appeared very plainly to look upon the introduction of Spaniſh troops in this light, by refuſing to conſent to it, whilſt he was under ſo beneficial an alliance with Spain, and even ſuffering himſelf to be diſunited from that crown rather than comply.

They obſerved farther, that the Spaniards were ſo far from having renounced their pretenſions to Gibraltar and Minorca, or recognized our right to the poſſeſſion of them, that they are not ſo much as mentioned in the treaty; a plain indication that the court of Spain would not admit of any words therein which might annihilate their pretenſions, and never did deſign to include our poſſeſſion of that place in their general guaranty of "all his majeſty's kingdoms, ſtates, and dominions."

The lords on the ſide of the miniſtry exerted their utmoſt endeavours to baffle the arguments of their adverſaries on this laſt very popular objection: they obſerved, that the Spaniards never could, even while on the beſt terms with the Engliſh, be brought to relinquiſh their right to Jamaica, which notwithſtanding the Engliſh continued to poſſeſs unqueſtioned and uninterrupted. They ſaid, that the ſtrongeſt renunciations would be invalid, ſhould the Spaniards ever be in a condition to diſpute the Engliſh property in thoſe places that England had conquered from the crown of Spain; and therefore to have inſiſted upon an abſolute formal renunciation would not only have been altogether needleſs, but, in caſe of the Spaniards refuſing it, would have even weakened our title to theſe places, beſides hazarding the whole ſucceſs of the negotiation, which they maintained to be highly for the honour, as well as intereſt, of Great Britain.

Such was the ſubſtance of the arguments for and againſt the peace, in which the moſt able and plauſible ſpeakers on both ſides diſplayed all their talents for elocution. The public, however, and particularly the commercial part of it, appeared to be ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed againſt the treaty. The lord Bathurſt now moved for a reſolution, "That the agreement in the treaty of Seville, to effectuate the introduction of Spaniſh troops into Tuſcany and Parma, is a manifeſt violation of the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, tends to involve the nation in a dangerous and expenſive war, and to deſtroy the balance of Europe." After ſome debate the queſtion was put upon the motion, and it was reſolved in the negative. The like fate attended two other motions; the one, to reſolve, "That Great Britain's right of ſovereignty, dominion, poſſeſſion, and claim to Gibraltar and Minorca, is not aſcertained by the treaty of Seville, ſo as to extinguiſh the claims and pretenſions ſet up by the Spaniards, which were followed by an actual ſiege ſince the ceſſion of thoſe valuable places by the treaty of Utrecht:" and the other, "That the ſtipulations in the treaty of Seville, for repairing the loſſes of our merchants, are inſufficient and precarious."

Then it was propoſed by ſome of the lords in the majority to reſolve, "That the treaty of peace, union, and friendſhip, (for ſuch was its title) concluded at Seville the ninth of November laſt, N. S. doth contain all neceſſary ſtipulations for maintaining and ſecuring the honour, dignity, rights, and poſſeſſions of the crown; and that all due care is taken therein for the ſupport of the trade of the kingdom, and for repairing the loſſes ſuffered by the merchants *." After the debate, the queſtion was put upon the ſaid motion, and it was reſolved in the affirmative; upon which ſeveral lords entered their proteſt againſt it, with their reaſons at large, which made great impreſſions on the body of the people. It muſt be owned, at the ſame time, that thoſe impreſſions were in a great meaſure ſtrengthened by the weakneſs of the miniſterial advocates without doors, who in general were the moſt contemptible writers that money or favour could be thrown away upon.

While the before-mentioned topics were agitating in the houſe of peers, the anti-courtiers among the commons ſuſpecting that the miniſtry were playing ſome hidden game, moved for an addreſs to his majeſty, entreating him "to communicate to his parliament any engagements he might have contracted for the payment of ſubſidies to foreign princes, or the hire of foreign troops, which had not been laid before them." This motion was treated by the courtiers as highly indecent, and implying a mean ſuſpicion of his majeſty; and upon the queſtion being put, it was thrown out, by a majority of two hundred againſt one hundred and ſeven. And here I muſt once for all obſerve, that the miniſtry treated the oppoſition within doors as ſuperciliouſly as they did that without. Secure of their own numbers in the houſe of commons, they ſeldom entered into that length or ſolemnity of debate which was neceſſary, either for the conviction or converſion of thoſe who oppoſed them from principle. In ſhort, matters were carried rather by dividing than debating. This conduct gave great and reaſonable diſguſt to many noblemen and gentlemen of great credit and influence, who reſented it by voting againſt the miniſtry; and their example ſerved not a little to rivet in the minds of the people the unfavourable impreſſions they had imbibed of the court meaſures.

In the mean while, his Imperial majeſty was ſo far from looking upon the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons into Tuſcany and Parma as a trifling variation from the quadruple alliance, according to the doctrine of the Britiſh miniſter and his friends, that he

he reſented both the matter and the manner of it in the ſtrongeſt terms, as a downright infraction of treaties, derogatory to his honour, and dangerous to his intereſts, as well as the rights of the empire. Such at leaſt was the purport of numberleſs reſcripts and remonſtrances with which he filled all Europe, Germany eſpecially. Nor did the court of Vienna content themſelves with ſhewing their reſentment in words and appearances only, but actually made preparations for pouring a large army into Italy, with orders to oppoſe the execution of the treaty of Seville; but being in want of money, they ſet on foot a negotiation for a loan in England of four hundred thouſand pounds, this being the only country where they could raiſe money, as the great ſubſidies which they uſed to receive from Spain were now cut off.

Our miniſtry were very juſtly alarmed at a negotiation of this kind: they ſet all their ſtrength to fruſtrate its ſucceſs, and a bill of a very extraordinary nature was brought into the houſe of commons, "to prohibit his majeſty's ſubjects to lend any ſum of money to any foreign prince, ſtate, or potentate, without licence firſt obtained from his majeſty, under his privy-ſeal, or ſome greater authority." This, however, was not to extend to prohibit any ſubſcription to the public funds or trading companies of foreign kingdoms.

On the ſecond reading of this bill Mr. Daniel Pulteney, a gentleman deſervedly eſteemed the firſt in commercial talents and ability amongſt the anti-miniſterial party, ſpoke againſt it in very ſtrong terms. He ſaid, that it would make Holland the market of Europe, and the mart of money to the nations of the continent: that the article of lending money was ſo advantageous, that the Dutch, when themſelves were engaged in a war with the Spaniards, who treated them as rebels, lent money, arms, and ammunition, to the enemy. He ſaid, that this bill would diſable the Britiſh merchants from lending money to the king of Portugal, a reſtriction that might be attended with very bad conſequences to the nation: that the act, in any event, armed the miniſtry with too great and too extenſive a power; and that while the licenſing power remained in the crown, the licences would be iſſued through the hands of the miniſter, who by that means might put into his pocket many thouſands a year. He obſerved, that while this bill reſtrained the merchants from aſſiſting the princes and powers of Europe, it permitted the ſtock-jobbers to trade in their funds without interruption. "I know very well, ſaid Mr. Pulteney, for whoſe benefit this complaiſance is deſigned; but jobbing abroad in the ſtocks of foreign nations is what we ſhould leaſt encourage, and what we ought principally to prohibit; for we have ſuffered ſeverely by that means already, and our miniſtry would never give us relief nor aſſiſtance."

Sir Robert Walpole and his friends finding themſelves cloſely puſhed by theſe arguments, contented themſelves with reſting the merit of the bill entirely upon the neceſſity at this particular juncture. Mr. Barnard, afterwards the famous ſir John Barnard, a merchant of London, who perfectly underſtood trade in all its branches, after having explained his reaſons, declared he would never conſent to a bill which he deemed a violation of our fundamental laws, and a grievous hardſhip on individuals. He then propoſed an exception, by which the prohibition ſhould be reſtricted to the emperor alone, without extending to other powers. The bill, however, was vindicated by ſir Robert Walpole, Mr. Pelham, and ſir Philip Yorke, attorney-general; and being ſupported by the whole weight of miniſterial influence, not only paſſed through the houſe, but was afterwards enacted into a law.

The commons having examined the eſtimates for the enſuing year, voted ſeventeen thouſand ſeven hundred and nine men for the land-ſervice: they continued the ſubſidies to the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel and the duke of Brunſwick-Wolfembuttel; and, in order to defray theſe and other neceſſary expences, they granted the ſum of 2,280,000 l. Theſe meaſures were ſtrongly oppoſed by the anti-courtiers, who made ſeveral motions which they knew, if agreed to, would render the miniſter uneaſy; and, if rejected, would make him unpopular. The principal of theſe was on occaſion of the land-forces being voted, and was as follows: "That an addreſs be delivered to his majeſty, humbly to repreſent, that the houſe having, in conſideration of the preſent ſtate of affairs, voted ſuch a number of land-forces for the current ſervice of the year, aſſure themſelves that his majeſty, from his juſt regard to the conſtitution of the kingdom, as well as his earneſt deſire to eaſe his people of every charge not abſolutely neceſſary, will take the firſt opportunity to make a farther reduction of thoſe forces, if the ſtate of affairs will admit, before the concluſion of this or the beginning of next ſeſſion of parliament." This motion however was rejected without a diviſion.

Another motion was made about the ſame time which gave the miniſtry no little uneaſineſs, as it was the moſt popular that had been levelled againſt them during the whole ſeſſion. It was a motion to bring in a bill "for making more effectual the laws in being for diſabling perſons from being choſen members of parliament who had any penſion, during pleaſure, or for any number of years, or any office held in truſt for them, from the crown." We have already taken notice of the principal arguments that may be urged on both ſides of this important queſtion; ſuffice it at preſent to obſerve, that the following oath, to be taken by every member of the houſe, was propoſed as a wiſe and neceſſary precaution:

"I A. B. do ſolemnly ſwear that I have not, directly nor indirectly, any penſion, during pleaſure, or for a number of years; or any office, either in whole or in part, from the crown, held for me or for my benefit, by any perſon whatſoever: and I do ſolemnly and ſincerely promiſe and ſwear, that I will not receive, accept, or take, directly or indirectly, during the time of my being a member of this preſent parliament, any penſion during pleaſure, or for any number of years, or any gratuity or reward whatſoever, or any office from the crown, to be held for me, or for my benefit, in whole or in part, by any perſon whatſoever, without ſignifying the ſame to this houſe, within fourteen days after I have received or accepted the ſame, if the parliament be then ſitting, or within fourteen fourteen days after the next meeting of parliament."

The violation of this oath was to be deemed wilful and corrupt perjury, and puniſhed as ſuch; and the ſeats of all members refuſing to take it were to be vacated, as if they had been actually dead. A penalty of thirty pounds was inflicted upon every member for every day he ſhould ſit in the houſe without taking the oath, beſides an incapacity ever after, either to ſerve the crown, or ſit in parliament, or enjoy any place of profit or truſt under his majeſty or his ſucceſſors.

Such was the ſubſtance of this famous ſelf-denying bill, which has been ſo often renewed ſince, but never enacted into a law. For this time, however, the country party carried their point in the houſe of commons. The cry of corruption was become ſo general, that many who were not heartily for the bill (which it muſt be confeſſed was liable to ſeveral exceptions, and could not, even if paſſed into an act, have fully anſwered the purpoſe intended) were yet induced to vote for its paſſing; while the miniſter, who had reaſon to believe it would never make its way through the upper houſe, did not exert himſelf to have it thrown out below; for the queſtion was carried in favour of it by a majority of one hundred and forty-four againſt one hundred and thirty-four; and Mr. Sandys, ſir Edward Stanley, and Mr. Wyndham, were ordered to bring it into the houſe, through which it paſſed with very little difficulty.

When it was preſented in the upper houſe, its friends moved for an addreſs to the king, deſiring a liſt of the penſions payable by the crown; but the motion was thrown out by a great majority. The bill being afterwards read (on the twenty-firſt of March) and the queſtion being put, whether it ſhould be committed? it paſſed in the negative, after a long debate; upon which a proteſt was entered by twenty-ſix peers. Another queſtion was then put, that the bill be rejected; which being carried in the affirmative, produced a proteſt that was adhered to by the ſame number of peers as above.

In the courſe of this ſeſſion the parliament paſſed ſeveral acts which, under a more popular miniſtry, would have met with great and deſerved applauſe. They appropriated one million of the ſurpluſage ariſing from the Sinking Fund, towards the diſcharge of the national debt; and by another act extinguiſhed the duties upon ſalt; by which expedient the ſubject was eaſed of a heavy burden, not only in being freed from the duty, but alſo from a conſiderable charge of ſalaries given to a great number of officers employed to collect this tax.

They likewiſe encouraged the colony of Carolina with an act allowing the inhabitants of that province to export rice directly to any port of Europe ſouthward of Cape Finiſterre, provided the trade was carried on in Britiſh bottoms; and they permitted ſalt from Europe to be imported into the colony of New York. Several other acts were alſo paſſed; ſome of which being of great national importance, we cannot cloſe the proceedings of this ſeſſion without taking particular notice of them.

Among others, a moſt excellent law was enacted for the better regulation of juries. Before this time it was a reproach to the Engliſh law, that no proviſion was made to oblige men of ſubſtance effectually to ſerve as jurymen; for which reaſon it was very common for perſons of property to ſhift that office from themſelves upon indigent people, which opened an alarming field for corruption in capital caſes, where the delinquents were monied men. But this act remedies all theſe inconveniencies; for,

It requires "the petty conſtables to make up true liſts of the perſons qualified to ſerve on juries within their pariſhes or precincts; and to prevent frauds herein, the ſaid liſts are to be fixed on the church-doors twenty days before Michaelmas every year, for the inſpection of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, who may make their objections. The more effectually to exclude needy perſons from this office, a juryman muſt be a freeholder or copyholder of at leaſt ten pounds per annum in England, and ſix pounds in Wales, or a leaſeholder for life of the yearly value of twenty pounds. Theſe liſts being tranſmitted to the ſheriff, he is to return no others upon juries but thoſe whoſe names are found there; and to prevent the jurymen being ſummoned oftener than is reaſonable (to the hindrance of their reſpective buſineſſes or occupations) no perſon is obliged to ſerve oftener than once in two years, except in the ſmall county of Rutland. When the aſſize is held, the name of each perſon ſummoned and impannelled is to be written, with his addition and place of abode, in diſtinct pieces of parchment or paper, rolled up in the ſame manner, as like each other as may be; which names are to be put into a box or glaſs; and when a cauſe is brought to be tried, ſome indifferent perſon, in open court, is to take out twelve of theſe parchment or paper-billets, one after another; and if any of the perſons drawn do not appear, or is challenged or ſet aſide, then a farther number, till twelve be drawn who ſhall appear, and ſhall be the jury to try the cauſe; after which thoſe names are to be mixed again with the other, and a new jury is to be appointed for the next cauſe in the ſame manner."

From this excellent act two very eſſential benefits ariſe to the ſubject; for it becomes impoſſible to pack or corrupt a jury, becauſe no man knows who will try the cauſe till the moment the jurymen are ſworn; and the freeholders, &c. will be obliged to give attendance, becauſe none can tell whether his name will be amongſt thoſe that are drawn out: in which caſe, if the perſon does not appear, after being three times called upon in court, he is liable to a fine of forty ſhillings, and five pounds, at the diſcretion of the judge.

Another act paſſed this ſeſſion, which was alſo greatly in favour of the ſubject. It was, "An act for explaining and amending an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, entitled, An act for the relief of debtors, with reſpect to the impriſonment of their perſons." By this act debtors might be carried to the neareſt great aſſize, in order to be cleared; whereas, by the former law, they were obliged to be brought up to Weſtminſter-hall to be cleared, however diſtant their place of reſidence might be therefrom. And whereas officers were, by the former act, reſtrained from carrying perſons arreſted to priſon till the expiration of twenty-four hours after the arreſt, which ſeveral perſons taking the advantage of, and refuſing to be carried to any houſe whatever, had made their eſcapes in the night; it is now ordered that ſuch arreſted perſons ſhall be carried to ſome houſe of ſafety; but the choice of the houſe is left to them, to prevent their being hurried to ſpunging-houſes, and ſuch-like places *.

An attempt was made this ſeſſion of parliament to throw open the Eaſt India trade. As this is alſo an object of great national concern, I ſhall give an account of the proceedings therein at large; and the rather, as Great Britain this year was remarkably barren of any other tranſactions of moment worthy a place in hiſtory.

The Engliſh Eaſt India company's term for the redemption of their capital and of their excluſive trade being near its expiration (viz. on three years notice from Lady-day 1733) a powerful and ſtrenuous oppoſition to its renewal or prolongation was at this time raiſed by ſeveral merchants, and others, who wanted to be incorporated and veſted in the ſame trade; and who, foreſeeing that the company would apply to the legiſlature for a longer time in their excluſive privileges, determined to be beforehand with them; and therefore, on the ninth of April, 1730, they preſented to the houſe of commons their petition and propoſals, as follow.

They offered to advance 3,200,000 pounds for redeeming the fund of the company, by five ſeveral payments; the laſt to be at Lady-day 1733, to be allowed an intereſt of four per cent. till the laſt-named term, and only two per cent. from and after that term. Provided,

" I. That they might be incorporated, and in all reſpects veſted with all the excluſive privileges and trade of that company; yet ſo as not to trade in one joint ſtock, or in their corporate capacity; but that the trade ſhould be free and open to all his majeſty's ſubjects, who ſhould pay one per cent. of the value of their exports to India, in conſideration of their taking out a licence from this propoſed corporation.

" II. That this trade be ſolely carried on from the port of London.

" III. That this propoſed company's term be thirty-one years, and to be redeemed on three years notice.

" IV. That moreover, for enabling this propoſed corporation to defray the expence of forts and ſettlements in India, as well as the preſervation and enlargement of the trade, they may be empowered to levy a duty of five per cent. on the groſs value of all the merchandize which ſhall be imported from India."

As this petition was not only of an intereſting, but of a national nature, it greatly engaged the attention of the houſe. Alderman Barnard, and other eminent merchants, members of the houſe, ſupported this petition by ſeveral very plauſible arguments. They obſerved, that great benefits would accrue to the public by accepting the propoſal of the petitioners; for by the petitioners taking but two per cent. intereſt on three millions two hundred thouſand pounds after a limited time, an annuity of ninety-two thouſand pounds would be added to the Sinking Fund, which, at twenty-five years purchaſe, was worth two millions five hundred thouſand pounds to the public. They ſaid, that the laying the trade open to Eaſt India, or the reducing it into a kind of regulated company, would, among many other advantages, neceſſarily occaſion a larger exportation of our own product and manufactures to India; employ a much greater number of ſhips and ſeamen; greatly lower the prices of all Eaſt India commodities conſumed at home; enable us to ſupply foreign markets cheaper, and in greater quantities, with Indian merchandize, whereby new branches of traffic might be opened, as well in Africa and America as in ſome parts of Europe; that hereby the cuſtoms and exciſe revenues would be greatly encreaſed, and, in conſequence, the national debt leſſened. They alleged, (but gave no particular reaſon for ſuch allegation) that great advantages might accrue by employing our ſhipping in freights from one part of India to another, more than the preſent company had ever been able to do; and, laſtly, they obſerved, it would prevent perſons acquainted with the trade of India from being under the neceſſity, for want of employment here, of ſeeking it in foreign nations; and would even bring home thoſe who were already engaged in that way. This alluded to certain Engliſhmen engaged in the Oſtend and Swediſh Eaſt India companies. Theſe were the plauſible and principal arguments made uſe of to the legiſlature without doors, which were yet more abundantly amplified and improved without, in pamphlets and news-papers, which carried them, as is uſually the caſe, much beyond rational probability.

We ſhall now, in juſtice to the preſent Eaſt India company, exhibit the principal points urged by them, by way of reply, in their own behalf. In the firſt place, they obſerved, that it ſeemed at preſent to be agreed on all ſides, that the Eaſt India trade was a beneficial one to this nation, and conſequently neceſſary to be preſerved; but that the main queſtion is, which is the beſt method to preſerve it to us? viz. Whether by a company veſted with excluſive privileges and regulations, ſuch as the legiſlature ſhall from time to time direct? or, Whether the trade ſhall be left quite open to any adventurer who ſhall pay for a licence from the company? They obſerved, that the preſent oppoſition to the company proceeded in a grea tmeaſure from the great gains which the company make, as their enemies do not pretend to have any thing to allege againſt their conduct, at leaſt for the laſt forty years.

The company, ſaid they, at preſent employ a vaſt ſtock in trade; their ſales amount to about three millions yearly; and the cuſtoms accruing to the public are immenſely great, and anſwer the appropriations made of them by parliament better than moſt other duties, they being in neat money, clear of all drawbacks and debentures, three hundred thouſand pounds yearly. To prove this, they laid before the parliament on this occaſion an account, ſhewing the amount of the value of goods, merchandize, and bullion, exported by their company from the port of London, from Chriſtmas 1720 to Chriſtmas 1727, and of the goods and merchandize imported by the ſaid company from Chriſtmas 1722 to Chriſtmas 1729. A copy of this account the reader will find in the note at the bottom of this page *, by which he will be enabled to form ſome idea of the importance of this trade. It was then aſked, Would it be prudent in the legiſlature to ſuffer theſe cuſtoms to fall without a certainty of at leaſt as much in the room of them?

The company next proceeded to ſhow that the forts and factories coſt them three hundred thouſand pounds yearly; and doubtleſs, they ſaid, the government could not maintain them for ſo little. Theſe forts, and other buildings, they ſaid, were queſtionleſs the preſent company's property, who actually purchaſed them of the old company, and were of great value: who then ſhould ſet an equitable price on them? What certainty had the government, when they might be in their hands, that the propoſed open trade will be always ſufficient to maintain ſo vaſt an expence of cuſtoms and forts as ſix hundred thouſand pounds yearly? For as every perſon is by the propoſed ſcheme left at liberty (and will doubtleſs make uſe of it) to trade or not to trade thither, as it may ſuit his intereſt, it may happen that one year there may go fifty ſhips for India, and another year perhaps not five: and theſe being all ſeparate traders, the government could have no certainty nor ſecurity from them, nor indeed from any other but an incorporated body, who have a great deal to loſe, and who are able to bear the ill fortune of ſome particular years trading, without preſently laying it aſide.

It was furthermore aſſerted, that by the ſeparate traders outbidding one another in India, for the ſake of diſpatch, the prices of goods there would be raiſed ſo high at length, as not to be worth the buying; and for the ſame reaſon at home, they could ſo underſell each other, till the goods would not be worth ſelling: that an united company will always be more diligent to watch the encroachments and attempts of other European nations in India, than ſeparate traders will or can be, whoſe views naturally are contracted within the narrow circle of their own private intereſt alone.

To ſum up the matter: the managers for the company told the houſe, that although the company had a claim to a perpetuity in this trade by the act of the tenth of queen Anne; yet ſome doubts having ariſen touching the certainty of this right, becauſe that act only repeats the proviſion in former acts, which directed, "That the privileges of trade ſhould ceaſe when the fund ſhould be redeemed;" but does not explicitly enact a perpetuity of trade to this company, in the ſame terms as the act of that ſame ſeſſion expreſsly does in favour of the South-ſea company; the Eaſt India company being unwilling that their title to this trade (however ſtrong) ſhould prove the occaſion of diſputes hereafter, therefore conſent to take up with a temporary certainty in lieu thereof, and moreover to give the public almoſt four hundred thouſand pounds for the ſame, by paying down two hundred thouſand pounds in money, and farther conſenting that their annuity of five per cent. which is not redeemable till the year 1736, be now reduced to four per cent. whereby they give up an annuity of thirty-two thouſand pounds for ſix years to come, the value of which is one hundred and ninety-two thouſand pounds.

Some other leſs important arguments were at this time advanced on both ſides, which I ſhall not particularize. To conclude, the miniſter, who had great connections with the Eaſt India company, had been at vaſt pains to inform himſelf of the nature of the trade, and was, from the beſt accounts he could receive, convinced that it could be carried on only by an excluſive charter; he therefore heartily engaged in the cauſe of the company. And indeed the majority in the houſe of commons appear to have been on this occaſion unbiaſſedly of the miniſter's opinion; for after very long and ſolemn debates, they rejected the above-recited petition of the merchants againſt the prolongation of the Eaſt India company's privileges: as likewiſe two others; one from the city of Briſtol, the other from the port of Liverpool, to the ſame purport; and paſſed the bill in the company's favour, which afterwards received the royal aſſent, by the title of "An act for reducing the annuity or fund of the united Eaſt India company, and for aſcertaining their right of trade to the Eaſt Indies, and the continuance of their corporation for that purpoſe:" whereby, after a full recital of former ſtatutes and charters, the company agrees, and it is enacted, "That their preſent yearly fund of one hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds be reduced to one hundred and twenty-eight thouſand pounds, or from five to four per cent. from Michaelmas 1730; in conſideration whereof, and of two hundred thouſand pounds to be paid by them for the public ſervice of this preſent year (1730) all their excluſive privileges of trade to the Eaſt Indies are continued and prolonged, from Lady-day 1736 to Lady-day 1766, and three years notice then to be given, in all, including the ſaid three years notice to Lady-day 1769, being thirty-three years, when, on re-payment of their entire capital of three millions two hundred thouſand pounds, their excluſive privilege of trade ſhall ceaſe and determine; yet nevertheleſs the company ſhall continue as a corporation for ever, to enjoy the Eaſt India trade in common with all other ſubjects.

We have been the fuller here on the objections againſt this company, becauſe the objections again ſtarted in the year 1754, and renewed at this preſent time in certain pamphlets and news-papers, with a view to the like private ends, are the very ſame as above, with ſome additional ones indeed, drawn from the prodigious territorial acquiſitions of the company in India within theſe three or four laſt years. The ſubject, however, has been ſo long canvaſſed by men of judgment and experience, that there is no room left to ſay any thing material now on the ſubject, and therefore I here cloſe it once for all, nor ſhall I enlarge thereon in any future part of this hiſtory.

The royal African company declining more and more, ſo as not to be able to ſupport their forts and factories on the coaſt of Africa, and the trade being thereby laid open ſo as to endanger them, the Britiſh parliament in this ſame year granted ten thouſand pounds for that purpoſe, by an act for raiſing five hundred and fifty thouſand pounds by Exchequer-bills, &c. which ſum of ten thouſand pounds was granted by parliament annually, till the year 1744, when, by reaſon of the war with France and Spain, twenty thouſand pounds were granted for that end; the two following years ten thouſand pounds were again granted annually for the ſame purpoſe; but nothing was granted for the year 1747.

In this ſame year the South-ſea company's great ſhip Prince Frederic, which had been ſo long detained at La Vera Cruz, in the Spaniſh Weſt Indies, occaſioned by the differences between Great Britain and Spain, arrived ſafe in the Thames, laden for that company's account with four hundred thouſand dollars, or Spaniſh pieces of eight, in ſpecie; one hundred and ninety thouſand pounds weight of cochineal*; forty-ſeven thouſand pounds weight of indigo; and one hundred and ſixty-ſeven tons weight of logwood; beſides what came in private trade; ſuppoſed altogether to be worth three hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling.

On the fifteenth of May the king went to the houſe of peers, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, which concluded with the following remarkable words:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am very glad that, for the general ſatisfaction, you entered into a particular conſideration of the ſtate of the nation; and it is a great happineſs to ſee, after ſo many unjuſt and unreaſonable clamours, raiſed with all poſſible art, induſtry, and malice, that upon mature deliberation, and the moſt ſolemn debates, you were ſo far from finding any thing worthy of blame or cenſure, that all matters that came under your cognizance met with your approbation.

"This muſt inſpire all mankind with a juſt deteſtation of thoſe incendiaries who, from a ſpirit of envy and diſcontent, continually labour, by ſcandalous libels, to alienate the affections of my people, and to fill their minds with groundleſs jealouſies and unjuſt complaints, in diſhonour of me and my government, and in defiance of the ſenſe of both houſes of parliament.

"But I entirely rely upon your prudence and your concern for the peace and happineſs of your country, to diſcountenance all ſuch ſeditious practices, and to make my people ſenſible, that theſe wicked proceedings have no other view and end than to create confuſion and diſtraction amongſt us."

The parliament was then prorogued to the fourteenth of July.

I have already obſerved that no tranſaction of any great moment paſſed in Great Britain this year. Seven chiefs of the Cherokee nation of Indians in America were brought to England by ſir Alexander Cumin, and introduced to the king, at whoſe feet they laid their crown and regalia, and by an authentic deed acknowleged themſelves ſubject to his dominion, in the name of all their countrymen, who had veſted them with full powers for this purpoſe. They gave their aſſent in the moſt ſolemn manner to articles of friendſhip and commerce propoſed to them by the government; and being loaded with preſents ſuitable to their taſte and inclination, were reconveyed to their own country.

England was at this period terribly infeſted with robbers, aſſaſſins, and incendiaries; the natural conſequences of degeneracy, corruption, and the want of police in the interior government of the kingdom; in which laſt article the miniſtry were certainly unaccountably remiſs. A new ſpecies of villainy now ſtarted up; a ſet of miſcreants made a practice of circulating letters, demanding ſums of money from perſons, on pain of having their houſes burnt down to the ground, and conſequently themſelves and families ruined. In one inſtance, they had the impudent barbarity to put theſe threats in execution, by ſetting fire to the houſe of a rich merchant of Briſtol, who had refuſed to comply with their demands. In ſhort, the peculiar depravity of the times became at length ſo alarming, that the government was obliged to interpoſe, and a conſiderable reward was offered for diſcovering the ruffians concerned in ſuch execrable practices.

In the courſe of this year the common-council of the city of London agreed that all the fines ariſing from thoſe perſons who were nominated ſheriffs, and declined that office, ſhould be appropriated for building a manſion-houſe for the lord-mayors of the city.

The hoſpital of St. Bartholomew being taken down in order to be re-built, the foundation-ſtone was laid by ſir Richard Brocas, lord mayor, on the ninth of July this year.

On the twenty-firſt of January, 1731, the parliament met, when his majeſty, in his ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion, told them, that the preſent critical juncture ſeemed in a very particular manner to deſerve their attention: that as the tranſactions then depending in the ſeveral courts of Europe were upon the point of being determined, the great event of peace or war might

* Mr. Anderſon, author of a judicious and elaborate Treatiſe on Commerce, lately publiſhed, tells us, that ſo unuſual a quantity of cochineal induced him to take with him two phyſicians down to the company's vaults, whereby they were perfectly ſatisfied that this drug is an inſect, in all reſpects the ſame with our lady-bird; and that it was purely by that inſect's feeding on the fine red juice or ſap of the Mexico ſhrub or tree, called the Prickly Pear, that it acquired its ſuperior excellence, agreeable to what had been before aſſerted by ſeveral authors. be much affected by their firſt reſolutions, which were expected by different powers with great impatience. He ſaid, the continuance of that zeal and vigour with which they had hitherto ſupported him and his engagements, muſt at this time be of the greateſt weight and importance, both with regard to his allies, and to thoſe who might be diſpoſed before the ſeaſon of action to prevent, by an accommodation, the fatal conſequences of a general rupture.

When the commons returned to their houſe, a motion was made for a loyal addreſs to his majeſty, by Mr. Campbel of Pembrokeſhire; but the anti-courtiers inſiſted on reſtricting it to a ſimple promiſe to aſſiſt him only in ſuch meaſures as ſhould be abſolutely neceſſary for procuring ſatisfaction to his allies, and providing for the intereſts of his people, expreſſing at the ſame time their hopes that his majeſty would take care to prevent the breaking out of a war upon the Rhine or in the Auſtrian Netherlands; the preſervation of which, in the hands that now held them, was of the greateſt importance to theſe kingdoms, and the maintenance of which had coſt the nation ſo much blood and treaſure.

In ſupport of this allegation the country party alleged, that the power of France was dangerous to the liberties, not only of England, but of all Europe: that evidence could be produced of that court having ſuffered the harbour of Dunkirk to be cleared and repaired, in direct violation of the treaty of Utrecht: that they had made great encroachments upon the Engliſh in the Weſt Indies, the natural conſequences of thoſe pernicious connections which we had lately contracted with them: that for England to join with France in an attempt againſt the emperor, either in Flanders or upon the Rhine, would be acting againſt the very intention of that glorious confederacy which had humbled the power of France during the reign of queen Anne: that it would deſtroy that balance of power which had been ſo happily eſtabliſhed, and had been the chief advantage that England or Europe had derived from that confederacy: that in any event it was extremely dangerous and inexpedient to promiſe, the very firſt day of the ſeſſion, to ſupport all his majeſty's meaſures and engagements, before they knew what they were: and that, in fact, ſuch an aſſurance rendered all their future deliberations fruitleſs and inſignificant.

The miniſter and his friends found themſelves hard preſſed by theſe popular arguments: however, they endeavoured to ſhew that the worſt conſequences, both at home and abroad, might ariſe from this amendment being approved, ſince it would carry an implication of his majeſty's intending ſomething that was not neceſſary for the intereſt of England, or agreeable to the principles of public liberty; an inſinuation which could not fail of diſcouraging the friends of the proteſtant ſucceſſion at home, and animating their enemies abroad; and therefore the houſe ought to truſt to his majeſty's wonted prudence: and, finally, that the inſerting ſuch expreſſions in the addreſs would have the appearance of encroaching on the royal prerogative, and dictating to his majeſty in the operations of the enſuing war.

To this the members of the oppoſition replied, by aſking how, if the French ſhould be ſucceſsful in making acquiſitions from the emperor in Flanders, or upon the Rhine, which muſt be extremely prejudicial to public liberty, the king could, with all the power the parliament could give him, prevent the fatal conſequences that muſt enſue?

Lord Hervey, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Briſto, who by this time began to make ſome figure in the houſe, and was a faſt friend of the miniſter, took notice, in anſwer to the objections of the oppoſition, that the houſe of Auſtria, as well as that of Bourbon, might by its ambition deſtroy that balance of power which was ſo juſtly dear to England. He ſaid, the conduct of the French at this time had nothing alarming in it: that he thought it would be highly abſurd to pull down the houſe of Bourbon to raiſe that of Auſtria into the power of acting in the ſame manner the other had done: and that he entertained not the leaſt doubt that his majeſty had intereſt enough with his allies to eſtabliſh a confederacy to oppoſe any meaſures that the court of France might adopt prejudicial to the deſired equilibrium of power. As to the propoſed alteration, he ſaid, ſhould it be adopted, this would be in fact proclaiming to all Europe that the emperor was left to act as he pleaſed; and if the allies ſhould agree that he was not to be attacked on the Rhine or in the Netherlands, the king of Great Britain and his allies might as well ſubmit at once to receive laws from the imperial court.

This debate, which was long and warmly agitated on both ſides, ended in the addreſs being voted in its original form; and ſuch another, preceded by the like conteſt (headed by lord Carteret, who had now joined the country-party) was carried in the houſe of lords.

The anti-courtiers, however, reſolved once more to revive the penſion-bill. The motion was introduced with great ſolemnity by Mr. Shippen, and the bill made its way with very little difficulty through the commons; but when it was ſent up to the lords, it was, as before, by them rejected. On this occaſion Dr. Sherlock, then biſhop of Bangor, who was among thoſe who oppoſed it, made a ſpeech on the occaſion, by which he incurred a great load of popular odium. After advancing a great number of arguments, in which he endeavoured to demonſtrate that this bill had a very bad tendency, he concludes with the following remarkable words: "Though this bill at firſt might ſeem to be a ſelf-denying act, and to ſome particular members may perhaps prove ſo; yet the commons, conſidered as an houſe of parliament, will find in it, no doubt, a very great enlargement of power; and whatever tends to break the balance between the powers eſſential to this conſtitution, muſt ſooner or later prove the ruin of the whole. An independent houſe of commons, or an independent houſe of lords, is as inconſiſtent with our conſtitution, as an independent, that is, an abſolute king; and whoever loves the liberties and laws of his country, will no more deſire to ſee the one than the other. Let bribery be puniſhed; let corruption be puniſhed; but let us not give ſo much ſtrength to one part of the conſtitution as ſhall make it able to overpower the reſt."

This ſpeech was induſtriouſly circulated through the kingdom by the country-party, with their own notes and commentaries upon it; in which they endeavoured to prove, that his lordſhip only ſpoke the ſentiments of the miniſter, who had formed a ſubtle deſign to overturn the conſtitution, by deſtroying the independency of the two houſes of parliament. It muſt be confeſſed that the prelate made uſe of a very unlucky phraſe, though perhaps not in the ſenſe that his adverſaries applied to it.

The minority ſeeing every queſtion carried almoſt without a diviſion by the miniſter and his adherents, began to grow uneaſy at the remiſſneſs of their friends, who did not give a proper attendance; and as of themſelves they had no method of compelling them thereto ſooner than their own convenience ſuited, this occaſioned a new and diverting ſcheme of compulſion. A call of the houſe being ordered and held, two members, who were conſidered as of the country party, were, for non-attendance, moved by their friends to be taken into cuſtody. The court-party, however, interfered warmly in their behalf, and they were excuſed: the ſame indulgence was extended to ſeveral others; ſome on account of their indiſpoſition, others on pretence of their being on the road. This conduct of the court was certainly very ill judged, as it was againſt the moſt eſtabliſhed rules of parliament, ſince the attendance of every member in the houſe is to be conſidered not as optional, but as a matter of indiſpenſible duty. Beſides, they conſtitute a part of the great council of the nation; and therefore the ſovereign has an indubitable right, by the conſtitution of England, to inſiſt that the full complement of his counſellors ſhould attend his ſervice, upon the high and arduous matters that come before the parliament, relating to the public. The courtiers themſelves ſeem to have been ſenſible of their indiſcretion; for, in order to compromiſe the matter, they agreed to the appointing of certain days, within which the abſentees ſhould attend; and upon neglect they were to be committed to the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms attending the houſe.

This great preparation on the part of the minority was intended to ſtrengthen a ſecond attack they meditated upon the eſtabliſhment of the Heſſian troops in Britiſh pay; for after the houſe had been furniſhed with all neceſſary papers, a motion was made for referring the eſtimate of the twelve thouſand Heſſian troops to the committee of ſupply. This motion begat a very warm debate; and as there is ſomewhat new, and worthy of particular notice, in the following arguments, I ſhall introduce them here, for the reader's amuſement. Mr. Daniel Pulteney, though a ſtaunch Whig in his heart, yet on this occaſion adopted a maxim of the Tories, which had not been heard of ſince the death of queen Anne. He ſaid, that wars had happened on the continent of Europe, of which, tho' foreign to the intereſts of England, ſhe had borne the expence. It was urged in reply to this, that commerce had connected England with the continent, though nature had disjoined her from it: that the Engliſh, by their influence on the affairs of the continent, had acquired many advantages in trade; and, in order to maintain theſe, they were ſometimes obliged to interfere in foreign quarrels: that ſome of the countries of Europe, which conſumed a great many of the Engliſh commodities, had ſo little communication with the ſea, that they were inacceſſible to our fleets; and therefore, if they laid the trade of the Engliſh under any hardſhips or inconveniencies, or offered them any inſults or indignities, the Engliſh had no other means of aſſerting their rights, or recovering their wrongs, than by employing ſome of the powerful ſtates upon the continent to wreak their reſentment: that this had frequently been found a very uſeful expedient to England; but that ſhe could not any longer avail herſelf of it than while ſhe was ready, in her turn, to perform the more friendly offices to theſe potentates. They alleged, that it was upon this very principle that the treaty of Hanover was concluded, and the Heſſian troops were taken into Britiſh pay; and that thoſe two meaſures had prevented the fatal effects which might have attended the ambition and obſtinacy of the emperor: that upon the ſame principle likewiſe was founded the treaty of Seville, which, by our engaging for the introduction of ſix thouſand Spaniſh troops into Italy, had effectually detached Spain from the emperor: that the latter, however, had filled Italy with his armies, in order to prevent the introduction of theſe garriſons. The Heſſians, who were in our pay, it was ſaid, were the only curbs the emperor had in Germany; conſequently, that the diſmiſſion of theſe forces at preſent would leave him at liberty to kindle a flame in Europe, which might coſt Great Britain many millions to extinguiſh. Such were the arguments that determined this parliament to continue the eſtabliſhment of the Heſſian troops, as likewiſe the ſubſidy of the duke of Brunſwic-Wolfembuttel *.

The two parties were at this time exaſperated againſt each other to the higheſt degree of animoſity and reſentment. The court-writers charged the minority with ſedition and defamation, and with employing every art that could alienate the nation from his majeſty's perſon and government. The minority replied to this in ſeveral public papers and pamphlets, eſpecially in one, entitled, The Country Journal, or, The Craftſman; by Caleb D'Anvers, Eſq. a paper that ſoon diſcovered itſelf to be immediately directed againſt the miniſter. Lord Bolingbroke (whom Dr. Swift calls the greateſt genius in Europe) and Mr. W. Pulteney were immediately ſuſpected to be concerned in it; but the care of publiſhing it, and ſupplying it with materials, when none were communicated, was intruſted to Mr. Nicholas Amherſt, formerly of St. John's College, Oxford, from whence he was ſaid to have been expelled for his ſatirical wit, which he dealt about rather too freely upon his ſuperiors. His writings on different ſubjects, both in proſe and verſe, had been very well received.

The miniſter, as I have already obſerved, was unpardonably negligent in his choice of writers: the beſt amongſt them was Dr. Hare, biſhop of Chicheſter, who wrote a vindication of the treaty of Hanover, under the title of "An enquiry into the reaſons of the conduct of Great Britain, with regard to the preſent ſtate of Europe:" in which he endeavoured to ſet forth the dangerous tendency of the firſt treaty of Vienna, and to prove from thence the abſolute neceſſity of the counter-alliance formed at Hanover. This book ſeems to be written with a greater air of confidence, and intimate knowlege of facts which were a ſecret to the reſt of mankind, than almoſt any other political piece that appeared during ſir Robert Walpole's adminiſtration. Accordingly, it drew from the other ſide more anſwers, obſervations, and remarks, than perhaps were ever beſtowed upon a ſingle pamphlet.

The party-war was ſtill carrying on with great acrimony on both ſides, when the Remarks on the Hiſtory of England began to be publiſhed about this time, under the name of Humphrey Oldcaſtle. The judges of writing were ſoon convinced, both from the ſtile of theſe Remarks, and the thorough knowlege of mankind diſcovered in them, that the author could be no other than lord Bolingbroke. The publication of them continued through this year, and to the twenty-ſecond of May in the next, when that remarkable Craftſman came out, which contained the author's vindication of Mr. Pulteney and himſelf, and gave riſe to more perſonal invective than had been common, or, perhaps, than was decent, in perſons of ſuch high rank and diſtinction.

But, previous to this, and during the preſent ſeſſion of parliament, a quarrel happened between lord Hervey, then a member of the houſe of commons, and Mr. W. Pulteney, which occaſioned a duel. The riſe of this quarrel was as follows: A pamphlet had been publiſhed, it was thought, by the former, againſt the writers in the oppoſition, entitled, Sedition and Defamation diſplayed. In anſwer to which came out another, which the town aſcribed to Mr. Pulteney, called, A proper Reply to a late ſcandalous Libel, entitled, Sedition, &c As the author had uſed our nobleman with a pretty deal of contempt, it was on the preſumption that Mr. Pulteney was the man, that his lordſhip ſent him a challenge to meet him in the Green Park. They met accordingly; and ſeveral paſſes having been made on both ſides, in which lord Hervey received two or three wounds, and Mr Pulteney a ſlight one in his left hand, they cloſed in; and were diſarmed by ſir John Ruſhout and Henry Fox, eſq. their friends who attended them. Such an affair as this could have no other tendency than to inflame all the adherents of the reſpective parties, and make them ready on the firſt occaſion to expoſe private hiſtory, and whatever they knew or heard ſuggeſted of each other's characters.

It was about this time that two petitions were preſented to the houſe of commons, repreſenting the delays of juſtice occaſioned by the uſe of the Latin tongue in proceedings at law. The firſt petition on this head came from Yorkſhire; and the committee to whom they were referred, on Feb. 22, reported to the houſe, "That it appeared to them, that the proceedings in the law being in law-Latin, abbreviated and wrote in court-hands and characters, untintelligible, and not legible to the moſt part of the perſons concerned, eſpecially in criminal caſes, were a great delay to juſtice, and occaſioned moſt dangerous frauds: that ſpecial pleadings were very expenſive, intricate, and dilatory, and highly prejudicial to the property of the ſubject: that the recovery of ſmall debts, as the law was now practiſed, was ſo expenſive, that many prudent people choſe rather to loſe their juſt dues than go to law for the recovery of them; a circumſtance that tended to the deſtruction of credit, and the great detriment of trade: that the number of attornies admitted in the King's Bench amounted to eleven hundred and fifty-ſeven; and the number of thoſe in the court of Common pleas exceeded three thouſand."

In conſequence of this report, a bill was brought in for changing this practice complained of, and enacting, that all thoſe proceſſes and pleadings ſhould be entered in the Engliſh language. Though one would imagine very little could be advanced againſt ſuch a regulation, founded on the moſt obvious principles of common ſenſe, the bill met with a warm oppoſition, on pretence that it would render uſeleſs the antient records which were written in that language, and introduce confuſion and delay of juſtice, by altering the eſtabliſhed form and method of pleadings. The bill however paſſed through both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

The Spaniards ſtill continuing their depredations and cruelties in the Weſt Indies, a great number of merchants, from different parts of the kingdom, preſented petitions for redreſs to the houſe of commons, who referred them to the conſideration of a grand committee. Their complaints, upon examination, appeared to be well-founded; whereupon a motion was made for an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring he would be graciouſly pleaſed to continue his endeavours to prevent ſuch depredations for the future, and to procure full ſatisfaction for the damages already ſuſtained, and to ſecure to the Britiſh ſubjects the full and uninterrupted exerciſe of their trade and navigation to and from the Britiſh colonies in America.

The oppoſition were by no means ſatisfied with this motion; they propoſed an amendment to it, importing a deſire that his majeſty would take the moſt vigorous meaſures to procure ſatisfaction to our ſubjects for the loſſes they had ſuſtained from the Spaniards, and to prevent the like inſults for the future. In ſupport of this amendment the party alleged, that there was very little probability that we ſhould ever obtain any ſatisfaction from Spain by the means of negotiating; and that to delay matters any longer would, in fact, be giving up the Britiſh commerce in America: that the depredations complained of had been committed by virtue of expreſs orders from the court of Spain, whoſe whole conduct evinced an intention to drive the Engliſh entirely out of the Weſt Indies. Mr. Pulteney, ſir W. Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Barnard were the principal ſpeakers in this part of the debate.

They were anſwered by ſir Robert Walpole, Mr. Pelham, and ſir William Yonge, who urged, that the firſt propoſed addreſs was all that the houſe could properly, prudentially, or with any degree of decency, lay before the throne, in which the undoubted power of making peace or war was conſtitutionally veſted. Sir Robert Walpole ſaid, that orders had been ſent by the court of Spain to their governors to put a ſtop to thoſe depredations; and that his Catholic majeſty having, in fact, by the treaty of Seville, engaged to make good the loſſes ſuſtained by the Britiſh ſubjects from the Spaniards in America, it was evident that he could have no thought of a ſcheme of expulſion, as had been men-mentioned by the gentlemen who were for the amendment. It was moreover alleged, that the captures ſince the treaty of Seville had been very few, and thoſe doubtful caſes; and inſiſted, that before the houſe adviſed his majeſty to proceed to hoſtilities, they ſhould be very ſure that the complaints on which they founded ſuch a reſolution were uncontrovertible; which could not be done, they ſaid, without hearing both parties, whereas only one as yet had been heard. After a great debate, the amendment was rejected, and the addreſs preſented in its original form.

Great part of this ſeſſion was taken up in relieving the ſubject from the abuſes of the law, as alſo from the exorbitant and unreaſonable rates exacted by the charitable corporation from the induſtrious poor, for the money they ſupplied them with upon goods pledged, &c. This affair was referred to a committee; and after proper examination of perſons and papers, it appeared that the corporation had taken, for large ſums they had lent, ten per cent. under colour and pretence of reaſonable coſts and charges: upon which a bill was brought into the houſe, and afterwards paſſed, for regulating the lending of money upon pledges, and for preventing uſury and extortion.

The merchants trading to the Britiſh ſugar-colonies, and the planters, having petitioned the houſe of commons, complaining againſt the Britiſh continent American colonies †, "for their carrying on a trade with the foreign ſugar-colonies of the French and Dutch, from whence they were ſupplied with ſugar, rum, molaſſes, &c. inſtead of thoſe of our own ſugar-colonies, as well as with foreign European goods and manufactures, contrary to the tenor or intention of the laws in being, and of the fifth article of the treaty between king James II. and the French king in the year 1686: and they alleged, that as this new method of trade (firſt begun to be complained of in the year 1715) increaſed and enriched the colonies of other nations, ſo it was injurious to the trade of this kingdom, and greatly impoveriſhed the Britiſh ſugar colonies; and therefore praying relief therein." Whereupon a committee was appointed, upon whoſe report a bill was brought in, and paſſed the houſe of commons, "For the better ſecuring and increaſing the trade of his majeſty's ſugar-colonies." It was indeed dropped in the houſe of peers; yet, as being a ſubject of the greateſt conſequence to our American commerce and colonies, I ſhall exhibit an abſtract of that bill, as it was ſent up to the lords.

It enacted, "That no ſugar, rum, or molaſſes, of the plantations of foreign nations, ſhall be imported into Great Britain or Ireland, or to any of the king's dominions in America, under forfeiture of lading, ſhip, and furniture; and thoſe who aided, abetted, or received, were to forfeit treble value thereof; maſters of ſhips taking in any ſuch foreign ſugar, in order to be landed in Great Britain or Britiſh America, were ſubjected to a fine of two hundred pounds; and all maſters of ſhips lading ſugars, &c. at the Britiſh ſugar-colonies, bound to any other part of the king's dominions, ſhall, before he ſails, deliver to the collector of the port, a true account of his lading, and take a certificate thereof, with the merchant's name who ſhipped them, and of him to whom conſigned; and when arrived at his intended port, ſhall take an oath, and ſign a true manifeſt of his lading. And whereas great number of horſes, and great quantities of lumber, had been exported from our continent colonies to the foreign ſugar-colonies, whereby they were enabled more eaſily to carry on their ſaid ſugar-plantations; none ſuch were to be tranſported hereafter to thoſe foreign colonies; and when any ſuch goods are to be ſhipped from the continent-colonies, the maſter ſhall give a bond for five hundred pounds that they ſhall not be carried to any foreign ſugar-colony. A fine of three hundred pounds was inflicted on any governor, cuſtom-houſe officer, &c. conniving at any fraudulent importation of foreign ſugars, &c. Nothing in this act, however, was to extend to the reſtraining the uſual importation of ſugars from the dominions of the king of Portugal."

During the courſe of the debates upon this bill, the friends of it clearly proved, that if a ſtop was not immediately put to the trade between New-England and the French ſugar-colonies in America, the abſolute ruin of the Engliſh ſugar-iſlands muſt enſue. It appeared, that by New-England ſhips furniſhing the French colonies with terſes and timber, cut out of the king's woods; and by the ſmall duties paid upon French ſugars in Martinico, compared to what was paid in Barbadoes and Jamaica, the French were enabled to underſel the Engliſh very much, no more than one per cent. being paid for exportation of all the produce of the French iſlands. It was farther proved, that the vaſt improvement in all kind of manufactures of linen, woollen, and iron, in and about Boſton and New-England, enabled them to ſerve the French with all theſe commodities, and in return they had their molaſſes, ſugars, rum, and ſilks, to the great prejudice of Great Britain.

On the other hand, it was attempted to be ſhewn, that the northern colonies, and conſequently the mother-country, profited greatly by the intercourſe complained of; and ſome hints were thrown out, that we might reject the diſabling ſo large and ſo powerful a people. It was alleged in behalf of the northern colonies, that as they and Great Britain do actually take off all the ſugar, rum, and molaſſes, which our ſugar-iſles do or can poſſibly produce; and that our ſaid northern colonies do moreover take off vaſt quantities of rum and molaſſes from the French of Martinico, and do likewiſe get a great deal of them from Surinam, Guadaloupe, the Grenadoes, Cape François, Cayenne, &c. ſhould all but our own ſugar, rum, and molaſſes, be abſolutely prohibited, many great inconveniencies would follow. In the firſt place, we ſhould loſe the employment of ſeveral thouſand tons of ſhipping in the trade between the northern colonies and theſe foreign ſugar colonies. Secondly, the northern colonies could not poſſibly be ſupplied with near the quantity of rum and molaſſes which they ſtood in need of for the carrying on many moſt profitable trades in which they are now engaged. Thirdly, this would put a moſt dangerous monopoly into the hands of our own ſugar-planters, ſo as that the India and Turkey trades by the northern colonies could not afford to pay the rates which would be demanded, even ſuppoſing our iſlanders could make ſufficient quantities of thoſe goods for both the American and Britiſh conſumption. Fourthly, it would greatly increaſe the French ſhipping and navigation, not only in bringing lumber, horſes, &c. to their own ſugar-iſlands, but in carrying from thence to Europe all their rum and molaſſes, where, no doubt, they could find markets for them, as they already do for their ſugars, ſo as to have ſupplanted us, and to underſel us in Holland, and at Hamburgh, Cadiz, &c. Fifthly, if the complaint of the Barbadians be true, viz. that their lands are ſo far worn out, that it requires the labour of three negroes to produce as much ſugar as could formerly be raiſed by the labour of one, they need but remove to Jamaica, where they may have excellent freſh land enough; and as the value of ſuch new land is a trifle, when compared to the value of the ſtock required for a ſugar-plantation, they have that entire to carry along with them to Jamaica; and the charge and trouble of their removing thither would be amply compenſated by the abundant product of thoſe new lands; and which, conſequently, would enable them to underſel the French and Dutch plantations, the only ſeeming means left for our recovering the trade of the re-exportation of our ſugars. Sixthly, that from the foreign ſugar-colonies our northern colonies bring back conſiderable quantities of gold and ſilver along with their ſugar, rum, and molaſſes, whereby they are enabled to pay their mother-country for the vaſt quantities of her product and manufacture which they take of her; and which, without this trade, ſo much complained of, they could not poſſibly do. Laſtly, that the prohibiting the continent people from purchaſing of the foreign colonies their ſugar, rum, and molaſſes, or even laying the high duties on them, would utterly deſtroy a commerce of ſuch great conſequence to the northern colonies, as that without it they could not carry on their fiſheries, their fur-trade, and their navigation, with the Indians; neither could they diſpoſe of the product of their lands and labour, a great part of the profits whereof center in Great Britain, in payment of the manufactures, &c. they had from thence. Upon the whole, ſaid the advocates for the northern colonies, the ſecret and real view of the ſugar-iſlands is, to gain the abſolute monopoly of ſugars and rum, with reſpect to the ſubjects of Great Britain, to themſelves, that ſo they may have it in their power to exact what prices they ſhall pleaſe from the buyers.

Theſe arguments, however, being chiefly founded on ſpeculation, were not deemed ſufficient to outweigh thoſe urged on the other ſide, particularly with regard to the vaſt diſadvantages that Martinico, and all the French ſugar-iſlands, muſt be under, were they not ſupplied with horſes, tools, wood, and all kinds of utenſils for carrying on their ſugar-works; while all that the northern colonies receive in return may be ſupplied by the produce of our own ſugar-iſlands. It was then ſtrongly urged, that if they were not timely checked in their illicit practices, there might be danger of their ſetting themſelves up as an independent ſtate: in the mean time, it was ſaid, the bill in queſtion would have this good effect at leaſt, that if it paſſed into a law, it would oblige the northern colonies to apply themſelves to raiſing flax and hemp, and other naval ſtores, which muſt be of immenſe ſervice to the mother country.

Notwithſtanding all theſe plauſible allegations on both ſides, in a matter of ſo great importance to our commercial intereſts, there was nothing legally decided until two years later. The miniſtry were highly cenſured for the backwardneſs they ſhewed in this affair, which was ſo very intereſting to the mother-country; for, as we before obſerved, the act for encouraging the ſugar-colonies was dropped in the houſe of peers: but, indeed, when ſuch material alterations are required to be made, in a long-eſtabliſhed, or even connived courſe of any important branch of commerce, great and ſerious deliberation, and mature obſervation and conſideration, ſeem abſolutely requiſite in a nation like ours, whoſe principal ſupport depends ſo much on commerce and plantations ‡.

Such were the principal tranſactions of this ſeſſion of parliament, which cloſed in the month of May, 1731, by a ſhort ſpeech from the throne.

The allies of Seville finding the emperor in earneſt, and fully determined to ſtand in his defence, began to abate ſomewhat of their former high ſtrain. The cabinets of Europe were again employed in framing expedients. Couriers were continually paſſing from court to court, and the public prints amuſed the nation with nothing but new plans or new reports of accommodation, whilſt a large fleet lay in the road of Barcelona, and a numerous body of land-forces were aſſembled on the neighbouring coaſts of Spain, ready to embark upon the firſt motion for the intended expedition. But his Imperial majeſty having rejected all propoſitions made to him for acceding to the treaty of Seville; and ſeeming determined to abide extremities rather than conſent to their meaſures, the time was worn out in negotiation only, and the Spaniſh armada retired to their harbours, without any action, like our fleet at Spithead the year before.

Thus did affairs continue in a doubtful ſituation between peace and war, as they had continued for ſeveral years paſt, till the beginning of the preſent year, 1731; about which time a private negotiation at Vienna, between Great Britain and the emperor, began to get air, and in leſs than three months afterwards a treaty of peace and alliance was actually concluded at Vienna between the emperor and the king of Great Britain. The truth is, that the depredations of the Spaniards in America, and their backwardneſs in executing the treaty of Seville, had provoked the Engliſh miniſtry to ſuch a degree (owing in great meaſure to the ſevere reflections caſt upon them, on account of their tameneſs, by the oppoſition, who had now the general voice of the nation on their ſide) that they made propoſals to the court of Vienna, which the latter accepted. What theſe were, and the treaty concluded in conſequence thereof, will be ſhewn hereafter.

In the beginning of the year the duke of Parma died, after having made a will, in which he declared that his ducheſs was three months advanced in her pregnancy; intreating the powers of Europe to have compaſſion upon his people, and defer the execution of their projects until his conſort ſhould be delivered. In caſe the child ſhould be ſtill-born, prove a female, or, if a male, die after the birth, he bequeathed his dominions and allodial eſtates to the infant Don Carlos of Spain, and in the mean time appointed five regents to govern the duchy.

Notwithſtanding this diſpoſition, a body of Imperial horſe immediately took poſſeſſion of Parma and Placentia, under the command of general Stampa, who declared they ſhould conduct themſelves with all poſſible regularity and moderation, and leave the adminiſtration entirely to the regents whom the duke had appointed. They publicly proclaimed in the market-place, that they took poſſeſſion of theſe duchies for the infant Don Carlos; and that, if the ducheſs-dowager ſhould not be delivered of a prince, the ſaid infant might receive the inveſtiture from the emperor whenever he pleaſed, provided he came without an army.

Though theſe ſteps ſeemed to threaten an immediate war, the king of Great Britain and the States-general interpoſed their mediation ſo ſucceſsfully with the emperor, that he deſiſted from the proſecution of his deſigns. On the ſixteenth day of May, 1731, the ſecret negotiation between the courts of London and Vienna was perfected into a treaty.

By the firſt article of this treaty (known by the name of the treaty of Vienna) a mutual guaranty of all the territories belonging to the contracting powers is ſtipulated.

The ſecond article ſtipulates a general guaranty of the pragmatic ſanction in favour of the emperor's female heirs.

By the third article, his Imperial majeſty conſents to the introduction of the Spaniſh troops into the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia; and binds himſelf to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to obtain the conſent of the empire for that purpoſe.

By the fourth article it is ſtipulated, that all parts of the treaty ſhall be duly and truly executed.

The fifth article entirely aboliſhes all navigation to the Auſtrian Netherlands; excepting the ſending (once only) two ſhips from Oſtend: and commiſſioners, by the ſame article, are to meet on the parts of both powers at Antwerp, for ſettling a tarif between Great Britain and the Auſtrian Netherlands.

By the ſixth article it is agreed, that all points of difference amongſt the contracting powers, or any of their allies, ſhould be amicably adjuſted; and that the preſent treaty is not to derogate from the force of any of the former treaties ſubſiſting between either the contracting parties, or their allies, excepting ſo far as they are inconſiſtent with the preſent treaty.

By the ſeventh article, the Engliſh, touching their commerce in the kingdom of Sicily, are to be treated on the ſame footing as they were in the reign of Charles the Second of Spain, and as it is uſual to treat a nation with which one is in ſtrict friendſhip.

The eighth article fixes eight months after the ratification for the acceſſion of the other powers who ſhall be invited into the treaty.

The ninth and laſt article allows ſix weeks for exchanging the letters of ratification.

Beſides theſe, there was a ſeparate article, which declared, "That the guaranty entered into by the contracting powers, ſhould not extend to the emperor's dominions, which might be attacked by the Turks. At the ſame time his Britannic majeſty declared authentically, that notwithſtanding the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons into the ſtrong places of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, yet that he had no intention to depart from what had been ſettled by the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, either with regard to the rights of his Imperial majeſty and the empire, or to the ſecurity of the kingdoms and ſtates which his Imperial majeſty actually poſſeſſes in Italy; or, laſtly, to the preſervation of the quiet and dignity of thoſe who were then the lawful poſſeſſors of theſe duchies, and therefore he renews to the emperor the guaranty of thoſe countries. But to take away all ſuſpicion of the emperor's trifling in this matter, he emitted a declaration, of the ſame force and date with the treaty, importing, "That if the pregnant ducheſs-dowager of Parma ſhould be brought to-bed of a ſon, the introduction of the Spaniſh troops to that duchy ſhould ſtill take place; and that, if ſhe ſhould be brought to-bed of a daughter, Don Carlos was immediately to be put into poſſeſſion of the duchies of Parma and Placentia, by an eventual inveſtiture from the emperor and the empire." And his Imperial majeſty farther declares, "That in caſe the ducheſs-dowager ſhould be brought to-bed of a daughter, he will immediately withdraw his troops from the duchies of Parma and Placentia, to give way to the peaceable poſſeſſion."

Although the States-general were included in this treaty, neither France nor Spain were ſo much as mentioned in it; which ſeemed to be ſomewhat extraordinary, as to the latter at leaſt, ſince the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons into Italy with the emperor's conſent, made one of the principal ſtipulations of this new treaty; nay, what is ſtill more ſurprizing, it was with extreme difficulty that they were brought into it at laſt; and even then not without inſiſting on ſeveral alterations in the act of approbation; one of which was, that the introduction of Don Carlos with ſix thouſand Spaniſh troops into Italy, ſhould be effectuated previouſly to the execution of any engagements on their parts, however they might ſtand prior to the treaty of Seville. The Dutch were ſtill more backward in their acceſſion, and did not accede at laſt without ſeveral reſtrictions. As for the court of France, they were ſo far from liſtening to any ſollicitations on this head, that they exerted their utmoſt endeavours to prevent the concurrence of Spain: nay, they expreſſed ſuch reſentment both againſt the treaty itſelf and the manner of negotiating it, that nothing leſs was apprehended by us from them than an invaſion from Dunkirk, where they had actually aſſembled a large body of troops. To guard againſt attempts of this nature, the coaſts of Kent were immediately covered with regiments of horſe, foot, and dragoons, who were ordered to march thither from all parts of the kingdom;

To guard againſt attempts of this nature, the coaſts of Kent were immediately covered with regiments of horſe, foot, and dragoons, who were ordered to march thither from all parts of the kingdom; and the fluctuation which ſuch an alarm naturally occaſioned in our ſtocks, afforded the locuſts of the alley a plentiful harveſt.

Theſe apprehenſions being at length diſſipated, and news arriving that general Stampa, with the imperial forces, had taken formal poſſeſſion of the duchies of Parma and Placentia, in conſequence of the relict of the deceaſed duke at length declaring that ſhe was not with child, ſir Charles Wager was diſpatched about the latter end of Auguſt to the court of Spain, with a large ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips, in order to wait upon Don Carlos and the Spaniſh troops to his new dominions. The admiral's ſhip was fitted out in a moſt ſplendid manner for the reception of his royal highneſs; but after a courſe of pompous viſits between the commander of the Spaniſh fleet and our admiral, on his arrival at Cadiz; and the ſame honours having been afterwards paid him at the court of Seville, his Catholic majeſty was pleaſed to diſcharge him from the trouble of taking Don Carlos under his care, and required no more at his hands than to convey the Spaniſh troops to Italy, in conjunction with his own admiral. The combined fleet accordingly ſet ſail from Barcelona in the month of October, and arrived at Leghorn, from whence our ſquadron afterwards returned to England.

As ſoon as the court of Spain received intelligence that their forces were ſafely landed, and that every thing relating to the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons in Tuſcany was finiſhed, the young prince was ſent after them by land as far as Antibes, they chuſing to let him travel through France, rather than accept of thoſe magnificent accommodations which had been provided for him and his retinue on board our ſquadron, at ſo great an expence. His highneſs embarking on board the Spaniſh gallies at Antibes, landed at Leghorn on the twenty-ſeventh of December, and was received there with all poſſible marks of joy and reſpect, eſpecially by the Engliſh factory, who erected a triumphal arch in honour of the day. The imperial general, Stampa, was no ſooner informed of his arrival, than he withdrew his forces into the Milaneſe, and the infant took poſſeſſion of his new dominions.

The Engliſh miniſtry exulted not a little in the completion of their ſchemes: they challenged the boldeſt of their enemies to mention a ſingle circumſtance neceſſary for the peace of Great Britain that had been neglected. It muſt be confeſſed, that this ſecond treaty of Vienna prevented an immediate war, and ſerved to keep things together for ſome time; but it certainly did not eſtabliſh a firm and laſting peace: for, to ſpeak in the mildeſt terms, a remarkable coldneſs enſued between us and France; and the preparations in the ports of Spain, for equipping another armament the very next ſpring, ſeemed to give our miniſtry ſuch an alarm, that a fleet was fitted out here likewiſe in a great hurry, and rendezvouſed for ſome time at the Nore, under the command of ſir George Walton. This ſeemed to intimate that our court had ſome jealouſy of the deſigns of the Spaniards; for as ſoon as ſoon as certain intelligence came that they were landed near Oran, the admiral was ordered to ſtrike his flag, and the ſhips returned into harbour *.

The ſtate of the nation at the end of this year was alſo far from being tranquil, notwithſtanding the new alliances it had formed. The violence of party-pamphlets continued to ſuch a degree, that even the moſt ſacred repoſitories of friendſhip were broken up and expoſed to every vulgar eye. This ſerved only to exaſperate matters, and to render party-controverſies merely perſonal. It was generally ſuppoſed to be ſomewhat of that kind which occaſioned the diſgrace of Mr. W. Pulteney, whoſe name was in July ſtruck out of the liſt of privy-counſellors by his majeſty's command; he was alſo ordered to be put out of all commiſſions of peace; and all this on account of his being the ſuppoſed author of ſome writings highly reflecting upon the miniſter, and againſt the meaſures of the court.

In the month of October this year the duke of Lorraine paid a viſit to England; and after having had ſeveral private conferences with his majeſty, he returned to Holland in December in one of the royal yachts. Few people at this time ſuſpected the motive of his viſit, which was afterwards ſaid to be to engage (by the deſire of the emperor) his Britannic majeſty's approbation of his becoming huſband to that monarch's daughter.

The parliament of Great Britain meeting on the thirteenth of January, 1732, the king in his ſpeech declared, "That the general tranquillity of Europe was now reſtored and eſtabliſhed, and all his expectations on that head fully anſwered: that the ſhare of credit and influence which the crown of Great Britain had had in accompliſhing that difficult and diſagreeable work, and which redounded ſo much to the honour and intereſt of the nation, as it was univerſally confeſſed abroad, would, he was confident, be agreeable to his people, and acknowleged with gratitude by his parliament: that from the time of concluding the quadruple alliance, the ſeveral courts of Europe had been employed in finding means to execute the meaſures which the contracting powers had concerted for ſecuring the ſucceſſion of Tuſcany and Parma in favour of the infant of Spain; but the various, jarring, and contending intereſts, hard to be reconciled, and united, in effectuating a point of ſo much importance; the ambitious views and hopes of obtaining on every ſide farther advantages; and the natural jealouſies and ſuſpicions ariſing among the ſeveral powers concerned; all theſe oppoſite principles and purpoſes had kept in ſuſpence and unexecuted, what the court of Spain had very much at heart, and had occaſioned ſuch troubles and diſturbances as embarraſſed the affairs of Europe for many years, and particularly affected the intereſt of this nation."

The reſt of the ſpeech is in the ſame congratulating ſtile; and it concludes in the following warm manner: "This happy ſituation of affairs, I promiſe myſelf, will inſpire you all with ſuch temper and unanimity, and ſuch ardent zeal for the public welfare, as becomes a parliament ſenſible of the great bleſſings they enjoy: the duty and affection of my ſubjects is all the return I de-ſire for my paternal care and concern for them: my government has no ſecurity but what is equally conducive to the happineſs and to the welfare of my people; and their happineſs has no foundation but in the defence and ſupport of my government: our ſafety is mutual, our intereſts inſeparable."

The oppoſition to the court meaſures appears to have been uncommonly ſpirited during the courſe of this ſeſſion. When the commons returned to their houſe, the lord Tyrconnel, an Iriſh peer, made a motion for an addreſs of thanks, in which they ſhould declare their entire approbation of the king's conduct, acknowlege the bleſſings they enjoyed under his government, expreſs their confidence in the wiſdom of his councils, and declare their readineſs to grant the neceſſary ſupplies. This motion was ſeconded by Mr. Clutterbuck, but violently oppoſed by ſir Wilfred Lawſon, Mr. Shippen, Mr. W. Pulteney, ſir W. Wyndham, and Mr. Oglethorpe. They did not object againſt a general addreſs of thanks, but expoſed the abſurdity and bad tendency of expreſſions which implied a blind approbation of all the meaſures of the miniſtry. Sir Wilfred Lawſon obſerved, that notwithſtanding the great things we had done for Spain, and the favours we had procured for the royal family of that kingdom, little or no ſatisfaction had as yet been received for the injuries our merchants had ſuſtained from that nation.

Mr. Pulteney took notice, that the nation, by being guaranty to the pragmatic ſanction, laid itſelf under an obligation to aſſiſt the Auſtrian family, when attacked by any potentate whatever, except the grand ſeignior. They might be attacked, he ſaid, when it would be much againſt the intereſt of the kingdom to engage itſelf in a war upon any foreign account: that it might one day be for the intereſt of the nation to join againſt them, in order to preſerve the balance of Europe, the eſtabliſhing of which had already coſt England ſuch immenſe ſums of money; and he expreſſed his apprehenſions, that the court of Verſailles would accuſe the Engliſh of a breach of good faith, in concluding the treaty of Vienna without their participation.

Sir William Wyndham inſiſted upon the abſurdity of entering into a ſtrange variety of obligations, not only inconſiſtent with, but oppoſite to each other; obligations, the motives of which could not readily be conceived nor accounted for upon any known principles of ſound policy; for by this conduct we were made to affront in their turns all the great powers of Europe; and not only ſo, but to ſet them at variance with each other; and this was done at a prodigious expence, at a time when the nation was loaded with debts and taxes; while, on the contrary, his Imperial majeſty, by his wiſdom and ſteadineſs, had compaſſed his own ends.

Mr. Oglethorpe was of opinion, that many other things related more nearly to the honour and intereſt of the nation than did the guaranty of the pragmatic ſanction: he inſtanced the obtaining reparation for the Spaniſh depredations, the procuring the complete demolition of the harbour of Dunkirk, and the putting the militia of our own country upon ſuch a footing as might render them more uſeful in caſe of an invaſion. He mentioned the hardſhips which the proteſtants of Germany ſuffered from the houſe of Auſtria; and expreſſed his hopes, that before the Dutch acceded to the treaty of Vienna, ſuch explanations and conceſſions would be made by the emperor as ſhould ſecure the future tranquillity of Europe.

The motion was defended by Mr Pelham and Mr. H. Walpole, brother to the miniſter: the former was pay-maſter of the forces, and brother to the duke of Newcaſtle: he was liberal, candid, benevolent, and attached to the intereſts of his country, though frequently miſtaken in the true nature of them, and at all times ready to ſupport the meaſures of the miniſtry. On this occaſion he aſſerted, that it was no way inconſiſtent with the dignity of that houſe to thank his majeſty in the moſt particular terms, for every thing he had been pleaſed to communicate in his ſpeech from the throne: that no expreſſions of approbation in the addreſs could be any way made uſe of to prevent an enquiry into the meaſures which had been purſued, when the treaties ſhould be laid before the houſe. He ſaid, at the opening of a ſeſſion the eyes of all Europe were turned towards Great Britain; and from the reſolves of her parliament the neighbouring powers judged of the unanimity that would enſue between his majeſty and his people: that their appearing jealous of his majeſty's conduct would weaken his influence upon the councils of foreign ſtates and potentates, and perhaps put it out of his power to rectify any falſe ſteps that might have been made by his miniſters.

Mr. Walpole made a long ſpeech, in which he juſtified the miniſtry in every ſtep they had taken. He ſhewed that they could not, conſiſtently with the national honour and intereſt, have ſooner guarantied the pragmatic ſanction, inaſmuch as they were not ſure but the emperor deſigned Don Carlos for his ſon-in-law; in which caſe the extenſive dominions he was to poſſeſs in Italy might have proved fatal to the repoſe of Europe. He denied that there was any thing to fear from the reſentment of the court of Verſailles, who were ſtill deſirous and willing to continue in the ſtricteſt friendſhip with us. He affirmed, that had his Moſt Chriſtian majeſty guarantied the pragmatic ſanction, Don Carlos might have met with invincible obſtacles to his ſucceſſion; and that, in all probability, neither the Dutch or Great Britain would have been able to perſuade the emperor to give up the Oſtend company, or to do them juſtice in other reſpects. After a long debate the queſtion was put, the motion carried, and the addreſs preſented.

The next ſubject of importance which came before the commons was the number of land-forces. When the ſupply fell under conſideration, ſir W. Strickland, ſecretary at war, moved for ſeventeen thouſand ſeven hundred and nine men for the ſervice of the current year. He was oppoſed by Mr. (afterwards ſir) Watkyns-William Wynn, who moved that the army ſhould be reduced to twelve thouſand men. A warm debate enſuing, was managed in favour of the firſt motion, by lord Hervey, ſir Robert Walpole and his brother, Mr. Pelham, Sir Philip Yorke, attorney-general, who was a better lawyer than a politician, and ſhone more as an advocate at the bar than as an orator in the houſe of commons. The laſt partizan of the miniſtry was ſir W. Yonge, one of the lords commiſſioners of the Treaſury, of whom a modern writer has given a character, which ſeems rather dictated by party-inveteracy than by that ſpirit of of impartiality and truth which ought to diſtinguiſh every hiſtorian. Mr. Wynne's motion was ſupported by the lord Morpeth, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Carliſle; by Mr. Walter Plumer, who ſpoke with great weight, though embittered with too great a proportion of ſeverity; by ſir W. Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, Mr. W. Pulteney, and Mr. Barnard.

The courtiers argued, that it was neceſſary to maintain ſuch a number of land-forces as might defeat the deſigns of malcontents, ſecure the interior tranquillity of the kingdom, defend it from external aſſaults, overawe its neighbours, and enable it to take vigorous meaſures, in caſe the peace of Europe ſhould be embroiled: they endeavoured to ſhew, that ever ſince the Revolution the government had never reduced its forces without having cauſe to repent it, by the encouragement which ſuch a reduction gave to their foreign and domeſtic enemies. They expoſtulated on the wiſdom of his majeſty, and his tenderneſs for the liberties of his people; together with the jealouſy of the parliament which would never ſuffer any army, raiſed by their conſent, to ſubvert either the freedom or the property of the ſubject. It was moreover obſerved, that the forces now in pay could not be properly deemed a ſtanding army, inaſmuch as they were voted and maintained from year to year.

To theſe arguments the members in the oppoſition replied, that a ſtanding force in time of peace was unconſtitutional, and had been always thought dangerous: that a militia was as capable of diſcipline as a ſtanding army, and would have more incentives to courage and perſeverance: that the civil magiſtrate was able to preſerve the power of the country; and that the number of malcontents was contemptible, though it might be conſiderably augmented by maintaining a ſtanding army, and meaſures of the like arbitrary tendency. Other nations, it was ſaid, had been enſlaved by ſtanding armies. Hiſtory, ancient and modern, was produced for examples. The Roman army, who had ſubverted the liberties of their country, that of Cromwell, and of James II. were adduced as inſtances to heighten the parallel the oppoſers of the bill laboured to eſtabliſh.

Theſe remarks were anſwered by ſir Robert Walpole, who ſaid, that there could be no danger of this ſort from the preſent army, which was commanded by men whoſe properties were too conſiderable to ſuffer them to head, or even to encourage any attempt againſt the civil conſtitution of their country: that all arguments drawn from paſt times, againſt a regular military force, were foreign to the purpoſe, conſidering the vaſt alterations which had been introduced into the civil ſyſtem of Great Britain, and of all Europe: that England was now a commercial nation, and could not ſpare from her trade and manufactures a number of men ſufficient to defend her as a militia, in caſe ſhe was attacked by regular troops, great armies of which were now kept on foot by all her neighbours: that the maintaining of the propoſed number of troops was not only dictated by prudence, but, if the matter was duly conſidered, by oeconomy likewiſe: that, ſhould the army be reduced, the nation would be in the moſt imminent danger, from the deſigns of Jacobites and diſaffected perſons: and, finally, that it was well known that the papiſts and Jacobites were then, and always had been, the moſt forward in the cry for the reduction of the army.

Mr. Plumer complained, that the country was oppreſſed by an arbitrary method of quartering ſoldiers, in an undue proportion, upon thoſe publicans who refuſed to vote in elections, according to the direction of the miniſtry. Mr. Pulteney aſſerted, that the money raiſed for the ſuſtenance of eighteen thouſand men in England would maintain ſixty thouſand French or Germans, or the ſame number of almoſt any other people on the continent. Sir W. Wyndham declared, that eighteen thouſand of the Engliſh troops in the late war were maintained on leſs than two thirds of the ſum now demanded for the like number. Beſides, the expediency of reducing the number from eighteen thouſand to twelve thouſand, was inſiſted upon as the natural conſequence even of his majeſty's own declaration from the throne; by which he had given his parliament to underſtand, "that the peace of Europe was eſtabliſhed, and that he had nothing ſo much at heart as the eaſe and proſperity of his people." If eighteen thouſand men then, it was ſaid, were ſufficient, on the ſuppoſed eve of a general war in Europe (as was the caſe laſt year) it was ſurely reaſonable to think that a leſs number would ſuffice when peace was perfectly re-eſtabliſhed. Whatever ſolidity might be in theſe reaſons, or however they might be the ſentiments of the nation, they made no impreſſion on the houſe, where the majority reſolved that the ſtanding army ſhould be maintained without reduction *.

The miniſter, conſcious of his own unpopularity, reſolved at this time to make an attempt to recover his credit with the landed gentlemen of England. This was no other than a ſcheme to give them relief by reviving the duty upon ſalt, in order the more eaſily to lighten the burden of the land-tax. Accordingly, in a grand committee of the houſe, ſir Robert Walpole ſaid, "That in raiſing the ſupplies granted, his majeſty's intention was, that the burden ſhould fall as equally as poſſible upon the ſubjects: that it had long lain upon the gentlemen of the landed intereſt: that no tax could be more general than that upon ſalt, or more tolerable to individuals, be they ever ſo poor; whereas the land-tax, which had continued for forty years, affected the land-holders only. He therefore moved, that the duties upon ſalt, which about two years before had been aboliſhed, ſhould now be revived, and granted to his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, for the term of three years." In order to ſweeten this propoſal, he declared, that the land-tax for the enſuing year ſhould be reduced to one ſhilling in the pound.

Plauſible as this propoſal was, it did not operate ſo ſtrongly with the houſe as the author expected. The country-party to a man inveighed loudly againſt it: they obſerved, that two years had elapſed ſince the king, in a ſpeech from the throne, had exhorted them to aboliſh ſome of the taxes that were the moſt burdenſome to the poor. The houſe was then of opinion, that the tax upon ſalt was the moſt burthenſome, and the moſt pernicious to the trade of the kingdom of all the impoſitions to which the poor were ſubjected, and therefore it was taken off; but that no good reaſon could be produced for altering their opinion ſo ſuddenly, and reſolving to grind the faces of the poor, in order to eaſe a few rich men of the landed intereſt.

Mr. Plumer, in particular, took upon him to anſwer the miniſter, and, in the courſe of his ſpeech, obſerved, that the character of a right tax was wanting in this: for, ſo far from taxing the luxuries, it taxed the moſt ordinary neceſſaries of life; that the motion, if approved, tended to diſtreſs the landed gentlemen more than the land-tax itſelf, inaſmuch as by diſabling manufacturers from carrying on their trade, it would diſable tenants from paying their rents; and, moreover, it was highly impolitic, ſince the revival of it might alienate the affections of the people from his majeſty. He deſired every landed gentleman that heard him, to conſider what he could make of his eſtate if we had no trade, no manufactures, nor any number of populous trading towns in England: he aſked, who would be ſuch a fool as to deſire to be relieved of one ſhilling in the pound upon the land-tax, when he muſt pay as much another way, namely for the ſalt made uſe of in his family, and when at the ſame time he diminiſhes the yearly income of his eſtate much more than one ſhilling in the pound, nay more than any land-tax ever amounted to in England. The land-tax, he ſaid, was but an annual diminution of a gentleman's eſtate; he might be free of it, or part of it, the ſucceeding year: but if, by the decay of trade and the hardſhip that was laid upon the poor farmer, he ſhould be obliged to lower the rents of his eſtate, that would be a diminution which, it was to be feared, would endure for ever."

Some other gentlemen in the oppoſition obſerved, that while this tax was exacted in England, a great number of merchants ſent their ſhips to Ireland to be victualled for their reſpective voyages; that ſince it had been aboliſhed, many experiments had been ſucceſsfully tried with ſalt for the improvement of agriculture, which would be entirely defeated by the revival of this impoſition, which was likely to anſwer no one good purpoſe, but to the miniſter, who would now have it in his power to employ a great number of additional officers in the revenue, all of them wholly depending upon him, whoſe influence in elections they would proportionably increaſe.

Mr. Walpole, reſuming his diſcourſe, ſaid, that with regard to the objection, that the revival of the duty would be prejudicial to the commerce of England, he begged leave to obſerve, that the trade and commerce of England had never made ſo rapid a progreſs as during the thirty years that this tax laſted, and that the victualling of ſhips at Corke, in Ireland, in order to avoid paying the duty in England, was ſo far from being detrimental, that it was in fact beneficial to the kingdom; that as to another objection, as if the revival of the duty would hurt agriculture, the allegation itſelf was founded on a falſe fact, inaſmuch as that ſpecies of the commodity which was proper for manure, might be had in any quantity free from duty.

Some other ſpeeches were made upon the ſubject, particularly one by Mr. Pulteney, who undertook to refute all the arguments of the miniſtry in favour of the tax. The queſtion, however, being put, was carried in the affirmative, but not without the moſt violent debates. The bill met with much the ſame treatment in the upper houſe, where it was warmly conteſted, but finally paſſed.

The reader will readily remember, that, in the laſt ſeſſion, ſome complaints had been made againſt the Charitable Corporation, to the houſe of commons: it now became a very ſerious affair. This company was firſt erected in the year 1707. Their profeſſed intention was to lend money at legal intereſt to the poor, upon ſmall pledges, and to perſons of better rank upon an indubitable ſecurity of goods impawned. Their capital was at firſt limited to thirty thouſand pounds, but, by licences from the crown, they increaſed it to ſixty thouſand pounds. In the month of October, of the preceding year, George Robinſon, eſq. member for Marlow, their caſhier, and John Thompſon, warehouſe-keeper of the corporation, diſappeared in one day. The proprietors, alarmed at this incident, held ſeveral general courts, and appointed a committee to examine the ſtate of their affairs, when it ſoon appeared that a moſt pernicious ſcene of villany had been carried on, inaſmuch as thirty thouſand pounds was all that could be diſcovered to anſwer a capital of near ſixty thouſand pounds, the remainder having been embezzled by means which could not be diſcovered. The proprietors hereupon preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, repreſenting, that by the moſt notorious breach of truſt in ſeveral perſons, to whom they had committed the management of their affairs, the corporation had been defrauded of the greateſt part of their capital, and many of the proprietors were reduced to abſolute beggary; they therefore humbly prayed, that, as they were unable to detect the combinations of thoſe who had ruined them, or to bring the delinquents to condign puniſhment, without the aid and aſſiſtance of parliament, that houſe would be pleaſed to examine into the ſtate of the corporation, and the conduct of the managers, and give ſuch relief to the petitioners as the houſe ſhould think proper.

This petition was very graciouſly received, and the houſe appointed a committee to conduct the enquiry. They ſoon diſcovered a moſt iniquitous ſcene of fraud, in conſequence of which, Mr. Robinſon, ſir Robert Sutton, and ſir Alexander Grant, were expelled the houſe, for having had a conſiderable ſhare in theſe malpractices; and a bill was brought in to reſtrain them, with their accomplices, Dennis Bond, William Burroughs, George Jackſon, Benjamin Robinſon, Richard Wooley, and Thomas Warren, eſqrs. from leaving the kingdom, or alienating their effects.

While the committee was ſitting upon this black affair, they received a letter from one Belloni, a banker at Rome, informing them, that Thompſon, the warehouſe-keeper, was ſecured in that city, with all his papers, and confined in the caſtle of St. Angelo, and that the papers were tranſmitted to his (Belloni's) correſpondent at Paris, who ſhould deliver them up, on certain conditions ſtipulated in favour of the priſoner.

From ſeveral concurring circumſtances, and the characters of the perſons concerned in conducting this intelligence, the committee inferred, that it was no other than an artifice to insinuate a favourable opinion of the pretender, as if he had procured the arrest of Thompson, from his zeal for justice, and affection to the English nation; the proposals contained in the letter were therefore rejected with disdain, and both houses concurred in an order, that the letter should be burned by the hands of the common hangman, at the Royal Exchange: and the lower house came to the following resolution: "That it was an insolent audacious libel, attempting, by false and insidious insinuations, to impose upon the parliament and people of Great Britain; and, by specious pretences, and professions of esteem, affection, and compassion, to amuse the unhappy sufferers of the Charitable Corporation, with vain and deceitful hopes of relief; that the said letter was, in itself, absurd and contradictory, conceived, at the beginning, in terms, and in the style of power and authority, or as proceeding from some extraordinary interest and influence, but concluding in the person and character of a private banker at Rome, who agreed upon certain conditions in behalf of John Thompson to deliver certain books and papers belonging to the said Thompson; that the conditions required and demanded in favour of Thompson, seemed at the same time to be vague, evasive, and uncertain, tending to procure advantages and indemnity to himself and his accomplices, without any prospect of benefit to the corporation: and that the whole transaction appeared to be a scandalous artifice, calculated purely to delude the unhappy, and partly to disguise and conceal the wicked practices of the professed enemies to his majesty's person, crown, and dignity."

Another, but a more daring and barefaced instance of the abuse of parliamentary confidence, happened to be discovered this session, by the unwearied application of lord Gage. Certain commissioners had been appointed to sell the English estates forfeited by the rebellion of the year 1715; and among others, the forfeited reversion of one that had belonged to the Derwentwater family, which was adjudged worth nine thousand pounds a year: this reversion had been sold, in a clandestine manner, by two of the commissioners only, to one Mr. Smith, a friend of theirs, for the trifling sum of one thousand pounds. This affair was no sooner known abroad, than it made a very great noise, and, by the indefatigable pains which lord Gage took, the whole mystery of iniquity was minutely detected; in consequence of which a bill was prepared in the lower house, to make the sale void. Dennis Bond, esq. (the same who was concerned in the Charitable Corporation affair) and serjeant Birch, commissioners for the sale of the forfeited estates, were declared guilty of a notorious breach of trust, and expelled the house, of which they were members. During this session, no less than five members of parliament were expelled for the most sordid acts of knavery; a melancholy proof of national degeneracy.

All the supplies were granted, and, among other articles, the sum of twenty-two thousand six hundred and ninety-four pounds, seven shillings, and six pence, for the agio or difference of money in the subsidies payable to the crown of Denmark, in pursuance of the treaty subsisting between the late king and that monarch; but this was not obtained without a violent dispute, in which Mr. Pulteney greatly distinguished himself. On this occasion some words happened between him and Mr. Pelham, which brought on a challenge, and both gentlemen went out of the house in order to terminate their dispute without delay; which being observed by the speaker, he ordered the serjeant at arms to follow them forthwith, and summon them to return to the service of the house: they complied, and Mr. Speaker then obliged each severally to declare that they would not prosecute any quarrel, or shew any farther resentment, for what had passed between them in the house; and here the affair ended. The misfortune was, at the time we now treat of, personal invectives were too common between both parties.

The pension-bill was revived this session, for the third time, and again rejected by the house of lords. Some efforts were likewise made towards restoring the trade of the sugar-colonies in America, but they met with so strong an opposition from the northern colonies, that they proved of little or no effect: an act, however, passed for encouraging the growth of coffee in his majesty's plantations in America.

It was not only in the house of commons that the minister had a strong opposition to encounter; the peers were far from unanimously approving his measures. On the rejection of the pension-bill, several lords entered very spirited protests. When the number of standing forces came to be debated, the earl of Chesterfield argued for the court motion. The earl of Oxford moved for the reducing them to twelve thousand effective men. The earl of Winchilsea observed, that a standing army rendered ministers of state more daring than otherwise they would be, in contriving and executing projects that were grievous to the people; schemes that never could enter into the heads of any but those who were drunk with excess of power. The marquis of Tweedale, in reasoning against such a number as the ministry proposed, took occasion to observe, that not one shilling of the forfeited estates was ever applied to the use of the public; he likewise took notice, that the eighteen thousand men demanded as a standing force, were now modelled in such a manner, that they might be speedily augmented to forty thousand, on any emergency. The duke of Argyll endeavoured to demonstrate the danger of depending for the safety of the kingdom upon an undisciplined militia, a fleet, or an army of auxiliaries; then he represented the necessity of having recourse to a regular army in case of invasion; and, after all, acknowleged that the number proposed was no way sufficient for that purpose. All his arguments were answered by lord Carteret; nevertheless victory declared for the ministry.

The parliament having granted every branch of the supply, towards the payment of which they borrowed a sum out of the sinking fund, and passed divers acts for the encouragement of commerce and agriculture, the king, on the first day of June, gave the royal assent to the bills that were prepared, and closed the session, after having informed both houses, that the States-general had acceded to the treaty of Vienna, that he had determined to visit his German dominions, and to leave the queen regent in his absence: he accordingly set out for Hanover in the beginning of June. By this time the pragmatic sanction was confirmed by the diet of the empire, though not without a formal protest by the electors Palatine, Bavaria, and Saxony.

In this ſame year, a number of gentlemen of diſtinction and worth ſet on foot one of the moſt diſintereſted, charitable, and (to the public) beneficial deſigns, that was ever undertaken. Hitherto all our American colonies were profeſſedly planted for the immediate benefit of the undertakers; but this was ſolely for a national and charitable purpoſe, without any other benefit to the undertakers than what reſults from the pleaſure of doing good. Moſt of them were members of parliament, who having lately had occaſion to obſerve the miſery of the priſoners confined in our gaols for debt, were moved with compaſſion for the relief of ſuch unfortunate objects, who, were they ſettled in ſome new colony in our plantations, might, inſtead of a burden and a diſgrace, prove a great advantage to their country; and that, moreover, many perſecuted proteſtants from beyond ſea might take the benefit of ſuch a colony, for ſetting up their reſidence there, with the free enjoyment of their civil and religious liberties.

There was ſtill a great part of the charter-lands of South Carolina, ſituated on the ſouthern part of that province, bordering upon Florida, remaining unplanted, which it was highly the intereſt of Great Britain to occupy and plant as ſoon as poſſible, leſt either the Spaniards from Florida, or the French behind it, from their uſurpation of Miſſiſippi, ſhould ſeize on and plant what they found ſo unoccupied; more eſpecially as the latter people greatly lamented their not having any footing on any part of the eaſtern ſhores of North America, ſo as to communicate more eaſily with their ſugar-iſlands, their voyages to and from the Miſſiſippi colony being by no means ſo convenient for receiving thence ſupplies of proviſions, lumber, &c. which they were, for that reaſon, obliged to take from our Britiſh continent-colonies. This vacancy then was judged abſolutely neceſſary to be filled up as ſoon as poſſible.

Theſe reaſons were ſufficiently urgent for gentlemen of ſo public-ſpirited a character and diſpoſition to make the attempt. But firſt they were to be authoriſed by his majeſty's perpetual charter, which they obtained in this ſame year, 1732, on the ninth of June, "empowering twenty-one gentlemen by name, and ſuch others as they ſhould, from time to time, elect into their body, to be truſtees for eſtabliſhing the colony therein named Georgia, in America, bounded between the moſt northern ſtream of the river Savannah, and the moſt ſouthern ſtream of the river Alatamaha (an extent of upwards of one hundred miles) along the ſea-coaſt; and going weſtward from the heads of the ſaid rivers, in direct lines, to the South Sea; with the iſlands within twenty leagues of the ſea-coaſt. The ſaid truſtees were thereby empowered to receive and manage the contributions of all perſons and corporations inclined to give money for the tranſporting of people to, and ſettling them in, the ſaid colony. This corporation was made capable in law to hold and purchaſe lands, &c. in Great Britain, to the value of one thouſand pounds yearly, and in America to an unlimited value, for the ſaid charitable purpoſe. Their common council was to conſiſt of fifteen perſons, with power to make them up twenty-four (as they afterwards were). Georgia was to remain for ever an independent province, ſave only that the government of its militia ſhall remain in the governor of South Carolina; but the government of the colony in other reſpects to be in the truſtees for twenty-one years, when it was to be veſted in the crown. Liberty of conſcience and freedom of worſhip allowed to all its inhabitants, papiſts excepted. No truſtee to hold lands or office in Georgia. The grants of lands to be regiſtered in England, in the office of the auditor of the plantations."

It may be truly ſaid that the truſtees took all poſſible pains for executing the truſt, and no one diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much as Mr. (afterwards lieutenant general) Oglethorpe, who had the principal ſhare in firſt ſetting this undertaking on foot. They erected two good towns, Savannah and Frederica, at the north and ſouth extremities of the province, beſides ſeveral villages and ſmall forts; and one in particular among the Indians, called Auguſta, with a ſmall garriſon, for the protection of the Indian trade, two hundred and forty miles inland, up the river Savannah. They planted a common nurſery-garden for white-mulberry trees, for the feeding of ſilk-worms. By the planting of Georgia, Carolina has felt the benefit of being able to run out (as they term it) much land, which till that new frontier barrier was eſtabliſhed, they had no inclination to do, whereby thoſe lands have been raiſed to five times their former value about Port Royal and towards the river Savannah.

Georgia produces a great variety of excellent plants and drugs, and orange-trees in ſome parts of it; great plenty of horſes and black cattle are raiſed, and the Saltzburghers (who went over there from Germany) have ſince raiſed more corn than the colony could conſume. There is plenty of wild fowl, and alſo fiſh on its coaſts; and ſince it has fallen under the government of the crown, it gradually increaſes in people and improvements. Upon the whole, Georgia cannot fail to be of great ſervice to Great Britain on many accounts. The Engliſh navy may, in its harbours and bays, in caſe of a war, ſafely lie in wait for the Spaniſh galleons, or for the French from Miſſiſippi, in their return to Europe through the dangerous gulph of Florida. The truſtees erected a fort in the country of the Upper Creek Indians, almoſt four hundred miles from the ſea, and not above forty miles from the neareſt French fort in Miſſiſippi, whereby all that tract of country is kept poſſeſſion of for us.

We will now turn our eyes upon the ſituation of affairs on the continent. The States-general had ſucceeded in forwarding the project of a marriage between the eldeſt archduchеſs of Auſtria and the duke of Lorraine, by which means the indiviſibility of the Auſtrian dominions, the great object of the pragmatic ſanction, was ſecured, without ſubjecting Europe to any apprehenſions of danger by her matching with a more powerful prince. They had procured a full and perpetual abolition of the Oſtend company; and all their diſputes with the emperor in Eaſt Frieſland were adjuſted to their entire ſatisfaction.

The court of Vienna ſeemed cordially to return to its ancient ſyſtem of harmony and friendſhip with Great Britain; but carried its perſecutions againſt its proteſtant ſubjects to ſuch an height of cruelty, that the king of England was obliged to interpoſe in their behalf. France, by the bigotry of cardinal de Fleury, and the blind deference of the ſovereign to that miniſter, was rent in pieces by religious diſſenſions, which, while they deſtroyed her own internal tranquility, rendered her incapable of diſturbing that of her neighbours.

Spain having compaſſed her favourite point of ſetling don Carlos in Italy, now undertook an expedition againſt Oran, a town of ſome conſequence, which lies oppoſite to Carthagena, and which the Spaniards, after having poſſeſſed for two hundred years, had loſt to the Moors in 1708. This expedition fully anſwered the purpoſe for which it had been undertaken, they not only taking Oran, but making themſelves alſo maſters of the ſtrong fort of Mazalquivir. It was the armament fitted out for this expedition that had given that alarm to our court, of which I have already taken notice.

Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia, after having abdicated the throne in favour of his ſon Charles Emanuel, ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded by his wife, an ambitious woman, to engage in ſome intrigues for reſuming the ſovereign ſway; but theſe being diſcovered by his ſon, the reigning king, he ordered his perſon to be ſecured at Montcalier, and conveyed to Rivoli, under a ſtrong guard: his wife, the counteſs of St. Sebaſtian, was conducted to Ceva.

The diſpute that had long ſubſiſted between the king of Pruſſia and the young prince of Orange, touching his ſucceſſion to the eſtates poſſeſſed by king William III. (in quality of prince of Orange) was at laſt adjuſted by a formal treaty, ſigned at Berlin and Dieren.

I ſhall cloſe this ſhort review of the affairs of Europe this year, with an intereſting event that happened in Pruſſia, where the prince-royal (the preſent famous king of Pruſſia), nephew to his Britannic majeſty, had fallen under the diſpleaſure of his father; a reconciliation, however, was happily effected this year, by the prince-royal conſenting to marry the princeſs of Bevern, a match which, though rather diſagreeable to himſelf, was the price he was obliged to pay for being re-admitted into favour with his father. The virtues of this lady, however, were ſuch, that when the prince ſucceeded to the throne, he voluntarily ſhared with her his royalty.

The Dutch were alarmed about this time with an apprehenſion of being overwhelmed by an inundation, occaſioned by an extraordinary ſpecies of worms which bred in the piles and timber-work that ſupported their dykes, and threatened the deſtruction of thoſe props of their common-wealth. They prayed, they faſted, they humbled themſelves in the moſt extraordinary manner before heaven, in order to avert a calamity which they knew not how otherwiſe to guard againſt: at length they were delivered from their terrors by an hard froſt, which effectually deſtroyed theſe dangerous enemies. At the cloſe of this year, M. Dieden, plenipotentiary from the elector of Hanover at the imperial court, received the inveſtiture of Bremen and Verden from the hands of the emperor*.

The hiſtory of England at this period, cannot but be very dry and unentertaining to the reader, as it furniſhes no domeſtic occurrences worth mentioning, conſiſting chiefly in an annual revolution of debates in parliament, in which the ſame arguments are perpetually recurring on the ſame ſubjects.

His majeſty being returned from his German dominions, the ſeſſion of parliament was opened on the ſixteenth of January, 1733, by a ſpeech from the throne, wherein the king declared, that the ſituation of affairs, both at home and abroad, rendered it unneceſſary for him to lay before the two houſes any other reaſons for calling them together, but the ordinary diſpatch of the public buſineſs, and his deſire of receiving their advice in ſuch affairs as ſhould require the care and conſideration of parliament. When an addreſs of thanks came to be propoſed, importing the entire ſatisfaction of the houſe at the preſent ſituation of affairs, as well foreign as domeſtic, the country members obſerved, in oppoſition to it, that there appeared very little reaſon for the nation to be ſatisfied with the preſent poſture of affairs; for, in the firſt place, it was very well known that the French were actually buſied in repairing the fortifications of Dunkirk, in direct violation of the moſt ſolemn treaties; that the Britiſh merchants were ſtill left expoſed to the cruel and inſolent depredations of the Spaniards; that the commerce of England daily decreaſed; and that every ſeſſion of parliament opened a new ſcene of villany and impoſition: the addreſs, however, was carried by the court party by a conſiderable majority.

The penſion-bill was once more revived, and again loſt in the houſe of peers. All the reaſons formerly advanced againſt a ſtanding army were now repeated, and a reduction of the number warmly inſiſted upon; but to very little effect, the army being voted on the preſent eſtabliſhment. The next debate of note was with regard to the Spaniſh depredations, when ſir Wilfred Lawſon made a motion to addreſs his majeſty, to know what ſatisfaction had been made by Spain for the depredations committed on the Britiſh merchants. This motion occaſioned a violent debate; the miniſter would gladly have evaded it, but he could not do it with decency, or even without danger. His tenderneſs for the court of Spain had made him indulge them in various delays, as to the execution of the treaty of Seville, with regard to their harraſſing the Engliſh in America. Sir Robert Walpole was ſenſible this conduct of his had given the oppoſition an advantage againſt him; but he acted on this occaſion with great addreſs and no leſs honour, by frankly owning that his majeſty had nothing to lay before the houſe upon the motion which had been made, as many unforeſeen accidents had prevented the commiſſaries from entering upon buſineſs ſooner than the month of February laſt: however, he hoped affairs would be ſettled in ſuch a manner as to give full ſatisfaction to every member of that houſe, and full reparation to every one of the ſubjects of Great Britain, who had met with a real injury from the Spaniards. This apology, however, was treated with great contempt by the members in the oppoſition, and the miniſter, though he could have carried the queſtion, ſuffered it to go againſt him, rather than inflame the minds of his adverſaries too much, whom he well knew poſſeſſed the confidence of the nation. The addreſs was accordingly preſented, and an anſwer came from the crown, which was little more than a copy of the apology which the miniſter had made in the houſe.

The

The warm diſpute between the Britiſh American ſugar-colonies and the Britiſh northern colonies, which had laſted from the year 1731, concerning the trade of the latter with the French, Dutch, and Daniſh ſugar-colonies, of which we have already treated, was now reconſidered by the houſe, and at length finally terminated by the prudent temperament of an act for the better ſecuring and encouraging the trade of his majeſty's ſugar colonies in America, which laid a duty upon all rum, ſugar, and molaſſes, brought from the northern colonies.

While the commons were deliberating upon the ſupply, ſir Robert Walpole moved, on the twenty-third of February, that five hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be iſſued out of the ſinking fund for the ſervice of the enſuing year. It is not to be ſuppoſed that a motion of this nature could paſs without being ſeverely animadverted upon by the members in the oppoſition: accordingly ſir William Wyndham, Mr. Pulteney, and ſir John Barnard, exerted all their force of argumentation to expoſe the miniſter for his iniquitous practices of pillaging ſo ſacred a depoſit, ſolemnly appropriated to the diſcharge of the national debt. Sir Robert heard and anſwered with amazing temper and coolneſs, all the invidious reflections, the bitter ſarcaſms, and the perſonal invectives with which his opponents loaded him; he knew that the oppoſition might juſtly be termed "vox & preterea nihil," a mere empty ſound, and that all their objections would vaniſh before his ſuperior influence. The motion was approved by the majority, and the ſum accordingly taken for the uſe of the crown.

A ferment very dangerous to the miniſter was, however, now working in the nation. He had begun, ſo long ago as the year 1724, to encreaſe the number of exciſes, by changing the cuſtoms on coffee, tea, and chocolate, to an inland duty; he had brought the ſalt duty, after he had detached it from the ſinking fund, and remitted it a ſhort time (to ſoothe the people), under the ſame regulation. This laſt alteration gave ſome alarm, though the firſt had paſſed off very eaſily; but the ſcheme which the miniſter now meditated, and of which he made no ſecret, namely, an exciſe upon the two articles of wine and tobacco, had impreſſed the people with the notion that little leſs than a general exciſe was intended. Never in the memory of man was the nation ſo alarmed at the deſigns of a miniſter as in the preſent caſe. The court-writers had endeavoured to prepare the people for this new inland duty, by a pamphlet entitled "Some general Conſiderations concerning the Alteration and Improvement of the Public Revenues;" but for ſome months before it was propoſed in the houſe, it became the chief ſubject of contention between the court and country-writers; and the Craftſman in particular gave ſuch a hiſtory and picture of exciſes in his weekly eſſays, as raiſed in the people moſt terrible apprehenſions concerning the extenſion of them. Theſe papers were collected together, and publiſhed under the title of "Arguments againſt Exciſes." They had their effect, and an univerſal clamour was raiſed againſt the miniſterial propoſal even before it had been offered to the public. When the parliament met, it was every week expected that ſir Robert Walpole would lay his ſcheme before the commons, and very broad hints were thrown out upon that ſubject; and in the debates occaſioned by the miniſter's motion for iſſuing and applying five hundred thouſand pounds out of the ſinking fund, for the ſervice of the current year, Mr. Pulteney happening to ſay, that "Though he was aware of the motion now made by that honourable gentleman ſitting near him, yet he was in hopes, that what he had now moved for, was not all that he was to open that day in the committee," and then mentioning the exciſe project, and painting it in the moſt frightful colours, almoſt all the gentlemen who ſpoke after, made a digreſſion from the point under conſideration to that in expectation, and anticipated the propoſition before it was made. In all probability, however, it was made the ſooner on this occaſion, the country gentlemen inſiſting on it while the houſe was full, and before the members were tired with attendance. The call of the houſe having been fixed to the ſeventh of March, ſir Robert Walpole then propoſed that day ſevennight for reſolving into a committee of the whole houſe, to conſider of the moſt proper methods for the better ſecurity and improvement of the duties and revenues charged upon, and payable from, tobacco and wine.

On the fourteenth of March the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms and of the exciſe attending, purſuant to an order of the preceding day, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer opened and explained his ſcheme in a long ſtudied ſpeech. He began by taking notice of the arts which had been uſed to prejudice the people againſt his ſcheme before it was known. He affirmed, that the clamours occaſioned by theſe prejudices had originally ariſen from ſmugglers and unfair traders, who had enriched themſelves by cheating the public; and that theſe had been ſtrenuouſly aſſiſted by another ſet of men, fond of every opportunity to ſtir up the people of Great Britain to mutiny and ſedition. He expatiated on the frauds that were committed in that branch of the revenue ariſing from tobacco; upon the hardſhips to which the American planters were ſubjected by the heavy duties payable on importation, as well as by the ill uſage they had met with from their factors and correſpondents in England, who, from being their ſervants, were now become their maſters; upon the injury done to the fair trader, and the loſs ſuſtained by the public in reſpect to the revenue. He aſſerted, that the ſcheme he was about to propoſe, would remove all theſe inconveniencies, prevent numberleſs frauds, perjuries, and falſe entries, and add two or three hundred thouſand pounds per annum to the public revenue. He entered into a long detail of frauds practiſed by the knaviſh dealers in thoſe commodities; he recited the ſeveral acts of parliament that related to the duties on wine and tobacco; he declared he had no intention to promote a general exciſe; he endeavoured to obviate ſome objections that might be made to his plan, the nature of which he at length explained. He propoſed to join the laws of exciſe to thoſe of the cuſtoms: that the farther ſubſidy of three farthings per pound, chargeable upon imported tobacco, ſhould be ſtill levied at the cuſtom-houſe, and payable to his majeſty's civil liſt, as heretofore: that then the tobacco ſhould be lodged in warehouſes, to be appointed for that purpoſe by the commiſſioners of the exciſe; that the keeper of each warehouſe, appointed likewiſe by the commiſſioners, ſhould have one lock and key, and the merchant importer have another, and that the tobacco ſhould be thus ſecured until the merchant ſhould find vent for it, either by exportation or home conſumption: that the part deſigned for exportation ſhould be weighed at the cuſtom-houſe, diſcharged of the three farthings per pound, which had been paid at its firſt importation, and then exported without farther trouble: that the portion deſigned for home conſumption ſhould, in the preſence of the warehouſe-keeper, be delivered to the purchaſer, upon his paying the inland duty of four pence per pound weight to the proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the merchant would be eaſed of the inconvenience of paying the duty upon importation, or of giving bond and finding ſecurities for the payment, before he had found a market for the commodity: that all penalties and forfeitures, ſo far as they formerly belonged to the crown, ſhould for the future be applied to the uſe of the public: that appeals in this, as well as in all other caſes relating to the exciſe, ſhould be heard and determined by two or three of the judges, to be named by his majeſty, and in the country by the judge of aſſize upon the next circuit, who ſhould hear and determine ſuch appeals in the moſt ſummary manner, without the formality of proceeding in courts of law and equity.

Such was the ſubſtance of the famous exciſe ſcheme, the propoſing of which occaſioned the moſt intereſting debate that could happen in a Britiſh houſe of commons. It held till two of the clock next morning, and was managed and maintained by all the ableſt ſpeakers on both ſides the queſtion. Sir Robert Walpole was anſwered by Mr. Perry, one of the members for the city of London. Sir Paul Methuen joined in the oppoſition. Sir John Barnard, another repreſentative of the city of London, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſame cauſe: he was ſupported by Mr. Pulteney, ſir William Wyndham, and others of the country party; while ſir Philip Yorke (now appointed lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench, and ennobled in the courſe of the enſuing year), warmly eſpouſed the miniſter's ſcheme; as did alſo ſir Joſeph Jekyll, maſter of the Rolls, aſſiſted by the lord Hervey, ſir Thomas Robinſon, ſir William Young, Mr. Pelham, and Mr. Winnington, which laſt was far the moſt eminent for talents and addreſs of all the miniſterial advocates.

Thoſe who argued againſt the ſcheme, accuſed the miniſter of having miſrepreſented the frauds, and made falſe calculations as to the hardſhips under which it had been ſaid the planters laboured. They affirmed, that the planters had never thought of complaining, till put upon it by letters and applications from London: that the ſcheme was ſo far from being calculated to relieve the planters, that it would expoſe the factors to ſuch grievous oppreſſion, that they would not be able to continue the trade, conſequently the planters would be utterly ruined; and, after all, it would not prevent the frauds againſt which it was ſaid to be provided: that from the examination of the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms, it appeared that thoſe funds did not exceed forty thouſand pounds per annum, and might be in a great meaſure aboliſhed by a due execution of the laws in being, conſequently this ſcheme was unneceſſary, would be ineffectual in augmenting the revenue, deſtructive to trade, and dangerous to the liberties of the ſubject, as it tended to promote a general exciſe, which was in all countries conſidered as a grievous oppreſſion. They ſuggeſted that it would produce an additional ſwarm of officers and warehouſe-keepers appointed and paid by the Treaſury, ſo as to multiply the dependents on the crown, and enable it ſtill farther to check the freedom of elections: that the traders would become ſlaves to exciſemen and warehouſe keepers, as they would be debarred all acceſs to their own commodities except at certain hours, when attended by thoſe officers; that the merchant, for every quantity of tobacco he ſhould ſell, would be obliged to make a journey, or ſend a meſſenger to the office for a permit, which could not be obtained without trouble, expence, and delay; and that if a law ſhould be enacted in favour of this ſcheme, it would in all probability be ſome time or other uſed as a precedent for introducing exciſe laws into every branch of the revenue, in which caſe the liberty of Great Britain would be no more.

After a very warm debate, the queſtion being put, upon a motion made by the miniſter, that the preſent duties on wine and tobacco ſhould, from and after the twenty-fourth of June next, ceaſe and determine, it was carried in the affirmative by two hundred and ſixty-ſix againſt two hundred and five.

The other reſolutions ſubſequent to this, for altering the cuſtoms to an inland duty on thoſe commodities, and appropriating this inland duty to the ſame uſes as the cuſtoms, were paſſed without a diviſion. Thus did the exciſe ſcheme triumph for the firſt day; and even on the ſixteenth, upon the report of the committee, after another long debate, it was agreed to by much the ſame majority, when it was ordered that a bill ſhould be brought in purſuant to the ſaid reſolutions. As the hiſtory of this bill will be ever memorable in Great Britain, I ſhall give an abſtract of it from the Hiſtorical Regiſter for the year 1733, with the arguments for and againſt it, as the only means of giving a juſt notion of the whole affair.

This famous bill was brought in on the fourth of April, and read the firſt time, after which Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, by his majeſty's command, acquainted the houſe, that his majeſty conſented to their making ſuch alterations as they ſhould think fit for the public ſervice, in relation to the ſubſidy on tobacco, then payable on account of his majeſty's civil liſt. It was next objected, that ſome parts of the ſaid bill were not within the reſolutions of the houſe purſuant to which the ſaid bill had been ordered to be brought in, and therefore it was moved, that the bill ſhould be withdrawn, which paſſed in the negative, two hundred and thirty-two againſt one hundred and ſeventy-ſix. Then a motion was made for adjourning, which likewiſe paſſed in the negative. At laſt it was reſolved that the bill ſhould be read a ſecond time, on that day ſevennight; two hundred and thirty-ſix againſt two hundred. Next day after bringing in of this bill, a motion was made for the printing ſuch a number of copies as ſhould be ſufficient for the uſe of the members of the houſe; but, upon the queſtion, the Noes had it by one hundred and twenty-eight againſt one hundred and twelve.

As this bill very much concerned the trade and commerce of this nation, the lord-mayor of the city city of London (John Barber, eſq.) procured a copy of it ſoon after it was brought into the houſe of commons, and having laid it before the common-council, it was there reſolved to petition the houſe againſt it; and a petition being immediately drawn up, and agreed to, the ſame was preſented to the houſe of commons on the tenth of April. The petitioners herein expreſs themſelves as follows: "That they preſume, in all humility, to expreſs to the houſe, as they had already done in ſome meaſure by their inſtructions to their members, the univerſal ſenſe of the nation concerning any farther extenſion of the laws of exciſe: that the burden of taxes already impoſed on every branch of trade, however chearfully borne, was ſeverely felt; but the petitioners apprehended that this burden would grow too heavy to be borne, if it was encreaſed by ſuch vexatious and oppreſſive methods of levying and collecting the duties, as, they are aſſured by melancholy experience, the nature of all exciſes muſt neceſſarily produce: that the merchants, tradeſmen, and manufacturers of the kingdom, had ſupported themſelves under the preſſure of the exciſe laws now in force, by the comfortable and reaſonable expectation, that thoſe laws, which nothing but public neceſſity could be a motive to enact, would be repealed in favour of the trade of the kingdom and of the liberty of the ſubject, whenever that motive ſhould be removed, as the petitioners preſume it effectually was, by the undiſturbed tranquility which the nation enjoyed at home, and the general peace which was ſo firmly eſtabliſhed abroad: that if this expectation ſhould be diſappointed; if the exciſe-laws, inſtead of being repealed, were extended to other ſpecies of merchandize not yet exciſed, and a door opened for extending them to all; the petitioners cannot, in juſtice to themſelves, to the merchants, tradeſmen, and manufacturers of the whole kingdom, and to the general intereſt of their country, conceal their apprehenſions, that the moſt fatal blow, which ever was given, would be given on this occaſion, to the trade and navigation of Great Britain: that that great ſpring, from which the wealth and property of the ſubject flowed, would be obſtructed, and the mercantile part of the nation would become not only leſs able to trade to advantage, but unwilling to trade at all; ſince no perſon, who could enjoy all the privileges of a Britiſh ſubject out of trade, even with a ſmall fortune, would voluntarily reſign ſome of the moſt valuable of thoſe privileges, by ſubjecting himſelf to the laws of exciſe: that the petitioners are able to ſhew, that theſe apprehenſions are founded both in experience and reaſon; and therefore they hope, that the houſe will be pleaſed to hear them by their counſel againſt the bill."

It has always been a privilege enjoyed by the city of London, that any petition from them is preſented to the houſe by their ſheriffs, and brought up by the clerk of the houſe, and read at the table, without asking the leave of the houſe for that purpoſe; whereas all other petitions muſt be preſented by a member of the houſe, and cannot be by him brought up, or read at the table by the clerk, till leave be firſt asked and obtained of the houſe. Accordingly, the petition was brought up and read at the table; and as ſoon as it was read, ſir John Barnard got up, and, in a very expreſſive manner, repreſented how much the city and citizens of London, as well as all the other trading parts of the nation would be affected by the bill for altering the method of raiſing the duties payable upon tobacco, and how juſt reaſon they had to inſiſt upon being heard by their council againſt it; concluding with a motion for granting them leave to be heard by their counſel, if they thought fit.

In oppoſition to this motion it was inſiſted on, by the miniſter and his friends, that it had always been the practice of that houſe, never to receive any petition, much leſs to admit counſel to be heard, againſt any bill for impoſing of taxes upon the ſubject; for that, if ſuch a thing was to be admitted, it would be impoſſible ever to paſs any ſuch bill, becauſe there would be ſo many different petitions preſented againſt it, by thoſe who were to be ſubject thereto, that it would be impoſſible to hear counſel ſeparately upon every ſuch petition within the uſual time of the continuance of one ſeſſion of parliament; and that in refuſing to admit counſel to be heard, there could be no inconvenience, becauſe every man, and every body of men, had their repreſentatives in that houſe, who certainly would repreſent their caſe to the houſe, if any particular hardſhip was to be put upon them by any bill then before the houſe.

To this it was replied, that the houſe had never pretended to any particular cuſtom of refuſing petitions, except againſt thoſe bills which were called money-bills, that was to ſay, ſuch bills as were brought in for raiſing money for the ſervice of the current year; and that even as to them there were many precedents where the houſe had admitted the parties whom they thought to have a real intereſt therein, to be heard by their counſel againſt the paſſing of ſuch bills: that the admitting of counſel, even in ſuch caſes, could never prevent the paſſing ſuch bill, becauſe the houſe could always order all parties petitioning to be heard at one time, and could give ſuch directions, that it would never take up many days to hear every thing that could be objected by every one of the parties petitioning: that though every part of the nation had their repreſentatives in that houſe, yet it was very well known, that ſpeaking in public was not the talent of every man; from whence it might happen that the particular perſons or part of the nation which was then to be aggrieved by what was paſſing in the houſe, might not have any ſuch members as were proper to lay their caſe fully and clearly before the houſe; and that therefore, even as to money-bills, it was proper to admit parties to be heard againſt them, when it appeared that they were very particularly intereſted therein.

But as to the caſe then before them, there was not the leaſt pretence for refuſing the deſire of the petition; becauſe the bill againſt which it was preſented, was no money-bill; on the contrary, it was even inſiſted on by the advocates for it, as one of the greateſt arguments in its favour, that there was no new duties to be impoſed; it was a bill only for altering the method of collecting the taxes already impoſed; and therefore it could never be pretended that there was any practice or cuſtom of the houſe to refuſe parties intereſted to be heard againſt ſuch a bill: that if there had been ſuch a cuſtom introduced, it ought not to be obſerved, eſpecially when ſuch a conſiderable body as the lord-lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London came with an humble petition to be heard againſt the bill, which they thought would not only be highly injurious to them in particular, but deſtructive to the trade and commerce of the whole nation.

In this debate there were many precedents brought by Mr. Sandys, Mr. Gibbons, and Mr. Bootle, where the houſe had received petitions, and admitted counſel to be heard againſt many bills; and there were likewiſe precedents brought by ſir William Young, and Mr. Winnington, where the ſame had been refuſed, the reading of which took up a great part of the day.

After the debate had laſted ſome time, upon putting the queſtion for allowing the petitioners to be heard by their counſel againſt the bill, there was a diviſion, and the queſtion had a negative put upon it, two hundred and fourteen againſt one hundred and ninety-ſeven: after which it was ordered, that the petition ſhould lie upon the table until the ſaid bill ſhould be read a ſecond time.

The ſtrain in which the petition of the city of London was drawn up, could not fail of having great effect with the public, eſpecially as it was ſeconded by others, in the like ſtyle, from Briſtol and all the capital towns in the kingdom. The truth is, the minds of the people were wrought up to ſuch a pitch of fury and reſentment, as threatened little leſs than a general rebellion. While the bill was depending with the commons, the houſe was ſurrounded with ſuch immenſe crouds of people, and theſe too ſo noiſy and riotous, that it was at the imminent hazard of their lives that any who favoured the ſcheme could either enter or come out. This occaſioned ſir Robert Walpole to conclude a ſpeech he made in the courſe of the debate with the following remarkable, though unguarded, expreſſions. After having declared, that he did not look upon the clamours without doors againſt the ſcheme, to be the voice of the nation, "Gentlemen (continued he) may ſay what they pleaſe, of the multitudes now at the door, and in the avenues leading to this houſe: they may call them a modeſt multitude, if they will; but, whatever temper they were in when they came hither, it may be very much altered now, after having waited ſo long at our door: it may be a very eaſy matter for ſome deſigning ſeditious perſon to raiſe a tumult and diſorder among them; and when tumults are once begun, no man knows where they will end: he is a greater man than any I know in the nation, that could with the ſame eaſe appeaſe them; for this reaſon I muſt think, that it was neither prudent nor regular to uſe any methods for bringing ſuch multitudes to this place, under any pretence whatever: gentlemen may give them what name they think fit: it may be ſaid, that they come hither as humble ſupplicants; but I know whom the law calls ſturdy beggars, and thoſe who brought them down hither could not be certain, that they might not have behaved in the ſame manner."

It is hardly to be expreſſed how great a ferment this part of the miniſter's ſpeech threw the houſe into; it was with much difficulty they could be brought into ſuch a temper as to be able to reſume the debate: at length ſir John Barnard ſtood up, and ſaid, that merchants of character had an undoubted right to come down to the Court of Requeſts and lobby of the houſe of commons, in order to ſolicit their friends and acquaintance againſt any ſcheme or project which they might think prejudicial to their commerce; that when he came to the houſe he ſaw none but ſuch as deſerved the appellation of Sturdy Beggars as little as the honourable gentleman himſelf, or any gentleman whatever; that it was well known, that the city of London was ſufficiently apprized of what was that day to come before the houſe: where they got their information he knew not; but he was very certain, that they had a right notion of the ſcheme which had now been opened; and they were ſo generally and zealouſly bent againſt it, that whatever methods might have been uſed to call them hither, he was ſure it would have been impoſſible to have found any legal methods to have prevented their coming thither.

Although the power of the miniſter was then very great, tho' he had the ſucceſs of this ſcheme very much at heart, and tho' there was no doubt that, had he puſhed it, he might have got the bill paſſed into a law: yet, obſerving that the whole nation was now alarmed, and beginning to be in fear of his life, he thought proper to drop the deſign, by moving the next day, April 11, when the bill was about to be read the ſecond time, that ſuch ſecond reading might be poſtponed to the twelfth day of June next. Though by this motion it evidently appeared that the bill was to be dropped, yet ſome gentlemen, who had from the beginning appeared ſtrenuouſly againſt the whole ſcheme, were not ſatisfied with letting it drop in ſo eaſy a manner, and therefore they were for having it rejected; but this propoſition did not come to a motion, much leſs to the queſtion, ſo that the firſt motion was agreed to without oppoſition; and upon the Friday after, which was the day appointed for the houſe to reſolve itſelf into a committee of the whole houſe, to conſider farther of the moſt proper methods for the better ſecurity and improvement of the duties and revenues then charged upon and made payable from tobacco and wines, it was reſolved, that the houſe would, upon the fourteenth day of June next, reſolve itſelf into the ſaid committee: ſo that part of the ſcheme which related to the duties upon wine was never laid before the houſe.

Such was the concluſion of a project, which the populace was taught to believe threatened no leſs than the utter extinction of their liberties and properties; but which, ſince the rage of party has ſubſided, has been conſidered by many ſenſible and experienced perſons in a more favourable light; nay, the moſt exceptionable parts of this project have, though in another ſhape, been ſince paſſed into a law, and that too at the requeſt and application of thoſe very perſons who were moſt forward in oppoſing the meaſure.

However, the miſcarriage of the bill was, at the time we are ſpeaking of, celebrated with public rejoicings in London and Weſtminſter; the Monument was illuminated, and the miniſter burned in effigy by the populace.

There having been great crowds of people about the houſe of commons on the eleventh of April, and ſome of them having behaved in a very tumultuous manner, the next day complaint was made to the houſe, by ſeveral members who had voted in in favour of the ſcheme, "That a tumultuous crowd of people had aſſembled the night before, and ſeveral days during the ſeſſion, in the Court of Requeſts and other avenues to that houſe, and that they themſelves, and ſeveral other members of the houſe, had been laſt night, in their return from the houſe, menaced, inſulted, and aſſaulted, by a tumultuous crowd of people in the paſſages to the houſe *." Whereupon it was ordered and declared, nemine contradicente, "I. That the aſſaulting, inſulting, or menacing any member of that houſe, in his coming to or going from that houſe, or upon account of his behaviour in parliament, was an high infringement of the privilege of that houſe, a moſt outrageous and dangerous violation of the rights of parliament, and an high crime and miſdemeanor. II. That the aſſembling and coming of any number of perſons, in a riotous, tumultuous, and diſorderly manner, to that houſe, in order either to hinder or promote the paſſing of any bill, or other matters, depending before that houſe, was an high infringement of the privilege of that houſe, was deſtructive of the freedom and conſtitution of parliament, and an high crime and miſdemeanor. III. That the inciting and encouraging any number of perſons to come in a riotous, tumultuous, and diſorderly manner, to that houſe, in order either to hinder or promote the paſſing of any bill, or other matter depending before that houſe, was an high infringement of the privilege of the houſe, deſtructive of the freedom and conſtitution of parliament, and an high crime and miſdemeanor."

Then it was ordered, "I. That the members of that houſe who ſerved for the city of London ſhould ſignify the ſame to the lord-mayor of London. II. That the members of that houſe who ſerved for the county of Middleſex, ſhould ſignify the ſaid reſolutions and declarations to the ſheriff of Middleſex. III. That the members of that houſe, who ſerved for the city of Weſtminſter, ſhould ſignify the ſaid reſolutions to the high-bailiff of Weſtminſter." Which orders were accordingly ſignified by their reſpective members, who next day reported their having done ſo to the houſe †.

After the miſcarriage of the exciſe-ſcheme, the houſe unanimouſly reſolved to enquire into the frauds and abuſes in the cuſtoms, and a committee of twenty-one members was choſen by ballot for this purpoſe. The ſubſequent debates of this ſeſſion were occaſioned by a bill to prevent the infamous practice of ſtock-jobbing, which with great difficulty made its way to the houſe of lords, who made ſome amendments, in conſequence of which it was laid aſide; and by another bill, eſtabliſhing a lottery to raiſe five hundred thouſand pounds, for the relief of thoſe who had ſuffered by the Charitable Corporation. After having undergone ſome alterations, it paſſed through both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

His majeſty having at this time determined for ſome wiſe reaſons of ſtate, to beſtow his eldeſt daughter, the princeſs royal, upon the prince of Orange, he ſent a meſſage to the commons, on the eighth of May, acquainting them with the ſame. He ſaid, he made no doubt that this match would be acceptable to all his good ſubjects, and therefore promiſed himſelf the aſſiſtance and concurrence of the houſe in enabling him to give ſuch a portion to his eldeſt daughter, as ſhould be ſuitable to the preſent occaſion, and might contribute towards ſupporting with honour and dignity an alliance that would tend ſo much to the farther ſecurity of the proteſtant ſucceſſion on the throne of theſe realms, and the farther ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt on the continent of Europe.

In reply to this meſſage, the commons returned a moſt warm and affectionate addreſs, and immediately voted, that out of the money ariſing from the ſale of lands in the iſland of St. Chriſtopher's, his majeſty ſhould be empowered to apply the ſum of eighty thouſand pounds as a marriage-portion for his eldeſt daughter.

The laſt affair in this ſeſſion which engaged the attention of the commons, was a queſtion concerning the conſtitution of their houſe. Lieutenant-general Wade, member for Bath, had been appointed governor of Fort William, Fort George, and Auguſtus, in Scotland; the point therefore in diſpute was, whether his accepting thoſe offices had vacated his ſeat in parliament? The anticourtiers were ſtrenuous in maintaining the affirmative; and in ſupport of their opinion they produced a number of precedents, and then moved, "That the accepting a commiſſion of governor or lieutenant-governor of any fort, citadel, or garriſon, upon the military eſtabliſhment of Great Britain, by any member of the houſe who was an officer of the army, ſhould vacate his ſeat as member of parliament." The queſtion, however, being put, was carried by the court, ninety-ſix againſt eighteen; and this determination has been regarded as deciſive of all ſucceeding caſes of the like nature.

Several warm attacks were made on the miniſter in the houſe of peers, during the courſe of this ſeſſion; particularly on the thirtieth of May, a motion was made to reſolve, "That it is the opinion of this houſe, that the produce of the ſinking fund ſhould be applied for the future towards reducing ſuch taxes as are moſt grievous to the ſubject, oppreſſive to the manufacturer, or detrimental to trade." This motion occaſioned a long and warm debate, in which all the arguments which have been already recited for taking money from the ſinking fund, were repeated, as alſo thoſe againſt it. The lords, however, which ſupported this motion (amongſt whom the lords Carteret and Bathurſt diſtinguiſhed themſelves) ſaid, that a great difference lay between the intereſt of the creditors of the public and the intereſt of the nation; for though the former might find it for their intereſt not to draw their money out of the public funds, yet it never could be the intereſt of the nation that taxes ſhould be perpetuated, which muſt be the caſe, if the money of the ſinking fund continued to be alienated. In reply to this, the lords of the court-party ſaid, that the taking money from the ſinking fund was in fact no alienation of it from the purpoſes of its firſt eſtabliſhment, and that the intereſt of the nation could not be more effectually conſulted, than by eaſing the landed intereſt, which was done by applying part of the money of the ſinking fund to the ſervice of the current year. The motion being rejected, among other reaſons, for being a motion for a reſolution very improper for a houſe of peers to come to, a ſtrong proteſt was entered by eighteen lords, in which they very clearly and impartially ſtated all that had been urged for the motion; but the moſt remarkable was the cloſe of the proteſt, and which was directly levelled at the miniſter. It ran thus:

* The miniſter in particular, in his coming to and returning from the houſe, had been inſulted in the moſt outrageous manner; and at one time his life was ſaved by Mr. Cunningham, a Scotch member, who had the courage to draw his ſword and keep off the rabble till his friend eſcaped: for which ſeaſonable piece of ſervice his majeſty rewarded him with the government of Jamaica.

"We inſiſt with great earneſtneſs and concern on this point, from our obſervation of what has lately paſſed on the occaſion of attempts being made to extend the cruel and arbitrary methods practiſed under the laws of exciſe, and naturally and neceſſarily, as we apprehend, flowing from them. If any new law of this kind has paſſed elſewhere, we perſuade ourſelves it could not have prevailed in this houſe: but we think it the more incumbent upon us, after ſuch an attempt, and ſuch national reſentment expreſſed againſt it (both which are of public notoriety), to promote as effectually as we are able, the quiet and happineſs of his majeſty's reign, by cutting off any hopes or fears which may be ſtill entertained, that ſuch a project will ſome time or other ſucceed; and to this good and laudable end we conceive, that nothing would have contributed more, than ſuch a ſolemn declaration of the ſenſe of this houſe, as is contained in the queſtion."

The affairs of the South Sea company were at this time run into great diſorder: the lords of the oppoſition moved, and carried their motion, that the directors of that company ſhould lay an account of the produce of the forfeited eſtates which had belonged to the former directors, who had been mulcted by the parliament. From this it appeared, that the large ſums of money ariſing from thoſe forfeited eſtates had been diſtributed among the proprietors by way of dividend, even before recourſe was had to parliament for directions in what manner that produce ſhould be applied. Lord Bathurſt therefore moved for a reſolution of the houſe, that the diſpoſal of this money by way of dividend, without any order of a general court for that purpoſe, was a violation of the act of parliament made for the diſpoſal thereof, and a manifeſt injuſtice done to the proprietors of that ſtock. This motion, however, was defeated by a majority of members in the court intereſt; and then the houſe ordered, that the preſent and former directors of the South Sea company, together with the late inſpectors of their accounts, ſhould attend and be examined. They were accordingly interrogated; but as no direct proof could be eſtabliſhed of any embezzlement, and as the diſcuſſion of the matter would have been attended with more bad than good conſequences, the majority thought proper to poſtpone the ſcrutiny *. A bill, however, paſſed, for converting a farther part of the capital ſtock of the South Sea company into annuities, redeemable by parliament.

The perſecution againſt the proteſtants in Germany, particularly the Saltzburghers, ſtill reigning, it was thought, by many of the public-ſpirited gentlemen concerned in the ſcheme for ſettling the colony of Georgia, that it would be good policy to grant thoſe unhappy people an aſylum in the Britiſh dominions in America, particularly in that infant colony, which, through the indefatigable pains of Mr Oglethorpe, wore a very promiſing aſpect: a petition was accordingly preſented to parliament for that purpoſe, who were pleaſed to give encouragement to the propoſal, and even to grant ten thouſand pounds to the truſtees, out of the ſale of the lands in the iſland of St. Chriſtopher's, for carrying it into execution.

On the eleventh of June, the public buſineſs being by that time all diſpatched, the king put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſhort but ſevere ſpeech againſt the authors of the heats and animoſities that had been lately ſpread through the nation.

It is by no means foreign to this hiſtory, to obſerve, that this ſame year, 1733, a new and moſt laudable corporation was erected for promoting Engliſh proteſtant working ſchools in Ireland. Mr. Anderſon, author of the Origin of Commerce, tells us, that he having been at this time ſomewhat uſeful in correſponding with Dr. Maule, then biſhop of Dromore, for promoting the charter of the corporation, received from that biſhop the following well vouched account of the number of people, both proteſtants and papiſts, in all Ireland; a matter ſufficiently curious to claim a place in the body of this work.

By the biſhop's books, and other authentic vouchers, it appeared that there were at leaſt two millions of people in that iſland, of which there are very near ſix hundred thouſand proteſtants, and ſomewhat above one million four hundred thouſand papiſts, or nearly five papiſts to two proteſtants. The following is a liſt of the total of both religions in the four great diviſions, called provinces, of Ireland, viz.

old marſhal Schomberg, ſaid, "This iſland is well worth fighting for."

We are now to attend foreign affairs. The court of Spain, this year, fell upon a project for erecting an Eaſt India company for trading to the Philippine Iſlands directly from Cadiz, by the Cape of Good Hope; and although it concerned all the other European nations trading to India, yet it more eſpecially concerned the Dutch to oppoſe it, as it was directly contrary to the latter part of the Vth article of the treaty of Munſter, anno 1648, between Spain and them; and as the ſame article had been lately ſucceſsfully made uſe of againſt the Oſtend company of the Spaniſh or Auſtrian Netherlands, it might be yet more ſtrongly oppoſed to the erection of this new company, viz. "Moreover it is ſtipulated and agreed, that the Spaniards ſhall confine their navigation in the Eaſt Indies in ſuch manner as it is at preſent poſſeſſed by them, without having it in their power to extend the ſame any farther. As alſo the inhabitants of the Netherlands ſhall abſtain from frequenting thoſe places which belong to the Caſtilians in the Eaſt Indies." Now the Eaſt India trade, as then poſſeſſed by Spain, was practiſed ſolely from New Spain to the Philippines, and back to the port of Acapulco; but no Eaſt India trade at all from Spain by the way of the Cape of Good Hope: wherefore the Dutch at this time moſt juſtly and zealouſly, and in the end effectually, oppoſed ſo palpable a contravention of that treaty. But it is probable I may have occaſion to mention this ſubject again, and therefore ſhall at preſent ſay no more of it.

On the fifth of Febuary this year (1733) died Auguſtus II. king of Poland, whoſe death opened a new and dreadful ſcen of war in Europe, the neighbouring princes intereſting themſelves ſtrongly in the choice of a new ſovereign. The elector of Saxony, ſon to the late monarch, and Staniſlaus, whoſe daughter was married to the French king, declared themſelves candidates. The emperor, the czarina, and the king of Pruſſia eſpouſed the cauſe of the Saxon: it was natural for the king of France to ſupport the pretenſions of his father-in-law; and no ſooner was he informed that the emperor had aſſembled a body of forces in Sileſia, than he ordered the duke of Berwick to advance to the Rhine with a numerous army, and take meaſures for entering Germany, in caſe the Imperialiſts ſhould attempt to penetrate into Poland, on the frontiers of which they, and a large body of Ruſſian troops, were now hovering.

In the mean time Staniſlaus, who was ſtill at the court of France, found means to tranſport himſelf privately into Warſaw, the capital of Poland, where he continued undiſcovered till he found it for his intereſt to appear in public. As the day of election drew nigh, the Ruſſian and Pruſſian miniſters delivered their ſeveral declarations, by way of proteſt, againſt the eventual election of Staniſlaus, as a proſcribed perſon, and one rendered for ever incapable of wearing the crown.

About the middle of Auguſt, the Ruſſian general Laſci entered Poland, at the head of fifty thouſand men: the diet of the election was opened with the uſual ceremony. Prince Winozawiſki, chief of the Saxon intereſt, retired to the other ſide of the Viſtula (or Wiezer) with three thouſand men, including ſome of the nobility who adhered to the party of Auguſtus. The primate of Poland, who always acts as regent during an interreghum, endeavoured to reconcile all differences among the grandees, in order to proceed peaceably to the new election: Staniſlaus was unanimouſly choſen king, and appeared in the electoral field, where he was received with loud acclamations. Auguſtus's party proteſted againſt the election, and, being now increaſed to ten thouſand men, they joined the Ruſſian army, which had advanced by haſty marches. Staniſlaus, ſenſible of his inability to withſtand ſuch powerful enemies, retired, with the primate and French ambaſſador, to Denmark, leaving the palatine of Kiow at Warſaw. This general attacked the Saxon palace, which was inſtantly ſurrendered, and the ſoldiers and inhabitants plundered the houſes belonging to the grandees who had declared for Auguſtus, as likewiſe the hotel of the Ruſſian ambaſſador.

While theſe tranſactions paſſed, the Poles, who had joined the Muſcovites, finding it impoſſible to paſs the Viſtula before the expiration of the time fixed for the ſeſſion of the diet, erected a colo, or great council, at Cracow, where the elector of Saxony was choſen, and proclaimed by the biſhop of that place, king of Poland, by the name of Auguſtus III. on the ſixth day of October. The two armies then croſſed the river, and the palatine of Kiow retiring towards Cracow, they took poſſeſſion of Warſaw, where, in their turn, they plundered the palaces and houſes belonging to the oppoſite party.

Mean while the French king, incenſed at the part the emperor had acted againſt his father-in-law, entered into a treaty with the courts of Madrid and Turin, by which they agreed jointly to declare war againſt the emperor. Theſe three powers had their reſpective intereſts, but they all concurred in one view, namely, the weakening the houſe of Auſtria.

The dukes of Savoy had been a long time gradually encreaſing their dominions, by ſometimes aſſiſting the emperors, and ſometimes declaring againſt them. The king of Sardinia, Charles Emanuel, hoped to procure the duchy of Milan, and it had been promiſed him both by the miniſters of Verſailles and Madrid. Philip V. king of Spain, or rather Elizabeth of Parma, his conſort, aſpired at more conſiderable eſtabliſhments for the royal offspring than Parma and Placentia. Lewis XV. ſought to aggrandize his own glory by pulling down his enemies. Never was negociation more ſpeedily concluded, than that which united theſe three monarchs, and Europe was now filled with manifeſtoes by all the parties at variance.

England could not declare herſelf without the concurrence of the United Provinces; and that cautious republic ſhewed no great readineſs to launch into an expenſive and ruinous war, merely for the ſake of ſupporting the emperor's quarrel. In vain did the Imperial miniſters ſolicit, with the greateſt earneſtneſs, both our court and the States-general, to take the moſt ſpeedy and vigorous meaſures to prevent their ally from being cruſhed by the power of his enemies, and the ballance of power in Europe thereby utterly disjointed: we both ſtood by, unconcerned ſpectators of the rapid progreſs of the French, who paſſed the Rhine in the month of October, under the duke of Berwick, and laid ſiege to Fort Kehl, which he ſoon reduced; while another body of French forces, under marſhal Villars, Villars, joined by the king of Sardinia, ſubdued Pavia, Pizzighitone, Cremona, Secco, Frezzo, with the fort of Fuentez; and not long after marſhal de Villars ended a glorious career, at the age of eighty-two, after having reduced the important city of Milan.

The emperor, dreading the effects of ſuch a powerful confederacy againſt him, offered to accommodate all differences with the crown of Spain, under the mediation of the king of England; and Mr. Keene, the Britiſh miniſter at the court of Madrid, made propoſals for that purpoſe. Philip expreſſed his acknowlegements to the king of England; but declared that the emperor's advances came too late, and that his own reſolutions were already taken. In the mean time he ſent a powerful army into Italy, under the duke of Montemar, who reduced the whole kingdom of Naples, which was beſtowed upon the infant don Carlos, who had already been acknowleged hereditary prince of Tuſcany. Thus did the emperor Charles VI. loſe almoſt all Italy, by giving a king to Poland; and a ſon of the king of Spain obtained, in two campaigns, the Two Sicilies, which had been ſo often before taken and retaken, and had been the conſtant objects of the attention of the houſe of Auſtria for above two centuries. All this time the other potentates of Europe looked on without intermeddling: the Venetians declared they would take no ſhare in the war in Italy; the Dutch ſoon entered into a neutrality with France; and we, in concert with thoſe ſtates, employed ourſelves in mediations, inſtead of affording the deſired aſſiſtance.

On the ſeventh of November, this year, his ſerene highneſs the prince of Orange arrived, in the Fubbs yacht, at Greenwich; proceeded, in one of the king's barges, to the Tower, and from thence, in one of his majeſty's coaches, to Somerſet-houſe; and the next day was received by the royal family with the greateſt reſpect. Soon after his highneſs was taken ill, which retarded his marriage for ſome time.

Not long after the riſing of the parliament, the court party loſt one of its ableſt advocates in the earl of Cheſterfield, who, being diſguſted at the conduct of the miniſter, reſigned his place of ſteward of his majeſty's houſhold. The duke of Montroſe relinquiſhed his office of lord privy-ſeal of Scotland; and his example was followed by lord Clinton, one of the lords of his majeſty's bed-chamber, and lord-lieutenant of the county of Devon. About the ſame time the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham were deprived of their poſts in the army. Theſe removals and reſignations gave great uneaſineſs to the public, which was, however, in ſome meaſure allayed by ſome promotions in the law, which were univerſally agreeable. Mr. Talbot, ſolicitor-general, one of the moſt accompliſhed lawyers and upright judges in the kingdom, was conſtituted lord high chancellor of Great Britain, and created baron Talbot of Henſoll; ſir Philip Yorke, attorney-general, was advanced to the office of lord chief-juſtice of the court of King's Bench, and honoured with a peerage, by the title of lord Hardwicke: the place of ſolicitor-general was then beſtowed on Mr. (afterwards ſir) Dudley Ryder, and that of attorney-general on Mr. (afterwards ſir) John Willes.

The year 1733 was diſtinguiſhed by the death of many perſons of high rank: George Byng, lord viſcount Torrington, ſo famous for the defeat he gave the Spaniards in 1718, died on the ſeventeenth of January, and was ſucceeded by ſir Charles Wager as firſt lord of the admiralty: on the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month died the earl of Pembroke, who had gone through the greateſt offices of ſtate ſince the Revolution: on the nineteenth of March died lord Raymond, lord chief-juſtice of the King's Bench: on the ſeventh of May died the earl of Cholmondeley; and in October died Henrietta, the young ducheſs of Marlborough, by which that title devolved to her ſiſter's ſon, the earl of Sunderland; and about the ſame time the ducheſs of Ormond departed this life.

This year, indeed, was uſhered in with an epidemic diſorder, much like a cold, which attacked all ſorts of people, and proved fatal to great numbers, particularly thoſe in years, inſomuch that in one week, the laſt in January, the Weekly Bills were at the amazing height of fifteen hundred and eighty-eight, being more by ſix hundred than had died in any one week ſince the great plague.

It may not be altogether uſeleſs to remark, that his majeſty having, in the courſe of this year, by proclamation, prohibited the paſſing or circulating of the old and much worn-out gold coins of the realm, of twenty-five and twenty-three ſhillings, commonly called Broad Pieces, and the halves and quarters thereof, he alſo, for the eaſe of his people, directed his receivers of taxes, and alſo the officers of his mint, to receive them at four pounds one ſhilling per ounce troy, during one whole year; and that ſuch of them as ſhould be ſo brought to the mint, ſhould be coined into the modern current gold coins of the kingdom. But it being apprehended that the advantage of ſo good an allowance as four pounds one ſhilling per ounce might be a temptation for bad perſons to counterfeit the ſaid old coins, a law was paſſed afterwards, making ſuch a practice high-treaſon, and forty pounds reward was offered to ſuch as ſhould diſcover the counterfeiters thereof.

On the 17th of January, 1734, the parliament met, and the ſeſſion was opened with a ſpeech from the throne as uſual, in which, among other things, his majeſty told the two houſes, "That though he was no way concerned in the war which had broke out in Europe, except by the good offices he had employed among the contending powers, he could not remain an idle ſpectator of the preſent events, or be indifferent about the conſequences of a war undertaken and ſupported by ſuch a powerful confederacy. He ſaid, he had thought proper to take time to examine the facts alledged on both ſides, and to wait the reſult of the councils of thoſe powers which were more immediately intereſted in the conſequences of the rupture. He declared he would concert with his allies, more particularly with the States-general of the United Provinces, ſuch meaſures as ſhould be thought moſt adviſeable for the common ſafety, and for reſtoring the peace of Europe; that he ſhould order the eſtimates to be laid before them, of ſuch ſervices as demanded their preſent and immediate care: that the augmentation, which would be propoſed for the ſea-ſervice, would be very conſiderable; but he was confident, they would think it reaſonable and neceſſary: that he muſt particularly recommend to their care the debt of the navy, which had been every year laid before them; but, from the preſent circum-

ſtances of the times, he believed, they would be perſuaded, that it now required ſome proviſion to be made for it; a thing that could not well be longer poſtponed, without manifeſt detriment to the public ſervice: that, as theſe extraordinary charges and expences were unavoidable, he made no doubt but they would effectually raiſe the ſupplies neceſſary for defraying them, with that readineſs and diſpatch, and with that juſt regard to the true intereſt of his people, which this parliament had hitherto ſhewn upon all occaſions: that he hoped they would proceed in all their deliberations with ſuch temper and unanimity, and ſuch expedition in the public buſineſs, as might give him the ſooner an opportunity of taking the ſenſe of a new parliament: that he flattered himſelf his preſent reſolutions would meet with their hearty concurrence and approbation; and, whatever inſinuations might be thrown out againſt the conduct of the government, he was confident a little time would effectually remove all groundleſs jealouſies, and make it appear, that Great Britain ought always to act that part which the honour and intereſt of the nation called upon it to undertake."

The motion for an addreſs of thanks produced, as uſual, a debate in both houſes, which, it muſt be confeſſed, appears to have proceeded more from a ſpirit of contradiction and cavilling, than from any reaſonable cauſe of objection.

On the twenty-third of January the commons agreed to addreſs his majeſty for a copy of the treaty of Vienna in 1731, with the ſecret and ſeparate articles, and the States-general's act of concurrence; and on the ſame day ſir John Ruſhout moved for another addreſs, deſiring that the letters and inſtructions relating to the execution of the treaty of Seville ſhould be ſubmitted to the inſpection of the commons.

This motion introduced a long and violent debate. Sir W. Yonge obſerved, that the treaty of Seville being prior to that of Vienna, letters and inſtructions relating to the former could have no connection or concern with the latter: that nothing could be more improper than to call for papers which might reveal the nature of any negotiation that was then upon the carpet: that nevertheleſs, if the houſe ſhould think fit to take the treaty of Seville under their conſideration, it might then be proper to call for any particular paper that might give light to their deliberations; but if they want to confine their preſent enquiries to the treaty of Vienna, the motion now made was altogether improper.

Sir W. Wyndham on the contrary declared it his opinion, that the impoſſibility of carrying the treaty of Seville into execution had given riſe to the ſtipulations contained in the treaty of Vienna; and that they could not pretend to judge of the propriety of the latter, without having the papers that related to the former laid before the houſe.

After a hard ſtruggle this motion was overruled; but the oppoſition, far from being diſcouraged by this defeat, reſolved to return to the attack with double vigour. Accordingly, on the twenty-fifth day of January, Mr. Sandys, a gentleman who had for ſome time appeared ſtrenuous in the oppoſition, and had a ſurpriſing perſeverance in wrangling, moved, that the houſe ſhould examine the inſtructions which had been ſent to the Britiſh miniſter in Poland ſome years before the death of king Auguſtus, that they might be the better able to judge of the cauſes which produced this new rupture among the powers of Europe. The intention of this motion was to come at the truth of a report which had pretty confidently prevailed, that the Britiſh miniſtry had not only favoured the election of Staniſlaus, but had even entered into a ſecret engagement with France, to aſſiſt her in ſupporting him on the Poliſh throne.

This motion was violently oppoſed by all the court-party, and inſiſted on with no leſs vehemence by thoſe in the oppoſition. In the debate the ſeveral ſpeakers gave into the moſt unwarrantable and ungentleman-like perſonalities, the repetition of which would diſgrace a national hiſtory; and they were carried on both ſides ſo far, that the ſpeaker was obliged to inform the gentlemen, that they had loſt ſight of the queſtion, which he again read. Then ſir W. Wyndham, who was always decent and parliamentary, ſtood up to ſupport Mr. Sandys's motion by clear argumentation. He began by obſerving, that this motion implied no diſreſpect to his majeſty, but only tended to canvaſs the conduct of the miniſter, and that the papers called for might be neceſſary for that effect: that this he ſaid, in order to obviate the arguments that might poſſibly be urged in favour of the miniſtry, as if the motion was unneceſſary and diſreſpectful, becauſe his majeſty at the opening of the parliament had told them, that he was in no wiſe engaged in the war, and had no concern except by his good offices in thoſe tranſactions, which had been declared to be the principal cauſes and motives of the rupture: that, in a conſtitutional ſenſe, the ſpeech of the king was to be conſidered as the ſpeech of the miniſter; and that the houſe had even a right to enquire, whether his majeſty's declarations were or were not agreeable to truth: that it was well known the States-general had concluded a treaty of neutrality, without the knowlege or conſent of England; a circumſtance which ſeemed to imply a diſtruſt of the Britiſh power, or at leaſt a ſuſpicion that they could not with ſafety place any confidence in the councils of the Britiſh miniſtry.

Sir Robert Walpole ſtood up in perſon to anſwer this gentleman, and refute his allegations. He ſaid, he did not deny that the king's ſpeech was to be conſidered as the ſpeech of the miniſter; but ſtill he thought it ought to be treated with decency, as it was ſtamped with the ſanction of his majeſty's name; and that in any event it was both unjuſt and unparliamentary to arraign it of falſehood, without producing any one charge againſt it, except ſuch as were founded on bare ſurmiſes and vain ſuppoſitions. He took notice, that all the late motions about papers were calculated to plunge the nation precipitately into war in a quarrel and at a conjuncture when there was no great occaſion to deliberate. "I believe, continued he, it will appear that our preſent ſituation is one of the very beſt that the nation could poſſibly be in, with relation to the preſent poſture of the affairs of Europe. The gentleman who ſpoke laſt thought proper to mention the ſtates of Holland, and to affirm they have done ſomething for their own ſecurity: it is true they have done ſomething; they have entered into a treaty of neutrality, whereas we have remained entirely inactive; but on that very very account I look upon the Engliſh to be in a much better condition than the Dutch: by that neutrality they have engaged not to act at all, nor to concern themſelves in the preſent war: we are ſtill at liberty, and may on any event take that part which ſhall then appear moſt for the intereſt of Great Britain."

In the courſe of the debate Mr. Pulteney reflected on the ſcandalous deciſions, as he called them, of the majorities in parliament, and inveighed with great ſeverity againſt the majority who had rejected the two late motions, and whom, he ſuppoſed, were influenced and directed by the miniſter. This charge, added to the aſſertions which were daily advanced with the utmoſt confidence, in the legion of pamphlets and papers which at this time ſwarmed throughout the nation, that every member who voted for the miniſter was a mercenary hireling, and ſold his voice for the ſake of place or penſion, in poſſeſſion or expectancy, made ſir Robert think it neceſſary to ſeize this occaſion to exculpate himſelf and his friends from ſo black a charge. This he endeavoured to do in a ſpeech, from which I ſhall here give the reader an extract, by way of ſpecimen of this great man's talent for oratory.

"An honourable gentleman, ſir, who ſpoke ſome time ago, took indeed a great deal of liberty in talking of majorities; but I would have gentlemen to know, that when they talk of ſuch majorities at preſent, they ſpeak of their equals as members of this houſe, of their equals on any ground in England: let gentlemen but caſt their eyes round the houſe, and they will find a number of gentlemen ſuperior to the higheſt number of their minority, who can as little be ſuſpected of corruption, as any of thoſe who generally appear on the minority of the queſtion.

"It is eaſy for gentlemen to repreſent the meaſures lately taken by the government, as unwiſe, inconſiſtent, and the like; but when the day comes for enquiring into them, which I as heartily wiſh for as any in this houſe, I believe thoſe meaſures will appear in a quite different light; and thoſe gentlemen who may, perhaps, have hearkened to every little whiſper of ſome of the foreign miniſters at this court, which is, I believe, the only foundation for what they have aſſerted, will find themſelves at laſt ſorely diſappointed. Whenever ſuch an enquiry ſhall be reſolved on, I doubt not but the majority of this houſe will agree to call for every paper that can be thought neceſſary for giving a full information of the preſent ſtate of the nation: but this is not the queſtion at preſent, nor are we now to enquire, whether his majeſty has had any ſhare in thoſe tranſactions which have given occaſion to the preſent war; and therefore, I cannot think we have, at preſent, any thing to do with any inſtructions to his majeſty's miniſters in Poland, or elſewhere.

"His majeſty, it is true, expects the aſſiſtance of his parliament; but for what? He does not immediately expect ſuch an aſſiſtance as to enable him to take any part in the preſent war; he wants only ſuch as may enable him to put the nation in a proper poſture of defence; and ſurely we may determine what will be neceſſary for that end, without enquiring into any of our foreign negotiations. It is for this reaſon, ſir, that I think the houſe has done right in rejecting all the motions hitherto made for letters and inſtructions relating to our foreign affairs; and for the ſame reaſon, I make no doubt but they will likewiſe reject the preſent motion."

After theſe and ſome other ſpeeches the queſtion was put, when the motion was overpowered by the majority; and this was the fate of ſeveral other propoſals made by the members of the oppoſition. Sir John Barnard preſented a petition from the druggiſts, and other dealers in tea, complaining of the inſults and oppreſſion to which they were ſubjected by the exciſe laws, and praying relief. Sir John and Mr. Perry, another of the city members, explained the grievous hardſhips which thoſe traders ſuſtained, and moved that the petition might be referred to the conſideration of the whole houſe. They were oppoſed by ſir W. Yonge and Mr. Winnington, and other friends of the miniſter, and very warm debates enſued thereupon; but in the end the minority were baffled, who ſeemed to diſplay the moſt conſummate talents in ſatire, argument, and reaſoning, for no other purpoſe but to add to the triumph of thoſe they oppoſed.

Great debates alſo aroſe about a motion for an addition of one thouſand eight hundred men to the number of land forces which had been continued ſince the preceding year; in which the oppoſition exhibited greater proofs of perſonal animoſity againſt the miniſter than of a real attention to the intereſts of their country, or the ſafety and advantage of the kingdom. The augmentation, however, was carried in deſpite of all their efforts; but they reſolved, in return, to clog the wheels of adminiſtration with every rub they could poſſibly throw in its way. With this view, leſs patriotic than invidious, they laid hold of the diſmiſſion of the duke of Bolton and the lord Cobham from their reſpective regiments, to raiſe a furious outcry againſt the miniſter, as if theſe noblemen had been ſet aſide merely becauſe they had refuſed to concur implicitly with all the court meaſures. On the thirteenth of February the lord Morpeth, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Carliſle, made a motion in the houſe of commons for a bill to prevent the officers of the army from being deprived of their commiſſions, otherwiſe than by the judgment of a court-martial to be held for that purpoſe, or by addreſs of either houſe of parliament. Even the friends of this motion were ſtruck at firſt hearing it, with a ſenſe of the abſurd manner in which it was expreſſed, which indeed tended to little elſe than the eſtabliſhing a ſtratocracy, or abſolute deſpotiſm in the army, as it took from the ſovereign the power of removing from his command even the general of the forces, however dangerous or diſloyal the deſigns or conduct of ſuch general might be: the motion was therefore amended, and reſtricted to "officers not above the rank of colonels." Extravagant as this motion was, it was ſuſtained with great vigour and addreſs by the ableſt ſpeakers among the minority: the noble lord who made it had recourſe, in defending it, to the government of foreign countries, and particularly mentioned the example of Holland and Sweden. In the former country, he ſaid, no officer could be broken without the ſentence of a court-martial; and in the latter none could be removed from his commiſſion without the conſent of the ſenate. He was ſeconded by ſir John Ruſhout, Rushout, who observed, that there were then upwards of forty officers of the army members of that house; and said, that by the house agreeing to the motion, it would effectually secure the independency of those gentlemen upon the minister, which would not a little contribute to the freedom of votes, as well within that house as without, on the occasion of elections. And here it will be proper to hint to the reader, that this was supposed to be the last session of the present parliament; and therefore the anti-courtiers endeavoured to weaken the influence of the minister as much as possible, in order to break the powerful majority which had so long put a negative upon their most favourite motions.

These arguments were answered by Mr. Clutterbuck, colonel Bladon, Mr. Winnington, sir Thomas Robinson, and other gentlemen of the court-party, who all vehemently opposed the motion, which they treated as absurd and extravagant, and the most bare-faced attempt to unhinge the constitution, and introduce a commonwealth, that had ever been made since the commencement of the civil wars under Charles I. Should this motion, they said, be approved, the whole of the British constitution would soon be at the mercy of the army: that at present the officers depended on the king for their commissions, and the army itself upon the parliament for its countenance and pay; but if the parliament should once make the officers independent of the crown, and give them a sort of freehold in their commissions, they would soon make both king and parliament dependent on them: for could it be supposed, that if both king and parliament should be inclinable to make a reduction of the army hereafter, those gentlemen, with swords in their hands, would willingly comply, and retire to their respective habitations at the desire of the commons? Would they not rather tell the commons that their commissions were for life? They were their freehold, made so by a law of the parliament, and that they could not be deprived of them unless they had been guilty of some crime, which could only be determined by a court-martial? and in that case gentlemen might easily guess what redress the nation could expect from a court-martial, every member of which must necessarily be personally interested in opposing the will of king and parliament in the matter of military reduction.

The debate was concluded by sir Robert Walpole, who, after affirming that the motion aimed at reducing the government to a military constitution, said, that he knew great endeavours had been of late used to make it believed abroad, that this was a divided nation, and the people disaffected; and that, should this proposition receive the sanction of the legislature, it would induce foreigners to give credit to what they had heard; for they would naturally infer that the parliament had no confidence in the king, and had therefore taken from him that power which his predecessors enjoyed. This, he observed, might produce a multitude of evils, especially at this juncture; and therefore, he thought, they should all say on this occasion what their forefathers said on another, "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari."

The debate being closed, the question was put, and carried in the negative without a division. The opposition however had another stroke in reserve; for no sooner was the opinion of the house declared on this motion than Mr. Sandys made another for an address to the king, desiring to know who addressed his majesty to remove the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham from their respective regiments. He was seconded by Mr. Pulteney and sir W. Wyndham; but the ministry foreseeing another tedious dispute, called for the question, and the motion was set aside by the majority.

The next source of contention was a bill for securing the freedom of parliament, by limiting the number of officers in the house of commons. It was read a first and a second time; but when a motion was made for its being committed, it met with a strong opposition, and produced a warm debate, which issued in a question that, like the former, underwent a negative.

Many great inconveniencies to commerce, and frequent frauds, having long notoriously prevailed by means of stock-jobbing in the city of London, a bill was brought in to prevent that infamous practice, by prohibiting and rendering void all bargains for stocks bought or sold, for a future time, by persons on one hand not possessed of such stock, and on the other, by many not of circumstances or ability to pay for such stock, whereby many unwary persons, and their innocent families, have been undone. This bill was proposed by the minority, and the passive conduct of the ministry, who suffered it to pass into a law, with little or no opposition, seems in some degree to invalidate a charge generally alleged against sir Robert Walpole, and perhaps too implicitly believed; namely, that the principal part of his income, and that of his family, arose from trading in the stocks; and that, as he was in the secret of affairs both at home and abroad, he made use of his knowlege to influence the funds in the manner he thought most advantageous to himself and his dependents.

But the subject which of all others in the course of this session produced the most violent debates between the two parties, was, a motion made by Mr. Bromley for repealing the act for septennial parliaments.

In support of this motion he alleged, that the reasons for prolonging the sitting of parliaments from three to seven years, were now at an end: that the people in general looked upon septennial parliaments as a grievance and innovation in the constitution: that he begged leave to remind the house of the act made in the sixteenth of Charles II. which wisely provided against the too long continuance of one and the same parliament, by ordaining that a new parliament should be called once in three years, or oftener if need required: that this act was expressly confirmed by the bill of rights: that from the time of the Revolution to the first year of the late king, no parliament had sat above three years, and some only one session: that he thought triennial parliaments were more grievous than annual ones, and consequently septennial parliaments must be doubly more grievous than those which lasted only three years: that supposing he should be mistaken in this point, which nevertheless he could never admit without due conviction, the argument in the preamble to the septennial bill was altogether inapplicable to the present times: the act against bribery and corruption, he said, would necessarily remedy that evil, as it would prevent corruption in the elections; but nothing but the frequent return of new parliaments could prevent it in the elected. In order to effectuate this desirable purpose, he moved, that leave be given to bring in a bill for repealing the septennial act, and for the more frequent meeting and calling of parliaments.

Sir John St. Aubin, knight of the shire for Cornwall, and a gentleman of considerable influence in the house, stood up to second this motion. In the course of his speech he gave an historical detail of the duration of parliaments from the time of Henry VIII. shewed how triennial parliaments came to be lost by the revival of the septennial act; and endeavoured to prove that septennial parliaments were better adapted than triennial ones for the purposes of a wicked minister; and that, in proportion to the frequency of parliaments, they were more advantageous both to the king and people.

These and many other arguments were used in favour of this motion, which was opposed by the whole weight of court influence: the ministry in particular insisted on the great increase of popery and Jacobitism in the kingdom, as a reason against weakening the hands of government at this time: they called upon those on the other side of the question to produce a single instance in which the administration had encroached upon the rights and liberties of the people since the septennial act had taken place; or to shew that his present majesty had ever endeavoured to extend any branch of the royal prerogative beyond its legal bounds.

Sir John Willes, the new attorney-general, made a long and learned speech in favour of septennial parliaments, in which he endeavoured to prove, that the transition from triennial parliaments to septennial was in itself a right measure, and agreeable to the true principles of the English government: nay, he insisted that even the triennial act was not obtained upon the principles of liberty, but merely with design to distress king William and the friends of the Revolution, which, he said, had the effect looked for by the proposers of this alteration, by drawing that monarch into several engagements, equally disadvantageous and disgraceful to him and his people, and were afterwards made a handle by his enemies to depreciate and revile his goverment. With regard to the objection made by some gentlemen, that the elected during a long parliament were apt to lose their dependence on their constituents, a thing which could never happen if parliaments were annual, he begged leave to remark, that although all the members of the house had undoubtedly a dependence upon the people for their election; yet after they were chosen, and had taken their seats in the house, he thought that dependence ceased, at least in so far as regarded their behaviour in parliament, the whole power of the electors then devolving upon the members, who, in every question that came before the house, were to regard only the public good in general, and to determine according to their own judgments; otherwise they could not be said to act freely, nor could such parliaments be called free parliaments.

This doctrine of the independency of members upon their constituents after elections, gave so much offence to sir John Barnard, that he thought proper to answer it in a particular speech, in which he accused the attorney-general of advancing a doctrine altogether new. He declared, that he valued himself more upon the honour of sitting in that house, as one of the representatives of the people, elected such by their free and uncorrupted choice, than he should do on the greatest honours the crown could bestow; and that he thought the dependence he had, and should always acknowlege to have, on his constituents, preferable to any mercenary dependence on the greatest sovereign in the universe. At last, the subject being entirely exhausted, the question was put and carried in the negative by a great majority.

On the twenty-eighth of March sir Robert Walpole delivered a message from the crown to the house of commons, importing, "That as the war which had lately broke out in Europe still continued to rage, his majesty hoped he might be enabled to augment his forces, if such augmentation should be found necessary between the dissolution of this parliament and the election of another." This message, introduced as it were by surprize into the house, at the latter end of a session, when a great many members had retired to their country seats, could not fail of alarming those who thought unfavourably of the minister: they considered it as a stroke aimed at the vitals of our liberties; they made a suitable stand against it; they disputed every inch of the argumentation: nor did they recede till, borne down by the weight of superior numbers, they perceived all farther contest vain. The result was, the voting and presenting an address to his majesty, signifying the compliance of his faithful commons with his royal request. In consequence of another message, the house prepared and passed a bill, impowering his majesty to settle an annuity of five thousand pounds for life on the princess-royal, as a mark of his paternal favour and affection *.

The opposition was carried on with equal ardour in the house of peers as it had been in the house of commons, and with no better success. The leading speakers against the measures of the administration were, the lords Bathurst and Carteret, the earls of Chesterfield and Abingdon. The duke of Marlborough made a motion for a bill to regulate the army, much to the same purpose with that which had been rejected by the commons; and after a warm dispute, it also underwent a negative. The like fate attended a motion made by lord Carteret for an address to his majesty, to acquaint the house by whose advice the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham had been dismissed from their respective commands, and what crimes were laid to their charge to occasion such dismission.

The house of peers were also a good deal busied this session in matters concerning their own body. Those who had framed the act of union had, by an unaccountable oversight, neglected to establish any proper judicatory for trying the validity of any claim to a Scottish peerage, excepting the court of session of Scotland, which many of the English peers thought was an encroachment upon their rights. It was therefore moved to resolve, "That no peer who hath claimed or shall claim right by ſucceſſion to any peerage of Scotland, other than a deſcendant from the body of a peer or peereſs, who has been in poſſeſſion of the peerage claimed ſince the twenty-fifth of April 1690, ſhall be admitted to vote at any election of a peer or peers, to ſit in parliament for that part of Great Britain called Scotland, until his right and title be determined in this houſe." This was certainly a very excellent motion, and it had been greatly to be wiſhed that it could have been complied with; but it was directly repugnant to the articles of union, as well as to the right of ſucceſſion to the peerage in Scotland.

It had been an evil long complained of, and, as ſhould ſeem, with but too good foundation, that the great majority of the Scottiſh repreſentatives, who always voted for the miniſtry, was owing to the exertion of an undue influence in the elections: the lords of the upper houſe therefore made ſeveral attempts to prevent this evil for the future. Among other things, they moved to reſolve, "for the better freedom of the election of a peer or peers to ſit in the parliament of Great Britain on the part of Scotland, that the election ſhall be by way of ballot." This motion, however, being proved contrary to the articles of union, was likewiſe rejected. The anti-courtiers then made another more directly to the purpoſe: it was introduced by the earl of Marchmont, who moved to reſolve, "That it is the opinion of this houſe, that any perſon or perſons taking upon him or them to engage any peer or peers of Scotland, by threats, promiſes of place or penſion, or any reward or gratuity from the crown whatſoever, is an encroachment on the freedom of elections, and highly injurious to the honour of the peerage." This motion was ſupported by the earls of Cheſterfield, Winchelſea, and Stair; the lords Willoughby de Broke, Bathurſt, and Carteret. Theſe were oppoſed by the dukes of Newcaſtle and Argyle, the earls Cholmondeley and Paulet, lord Hervey (now called up by writ to the houſe of peers as baron Hervey of Ickworth) and by the lord-chancellor Talbot. Unexceptionable, and perfectly conſtitutional and abſolutely neceſſary as a law of this kind appeared to be to every candid and impartial perſon; yet as it carried with it too cloſe a reſtriction on miniſterial operations, the motion was rejected upon a previous queſtion (for the main queſtion would not have borne a debate) by a majority of ſeventy-three againſt forty three peers preſent, and of twenty-ſix againſt ſeventeen proxies. A proteſt however was entered in favour of the motion, ſigned by thirty-two peers.

The other debates and proteſts of the peers this ſeſſion turned upon the king's meſſage, demanding a power to augment the forces during the receſs of parliament; as alſo againſt a bill for enabling his majeſty to apply the ſum of one million two hundred thouſand pounds out of the Sinking Fund for the ſervice of the current year. The houſe alſo took under conſideration the ſtate of our American colonies, and the encouraging thoſe manufactures thereof that could no way interfere with the trade of Great Britain, or which may be of uſe to the mother-country.

Purſuant to an order of their lordſhips while deliberating on theſe matters, the lords commiſſioners of trade and plantations laid before the houſe the following repreſentation, exhibiting an exact and curious ſtate of the trade, people, and ſtrength of our ſugar-colonies in the Weſt Indies, which I ſhall here inſert, together with the judicious remarks of that accurate commercial writer Mr. Anderſon.

I. "JAMAICA, though having nineteen pariſhes, had but ſeven thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty-four white people on it, even although its militia conſiſted of three thouſand men, horſe and foot, diſperſed all over the uninhabited part of the iſland. They had ſix forts, and of late had no fewer than eight independent companies of the king's forces, each conſiſting of one hundred men."

Here Mr. Anderſon obſerved, that the diminution of the white people of Jamaica was owing to the great decay of their private or illicit trade to the Spaniſh main, that trade having drawn thither many white people, who made handſome fortunes in a few years, and returned therewith to the mother-country; and thus the Spaniſh money they got in Jamaica did at length center in England. From Jamaica our people privately carried all ſorts of our manufactures, &c. to New Spain, which it is well known can only be legally carried thither by the flota and flotilla from Old Spain. They alſo carried thither great numbers of negroes.

"Our exports to Jamaica, at a medium of four years, from Chriſtmas 1728 to Chriſtmas 1732, were to the value of one hundred and forty-ſeven thouſand ſix hundred and ſeventy-five pounds two ſhillings and three-pence halfpenny; and our imports were five hundred and thirty-nine thouſand four hundred and ninety-nine pounds eighteen ſhillings and three-pence halfpenny: the annual exceſs of our imports from Jamaica is three hundred and ninety-one thouſand eight hundred and twenty-four pounds fifteen ſhillings and elevenpence three farthings.

II. "BARBADOES had eighteen thouſand two hundred and ninety-five white people. Its militia conſiſted of one troop and two regiments of horſe, and of ſeven regiments of foot; in all, four thouſand eight hundred and twelve men. In this iſland are no fewer than twenty-one forts and twenty-ſix batteries, mounted with four hundred and ſixty-three cannon."

All our ſugar iſles together, according to Mr. Anderſon, are thought annually to produce eighty-five thouſand hogſheads of ſugar, each hogſhead containing one thouſand two hundred weight, or in all one million two hundred thouſand cwt. of which Great Britain was thought to conſume annually ſeventy thouſand hogſheads, or ninety-four millions eighty thouſand pounds of ſugar. It is computed that three hundred ſail of ſhips go annually from Great Britain to the ſugar-iſlands (beſides thoſe which go thither from our continent-colonies) and about four thouſand five hundred ſeamen are employed in navigating them; and there is annually exported thither the value of two hundred and forty thouſand pounds in Britiſh manufactures.

III. In all the Britiſh Leeward Iſlands, viz. St. Chriſtopher's, Antigua, Nevis, and Montſerrat, (with their dependencies, Barbuda, Anguilla, Spaniſh-town, Tortoſa, and the reſt of the Virgin Iſles) there are ten thouſand two hundred and ſixty-two white people, and their militia conſiſts of three thouſand two hundred and eighty-four men."

But the before mentioned writer adds, that by an account of theſe Leeward Iſlands in the year 1736, their ſtrength was as follows:

In Antigua	1500 men	2 forts	7 batteries.
St. Chriſtophers	1340 men	3 forts	6 batteries.
Montſerrat	360 men	1 fort	1 battery.
Nevis	300 men	1 fort	1 battery.
In all	3,500 men
And in Anguilla	80 men
Spaniſh Town	72 men
Tortoſa	120 men

3,772 white men in all the Leeward Iſlands.

IV. "The iſlands called the Bahamas are the next in thoſe ſeas of any importance to Great Britain, where Providence is the only iſland as yet of any conſideration to us, or that is peopled in any degree; and here they have five hundred white people, out of whom they have formed ſix companies of militia, beſide one independent company in his majeſty's pay. On this iſland are two forts.

V. "In the Bermudas there were, a few years ſince, five thouſand white people, out of which there are one thouſand white men (beſides officers) for their militia. They have one fort and ſix batteries."

Nothing is ſaid of Newfoundland in this report, which indeed is properly no colony, it having ſcarcely any ſoil capable of cultivation; and the forts and people there are chiefly, if not ſolely, for the protection and accommodation of our important cod-fiſhery on the adjacent ſhoals called "The Banks of Newfoundland." Theſe garriſons are alſo requiſite for preventing any other European nation from getting poſſeſſion of that iſland; which poſſeſſion would render our fiſhery there extremely precarious on a rupture with any ſuch nation, as it would alſo our communication with our northern colonies on the continent. Newfoundland therefore, on theſe accounts, is of very great importance to us *.

When the lords had gone through the whole courſe of their enquiries relative to the commercial intereſts of our colonies reſpecting Great Britain, it was reſolved to make no alteration in the diſpoſition of their manufactures, from an apprehenſion that it might interfere with the trade of ſome of our allies on the continent, and our connections with them †.

The public buſineſs being now diſpatched, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the ſixteenth day of April, 1734; and having given his aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, among which was a bill for naturalizing the prince of Orange, took leave of this parliament with the warmeſt acknowlegements of their zeal, duty, and affection. The parliament was then prorogued, afterwards diſſolved, and another convoked by the ſame proclamation.

On the fourteenth of March this year the nuptials of his ſerene highneſs the prince of Orange with the princeſs-royal were celebrated with great magnificence, which occaſioned great rejoicings both in town and country, and addreſſes of congratulation from all parts to their majeſties and the prince and princeſs, it being a match very agreeable to the nation in general. On the twenty-ſecond of April the prince and princeſs embarked in one of his majeſty's yachts for Holland, and ſoon after their arrival his ſerene highneſs ſet out to make the campaign under prince Eugene on the Rhine; and during his abſence the princeſs came to her father's court, and reſided here till the prince her conſort returned from the Imperial army, when ſhe went to meet him.

The war in 1734 was carried on by the confederates with great ſucceſs againſt the emperor. Two moſt bloody battles at Parma and Guaſtalla were fought with doubtful ſucceſs. Don Carlos took poſſeſſion of Naples, and was declared king thereof and of Sicily; which laſt was ſoon reduced alſo. Upon the Rhine the French took Philipſburgh, before which their general, the duke of Berwick, natural ſon of king James II. loſt his life in the trenches. Dantzick was reduced to the obedience of Auguſtus III. after a grievous ſiege by the Ruſſian army; and that prince was univerſally acknowleged king of Poland, while his rival and competitor Staniſlaus eſcaped with great difficulty, in the diſguiſe of a peaſant, into the territories of the king of Pruſſia.

In the mean time, nothing was omitted by the miniſtry towards putting the nation in a poſture of defence, to which they were principally induced by the doubtful behaviour of ſome of the allies. The court of Spain ſuffered the eldeſt ſon of the pretender to ſerve in the army of Don Carlos, by whom he was treated with diſtinguiſhed marks of reſpect: nay, that prince made no ſcruple publicly to declare that, whenever the ſituation of his affairs would permit, he would ſupport with all his power the intereſts of the abdicated family.

The conduct of the French alſo at this juncture was ſuch as beſpoke no very friendly ſentiments in reſpect to Great Britain, they having publiſhed about this time a ſevere edict, compelling all Britiſh ſubjects either to quit France or enliſt in their armies; and the perſons of many Engliſhmen were actually ſeized and held in durance. This produced a ſpirited memorial on the part of our court, which lord Waldegrave, our miniſter at Paris, was ordered to deliver to the French council, who, when they ſaw us earneſt upon the affair, thought proper to excuſe themſelves, by alleging, they only meant to execute their edict againſt Britiſh and Iriſh vagabonds, and ſuch as had no viſible means of ſubſiſtence.

In June this year the lord Forbes waited upon his majeſty at Kenſington from Ruſſia, with the copy of a treaty of commerce he had concluded with the czarina, greatly to the advantage of the Britiſh nation, as will appear from the following abſtract:

* Anderſon, vol. ii. p. 350, 351.

† Journal of the Houſe of Lords. Hiſtorical Regiſter, &c.

" The fourth article of this treaty ſtipulates, that the ſubjects of Great Britain may carry to Ruſſia all ſorts of merchandize, and may tranſport them from thence by land to Perſia, on paying a duty of three per cent. and may likewiſe bring back from Perſia, through Ruſſia, all ſorts of merchandize, on again paying the ſaid duty, without being obliged to open their bales.

" The ſeventh article declares, that in caſe of ſhipwreck, all manner of aſſiſtance ſhall be given, without offering the leaſt violence to the ſhip's company or effects.

" By the ninth article, the Britiſh merchants in Ruſſia are exempted from being obliged to ſhow their books to any one whatſoever, except it be to prove ſomething in diſpute. And for the greater eaſe and encouragement of the Britiſh commerce, it is agreed, that for the future the Engliſh manufactures ſhall pay no greater duty on importation than is ſpecified.

" This treaty to be in force for fifteen years from the year 1734."

On the nineteenth of September this year a treaty was alſo concluded with the king of Denmark. The miniſters employed in negotiating it were, on the part of his Britannic majeſty, the duke of Newcaſtle and the lord Harrington (who then were the two ſecretaries of ſtate) and ſir Robert Walpole; and on the part of Denmark, the ſieur de Johnn, the Daniſh reſident.

" The firſt and ſecond articles of this treaty are general profeſſions of friendſhip, and renewals of all former treaties between the two nations.

" By the third article, his Daniſh majeſty, at the deſire of our king, engages to hold in readineſs one thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot for three years, to be tranſported over to England in caſe his Britannic majeſty's dominions ſhould be threatened with an invaſion.

" By the fourth article, his Britannic majeſty engages to pay to the king of Denmark, for every horſeman eighty crowns, and for every foot ſoldier thirty crowns; one half to be paid on ſigning the treaty, and the other half when the troops ſhall be delivered; over and above which, king George engages to pay to the king of Denmark an annual ſubſidy of two hundred and fifty thouſand crowns during the time the treaty ſubſiſts: but if the troops ſhould paſs into the pay of the king of Great Britain, then his Daniſh majeſty is to receive a yearly ſubſidy of one hundred and fifty thouſand crowns while they are in his Britannic majeſty's ſervice.

" By the ſixth article, theſe troops are not to be ſent to Italy, nor obliged to ſerve on board a fleet, nor to be tranſported beyond ſea, but to be employed for the defence of the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland; in which event they have the ſame pay that Engliſh troops have.

" The ſeventh article ſtipulates, that the ſaid troops ſhall be immediately ſent back to Denmark, with a month's pay, in caſe the king of Denmark's dominions are attacked; and his Britannic majeſty engages, in ſuch event, to give his Daniſh majeſty all the aſſiſtance the caſe ſhall require by ſea and land: the king of Denmark alſo binds himſelf in the like engagement of aſſiſtance towards the king of Great Britain.

" The eighth article determines in what caſe ſuch aſſiſtance, may be demanded and is to be given; namely, if either of the parties be actually attacked by force of arms, without that party having before uſed open force againſt him who attacks.

This treaty to be void at the end of three years, unleſs renewed *."

Nothing material paſſed in England during the courſe of this year, if we except the conteſt for electing members to ſit in the approaching parliament, which turned entirely in favour of the miniſter, whoſe influence at this period ſeemed to be all-powerful.

On the fourteenth of January 1735, the new parliament met, when the commons again made choice of Mr. Onſlow for their ſpeaker. After ſome days ſpent in the uſual formalities of qualifying the members, &c. his majeſty on the twenty-third opened the ſeſſion with a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne, in which he told the two houſes, That having undertaken, in concert with the States-general, to mediate between the powers at war, he had met with ſo good ſucceſs, that a plan would ſpeedily be offered to the conſideration of all parties engaged in the war, as a baſis for a general negociation of peace. He alſo acquainted them that he had concluded a treaty with the crown of Denmark; a matter, he conceived, of great importance in the preſent conjuncture; and which, being attended with ſome expence, he would order it to be ſubmitted to the conſideration of the commons. At the ſame time he put them in mind, that while a war was raging in Europe, it would be proper in all events (though it might be attended with ſome expence) for Great Britain to keep herſelf in a poſture of defence.

The addreſs of thanks occaſioned a diſpute, as uſual, which ended, as may be readily conceived, in favour of the court; and the addreſs was voted and preſented.

The next ſubject of debate was concerning a motion made in a committee of the whole houſe on ſupplies, February the ſeventh, for encreaſing the number of ſeamen to thirty thouſand effective men, for the ſervice of the current year. The minority affirmed, that twenty thouſand, the number employed laſt year, were fully ſufficient: that the unneceſſary naval armaments of Great Britain during laſt ſummer had occaſioned the ruin of Dantzick, inaſmuch as they prevented the French from ſailing in time to relieve it: that the Spaniards, from the apprehenſion that the Engliſh fleet was deſigned to act againſt them in the Mediterranean, had obliged the French miniſtry to keep their ſhips at Breſt, inſtead of ſending them to Dantzick, until they could diſcover the deſtination of the Engliſh ſquadron.

The miniſtry replied, that gentlemen were greatly miſtaken if they imagined the French to have been ever ſerious in their deſign either to relieve Dantzic, or to aſſiſt Staniſlaus in mounting the throne of Poland: that it was true they had laſt year equipped a fleet, under pretext of relieving Dantzick, and had circulated a report that this was their real intention: that nevertheleſs, it was certain that the French fleet was not only detained at Breſt all ſummer, but orders were given by the courts of Verſailles and Madrid to fit out, in all their ports, all the ſhips that could poſſibly be got ready: that his majeſty having come to the knowlege of theſe orders, had judged it indiſpenſibly neceſſary to increaſe his ſea forces with the additional number of ſeven thouſand men; an expedient which, in all probability, had defeated the deſigns which the French and Spaniards had formed againſt theſe kingdoms: that both theſe powers, far from relaxing their preparations, were at this very time ſtrengthening their marine with the utmoſt induſtry; ſo that the addition of ſeven thouſand men to the naval force of Great Britain muſt be thought by all impartial perſons a reaſonable augmentation; and that this meaſure would appear the more neceſſary when it was conſidered, that in a free country like ours, where there was no regiſter for ſeamen, by which the fleet might be inſtantly ſupplied with men, the government was obliged, on any ſudden emergency, to have recourſe to preſſing; a moſt diſagreeable expedient in a country of liberty. After this and a great deal more had paſſed to the ſame purpoſe, the queſtion being put, was carried in the affirmative for thirty thouſand ſeamen, the office of ordnance being included.

On the twenty-fourth of February ſir W. Wyndham moved, that the eſtimates of the navy for the enſuing year might be referred to a ſelect committee. He was ſeconded by Mr. Sandys, and ſupported by ſir Joſeph Jekyll and Mr. Pulteney; but after ſome debate the motion was carried in the negative.

On the twenty-eighth, the treaty concluded laſt year with Denmark came under conſideration in a grand committee, when Mr. H. Walpole moved, "that the ſum of fifty-ſix thouſand two hundred and fifty pounds ſhould be granted to his majeſty, as a ſubſidy to the king of Denmark, purſuant to the ſaid treaty, for the ſervice of the enſuing year." This demand was vehemently oppoſed by the gentlemen in the country intereſt, as both unreaſonable and unneceſſary, at a time when Denmark had rather greater reaſon than England for maintaining the balance of power in Europe. They ſaid, the money would be much more properly applied in gaining over the elector of Bavaria, in detaching the king of Sardinia from his engagements with France, or in enabling the Poles to chuſe ſuch a king as might have prevented the breaking out of the war; and in ſhort, that the ſubſidy was no more than a bribe given by England to induce a foreign prince to follow his own intereſt. The debate having had its free courſe, the queſtion was put, and the motion approved by the majority.

A bill was afterwards brought in for limiting the number of officers in the houſe of commons; but on the ſecond reading was rejected, after a learned debate; in the courſe of which the oppoſition was ſtrengthened by the coming over of lord Polwarth, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Marchmont, a nobleman of clear, keen, and elegant elocution.

In the courſe of this ſeſſion the mutiny-bill received a material alteration. By this act, any juſtice of the peace had it formerly in his power to throw a poor fellow into gaol, if, after receiving the inliſting money (while perhaps he was drunk) he refuſed to take the oaths, even though he offered to return the money: but now a clauſe was inſerted, importing, that every officer who ſhould hereafter inliſt any man to ſerve in any regiment, ſhould, within a certain number of days, carry the perſon inliſted before one of the next juſtices of the peace, where the man ſhould be at liberty to declare his diſſent to ſuch an act, and his having repented of what he had done; and upon his ſo doing, and returning the officer the inliſting money, and the expences incurred in the progreſs of the affair; ſuch juſtice ſhould forthwith diſcharge him: and that an officer guilty of any failure or neglect in this particular ſhould be liable to the ſame penalties which were inflicted on thoſe chargeable with falſe muſters. At the ſame time, to prevent any abuſe of this indulgence, another clauſe was added, ordaining, that if any perſon ſhould receive inliſting money (knowing it to be ſuch) and ſhould afterwards abſcond or refuſe to go before a magiſtrate, to declare his aſſent or diſſent to the enliſting, ſuch perſon ſhould be deemed to be inliſted to all intents and purpoſes †.

An affair of a very ſerious nature was at this time depending before the houſe of commons. The magiſtrates of the royal burgh of Haddington had been ſeized and impriſoned in a diſtant gaol, without being admitted to bail, by a warrant from one of the Scots judges; but another judge had ventured to take their bail, and ſet them at liberty. The injured parties preſented a petition to the houſe of commons; and the caſe appeared ſo flagrant, that a motion was made to refer it to the conſideration of a committee of the whole houſe. This was oppoſed by the miniſter and his friends, from what motive is hard to ſay, unleſs we may ſuppoſe that the unjuſt judge had ſuch an intereſt in the country, as to make it neceſſary to ſcreen him at all events. However, the motion was thrown out by the majority, which did the miniſter no ſervice. The minority, though often baffled, ſeized every opportunity of renewing the ſtruggle, and on the fourteenth of March moved, that part of an act of the parliament of Scotland, made in 1701, entitled, "An act for preventing wrongous impriſonments, and againſt delays in trials," might be read, which was accordingly done, and a bill afterwards brought in by Mr. Dundaſs, lord Polwarth, and Mr. Sandys, for explaining and amending the above act. This act was all the natives of Scotland had in lieu of the Habeas Corpus act, though, as we have ſeen, it did not ſcreen them from oppreſſion; yet when the bill, after paſſing the commons, was ſent up to the lords, it was thrown out there, through the oppoſition made to it by the earl of Ilay, who undertook to prove, that the Scots were on a footing with their neighbours in England in this reſpect.

On the tenth of April a petition of the then late general aſſembly of the church of Scotland was preſented to the houſe and read, praying the houſe "to paſs a bill for repealing an act of parliament paſſed in the tenth year of queen Anne, reſtoring the right of patronage in Scotland, ſo far as it concerns the power of patrons to preſent miniſters to vacant churches, in order to reſtore the church of Scotland to the rights and privileges ſhe was poſſeſſed of at the union of the two kingdoms." A bill was ordered in upon this petition, and went through a firſt reading; but when it came to be read a ſecond time, it was oppoſed chiefly by the deſire of the Scotch members themſelves, who, being moſt of them patrons, thought the bill was an invaſion upon their rights. In fine, the bill was poſtponed for a month, which was the ſame as dropping it.

This ſeſſion the commons endeavoured to rectify the laws relating to the poor of England, which they found in ſome reſpects to be defective, and attended with difficulty and charge in the execution. Upon mature conſideration, therefore, they came to the following reſolutions on this ſubject; "That in each county a number of proper perſons ſhould form themſelves into a body-politic for erecting and governing hoſpitals and work-houſes, for the maintenance and encouragement of the poor, for the reception of foundlings and other infants, and for the puniſhment of vagrants and other diſorderly perſons; and that all the laws relating to the poor ſhould be reduced to one act of parliament." But it being late in the ſeſſion before this report was made to the houſe, nothing was done in this important matter *.

But the attention of the public was chiefly engaged by an affair of a very delicate and intereſting nature, which came before the upper houſe in the courſe of this ſeſſion. This was a petition ſubſcribed by the dukes of Hamilton, Queenſberry, and Montroſe, by the earls of Dundonald, Marchmont, and Stair, repreſenting, that undue influence had been uſed in carrying on the election of the ſixteen peers for Scotland.

This petition was delivered by the duke of Bedford on the fifteenth of February, who at the ſame time propoſed a day for taking it into conſideration; which propoſal was readily agreed to. Nevertheleſs, the affair was of ſuch an unprecedented nature, that the houſe ſeemed to be divided in opinion about the manner in which they ought to proceed. The duke of Newcaſtle obſerved, and certainly with great juſtice, that it was doubtful whether the houſe had even a power of receiving ſuch a petition, nothing in the articles of union, he ſaid, giving a Britiſh houſe of lords a right to interfere in the election of the Scottiſh peers; nor indeed had they otherwiſe any ſuch right, unleſs ſome particular charge was ſtated and offered to be proved. On the other hand, the friends of the petition urged that it was general, and the facts contained in the allegations were of a very bad complexion, and ſuch as ought to be puniſhed if they were proved. However, as it ſeemed to be uncertain what was the ſcope and deſign of the petition, a motion was made and aſſented to, that it ſhould be adjourned to a ſhort day, before which the petitioners ſhould be ordered to declare, "whether they intended to controvert the election of the ſixteen peers, or the election of any, and which of them."

This order being communicated by the lord-chancellor to the petitioners, they in a few days delivered in a declaration, importing, "That they did not intend to thwart the election or return of the ſixteen peers for Scotland; but they thought it their duty to lay before their lordſhips the evidence of ſuch facts and undue methods as appeared to them to be dangerous to the conſtitution, and might in future elections equally affect the right of the preſent ſixteen peers, as that of the other peers of Scotland, if not prevented by a proper remedy."

This declaration being read in the houſe, the court-party objected to it as unſatisfactory. Its meaning, they ſaid, was equally vague and undetermined with that of the petition; and therefore the duke of Devonſhire made a motion, "That the petitioners might be ordered to lay before the houſe in writing, inſtances of thoſe undue methods and illegal practices upon which they intended to proceed, and the names of the perſons they ſuſpected to be guilty." This motion was warmly oppoſed by the earls of Cheſterfield, Abingdon, and Strafford, and the lords Bathurſt and Carteret. Lord Cheſterfield concluded a ſpeech he made on this occaſion, with the following expreſſions: "Suppoſing, my lords, we ſhould get information that ſeveral barrels of gun-powder had been placed under this houſe, in order to blow us up, would it not be very fooliſh to delay going to ſearch for and remove the gun-powder, till we ſhould be informed by what means, at what time, and by whom the powder was placed there? The caſe before us is the very ſame; there is a ſort of metaphorical gun-powder placed under this houſe, which will in time blow us up, if it be not removed; and in ſuch a caſe are we to trifle away our time in enquiries after the names of the perſons who placed it there, and the methods by which it was conveyed?" Beautiful as this compariſon was, it had no effect, any more than the reaſoning of the other friends of the petition, with the majority of the houſe, who voted the declaration unſatisfactory; that the conſideration of the matter ſhould be delayed for eight days longer; and that the petitioners ſhould be ordered to lay before the houſe in writing, &c. as expreſſed in the above motion.

On the day appointed the petitioning lords preſented a remonſtrance to the houſe, in which they obſerved, "that as they had no intention to ſtate themſelves accuſers, they could not take upon them to name particular perſons who might have been concerned in thoſe illegal practices; but who they were would undoubtedly appear to their lordſhips, upon their taking the proper examination: that, nevertheleſs, they begged leave to acquaint their lordſhips, that the petition was laid before them, upon information that the liſt of the ſixteen peers for Scotland had been framed, previous to the election, by perſons in high truſt under the crown: that this liſt was ſhewn to peers as a liſt approved by the crown; and was called the king's liſt, from which there was to be no variation, unleſs to make way for one or two particular peers, on condition they ſhould conform to meaſures: that peers were ſolicited to vote for this liſt, without the liberty to make any alteration: that endeavours were uſed to engage peers to vote for this liſt, by promiſe of penſions and offices, civil and military, to themſelves and relations, as well as by offers of money: that ſums of money were actually given for this purpoſe: that penſions, offices, and releaſes of debts owing to the crown, were granted to peers who concurred in voting for this liſt, and to their relations: that, on the day of election, a battalion of his majeſty's troops was drawn up in the Abbey-court, contrary to cuſtom, and without any other apparent cauſe than that of overawing the electors: that theſe inſtances of undue practices would, they hoped, be abundantly ſufficient to ſatisfy their lordſhips, that they had juſt cauſe to pray the houſe to take this matter into their ſerious conſideration, and to provide ſuch remedy as might be effectual for preſerving the right and freedom of elections; ſuch right of electing being the only right that now remained with the peers of Scotland, in lieu of a conſtant and hereditary ſeat in parliament."

This remonſtrance gave riſe to another violent diſpute. The lords in the oppoſition endeavoured to make the moſt of a particular fact mentioned therein, which was the holding under arms a battalion of ſoldiers during the time of the election, which they repreſented to be a moſt ſcandalous, arbitrary, and flagrant infringement of the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and of that independency which is ever to be preſerved in all elections. The court lords, who made no ſcruple to acknowlege the fact, alleged in defence of ſuch a ſtep, that it was both legal and prudent: that the ſoldiers were drawn out by the authority of the civil magiſtrate, as a preventative againſt riots and tumults among the populace, who had been inflamed by the oppoſite party to a pitch of reſentment that threatened the moſt fatal conſequences, if not timely checked. In fine, the remonſtrance was voted unſatisfactory, the petition diſmiſſed, and the whole affair entirely ſuppreſſed †.

Notwithſtanding this diſcouragement, the minority renewed their attacks on every freſh occaſion; but all their motions were ſucceſſively rejected by the invincible power of a majority.

The public buſineſs being at length finiſhed, and the ſupplies granted (which this year amounted to upwards of three millions) the ſeſſion was cloſed on the fifteenth of May, 1735, by a ſpeech from the throne; in which the king was pleaſed to acknowlege, that the plan of pacification which he had formed with the States-general had not yet proved effectual; but added, that he was ſtill determined to perſiſt in the ſame pacific meaſures, and to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for compoſing the troubles of Europe. He thanked the parliament for the power they had given him to augment his forces by ſea and land; acquainted them with his intention to viſit his German dominions; and told them, that he ſhould conſtitute the queen regent of the realm during his abſence. Immediately after the prorogation, his majeſty embarked for Holland in his way to Hanover, from whence he did not return till the twenty-ſixth of October following.

A committee of inſpection into the ſtate of the South-ſea company's commerce to the Spaniſh Weſt Indies having been appointed by their general court out of the ſtock-holders, it appeared by the accounts which that committee publiſhed about this time, that the entire balance of that trade from the beginning (or of their ten years American or Aſſiento trade) amounted to no more than thirty-two thouſand two hundred and ſixty pounds eighteen ſhillings profit to the company. This was, by the proprietors of the ſtock, thought (and indeed it was) a very inconſiderable profit, being but three thouſand two hundred and twenty-ſix pounds for each year of that trade. This made the ſtock-holders very earneſt to accept of an equivalent formerly offered by the court of Spain: but thoſe proprietors or ſtock-holders conſidered only their own private advantage by that equivalent: for as the king and his miniſters muſt have been conſulted before the company could be permitted to accept of ſuch equivalent, there was a more important and extenſive conſideration to be duly weighed, viz. whether by the illicit and very profitable trade carried on by that company's ſupercargoes, factors, captains, and other ſervants employed by them in the Spaniſh Weſt Indies, and alſo under their wings from Jamaica, &c. the nation was not a greater gainer, upon the whole, than they could be by the propoſed equivalent, and the carrying back the trade to the channel of Cadiz, where, without doubt, our merchants had alſo a great intereſt in that trade? But I ſhall have occaſion to conſider this ſubject hereafter.

Great complaints came over from Nova Scotia at this time, and particularly from the Britiſh ſettlement at Canſo, a place of great conſequence to our fiſhing-trade in thoſe parts; that although the late king had ſent thither four companies of ſoldiers, yet there had been no money laid out in fortifying that place: that they were particularly apprehenſive of the French encroachments in their neighbourhood, who always pay great attention to their own fortifications; and that by our ſhameful neglect of Nova Scotia, our fiſhery there was almoſt dwindled to nothing. Notwithſtanding theſe remonſtrances and repreſentations, our miniſtry ſeemed quite to diſregard, or rather to be quite ignorant of, the great importance of that province.

At this period the affairs of Europe were in a very delicate and critical ſituation. The emperor complained loudly of the tame and pacific conduct of our court, which, from the treaties ſubſiſting between Great Britain and the empire, he expected would have eſpouſed his cauſe. His Britannic majeſty, however, gave the world an inſtance about this time, that it was from no perſonal pique to the emperor that he took no part in his affairs, relative to the war now carrying on; for having received certain advice that the French had formed a ſtrong party at the Ottoman Porte, who were labouring to bring the Divan to declare war againſt his Imperial majeſty, king George, conjunctly with the States-general, ſent orders to their reſpective miniſters at that court to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to counteract the French in their ſcheme; which theſe miniſters did ſo effectually, that the grand ſeignior was brought to lay aſide all thoughts of attacking the emperor, who, ſenſible of the friendly office done him, ſent his Britannic majeſty his hearty thanks upon the occaſion.

Nor was it in this inſtance only that our court acted the part of mediator, with a view to the maintenance of the balance of power, which at this time ſeemed to be in danger of being ruined. A miſunderſtanding had lately ariſen between the crowns of Spain and Portugal, occaſioned by affronts mutually offered to their ambaſſadors at each court. The affair could not be amicably compromiſed, and the king of Spain began to make preparations for a war with Portugal, which ſo alarmed his moſt Faithful majeſty, that he inſtantly made the moſt earneſt application to the Britiſh government for protection from the deſigns of his enemies. Agreeable to the plan we had framed of univerſal pacification, we readily promiſed our aſſiſtance, and reſolved, by a timely and powerful relief, to overcome the Spaniſh court, and fruſtrate their deſigns. Accordingly, in the month of May this year, ſir John Norris was diſpatched with a fleet of twenty-eight ſhips of the line to the river Tagus, where he was received by the king of Portugal and the inhabitants of Liſbon as their guardian and deliverer. The Spaniſh court inveighed in the moſt haughty and acrimonious terms againſt this interpoſition of the Engliſh, and threatened to pour a numerous army into Portugal over land; but when the firſt tranſports of their reſentment were ſubſided, they thought it moſt adviſeable, for their own intereſt, to lay aſide their hoſtile preparations.

Mean while, the powers at variance upon the continent began to grow heartily tired of the war, though neither cared to own their ſentiments. Conferences for peace had for ſome time been carried on at the Hague, under the auſpices of his Britannic majeſty and the States-general, though at the ſame time the latter had renewed, for another year, their treaty of neutrality with France. Couriers were continually paſſing between London and Verſailles; and although the king of Great Britain could not claim the merit of having abſolutely compleated the deſired work of peace, yet he undoubtedly ſmoothed the way to it by the plans he propoſed: but as the two courts of Verſailles and Vienna had already been diſguſted by certain proceedings of the congreſs who were to conſider of theſe plans, the two belligerant powers fell upon a more ſimple and effectual means of terminating their differences. An armiſtice was propoſed by the emperor, and agreed to by the court of France, which ſoon after terminated in the concluſion of certain preliminary articles, by which France engaged to reſtore to the empire all the places ſhe had taken from it in the courſe of the late war. It was alſo ſtipulated that the emperor ſhould poſſeſs the Mantuan, Parma, Placentia, and the Milaneſe. Don Carlos was acknowleged king of Naples and Sicily; John Francis, duke of Lorraine, who afterwards married Maria-Thereſa, eldeſt archduchеſs of Auſtria, was aſſigned the duchy of Tuſcany after the death of the reigning duke, when Lorraine was to be annexed to the crown of France.

King Staniſlaus renounced the kingdom of Poland, which he had twice obtained, and which his allies were unable to ſecure to him. He was, however, ſtill to retain the title of king; but he was to be further indemnified, more upon the account of France than of himſelf. Cardinal de Fleury, the French miniſter, was at firſt ſatisfied with the diſtrict of Bar, which the duke of Lorraine was to give to Staniſlaus, with a reverſion thereof to the crown of France: and Lorraine was not to be ceded till its duke ſhould be in full poſſeſſion of Tuſcany. This was making the ceſſion of Tuſcany depend greatly upon chance, and it was making very little uſe of the great ſucceſſes, and the moſt favourable conjuncture that had ever offered in favour of France: the old cardinal therefore reſolved to make a bold puſh: he demanded Lorraine upon the ſame conditions with the diſtrict of Bar, and obtained it, at the expence only of three millions five hundred thouſand livres (or about ſixteen thouſand pounds ſterling) granted to duke Francis till he ſhould be poſſeſſed of Tuſcany.

Thus was Lorraine for ever annexed to the crown of France, after having been many times attempted without ſucceſs; a king of Poland was tranſplanted to Lorraine; the ſecond ſon of the king of Spain was removed to Naples; but the duke of Lorraine was the chief gainer by this arrangement, ſince he afterwards became grand duke of Tuſcany, and ſon-in-law to the emperor, whoſe eldeſt daughter, Maria-Tereſa, he eſpouſed; an alliance to which he was indebted for the imperial diadem to which he afterwards ſucceeded. By this plan of pacification Leghorn was to be declared a free port; France was to guaranty the pragmatic ſanction; and England, Holland, Portugal, and Vienna, were to be ſollicited to guaranty the preſent treaty, to which the kings of Spain and Sardinia were to be invited to accede; the latter of theſe monarchs was to enjoy Vigevanaſco, Novara, and all its dependencies.

Such was the iſſue of this ſhort but bloody war, which at its firſt breaking out threatened all Europe with the moſt fatal conſequences, but which at laſt was happily terminated by the timely interpoſition of his Britannic majeſty, and the utter inability of the emperor to ſupport a burthen ſo far above his ſtrength *.

In the month of October king George returned from Hanover, and on the fifteenth day of January, 1736, opened the parliament with a ſpeech, in which he acquainted them, that the plan of pacification formed by the French and Imperialiſts was in ſubſtance the ſame with that which had been concerted between him and the States-general, tho' they had thought proper to communicate it as a new project; that he had agreed to this plan, which had been imparted to the kings of Spain and Sardinia, who, it was hoped, would likewiſe be perſuaded to accede to it. He told them, that he had already given orders for a reduction of his forces, both by ſea and land; but ſaid, he flattered himſelf they would think it reaſonable to continue ſome extraordinary expences till the peace of Europe ſhould be more fully eſtabliſhed.

When his majeſty was retired, a motion was made in the upper houſe for an addreſs of thanks to the ſpeech, importing, that the houſe beheld with pleaſure, in their preſent ſituation, the happy effects of the extraordinary ſupplies granted of late years by parliament, together with their congratulations on the plan of pacification. But the earl of Strafford oppoſed this addreſs, as he ſaid, in his opinion, the peace was a very bad one for Europe, ſeeing it would leave France in poſſeſſion of Lorraine, by which means ſhe could at any time find an eaſy acceſſion into the very heart of Europe. After ſome altercation, however, the addreſs was voted, drawn up, preſented, and moſt graciouſly received. The example of the lords was followed by the commons, who met with the like favourable reception.

The lower houſe having determined ſome controverted elections, proceeded to take into conſideration the ſupplies for the year; and ſir Charles Wager moving that fifteen thouſand men ſhould be employed for the ſervice of the enſuing year, the propoſal was approved without a diviſion.

The drinking of geneva, and other diſtilled ſpirituous liquors, had for ſome years paſt encreaſed to a ſurpriſing degree, eſpecially among the people of inferior rank, inſomuch, that not only thouſands had already periſhed through this abominable practice, and great numbers been rendered wholly unfit for labour or ſervice; but their morals had likewiſe been ſo debauched, that a general diſſoluteneſs prevailed amongſt them. Theſe pernicious liquors, of which gin was that principally drank, were not only ſold by diſtillers, but retailed in the ſmalleſt quantities by every petty chandler-ſhop or coal-cellar in the metropolis; by which means journeymen, apprentices, and ſervants, were drawn in to intoxicate themſelves with this bewitching drug. In a word, there was the greateſt reaſon to apprehend that the public welfare and ſafety, as well as the trade of the nation, would be greatly affected by this practice, which was ſo dangerous to the health, ſtrength, peace, and morals, and even threatened the extinction of the Engliſh ſpecies among the common people. Induced by theſe melancholy conſiderations, the juſtices of the peace for the county of Middleſex preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, ſetting forth the above evils, and praying that the houſe would take the matter into their ſerious conſideration, and apply ſuch remedy as to them in their wiſdom ſhould ſeem moſt proper.

This affair being carefully examined by the houſe, a motion was made for reſolving, that a duty of two ſhillings per gallon ſhould be impoſed upon all ſpirituous liquors; and that fifty ſhillings ſhould be paid to his majeſty for a licence, to be taken out yearly by every perſon who ſhould vend, barter, or utter, any ſuch ſpirituous liquors.

The gentlemen in the oppoſition adduced many weighty objections to the high duties propoſed to be laid by this motion. Mr. Pulteney in particular obſerved, that they amounted to a prohibition; and as this extended to rum, he was apprehenſive it might prove of fatal conſequence to the Britiſh ſugar iſlands, which were already in a declining condition: that many thouſands depended for their livelihood upon the Britiſh diſtillery; and that it was abſurd to argue againſt the uſe of a thing from the abuſe of it.

In anſwer to this, the promoters of the motion urged, that nothing but the extreme danger of the nation, from the exceſſive uſe of ſpirituous liquors, could have induced them to deſire ſuch a bill to be brought in: they were fully ſenſible, they ſaid, of the difficulties to which great numbers of his majeſty's ſubjects would be reduced by the duties propoſed to be laid on ſuch liquors; but the intereſt of individuals ought to give way to the general intereſt; and where the preſervation of the community was viſibly and ſo eſſentially concerned, the hardſhips of ſome few particular perſons muſt be overlooked: that with reſpect to rum and brandy, it was very certain thoſe liquors had often been drank to a very great exceſs, notwithſtanding the high duties laid upon them, and were as pernicious both to the health and morals of the people as any home-made ſpirit: that if any ſorts of ſpirits ſhould be exempted from the duties now propoſed, the retailer would ſell the moſt pernicious ſtuff under that denomination; and the diſtiller would compound them in ſuch a manner, that it would be impoſſible to detect the impoſition. After theſe and ſome other ſpeeches on each ſide of the queſtion, the reſolutions were approved by the majority, and a bill was brought in, for impoſing the above-mentioned duty. While this bill was depending, great numbers of petitions were received from the traders of the ſugar-colonies and the merchants of Briſtol and Liverpool, repreſenting the hardſhips to which they would be expoſed, by a law which amounted to a prohibition of rum and ſpirits diſtilled from molaſſes. In conſequence of theſe remonſtrances, a mitigating clauſe was inſerted in favour of the compoſition known by the name of punch; and diſtillers were permitted to exerciſe any other employment. When ſir Joſeph Jekyll, according to order, preſented the bill to the houſe, ſir Robert Walpole acquainted them, by his majeſty's command, that as the alterations propoſed to be made by that bill in the duties charged upon all ſpirituous liquors might in a great degree affect ſome part of the civil liſt revenues, his majeſty, for the ſake of remedying ſo great an evil as was intended by that bill to be prevented, did conſent to accept any other revenue of equal value, to be ſettled and appropriated in lieu of his intereſt in the ſaid duties.

The uſual eſſays, with the uſual ſucceſs, were made this ſeſſion for a penſion-bill, and other conſtitutional acts for ſecuring the independency of parliaments. The king was impowered to borrow ſix hundred thouſand pounds, chargeable on the Sinking Fund, for the ſervice of the enſuing year; and the ſum of ſeventy thouſand pounds was voted for making good the deficiencies that might happen in the civil liſt by the gin act.

Mr. Walter Plumer, a very ſenſible member of the oppoſition, in a ſpeech which did him much credit, moved for the repeal of ſome clauſes in the teſt act, which he repreſented as a ſpecies of perſecution, in which the proteſtant diſſenters were confounded with the Roman catholics and profeſſed enemies to the eſtabliſhment. Lord Polwarth and Mr. Heathcote ſpoke ſtrenuouſly in favour of this motion; but ſir Robert Walpole as ſtrongly oppoſed it, as being dangerous to the eſtabliſhed church. In this opinion he was joined by Mr. Shippen; and the queſtion being put, was carried in the negative. A petition being preferred by the body of people called quakers, deſiring to be relieved from the ſevere proſecutions they were liable to in the exchequer, eccleſiaſtical, and other courts, for the non-payment of tithes, church-rates, and other eccleſiaſtical dues, which, from a principle of conſcience, they could not pay; a bill was prepared for their relief, which, after ſeveral debates and alterations, at length paſſed the houſe, and was ſent up to the lords, where it was thrown out on a diviſion.

While theſe matters were deliberating in the great aſſembly of the nation, the public attention was engaged by an event which has proved of the utmoſt happineſs and advantage to Great Britain; I mean the marriage of his late royal highneſs Frederick prince of Wales to the princeſs Auguſta of Saxe-Gotha, from which union is ſprung our preſent illuſtrious and beloved ſovereign George III. The ceremonials preparative to theſe nuptials being paſſed, the lord Delawar was ſent in the beginning of March to fetch the princeſs over, who arrived at Greenwich on the twenty-fifth of April, and two days after the marriage was celebrated *. This match proved highly pleaſing to the nation in general; accordingly, the two houſes of parliament, the city of London, and almoſt every county town and borough throughout England, expreſſed their ſatisfaction in addreſſes to their majeſties and the princely pair. It was on this occaſion that Mr. Pitt, then a young member in the houſe of commons, gave the firſt proofs of that eloquence, and thoſe ſuperior abilities, by the help of which he has ſince made ſo conſpicuous a figure in the Britiſh annals: he ſeized the opportunity of the motion for an addreſs to their majeſties on the nuptials of the prince of Wales, to pronounce a moſt elegant panegyric on their royal highneſſes, in which he was ſeconded by ſir George Lyttleton, who likewiſe diſplayed himſelf as an orator to great advantage.

The ſpirit of bequeathing lands, &c. to pious and charitable uſes, had lately been carried to a dangerous height, even to the excluſion or diſinheriting of the lawful heirs and poor relations. Gifts, or alienations of lands, tenements, &c. in mortmain, or into dead hands, are prohibited and reſtrained by Magna Charta, and by divers other wholeſome laws, as prejudicial to the common utility. Nevertheleſs, this public miſchief had of late ſo greatly increaſed, that it was thought neceſſary to put a check to it by ſome farther regulations. For this purpoſe a bill was brought into the houſe of commons by ſir Joſeph Jekyll, maſter of the Rolls, to reſtrain the diſpoſition of lands in mortmain, whereby they became unalienable. As this bill, which afterwards paſſed into an act, may in ſome manner concern ſeveral of our readers, we ſhall here ſubjoin a ſhort abſtract thereof, for the information of thoſe who may not have the collection of ſtatutes at hand to refer to.

It is then hereby enacted, "That no manors, lands, tenements, rents, advowſons, or other hereditaments corporeal or incorporeal whatſoever, nor any ſum or ſums of money, or any other perſonal eſtate whatſoever, to be laid out or diſpoſed of in the purchaſe of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, ſhall be given, granted, or aſſigned, or any way whatſoever conveyed or ſettled to or upon any perſon or perſons, body-politic or corporate, or otherwiſe, for any eſtate or intereſt whatſoever, or in truſt, or for the benefit of any charitable uſes whatſoever, unleſs ſuch gift, conveyance, appointment, or ſettlement of any ſuch lands, tenements, &c. (other than ſtocks in the public funds) be made by deed, ſigned, ſealed, and delivered, in the preſence of two or more creditable witneſſes, twelve calendar months at leaſt before the death of ſuch donor or teſtator, and to be inrolled in Chancery ſix calendar months next after the execution thereof."

The two univerſities were greatly alarmed when they heard that a bill of this nature was depending in the houſe: they preſented petitions againſt it, as did alſo the colleges of Eton, Wincheſter, and Weſtminſter, and divers hoſpitals that ſubſiſted by charitable donations. An exempting clauſe was accordingly inſerted in favour of the two univerſities and the colleges above mentioned; but the petitions of the hoſpitals, and other charitable ſocieties, were rejected.

The ſubjects of debate in the upper houſe were exactly the ſame with thoſe in the lower. On the twentieth day of May, 1736, the king cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he told both houſes, "That a farther convention, concerning the execution of the preliminaries, had been made and communicated to him by the emperor and his moſt Chriſtian majeſty; and that negociations were carrying on by the ſeveral powers engaged in the late war, in order to ſettle a general pacification. He expreſſed great concern at ſeeing ſuch ſeeds of diſſenſion ſown among his people: he declared it was his deſire, and ſhould ever be his care, to preſerve the preſent conſtitution in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed: he recommended a ſpirit of harmony and concord among all the proteſtants of the nation, as the chief ſupport of that happy eſtabliſhment; and acquainted them with his intention to viſit his German dominions." Agreeable to this declaration, the parliament was no ſooner prorogued than the king ſet out for Hanover.

Among the acts paſſed this ſeſſion was one for naturalizing her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales, and another "for building a bridge croſs the river Thames from the New Palace-yard; or the Wool-ſtaple, in the city of Weſtminſter, to the oppoſite ſhore in the county of Surry." This noble ſtructure, hitherto the moſt beautiful and uniform of its kind in all Europe, its vaſt magnitude conſidered, by the parliament's bounty in granting ſeveral lotteries, and at different times ſeveral ſums of money for it, was at length compleated, much to the honour of the nation, the conveniency of inland commerce, and the accommodation of all ranks of people. The ſeveral ſtatutes made concerning it did alſo provide for the removing of many old and decayed houſes, and the erecting of thoſe noble and ſpacious new ſtreets named Bridge-ſtreet, George-ſtreet, and Parliament-ſtreet, beſide the adorning of both the Palace-yards, greatly to the ornament of the ancient city of Weſtminſter, which, inſtead of its former dirty and narrow ſtreets, now lifts up its head with grandeur and majeſty on every ſide.

For two years paſt the general courts of the South-ſea company had fruitleſs debates concerning an equivalent propoſed by Don Geraldino, the agent from the Spaniſh court, to that company, in lieu of their annual ſhip, which ſeemed rather calculated to amuſe the company than to give them any due ſatisfaction; wherefore that company's court, held on the eleventh of Auguſt this year, 1736, took that matter again into conſideration, as alſo the company's farming their introduction of negroes into particular parts of the Weſt Indies, and the ſeveral demands made by Geraldino before the Spaniſh court would grant its cedula or permiſſion for their ſending out their annual ſhip; when it was finally reſolved, that the ſeveral matters above ſhould be referred to the court of directors, to do therein as they ſhould think to be moſt for the intereſt of the company.

So exceedingly remiſs was the adminiſtration in the due execution of the laws, and in their attention to the proper regulations of civil government, that Licentiouſneſs roved bare-faced and uncontrouled throughout the kingdom, and the public peace was daily diſturbed by the moſt audacious riots and tumults. In the month of July there was a deſperate riſing of the weavers in Spital-fields, on account of ſeveral artiſts in that branch of commerce who had come over from Ireland; and by living more frugally, and being leſs addicted to the abominable practice of drinking ſpirituous liquors, to the deſtruction of their healths and ſubſtance, were enabled to underwork the Engliſh conſiderably. This tumult could not be ſuppreſſed without the interpoſition of the civil power, aſſiſted by parties of the horſe and foot guards and trained bands, and the effuſion of ſome blood. This riotous diſpoſition of the populace filled the government with great apprehenſion of the conſequences of the gin act taking place on the twenty-ninth of September: on that day therefore a double guard mounted at Kenſington; the guards at St. James's and Whitehall were reinforced; a guard was placed at the Rolls (ſir Joſeph Jekyll, then maſter of the Rolls, having been the principal promoter of the bill); a detachment of life-guards and horſe-grenadiers paraded in Covent Garden; and every other imaginable method was taken to ſuppreſs any tumult that might happen on the occaſion: but, contrary to expectation, every thing remained very quiet and tranquil.

A moſt daring inſult, however, was committed whilſt the courts of juſtice were ſitting in Weſtminſter-hall. The gin act, mortmain act, Weſtminſter bridge act, and the act for borrowing ſix hundred thouſand pounds from the ſinking fund, incloſed in a brown paper parcel, were blown up with gun-powder in the great hall, and partly burnt; for which fact one Nixon, a non-juring clergyman, was apprehended, and being fully convicted thereof, was ſentenced to pay two hundred marks, to be impriſoned for five years, and to give ſecurity for his good behaviour for five years afterwards, and to be brought up to the ſeveral courts then ſitting, with a label on his breaſt denoting his crime.

But the moſt extraordinary affair this year, and which drew very ſerious conſequences after it, was that of captain Porteous, commander of the city guard of Edinburgh, which was as follows: One Wilſon, a ſmuggler, a fellow of a bold and reſolute ſpirit, had been tried and condemned by the lords of ſeſſion in Scotland, for robbing one of the officers of the revenue, and having afterwards been guilty of one of the moſt daring actions that ever was attempted, that of reſcuing out of the hands of juſtice his brother-convict, in the time of divine ſervice, and in the midſt of his guards. The magiſtrates of Edinburgh redoubled their uſual precautions for executing the ſentence againſt this deſperate criminal. When the executioner was cutting him down from the gallows, he was pelted (as is cuſtomary in that country) with ſtones and dirt, by the boys and rabble. Some of the ſtones happening to ſtrike Porteous, who attended the execution with the city-guards, he being a hot-headed brutal man, ordered his ſoldiers to fire among the populace, which they did; and ſeveral perſons were thereby killed, and others wounded; and all this without the orders of the magiſtrates then attending. Hereupon Porteous was committed to priſon, tried for murder, convicted upon full evidence, and received ſentence to be hanged, which was to be put in execution on the eighth of September; but upon his petition to the queen, then regent, and as the ſmugglers were at this time remarkably numerous, and ſeemed to ſet both civil and military power at defiance, her majeſty thought proper to indulge him with a reſpite for ſix weeks; which reſpite arrived at Edinburgh on the ſecond of September. This occaſioned a moſt tragical cataſtrophe: the common people of Edinburgh reſented this lenity ſhewn to a criminal who was the object of their deteſtation, which they looked upon as an encouragement to oppreſſion; and being ſtimulated by the relations and friends of thoſe who had been murdered, they formed a reſolution to execute themſelves the ſentence which the law had denounced againſt the murder, and that on the very day the judges had fixed for that purpoſe. Accordingly, on the ſeventh of September, a well-conducted party of men entered the city of Edinburgh about ten at night, and by ſurprize ſeized all the fire-arms, &c. belonging to the city-guard, locked up the city gates, beat an alarm, burnt the door of the priſon where Porteous was confined, after endeavouring in vain to force it open, dragged him from his apartments, and hanged him upon a dyer's pole near the Graſs-market. From the boldneſs, ſecrecy, and ſucceſs of this extraordinary enterprize, it was univerſally believed that perſons of more than vulgar rank were concerned in it, eſpecially as, after the execution was over, they left the arms and drums on the ſpot, and quietly departed, having offered not the leaſt violence to any other perſon.

In the beginning of this year the Britiſh nation ſuſtained an unſpeakable loſs in the death of lord-chancellor Talbot, who had for ſeveral years executed that high office with admired ability and irreproachable integrity. He died univerſally lamented, in the month of February, at the age of fifty-two, and was ſucceeded by lord Hardwick.

On the ſixteenth of the ſame month there was the higheſt ſpring-tide in the river Thames that had been known in the memory of man; the judges, counſellors, and other perſons, were carried out of Weſtminſter-hall in boats, which plied both there and in the Palace-yards. All the cellars in Weſtminſter were filled with water; the privy-garden and parade in St. James's park were overflowed, as was in ſeveral places Tower-wharf; and the cellars and offices both above and below bridge, upon the banks of the river, were full of water.

I ſhall cloſe this account of domeſtic events (which indeed are very few, and little intereſting) with obſerving, that his majeſty, in compliance with the common practice of courts abroad, erected this year a new military poſt of honour, under the title of Field-marſhal of the armies of Great Britain. The two firſt officers who were inveſted with that high office were, the duke of Argyll and the earl of Orkney, as being the two eldeſt generals upon the eſtabliſhment.

Let us now take a view of foreign events during the courſe of this year.

On the firſt day of February was celebrated the marriage between Francis of Lorraine and Maria-Thereſa, the eldeſt daughter of the emperor Charles VI. now empreſs-queen of Hungary and Bohemia; and, to compleat the public tranquillity, the interpoſition of the Britiſh fleet under ſir John Norris, in favour of the crown of Portugal, brought the king of Spain into terms with his Portugueze majeſty.

Prince Eugene, who had acted as the imperial plenipotentiary in ſettling the preliminaries of peace between the emperor and France, did not live to ſee the fruits of his negociation come to perfect maturity, he dying at Vienna in the month of April, at the age of ſeventy-three, leaving behind him the character of an invincible hero, an accompliſhed general, and a conſummate politician.

About this period a very extraordinary perſonage ſtarted up in Europe, and for ſome time created great ſpeculation and diſcourſe. The republic of Genoa held the ſovereignty of the iſland and kingdom of Corſica, but had exerciſed their authority with ſo much tyranny, that the inhabitants had thrown off their yoke, and taking up arms, had defeated ſeveral parties of troops their quondam maſters had ſent to reduce them. In this conjuncture Theodore Baron Stein, a man of a bold and enterpriſing genius, aſſiſted by ſome perſons in England, landed in the iſland of Corſica in an Engliſh ſhip, where he was received with open arms by the inſurgents, who were prepoſſeſſed in favour of his appearance, which was very commanding and reſpectable; and in a little time he prevailed ſo far with the Corſicans, that having engaged all the credit he had or could procure for arms and ammunition, which were landed in Corſica, the inhabitants proceeded to elect him their ſovereign; and he was regularly crowned king of Corſica in an open plain, by the name of Theodore the Firſt, king of Corſica; and ſome ſmall pieces of money with that inſcription were actually coined: but all theſe promiſing appearances were ſoon after blaſted. He had been extremely laviſh of his ſuccours both of men and money. Month after month elapſed, and no ſuch ſuccours appeared. His new ſubjects began to ſuſpect him of having impoſed upon their too ready belief. Some of the principal of them took the liberty to expoſtulate with him upon this head. Incenſed at their preſumption, Theodore ordered them to be tried and executed by the ſentence of a court-martial of his own appointing. This proved the ſentence of his own degradation: he ſoon found the affection of his new ſubjects began to cool towards him. The Corſicans are noted for never forgetting or forgiving an injury. Theodore, troubled for the conſequences of their reſentment, prudently choſe to leave the iſland; but this was not to be done without the ſafeguard of ſome plauſible pretext: he therefore feigned an invitation from ſome foreign powers with whom he was to hold a conference, and promiſing to return with large ſupplies of arms and money, which, he ſaid, his preſence was neceſſary to procure, he abandoned his kingdom, and never ſet foot in it again; but, after a variety of romantic adventures, ended his days a priſoner for debt in the King's-Bench priſon in England.

On the firſt of February, 1737, the Britiſh parliament aſſembled, when the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion, his majeſty being indiſpoſed, in conſequence of the fatigue he had ſuffered in a tempeſtuous paſſage from Holland. The lord-chancellor, as one of the peers authoriſed by this committee, made a ſpeech in his majeſty's name to both houſes. He acquainted them, "That with regard to foreign affairs, the reſpective acts of ceſſion being exchanged, and orders given for the evacuation and poſſeſſion of the ſeveral countries and places by the powers concerned, according to the allotment and diſpoſition of the preliminary articles, the great work of re-eſtabliſhing the general tranquillity was far advanced; but his majeſty was of opinion, that great attention ought to be paid to the final concluſion of the new ſettlement, which was to diſpoſe of ſuch conſiderable parts of Europe: that though there was the moſt promiſing appearance of a general laſting tranquillity; yet common prudence called upon the Britiſh nation to avoid an indolent ſecurity, and too great a diſregard to future events: that, in a word, ſhe ought to be provided againſt all attempts that might be made againſt her peace by any of her enemies: that his majeſty had, as ſoon as the circumſtances of affairs would permit, made ſuch a reduction of the public expences as was conſiſtent with the quiet and ſafety of his kingdoms, the ſecurity of commerce, and the honour and intereſt of the nation: that he could not, without ſurprize and concern, obſerve the many deſigns and contrivances carried on, in various ſhapes, and in different parts of the nation, tumultuouſly to reſiſt and obſtruct the execution of the laws, and to violate the peace of the kingdom: that theſe diſturbers of the public repoſe, conſcious that the intereſts of his majeſty and his people were the ſame, and ſenſible of the harmony that ſubſiſted between him and his parliaments, had levelled their ſedition againſt both, and, in their late outrages, had either directly oppoſed, or at leaſt endeavoured to render ineffectual, ſome acts of the whole legiſlature: that the conſideration of the height to which theſe audacious practices might riſe, if not timely ſuppreſſed, afforded a melancholy proſpect, and required particular attention, leſt they ſhould affect private perſons in the quiet enjoyment of their property, as well as the general peace and good order of the whole community."

This ſpeech was anſwered by very loyal addreſſes from both houſes, expreſſing their abhorrence of the outrages complained of, and their reſolution to ſupport his majeſty in all his endeavours to re-eſtabliſh the general tranquillity. After this, the commons having heard council on the controverted elections, proceeded to take the ſupply into conſideration. They voted ten thouſand men for the ſea ſervice; they continued ſeventeen thouſand and upwards for the land-ſervice. The money was raiſed by the land and malt taxes, and one million was granted out of the ſinking fund.

The ſubject which occaſioned debates of the moſt conſequence in the lower houſe was a motion made by Mr. Pulteney for an addreſs to his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to ſettle one hundred thouſand pounds per annum upon his royal highneſs the prince of Wales. Such a proviſion, he ſaid, was conformable to the practice of antient times; it had been enjoyed by his preſent majeſty in the life-time of his father, and was a ſettlement both reaſonable and neceſſary to aſcertain the independency of the apparent heir to the crown. This motion was ſeconded by ſir John Barnard, and ſupported by a variety of inſtances from the Engliſh hiſtory, to ſhew the expediency and rectitude of ſuch a meaſure.

The motion was certainly a very popular one: his royal highneſs and his amiable conſort had endeared themſelves to the whole nation by their many virtues. The members of the oppoſition were ſenſible of this, and endeavoured to ſtrengthen their own intereſt by uniting it with that of the princely power. At the ſame time, they hoped that the miniſter, by oppoſing this meaſure (which they well knew he would) would compleat the meaſure of his unpopularity. His royal highneſs, on the other hand, could not but entertain a grateful ſenſe of the generous ſervices intended him, and thought himſelf obliged in honour to ſtand by his friends who had ſo warmly eſpouſed his intereſt. The miniſter was apprehenſive of the conſequences that might enſue from thus ſeparating the dependence of the ſon upon the father, and giving to the party adverſe to his adminiſtration ſo reſpectable and popular a head: he therefore uſed his utmoſt endeavours to prevent his royal highneſs from conſenting to the motion being made, but to no purpoſe.

However, when it came before the houſe, ſir Robert oppoſed it with great firmneſs, though with a becoming decency to the illuſtrious object. He repreſented it as an encroachment on the prerogative of the crown, as an officious intermeddling in the affairs of the royal family, and as an inſidious attempt to ſet the king and prince at variance; and indeed it ſhould ſeem, that his majeſty had already received intimation of, and had highly reſented, this ſtep of the prince and his friends; for ſir Robert in the midſt of his harangue told the houſe, by his majeſty's command, that on the preceding day the king had ſent a meſſage to the prince by ſeveral noblemen of the firſt quality, to the following purport: "That upon his royal highneſs's marriage he had immediately taken into his royal conſideration the ſettling a proper jointure upon the princeſs of Wales; but that his majeſty's ſudden going abroad, and his late indiſpoſition ſince his return, had hitherto prevented the execution of thoſe his gracious intentions: that from this ſhort delay, however, his majeſty did not conceive that any inconvenience could ariſe, eſpecially as no application had been made to him upon that ſubject by his royal highneſs: that his majeſty had now given orders for ſettling a proper jointure upon the princeſs of Wales, ſuitable to her high rank and dignity, which he would in proper time order to be laid before the parliament, in order to be rendered more certain and effectual: that although his royal highneſs had not thought fit to deſire his majeſty that his annual allowance of fifty thouſand pounds, which was now paid him monthly, rather than quarterly, according to his royal highneſs's own requeſt, might be rendered leſs precarious; the king, to prevent the bad conſequences which, he apprehended, might follow from the undutiful courſes which, his majeſty was informed, the prince had been adviſed to purſue, would grant to his royal highneſs, for his majeſty's life, the ſaid fifty thouſand pounds per annum, to be iſſued out of the civil revenues, over and above the prince's revenues ariſing from the duchy of Cornwall, which his majeſty thought a very competent allowance, conſidering his own numerous iſſue, and the great expence which did and muſt neceſſarily attend an honourable proviſion for the whole royal family." To this meſſage the prince returned a verbal anſwer, deſiring their lordſhips to lay him with all humility at his majeſty's feet; to aſſure him that he did, and ever ſhould, retain the utmoſt duty for his royal perſon: that he was very thankful for any inſtance of his majeſty's goodneſs to him or to the princeſs, and particularly for his majeſty's gracious intention of ſettling a jointure upon her royal highneſs; but that as to the meſſage, the affair was now out of his hands, and therefore he could give no anſwer to it: that his royal highneſs afterwards uſed many dutiful expreſſions towards his majeſty, adding, "Indeed, my lords, it is in other hands; I am ſorry for it;" or words to that effect.

Sir Robert then proceeded to demonſtrate, that the annual ſum of fifty thouſand pounds was as much as the king could afford to allow for the prince's maintenance; and he expatiated upon the bad conſequences that might enſue from rendering the heir-apparent independent of the reigning ſovereign: he particularly inſiſted, that the parliament had no right to interfere in the creation or maintenance of a prince of Wales: he allowed, indeed, that the parliament had addreſſed or petitioned the king upon the death of Edward the Black Prince, that his ſon, afterwards Richard II. might be created prince of Wales; but that meaſure, he ſaid, was in all probability directed by the king himſelf.

Theſe objections did not paſs unanſwered. Mr. Pulteney obſerved, that in regard to the latter inſtance, there was great reaſon to believe that Edward III. would not have been ſo forward to create his grandſon Richard prince of Wales, had he not been in a manner compelled to it by his parliament, ſince it was notorious that Edward, in the decline of life, had fallen into a ſort of love-dotage, and was entirely governed by his miſtreſs Alice Pierce, and his ſecond ſon the duke of Lancaſter, with whoſe reſpective views ſuch a preferment evidently claſhed. The ſupporters of the motion alſo obſerved, that the ſum of fifty thouſand pounds was not equal to the prince's unavoidable annual expence, excluſive of thoſe acts of charity and munificence ever expected from perſons in ſuch exalted ſtations; not to mention that the ſeveral deductions for land-taxes and fees reduced that fifty thouſand to forty thouſand, or a very little more. As to the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, they demonſtrated, that they did not exceed ten thouſand pounds per annum, in all making about fifty-two thouſand pounds a year; whereas, by his majeſty's own regulation, the expence of the prince's houſhold amounted to ſixty-three thouſand pounds yearly. They aſſerted that the produce of the civil liſt exceeded nine hundred thouſand pounds, which was more by one hundred thouſand pounds a year than his late majeſty had enjoyed: they ſhewed, that in the firſt year of the late king, his whole houſhold expence, and that of the civil government, was very little more than four hundred and fifty thouſand pounds a year. The parliament, they ſaid, had added one hundred and forty thouſand pounds annually for acts of charity and bounty, together with the article of ſecret ſervice-money, and allowed one hundred thouſand pounds for the maintenance of the prince of Wales.

His majeſty's meſſage, as reported by ſir Robert Walpole, made various impreſſions on the houſe. Some conſidered it as a wicked attempt of the miniſter to divide the royal family, while others were induced to think that his royal highneſs had ſuffered himſelf to be too eaſily led away by the inſinuations of ſome ſelf-intereſted perſons in the oppoſition. The debate was vehement and long; the beſt ſpeakers on both ſides exerted all their abilities in ſupporting their reſpective opinions; but the queſtion being at laſt put, the motion was rejected, by a majority of thirty voices (two hundred and thirty-four againſt two hundred and four.)

The houſe having reſolved itſelf into a committee to conſider of the national debt, a ſtate thereof was delivered in on the eighteenth of March, when it was found to amount to forty-ſeven millions eight hundred and fifty-five thouſand nine hundred and forty eight pounds three ſhillings and three pence halfpenny. Several of the members thinking that the intereſt paid for this debt was too high, ſir John Barnard moved, "That his majeſty ſhould be enabled to raiſe money either by ſale of annuities, or by borrowing at an intereſt not exceeding three per cent. to be applied towards redeeming old South-ſea annuities; and that ſuch of the annuitants as ſhould be inclined to ſubſcribe their reſpective annuities, ſhould be preferred to all others."

Evidently calculated as this motion was for public utility, as later experience has happily proved, the miniſtry and their friends raiſed a powerful oppoſition to it; but the excellent patriot who propoſed it enforced his plan with ſuch ſtrong and unanſwerable arguments, that they were obliged for the preſent to yield to the motion; and accordingly, on the thirteenth of March, ſir Charles Turner reported from the committee, "That it was their opinion, that all the public funds redeemable by law, which carried an intereſt of four per cent. ſhould be reduced according to the reſpective proviſos or clauſes of redemption contained in the acts of parliament for that purpoſe, or, with conſent of the proprietors, ſhould be converted into an intereſt or annuity not exceeding three per cent. nor redeemable till after fourteen years; and that his majeſty ſhould be enabled to borrow from individuals, or public bodies, any ſum of money, at an intereſt not exceeding three per cent. to be applied towards reducing the national debt." Several reſolutions were founded on this report, and a bill was immediately prepared, and read a firſt and ſecond time; but a motion being made for having it committed, this was over-borne by miniſterial influence, and the bill miſcarried.

The next remarkable conteſt in the lower houſe was occaſioned by a bill ſent down from the lords for puniſhing the magiſtrates of the city of Edinburgh, on account of the murder of captain John Porteous, of which we have already given a narrative.

When his majeſty's ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion was under conſideration in the houſe of peers, that part of it which related to riots and tumults was formally taken notice of by lord Carteret, who obſerved, that notwithſtanding the power with which the civil magiſtrate was inveſted, the military force had been employed in ſuppreſſing the late diſturbances; none of which, he ſaid, had proceeded from any diſaffection to the government, but from very different cauſes. He repreſented the murder which had been committed by the populace at Edinburgh, as of the moſt atrocious nature; and ſaid, that the conſpiracy by which it had been effected was the more alarming, as it had not been attended with any of thoſe diſorders ſo common to a riſing of a headſtrong and riotous populace, which afforded the greateſt reaſon to believe that it had been framed and conducted by perſons of rank and conſequence. Upon the whole, his lordſhip was of opinion, that the houſe ought to make the moſt diligent inquiſition into this affair, in order to diſcover the delinquents, and bring them to condign puniſhment; and even to puniſh the city of Edinburgh, if it ſhould appear that the inhabitants and magiſtrates had not exerted their utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs the inſurrection. His lordſhip then moved, "That the provoſt and bailies of Edinburgh, in the year 1736; that the perſon commanding the city-guard at the time of the riot in which captain Porteous was murdered; that the commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in Scotland at the time of the ſaid riot; ſhould all of them be ordered to attend the houſe on a day appointed; and that an humble addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, deſiring that the different accounts and papers relating to the murder of captain Porteous might be ſubmitted to their inſpection."

Theſe documents being accordingly produced and examined, and all the witneſſes arrived, including three Scottiſh judges *; and the houſe having procured all the intelligence that could poſſibly

* A debate aroſe about the manner in which theſe laſt ſhould be interrogated, whether at the bar, at the table, or on the poſſibly be obtained, a bill was brought in to diſable Alexander Wilſon, eſq. lord provoſt of Edinburgh, from enjoying any office or place of magiſtracy in Edinburgh, or elſewhere in Great Britain; for impriſoning the ſaid Alexander Wilſon; for aboliſhing the city-guard; and for taking away the gates of the Nether-bow port, ſo as to open a communication between the city and the ſuburbs in which the king's troops were quartered.

This bill was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the duke of Argyll, and the other Scottiſh lords, as a proceeding harſh, unprecedented, and unjuſtifiable: nevertheleſs it was paſſed, and ſent down to the commons, where it produced a long and violent debate; and the oppoſition made to it in the committee of that houſe was ſo vigorous, that the whole of it was ſaved only by the caſting vote of colonel Bladon, the chairman. At length it was reduced to a ſimple act, "diſabling Alexander Wilſon, the lord-provoſt, from enjoying any office or place of magiſtracy in the city of Edinburgh, or elſewhere in Great Britain; and for impoſing a fine of two thouſand pounds upon the city for the benefit of Porteous's widow." Thus altered, the bill was returned to the lords, by whom it was approved, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent. Another bill was alſo brought in and paſſed, appointing rewards for the diſcovery of any of the parties concerned in the murder of Porteous, and puniſhing thoſe who ſhould knowingly conceal them. Notwithſtanding all which, and though many thouſands were concerned in that affair, and ſeveral actually tried for the ſame, yet nothing tranſpired that could ſerve to elucidate the grand object of enquiry, the murder of Porteous.

To the account of the proceedings of this ſeſſion it may not be improper to ſubjoin a view of the play-houſe bill, which was now paſſed into a law. It ſeems the miniſter and his friends had been highly provoked at the unreſerved manner in which they had been ſatiriſed upon the ſtage; and ſir Robert Walpole having gotten into his hands a manuſcript comedy, which was fraught with the bittereſt ſarcaſms upon the adminiſtration, he produced it to his friends, who immediately joined with him in a deſign to ſuppreſs, for the future, all perſonified ſatire on men in power. For this purpoſe a bill was brought in for limiting the number of play-houſes, and for ſubjecting all dramatic performances exhibited on the ſtage to the inſpection of the lord-chamberlain of his majeſty's houſhold, without a licence from whom they ſhould not be ſuffered to be acted.

This meaſure, however, was violently oppoſed by all the anti-courtiers, who repreſented it as a direct violation of the liberty of the preſs, and the ſubjecting true genius to ſhackles, which in all human probability it would never be able to ſhake off. Their arguments were of little avail; for, notwithſtanding their utmoſt efforts, the bill paſſed by a conſiderable majority.

While this bill was depending in the houſe of lords, a ſpeech was made againſt it by the earl of Cheſterfield, in which all the powers of eloquence were diſplayed to the utmoſt advantage, both in compoſition and delivery. This ſpeech gives a true idea of the nature of a reſtraint of the kind propoſed, and will prove an entertaining relief to the reader from the dull repetition of parliamentary tranſactions, with which this period of our hiſtory is unavoidably loaded.

After ſpeaking of the precipitancy with which the bill had paſſed the houſe of commons, and of its being puſhed into an almoſt empty houſe of lords at the end of a ſeſſion, his lordſhip proceeds: "I have gathered from common talk, while this bill was moving in the lower houſe, that a play was offered to the theatre in order to be exhibited, which, if my account be right, was truly of a moſt ſcandalous and flagitious nature. What was the effect? Why, the manager to whom it was offered not only refuſed to act it, but carried it to a certain perſon in the adminiſtration, as a ſure method to have it ſuppreſſed. Could this be the occaſion of the bill? Surely no. The caution of the players could never occaſion a law to reſtrain them: it is an argument in their favour, and a material one, in my opinion, againſt the bill. It is to me a proof that the laws are not only ſufficient to deter them from acting what they know would offend, but alſo to puniſh them in caſe they ſhould do it.

"My lords, I muſt own I have obſerved of late a remarkable licentiouſneſs on the ſtage. There were two plays acted laſt winter (his lordſhip meant Paſquin, and king Charles I.) that one would have thought ſhould have given the greateſt offence; and yet they were ſuffered without any cenſure whatever. In one of theſe plays the author thought fit to repreſent religion, phyſic, and the law, as inconſiſtent with common ſenſe. The other was founded on a ſtory very unfit for theatrical entertainment at this time of day; a ſtory ſo recent in the minds of Engliſhmen, and of ſo ſolemn a nature, that it ought to be touched upon only in the pulpit. The ſtage may want regulation; the ſtage may have it; and yet be kept within bounds, without a new law for that purpoſe. I cannot think but great men are generally more ſollicitous to guard their own characters from public contempt than to maintain the principles of public virtue, decency, and order.

"One of the greateſt goods we can enjoy is liberty; the beſt things have their allay. Liberty has its allay: licentiouſneſs is the allay of liberty; it is the natural excreſcence, the ebullition of vigorous liberty. When I touch the one, it is with a fearful, with a trembling hand, leſt I ſhould unwarily do a violence to the other. Is a play a libel upon any one? The law is ſufficient to puniſh the offender, and the injured perſon in this caſe has a very ſingular advantage; he can be under no difficulty to prove who is the publiſher of it. The player himſelf is the publiſher, and there can be no want of evidence to convict him.

"When we complain of the licentiouſneſs of the ſtage, I fear we have more reaſon to complain of bad meaſures in our polity, and a general decay of virtue and good morals amongſt us. Ridicule and ſatire have their uſe; in ſuch a circumſtance they have a direct tendency to correct the guilty, while the innocent have nothing to fear from them. Juſt conduct exempts every perſon from the conſequences of ſatire; for ſatire unjuſtly caſt, reverts upon the cenſurer, and ridicule ill applied, makes the perſon who uſes it ridiculous.

"My lords, if it were neceſſary a bill of this kind ſhould paſs, I am of opinion, the method propoſed in this, to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs complained of, will not anſwer the purpoſe; for if it does not extend to the reſtraint of printing (which I hope it never will), it cannot produce the deſired effect. When my lord chamberlain has marked a play with his refuſal, may it not be printed? will it not be printed with double the advantage, when it ſhall be inſinuated that it was refuſed for having ſome ſtrokes of wit or ſatire in it, that were not ſuffered to come on the ſtage; and will not the printer ſet the refuſal in his title, as a mark of va lue? Is it not natural to be fond of any thing that is forbidden? and will it not be more likely to have its effect among the people by this means, when the printed play may coſt but a ſhilling, and the ſeeing it acted will coſt three or four? Does not the ſatire remain in print to be read and conſidered, when the offence in acting is over and forgot? I do not doubt but there are people, who would ſit down and write a play on purpoſe to have it refuſed, and that will be the only merit belonging to it; for I muſt obſerve to your lordſhips, that although it is very difficult to write one that is fit to be acted, yet it is eaſy enough to write one that is fit to be refuſed.

"When this is the caſe, will it not be ſaid, Shall we ſuffer a play to be printed after it has been forbid to be acted? ſhall we prevent the adminiſtration from being abuſed in Drury-lane, and allow it to be abuſed all over the nation? What can be ſaid in anſwer to this? I own, I think one reſtraint as reaſonable as the other. When this point is once gained, another ſtep will undoubtedly follow; it will be ſaid, Shall we prohibit the printing of a libel in the form of a play, and permit a libel not in the form of a play to be publiſhed? This reſtraint, which appears to me as reaſonable as the two former, puts an end to the liberty of the preſs, which we all ſeem to think of ſuch vaſt importance; and therefore I cannot but be againſt the firſt ſtep, which muſt lead us to the laſt.

"Beſides, my lords, we ought in all points to be tender of property. Wit is the property of thoſe who are poſſeſſed of it, and very often the only property they have. Thank God, my lords, this is not our caſe; we are otherwiſe provided for. I muſt own, I am not for laying any reſtraint upon wit; but by this bill wit is to be delivered out to the public by retail; it is to be exciſed, my lords, and there is to be a remarkable diſtinction in this exciſe from all others, that the lord-chamberlain is to have all the ſeveral offices veſted ſingly in himſelf; he is to be the gauger, ſurveyor, judge, and jury, without allowing any recourſe to thoſe important officers, the commiſſioners of appeal!"

After ſaying more concerning the hardſhips of this act to authors, and paying an elegant compliment to the then lord chamberlain, in whoſe impartiality and judgment his lordſhip declares he has the greateſt confidence, he concludes thus: "My lords, from laws of this nature I ſuſpect very ill conſequences, nor can I frame to myſelf any one good argument, or reaſon, for this bill. It is an arrow that does but glance upon the ſtage; but it will give its fatal wound to the liberty of the preſs. No country ever loſt its liberty at once: it is by degrees that work is to be done; by ſuch degrees as creep inſenſibly upon you, till it is too late to ſtop the miſchief; like different ſhades of the ſame colour, in which it is impoſſible to remark the ſeveral gradations *."

Every one remembers how right his lordſhip's opinion was, as to the printing of plays that were refuſed by the licenſer, and even as to the writing of plays on purpoſe to have them refuſed, that they might be printed only. Whether the noble orator was equally right in what he predicted concerning the preſs, or whether his apprehenſions for that part of liberty carried him a little too far, may perhaps admit of a doubt: thus much, however, is certain, that too much caution and vigilance cannot be uſed in a point that ſo nearly concerns the very being of our conſtitution, and which, it may reaſonably be apprehended, every bad miniſter would take the firſt opportunity to carry againſt us.

On the twenty-firſt of June, 1737, his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he complained greatly of the licentiouſneſs of the times, which, under the colour and diſguiſe of liberty, ſhewed a defiance of all authority, a contempt of magiſtracy, and even a reſiſtance of the laws, to the prejudice of the prerogative of the crown and the true liberties of the people; and then, after recommending the vigorous exertion of the laws, as the only means to remedy this abuſe, his majeſty expreſſes himſelf in theſe words: "I have made the laws of the land the conſtant rule of my actions; and I do with reaſon expect in return, all that ſubmiſſion to my government and authority, which the ſame laws have made the duty, and ſhall always be the intereſt, of my ſubjects."

The attempt made by the leaders of the oppoſition, with the tacit conſent at leaſt of the prince of Wales, to obtain an addition to his royal highneſs's income, had diſguſted the king, and occaſioned a viſible coolneſs between them; but an affair, of a very intereſting and delicate nature, happened ſoon after the cloſe of that ſeſſion, which increaſed the former miſunderſtanding to an open breach between his majeſty and the prince, and in its conſequences proved more than a mere family difference.

The princeſs of Wales had advanced to the very laſt month of her pregnancy, without being thought to be ſo near her time as ſhe really was: being with their majeſties, and the reſt of the royal family, at Hampton Court, without any midwife attending her, ſhe was, on the thirty-firſt of July, ſeized with the pains of child-birth, which increaſed ſo violently, that the prince, who was with her, was obliged to hurry her to London, where ſhe was that night delivered of a daughter, the princeſs Auguſta, now hereditary princeſs of Brunſwick.

His majeſty, on being acquainted with this unlooked for event, ſent a meſſage, by the earl of Eſſex, to the prince, congratulating him upon the birth of the princeſs; but at the ſame time expreſſing his diſpleaſure at his royal highneſs's conduct in carrying away the princeſs from Hampton Court under the immediate pains of child birth, without acquainting his majeſty or the queen with the circumſtances the princeſs was in, or giving them the leaſt notice of his departure; a conduct which his majeſty looked upon as a deliberate indignity offered to himſelf and the queen, and which he reſented to the higheſt degree. The prince deprecated his majeſty's anger in ſeveral ſubmiſſive letters, in which he laboured to excuſe the ſtep he had taken, by alleging, that it had happened thro' the uncertainty of the phyſician and midwife, as to the time of the delivery of the princeſs; his highneſs alſo implored his royal mother's mediation in his behalf. The princeſs joined her interceſſions to thoſe of her conſort, but his majeſty was too deeply incenſed to be moved by their humility or ſupplication; and on the tenth of September following, the duke of Grafton was ſent by his majeſty to the prince, with a very ſevere meſſage, in the cloſe of which he gave the prince to underſtand, that it was his royal pleaſure, that his highneſs ſhould quit St. James's, with all his family, when it could be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the princeſs; and that his majeſty ſhould, for the preſent, leave to the princeſs the care of his grand-daughter, until a proper time called upon him to conſider of her education.

In obedience to this meſſage the prince retired to Kew, and made other efforts to be re-admitted into his majeſty's favour, which, however, he could not regain. Nevertheleſs he ſent lord Baltimore, one of his houſhold, to the lord Grantham, the queen's chamberlain, intreating to know whether ſhe would receive a letter from him, in mitigation of his conduct. Her majeſty refuſed her conſent. The princeſs then wrote an humble and ſubmiſſive letter to the king, who returned an anſwer full of affection and civility to her highneſs, though it plainly appeared by ſome expreſſions therein, that his diſpleaſure at the prince was rather increaſed than abated.

In the mean time the guards were taken off from their attendance on the prince and his conſort; and all perſons who paid their court to the prince and princeſs were not ſuffered to come into his majeſty's preſence, or any of his palaces. The letters which paſſed between the royal family on this occaſion, were publiſhed by authority, and made various impreſſions on the minds of the people. All the prince's ſervants ſoon after joined the oppoſition to the miniſtry.

Upon the whole, I think it muſt appear to every candid and impartial perſon but too probable, that both the king and the prince were impoſed upon, by thoſe who found their account in creating a difference between them. If the prince's conduct, however, was in ſome reſpects reprehenſible, the puniſhment ſeems to have been more than ſevere, and even to approach towards cruelty; for he was denied admiſſion into the preſence of the queen his mother in her laſt moments, to implore her forgiveneſs, and receive her dying benediction.

In October, this year, a deputation of the merchants of London waited on his majeſty at Hampton Court, with a petition, in behalf of themſelves and others trading to, and intereſted in, the Britiſh colonies in America, ſetting forth, that the fair and lawful trade to the Britiſh plantations in America, had been greatly interrupted for many years paſt, not only by their ſhips being frequently ſtopped, and arbitrarily ſeized on, in the high ſeas, by Spaniſh ſhips, fitted out to cruize under the plauſible pretext of guarding their own coaſts; but that the commanders thereof, with their crews, had been inhumanly treated, and their ſhips carried into ſome of the Spaniſh ports, and there condemned, with their cargoes, in manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns, &c. and praying that his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to procure them ſpeedy and ample ſatisfaction for the loſſes they have ſuſtained, &c. To this petition his majeſty returned a moſt gracious anſwer, and his ſecretary of ſtate ſent freſh orders to Mr. Keene, to repeat his inſtances at the court of Madrid for their relief. In the mean while a committee of the privy-council ſat at Whitehall, to receive proofs of the loſſes which the merchants had ſuffered by the Spaniards.

And here it will not be improper to obſerve, that whereas by the treaty of 1670, ſubſiſting between us and Spain, our ſhips are not to reſort nor trade to the coaſts of New Spain and its adjoining provinces (unleſs driven thither by diſtreſs of weather) their ſailing near to thoſe ſhores rendered them liable to be ſuſpected of carrying on a contraband trade with thoſe provinces of Spaniſh America, the trade to which is abſolutely and moſt ſtrictly confined to Spaniards ſolely; and there is ſcarce any doubt to be made that our ſloops and coaſting veſſels from Jamaica, and other Britiſh colonies, did ſometimes run the hazard for the ſake of gain, and therefore ought to ſubmit to the conſequences. So, on the other hand, it is notorious, that the Spaniſh guarda-coſtas did frequently exceed their powers or commiſſions, by ſearching, plundering, and often ſeizing on our Britiſh ſhips ſailing on the American ſeas, even though not ſo near their ſhores as to give juſt ground of ſuſpicion of any clandeſtine trade, and though not laden with the produce of the Spaniſh American provinces; but only perhaps having, by mere chance, a few Spaniſh pieces of eight found in the ſhip, or perhaps a ſmall parcel of logwood; the firſt being the only coin in our iſland of Jamaica, and the laſt the produce of that iſland.

In ſhort, theſe mutual complaints did, in a few years after, bring on the war between Great Britain and Spain; and although the peace of Aix la Chapelle (in 1748) ſeemed to terminate that affair, yet did it barely ſeem to do it; and a new and more diſtinct or explicit treaty appears ſtill to be wanting for that point, and alſo for the logwood trade of our Britiſh ſubjects in the bay of Campeachy.

About this time alſo the French gave us no ſmall umbrage by their eagerly puſhing into an univerſal commerce, as the ſurer, though ſlower, way of compaſſing their old favourite ſcheme of univerſal dominion. And although, by our late amazing ſucceſs againſt the French colonies in America, matters are ſince greatly changed, yet the ſteps taken by that crafty nation are well worth tracing, as mementos for futurity.

In Africa they had monopolized the gum trade near the river Senegal: they had alſo encroached on the Engliſh ſettlement at the river Gambia, and had greatly extended their ſlave trade on that coaſt, for the encouragement of their Weſt India ſugar iſlands, iſlands, where they had at this time gained ſo much ground on ours as to be the great exporters of ſugar, and alſo of indico, cotton, and ginger, to many parts of Europe. They had alſo erected a conſiderable ſettlement on the coaſt of Guinea, near Surinam in South America, encroaching both on the Dutch and Spaniards there.

On the north continent of America they aſſiduouſly purſued the plan of Lewis XIV. for forming a chain of forts and ſettlements from the mouth of the great river Miſſiſippi, up to their province of Canada, with a view thereby to cut off our continent ſettlements from any commerce with the vaſt Indian countries weſtward, and in time to get poſſeſſion of them all. For that end they had ſtrongly fortified the iſland of Cape Breton, near the entrance of the river St. Lawrence, which ſerved as well to command that entrance as to protect a great cod-fiſhery which they have of late amazingly increaſed in the neighbouring ſeas.

From Quebec, their capital of Canada, they had opened and fortified a communication with the lakes lying behind, and properly as much belonging to our province of New York as any other part of that province can be ſaid to be; and had alſo taken poſſeſſion of the fertile lands round thoſe lakes, much of which they had already cleared, and in part cultivated. Weſtward they were ſaid to have already extended their communication as far as the Spaniſh province of New Mexico, with a view, no doubt, to the rich ſilver mines there. Eaſtward from the Miſſiſippi they had, by this time, ſettled ſo far up as to have forts within twenty days march of Charles-town, our capital of South Carolina. Of all which vaſt improvements and encroachments on the territories of other nations, and more eſpecially of our own, authentic accounts were laid before our government and our board of trade, yet no effectual regard was ſhewn thereto. In the Eaſt Indies alſo France had, by this time, encreaſed her trade almoſt beyond belief, without receiving any interruption from us or other ſtates concerned, who might in the beginning eaſily have defeated this and moſt of the above encroachments, had vigorous meaſures been taken in due time.

Theſe particulars I have judged neceſſary to lay together before my readers at one ſummary view, for ſerving the better to illuſtrate and explain what may hereafter fall in my way, in reſpect to the all-graſping deſigns of the French nation.

While I am upon commercial affairs, I muſt not omit to take notice, that in the courſe of this year Mr. Oglethorpe returned from Georgia, with an account of the promiſing ſtate of that infant colony, where the Indians had ſubmitted to his majeſty's authority. The Spaniſh governor of Florida, and the council of war reſiding at St. Auguſtine and Darien, had ſigned a treaty with the colony; and beſides the town of Savannah, which was then in a flouriſhing ſtate, three other towns, Frederica, Auguſta, and Darien, were founded; and a new town, called Ebenezer, had been built by the Saltſburghers, who had been obliged to leave their country by the perſecution of the German government on religious and civil accounts.

The doge and ſenate of Venice having thought proper to pay even royal honours to the pretender's ſon, who made a viſit to their city in the ſummer of this year, our court ſo highly reſented their proceedings, that the reſident from that republic here had notice given him to leave London in three days, and the kingdom in a week, for the inſult offered by his maſter to his majeſty's crown and dignity.

On November 20, at ſeven o'clock in the evening, died, to the inexpreſſible grief of his majeſty, the royal family, and the whole nation, Wilhelmina-Carolina-Dorothea, of the houſe of Brandenbourg Anſpach, queen-conſort of Great Britain, aged fifty-four years, eight months, and twenty days. Her majeſty had been for ſome days diſordered, and was treated by her phyſicians as for the gout in her ſtomach; but the diſtemper proved to be a concealed rupture. No princeſs ever lived more in the love and eſteem of all who knew her than ſhe did. His majeſty was for ſome time inconſolable for his loſs; and it muſt be confeſſed that no ſorrow was ever more juſtifiable. She was a pattern of conjugal fidelity and affection; and by the virtues of her heart, her uncommon penetration, her lively yet ſolid wit, and her extenſive generoſity, ſhe had rendered herſelf equally the delight of her royal conſort, her own family, and the whole nation. In her the poor loſt a noble benefactreſs, the learned a powerful and munificent patroneſs. In a word, all degrees of people were affected with her death, as every one conſidered as perſonal the loſs the public ſuſtained by her death. She had by cloſe ſtudy ſo improved her natural ſagacity and talents, that ſhe became an umpire in one of the moſt abſtruſe points of metaphyſics that ever was agitated, the doctrine of free will and fatality, as diſputed between Mr. Leibnitz and Dr. Clark.

Although the foreign events of this year were very little intereſting to Great Britain, yet I ſhall, for the information of my readers, give a ſummary account of them.

During this ſummer a rupture happened between the Turks and the Ruſſians, which laſt reduced the city of Aſoph on the Black Sea, and overran the greateſt part of Crim-Tartary. The czarina declared war againſt the Ottoman Porte, becauſe the Tartars of the Crimea had made incurſions upon her frontiers; and when ſhe complained of thoſe diſorders to the vizir, ſhe had received no ſatisfaction. Beſides, a large body of Tartars had, by order of that miniſter, marched through the Ruſſian provinces in deſpite of the empreſs, and committed horrid havock in their route. The emperor was obliged to engage as a party in this war, by a treaty offenſive and defenſive which he had many years before concluded with the Ruſſian crown. Before he declared himſelf, however, he joined the maritime powers in offering his mediation to the ſultan, who was very well diſpoſed to peace; but the czarina inſiſted upon retaining Aſoph, which her forces had reduced; and this preliminary article being rejected, as diſhonourable to the Ottoman empire, no accommodation could be effected, and the troops of the belligerant powers were therefore diſtributed into winter-quarters. The duke of Lorraine had now ſucceeded to the duchy of Tuſcany, on the death of the laſt of the Medicis family; and the French were by this event relieved from the burthen of a great annuity, which they had obliged themſelves to pay him till he ſhould ſucceed to Tuſcany. The king of Spain's troops evacuated that duchy, and the provinces in Italy now yielded to the houſe of Auſtria.

In this ſituation were the affairs of Europe, when his Britannic majeſty opened the parliament on the twenty-fourth day of January, 1738. His ſpeech was remarkably ſhort, and concluded with recommending the diſpatch of public buſineſs with prudence and unanimity. Each houſe preſented a warm addreſs of condolance upon the queen's death, with which the king ſeemed to be deeply affected.

Mutual complaints and remonſtrances ſtill continued between our merchants and the court of Spain, with whom the nation now ſeemed exaſperated beyond all farther ſufferance. His majeſty, as we have already obſerved, had referred the examination of the complaints of our merchants to a committee of the privy-council, who endeavoured to make good their allegations. Their cauſe was ſpecious and popular; the public warmly eſpouſed their quarrel; they were ſtrongly ſupported by the anti-courtiers in both houſes, who were bent upon a war with Spain. A petition, ſimilar to that which had been preſented to his majeſty, was now laid before the houſe of commons, and reinforced by others of the like nature from moſt of the trading towns in the kingdom; all which had ſuch an influence upon the houſe, that a motion was made to addreſs his majeſty for copies of all the repreſentations ſent by the Engliſh miniſtry to that of Spain, from the firſt day of November laſt, and of ſuch anſwers as had been returned to thoſe remonſtrances. This brought on a long debate, in which the cruelties of the Spaniards, and the tameneſs of the Engliſh miniſtry, were diſplayed in the ſtrongeſt colouring. Every ſpeaker of note on each ſide exerted himſelf on this occaſion; but the miniſter, who had a ſettled averſion to engaging the nation in a war, adhered firmly to his pacific plan, inſiſting that every method ought to be tried to bring Spain to terms, if poſſible, before we proceeded to forcible meaſures. He approved of the former part of the motion, but thought it would be dangerous to comply with the latter; and he made a long ſpeech in defence of his opinion: in fine, the motion was rejected by a conſiderable majority, as was alſo a bill brought in by Mr. Pulteney, for the more effectual ſecuring and encouraging the trade of his majeſty's ſubjects to America. The intention of this act was, to give the property of all prizes taken from the Spaniards after the declaration of war, to the officers and ſailors preſent in the action; to allow to the ſailors the ſum of five pounds, by way of head-money, for every Spaniard taken at ſea; and to veſt in the captors, by his majeſty's patent, the property of all the places conquered from the Spaniards.

This bill paſſed through the firſt reading without oppoſition; but when it was moved to recommit it for a ſecond reading, ſir Robert Walpole, who ſeems thoroughly to have ſtudied the queſtion, oppoſed it in a ſpeech, to the following effect:

He ſaid, that with regard to the firſt article, as the bill then ſtood, if hoſtilities were immediately to commence againſt Spain, and a ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips of war was to take the whole Plate fleet of the Spaniards, with all their regiſter ſhips, every ſhilling of the money muſt become the property of the Engliſh ſeamen, though it was notorious that not one fifth part of that treaſure belonged to the Spaniards, but was the property of the French, the Dutch, and other trading nations of Europe; and as it was not to be ſuppoſed that the ſailors would willingly part with what was once declared to be their due, the government would find itſelf under the very diſagreeable neceſſity, either to violate the preſent act, in order to make them refund the effects of the neutral nations, or the parliament muſt load the people with new taxes, in order to make good that money; or, in caſe of failure of theſe expedients, Great Britain muſt be inevitably involved in a war with all the different nations whoſe property ſhe had thus invaded: that with reſpect to the granting head-money for every Spaniard taken at ſea, he thought it a very wiſe and proper meaſure, and therefore he would agree to it as ſoon as war ſhould be declared: that as to the third article, he thought it of a moſt dangerous nature; and that if it paſſed into an act, it muſt effectually prevent all poſſibility of concluding any ſafe or honourable peace, becauſe in all negociations ſome places on both ſides were uſually given up, in order to facilitate the treaty; a method which could not be purſued if his majeſty, by letters-patent, ſhould beſtow the property on others. He inſiſted, that ſuch an act would be attended with the abſolute ruin of the Britiſh commerce all over Europe: he deſired the houſe to conſider what muſt be the caſe of the Britiſh merchants then reſiding in Spain, their perſons, their ſhips, and their properties, all which the Spaniards would undoubtedly ſequeſter. What, he aſked, muſt the Dutch think of ſuch a bill? or what power in Europe could be our hearty friend, ſhould ſuch a bill be enacted into a law? He then acknowleged the juſtneſs of the general complaint; promiſed that the moſt effectual means ſhould be employed for redreſs during the ſummer; and on its being inſinuated that thoſe promiſes would prove as little effectual as his former efforts of the ſame kind, he aſked, how he ſhould be able to ſhew his face again in that houſe, if he did not procure full reparation for the honour of the nation, as well as the loſs of our merchants? As to the inſinuations, he ſaid, which had been thrown out by thoſe who oppoſed his meaſures, merely from a ſpirit of oppoſition, that he was afraid of a war, becauſe peace was his only ſafety, he did not underſtand upon what they could be grounded: for his part, he declared he never could ſee any cauſe, either from reaſon or from his own experience, to imagine that a miniſter was not as ſafe in time of war as in time of peace: nay, were one to judge by reaſon alone, it was the intereſt of a miniſter, conſcious of any miſmanagement, to engage his country in a war, as the only means to divert the eyes of the public from examining too cloſely into his conduct; nor was he accountable for the bad ſucceſs of a war, as he was for that of an adminiſtration.

Theſe arguments, with thoſe advanced by other members, were deemed ſo ſatisfactory, that the bill was rejected by a conſiderable majority; the country party, however, determined to diſpute every inch of ground. At laſt Mr. Pulteney brought into the houſe a ſet of reſolutions, importing, that it was our undoubted and natural right to ſail with our ſhips on any part of the ſeas of America; and that the freedom of our navigation and commerce merce had been greatly interrupted by the Spaniards, under pretences altogether groundleſs and unwarrantable. Theſe, after having undergone ſome amendments, were unanimouſly approved, and preſented to his majeſty. There was an endeavour to propoſe ſome other queſtions, which were thought neceſſary, becauſe they would more fully and plainly have aſſerted our rights; but they were overruled: yet this, with the addreſs that followed, was more than ſufficient to convince the miniſter, that the oppoſition, who had the majority of the people on their ſide, were determined to bring on a war between us and Spain.

Mean while the lords were no leſs eager than the commons in enquiring into the ſubject of the Spaniſh depredations, and in their reſolutions upon this important affair went ſtill farther than the other houſe; for they not only aſſerted our undoubted right to navigate in the American ſeas, "but alſo to carry all ſorts of goods, merchandize, or effects, from one part of his majeſty's dominions to any other part thereof; and that no goods being ſo carried, are, by any treaty ſubſiſting between the crowns of Great Britain and Spain, to be deemed or taken as contraband or prohibited goods; and that the ſearching ſuch ſhips on the open ſeas, under pretence of their carrying contraband or prohibited goods, is a violation and infraction of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns." And in the addreſs which accompanied theſe reſolutions, their lordſhips gave his majeſty the ſtrongeſt and moſt ſincere aſſurances, that in caſe his friendly and powerful inſtances for procuring reſtitution and reparation to his injured ſubjects, and for eſtabliſhing the future ſecurity of their trade and navigation, ſhould fail of having their due effect on the court of Spain, they would zealouſly and chearfully concur in all ſuch meaſures as ſhould become moſt neceſſary for the ſupport of his majeſty's honour, the preſervation of the Britiſh navigation and commerce, and the common good of theſe kingdoms.

To this addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed moſt graciouſly to reply, that he was ſenſibly touched with the many hardſhips and injuries ſuſtained by his trading ſubjects in America, from the cruelties and unjuſt depredations of the Spaniards; that they might be aſſured of his care to procure ſatisfaction for the injuries they had already ſuffered, to ſecure the freedom of navigation for the future, and to maintain his ſubjects in the full enjoyment of all the rights to which they were entitled by treaty and the law of nations; and that he doubted not but he ſhould have their aſſiſtance in the ſupport of ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary for this purpoſe.

Thus ended an enquiry, which had, from the firſt meeting of the parliament, engroſſed the attention of the public to the excluſion of every other object. Two millions were granted to his majeſty for the ſervice of the current year, and for enabling him to pay to the company of the Bank of England the ſum of one million, in order to redeem an annuity of forty thouſand pounds, to which they were entitled; and ſome farther regulations were made for preventing the abuſe of ſpirituous liquors.

On the twentieth of May, 1738, his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he obſerved, "that, agreeable to what had appeared to be the concurrent opinion of both houſes of parliament, he had given orders to repeat, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt preſſing manner, his inſtances at the court of Spain for obtaining ſatisfaction for the many injuries and loſſes ſuſtained by his trading ſubjects in America, and for effectually ſecuring their rights for the future; and he hoped, from the juſtice and equity of the Catholic king, to procure and eſtabliſh a free and uninterrupted exerciſe of trade between the ſubjects of the two crowns, agreeable to treaties and the law of nations."

The miniſter now ſaw himſelf obliged to give way to the current; accordingly, when the parliament was riſen, we put almoſt our whole navy into commiſſion; and ſo ſtrongly perſuaded was the public, that we ſhould then really attempt to procure ourſelves juſtice by our arms, that even thoſe who ſtill queſtioned the ſincerity of theſe military preparations, ſcarcely dared avow their ſcruples, eſpecially when they ſaw admiral Haddock, a brave and experienced officer, ſent up the Mediterranean with a fleet of fifteen ſhips of the line. But it ſoon appeared how very averſe the miniſtry was to engage in a war; for towards the latter end of the ſummer our hoſtile meaſures were ſuſpended, and the nation was told, that Spain, terrified with the apprehenſions of a war, had granted us all we could reaſonably deſire, and had ſubmitted to whatever we could have hoped for even at the end of the moſt ſucceſsful war. This, had it been true, was a very fortunate event; as in ſuch a caſe that court muſt neceſſarily have formally diſavowed her pretended dominion in the ſeas of America, and her practice of ſearching our ſhips: but how great was the ſurprize of the public, when, ſome months after our military preparations had been laid aſide, it was confeſſed by the miniſter, that nothing had been yet agreed upon! What likewiſe augmented the general uneaſineſs, was a diſcovery ſaid to be made in that interval, that our fleets, ſent out during the ſummer to the Weſt Indies and to the Mediterranean, carried with them no orders to act offenſively, or to make any repriſal, though they departed from home long before the pretended ſubmiſſion of Spain, and at a time when the miniſter made the ſtrongeſt proteſtations of his reſolute intentions. Probably he imagined he could be able to manage matters ſo as to prevent a war, which he thought would amply compenſate for the ſufferings of the merchants, and that the public would be brought to give the preference to a peace, which promiſed ſo many advantages to trade and commerce. But he was miſtaken: the horrid accounts publiſhed in the news papers, and enforced in the antiminiſterial writings, of the Spaniſh barbarities, had exaſperated all ranks of men beyond any probability of reconcilement with pacific meaſures. The caſe which made the greateſt noiſe, was that of one Jenkins, maſter of an Engliſh ſhip, who had his ear, or part of his ear, cut off by the crew of a guarda-coſta, with circumſtances of the utmoſt inſolence againſt the perſon of his majeſty and his ſubjects. It was now publicly ſaid, that our boaſted preparations were never deſigned againſt our enemies, but only to amuſe the people at home, till Spain was prevailed upon by our intreaties to condeſcend to treat with us upon any terms, in order that ſomething, bearing the appearance of an agreement, might be produced before the meeting of the parliament, which, however inſufficient, might at leaſt ſerve as an annual expedient of delay, if it could not be impoſed upon the nation as ſatisfactory and honourable.

But the inſolence of Spain was ſo much inflated by theſe meaſures, that no agreement could be procured from that court till after the uſual time of convoking the parliament, which was prorogued in expectation of it, and afterwards adjourned, in order to get the articles ratified: however, during the prorogation and adjournment the long-expected convention arrived, and was ſoon after publiſhed to the nation.

Four days after the concluſion of the ſeſſion (viz. on the twenty-fourth of May, ſince the alteration of ſtyle the fourth of June) the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a ſon, who was baptized by the name of George, and is our preſent moſt auguſt ſovereign. His birth was celebrated with uncommon rejoicings; addreſſes of congratulation were preſented to the king by the two univerſities, and almoſt all the cities and corporations in the kingdom. But the prince of Wales ſtill laboured under the diſpleaſure of his majeſty, who ordered the lord chamberlain to ſignify in the Gazette, that no perſon who viſited the prince, ſhould be admitted into his majeſty's preſence.

A ſpirit of riot and miſrule diſcovered itſelf amongſt the lower claſs of people, in different parts of the kingdom, during the courſe of this year, chiefly owing, as was ſuppoſed, to the intemperate uſe of that pernicious compound, gin. The moſt dangerous tumults were in the weſtern counties of England, where a number of journeymen weavers roſe in a riotous manner, and committed the moſt terrible outrages againſt the perſons and properties of ſeveral maſters in that branch of trade, by whom they imagined themſelves ill uſed. The affair at length grew ſo ſerious, that the government was obliged to quarter bodies of troops in ſeveral of the borough and market-towns, to prevent the ſedition ſpreading farther. The metropolis itſelf was alſo far from being free from tumults and diſorders; in particular, a moſt dangerous inſult was committed upon juſtice, by a party of ſailors at Wapping, who cut down from the gibbet, and brought to life, one Buchanan, who had been condemned to be hanged for murder; and notwithſtanding the atrociouſneſs of the crime, and the danger of the example, ſo much were the offenders favoured by the public, that not one of them could ever be diſcovered.

About the middle of October the prince and princeſs of Wales went to Bath, and ſtaid there near ſix weeks, in which time they paid a viſit to the city of Briſtol, where they were entertained with great magnificence and ſigns of the moſt cordial affection. In this year a charter paſſed the great-ſeal for eſtabliſhing an hoſpital for the maintenance and education of expoſed and deſerted young children, commonly called the Foundling Hoſpital; an inſtitution which had been brought to bear by the indefatigable care and pains of one captain Coram, who had ſpent great part of his life in North America, and who ruined his private fortune by his application for its ſucceſs, which he afterwards brought to bear at a time when, by the courſe of nature, he could have but a very few years to enjoy the accompliſhment of his noble deſign. About the ſame time a moſt noble general hoſpital was founded at Bath, as was another at Edinburgh, upon voluntary ſubſcriptions; and another was projected at York. It is the province of hiſtory to record acts of this nature, which do honour to humanity.

The firſt ſeſſion of parliament of the year 1739 was opened on February 1, when his majeſty acquainted both houſes in a ſpeech, that, ſupported by the concurrent advice of both houſes of parliament, he had loſt no time in making preparations to do himſelf and his people juſtice, if the conduct of the court of Spain had laid him under that neceſſity: that he had at the ſame time, in the ſtrongeſt terms, repeated his inſtances for obtaining ſuch reparation for the many injuries and loſſes already ſuſtained, and ſuch effectual ſecurity for the future, as might prevent the conſequences of an open rupture: that he had now the ſatisfaction to acquaint them, that the meaſures he had purſued had been ſo ſucceſsful, that a convention was concluded and ratified between him and the king of Spain, by which, upon a ſtrict examination of the demands on both ſides, that prince had obliged himſelf to make reparation to the Britiſh ſubjects, by the payment of a certain ſtipulated ſum: that plenipotentiaries were likewiſe named and appointed for regulating, within a limited time, all thoſe grievances and abuſes which had hitherto interrupted the Britiſh commerce and navigation in the American ſeas; and for ſettling all matters in diſpute in ſuch a manner as might, for the future, prevent and remove all new cauſes and pretences of complaint, by a ſtrict obſervance of our mutual treaties, and a juſt regard to the rights and privileges belonging to each nation: and, finally, that he would order the convention to be laid before them.

The chief point with the miniſtry now was to make the convention (of which a copy had by ſome means been procured and publiſhed) paſs the two houſes of parliament, by procuring an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for the communicating it to them, which at the ſame time would be eſteemed an approbation of the meaſures. The motion met with great oppoſition, but was at laſt carried in the affirmative in both houſes, in the commons by a majority of twenty-eight.

By this convention it was agreed, in ſubſtance as follows:

"I. That immediately after the ſigning thereof, two plenipotentiaries on each ſide ſhould meet at Madrid, within ſix weeks after the day of exchanging the ratifications, there to confer and finally regulate the reſpective pretenſions of the two crowns.

"II. Until the limits of Florida and Carolina can be adjuſted, things ſhall remain there in their preſent ſituation.

"III. His Catholic majeſty ſhall cauſe to be paid to his Britannic majeſty the ſum of ninety-five thouſand pounds ſterling, as a ballance admitted to be due to the crown and ſubjects of Great Britain, after deduction made of the demand of the crown and ſubjects of Spain, to the end that the abovementioned ſum, together with the account of what has been acknowleged on the part of Great Britain to be due to Spain, on her demands, may be employed by his Britannic majeſty for the ſatisfaction and payment of the demand of his ſubjects upon the crown of Spain. But this reciprocal diſcharge ſhall not relate nor extend to the differences ſubſiſting between the crown of Spain and the South Sea company, company, nor to any particular nor private contract between either of the two crowns or their miniſters with the ſubjects of the other, or between the ſubjects of the one crown with thoſe of the other.

"IV. If it ſhould happen that, in conſequence of orders diſpatched by the court of Spain, any part of the value of certain (named) ſhips taken from the Engliſh, and included in the ninety-five thouſand pounds, be already paid, the ſame ſhall be deducted therefrom."

There were, beſides, two ſeparate articles, the firſt, importing, that the above-mentioned ſum of ninety-five thouſand pounds was to be paid at London, within four months after the exchange of the ratification.

By the ſecond ſeparate article it was ſtipulated, that the third article of the above convention ſhall not extend to ſhips taken ſince the tenth of December, 1737; in which caſes juſtice ſhall be done, according to the treaties, as if the convention had not been made. It being however underſtood that this relates only to the indemnification and ſatisfaction to be made for the effects ſeized, or prizes taken; but that the deciſion of the caſes which may happen, in order to remove all pretext for diſpute, is to be referred to the plenipotentiaries, to be determined according to the treaties.

This is the ſubſtance of a convention which made ſo much noiſe in Europe, and had almoſt ruined the internal tranquillity of England. What gave the greateſt diſguſt of all here was, the king of Spain's following declaration and proteſt, which he inſiſted on as a preliminary condition of his ratifying the above convention, viz. "That he reſerves to himſelf, in its full force, the right of being able to ſuſpend the Aſſiento for negroes, and of diſpatching the neceſſary orders for the execution thereof, in caſe the South-ſea company doth not ſubject itſelf to pay, within a ſhort term, the ſum of ſixty-eight thouſand pounds ſterling, which it has confeſſed to be owing on the duty for negroes, according to the regulation of fifty-two pence per dollar, and on the profits of the ſhip Royal Caroline. And farther declares, That under the validity and force of this proteſt the ſigning of the ſaid convention may be proceeded on, and in no other manner."

The injuſtice of this previous demand on the company was ſo apparent, that ſoon after the ſaid company's general court, on the firſt of March, reſolved not to pay the ſame without the king of Spain's coming to a juſt account with them for all the ſeizures and captures of their ſhips and merchandize, which he had engaged to refund to them.

The country party ſeeing every thing thus carried before the miniſter; and that writing, ſpeaking, and voting was no longer effectual, they determined to try ſome other means to quicken the ſenſe of the nation. This produced the SECESSION (as it was called) by which a conſiderable number of members retired into the country, and gave no more attendance during the whole ſeſſion; and about forty lords entered their proteſts upon the addreſs to his majeſty receiving the approbation of their houſe. The ſeceſſion ſeems to have been ſuggeſted by ſir William Wyndham, who made no ſecret during the debate, that ſhould the convention be approved, they were determined never again to come into the houſe. The queſtion therefore was no ſooner decided than ſir William Wyndham ſtood up, and expreſſed himſelf in the following terms:

"This addreſs (to congratulate his majeſty on the ſucceſs of his royal endeavours in concluding a convention with the king of Spain) is intended to convince mankind, that the treaty under our conſideration is a reaſonable and honourable treaty: but if a majority of thirty members in ſuch a full houſe, ſhould fail of that ſucceſs; if the people ſhould not implicitly reſign their reaſon to a vote of this houſe, What will be the conſequence? Will not the parliament loſe its authority? Will it not be thought, that, even in parliament, we are governed by a faction? And what the conſequence of this may be, I leave to thoſe gentlemen to conſider, who have given now their vote for this addreſs. For my own part, I will trouble you no more; but, with theſe my laſt words, I ſincerely pray to Almighty God, who has ſo often wonderfully protected theſe kingdoms, that he will graciouſly continue his protection over them, by preſerving us from that impending danger which threatens the nation from without, and likewiſe from that impending danger which threatens our conſtitution from within."

Sir William then left the houſe, and with him upwards of ſixty members, who choſe to withdraw after they had given their teſtimony againſt this meaſure of the miniſter, leſt even their attendance and fruitleſs oppoſition might ſeem to juſtify and give a ſanction to what they could not approve. The friends of the miniſter were ſo exaſperated againſt ſir William, on account of this ſpeech, that they were actually going to move to ſend him to the Tower; but ſir Robert, who poſſeſſed an admirable fortitude and coolneſs in all critical events, reſtrained them; but afterwards he himſelf, in a long and eloquent ſpeech, painted the oppoſition in terms more ſevere than he had ever before been known to make uſe of: he likened their conduct to that of the Jacobites, who abſented themſelves from parliament at the time when the biſhop of Rocheſter was tried and condemned.

Mean while the convention was no leſs ſtrenuouſly oppoſed in the upper houſe. Lord Carteret, who took the lead in the arguments againſt it, obſerved, that poſſibly one of the contracting parties had preſented a proteſt or declaration, importing, that he acceded to ſuch or ſuch a meaſure, only upon condition, that the terms of that proteſt or declaration ſhould be made good, "therefore (continued he) until my mind can be free from the moſt diſtant ſuſpicion that ſuch a proteſt may excite in the preſent caſe, I cannot form a juſt opinion of the tranſaction itſelf, nor communicate to your lordſhips any light that may be neceſſary for that purpoſe."

His lordſhip, in this part of his ſpeech, alluded to a proteſt that had been actually made by the marquis de la Quadra, the king of Spain's miniſter, previous to his maſter's ratifying the convention, in terms already mentioned. This proteſt had been delivered to Mr. Keene, the Britiſh embaſſador, at Madrid, who had promiſed, that if the South Sea company really owed the ſum inſiſted upon in this declaration (a circumſtance of which he declared himſelf at that time entirely ignorant), he would engage it ſhould be paid with the utmoſt punctuality. This conduct of Mr. Keene was greatly greatly cenſured by all the members in the oppoſition, who inſiſted, that he ought not to have ſo far forgot his character as to have accepted the proteſt: nay, they did not ſpare to ſay, that the whole tranſaction had been carried on by our miniſter at home, who was ready to give up the honour and advantage of his ſovereign and the nation, rather than enter into a war with Spain. Theſe ſuggeſtions were replied to, and the character of the miniſter at home, and our plenipotentiary abroad, ſtrongly vindicated by the lord Hervey, and other peers of the court party. After ſome debate a motion was made, "That a day ſhould be appointed for examining the directors of the South Sea company touching the ſum of ſixty-eight thouſand pounds, mentioned in the declaration given to the Britiſh miniſter, and claimed by his Catholic majeſty, as a debt due to him by the ſaid company, and that the directors of that company be ordered to attend at the bar of the houſe for that purpoſe."

This motion was oppoſed by lord Hervey and the earl of Ilay, who ſaid, that the South Sea company was a trading body, and as ſuch, had undoubtedly ſecrets in trade, which it would be very unjuſt, as well as impolitic, to oblige them to reveal at the bar of the houſe; beſides, they thought, that in any event, a proteſt ſigned but by one miniſter, and that too relating to a mercantile tranſaction, ought not to be conſidered as affecting the validity of a public treaty, nor ought it to come under the cognizance of that houſe, but the whole matter ought to be (as they doubted not it eaſily would be) ſettled by the South Sea company and the Spaniſh miniſter at London, without the intervention of any other power; and that therefore the motion ought not to be approved if it could be avoided.

The duke of Argyll, on the other hand, ſtrongly defended the motion: he declared himſelf to be of a very different opinion from the noble lord who had ſpoken on the other ſide of the queſtion; and that, ſo far from conſidering this as the affair of only one ſet of men in the kingdom, he looked upon it as an affair that nearly concerned the honour of the crown, ſince the Spaniſh miniſter by his declaration allowed no ſtrength, no validity to the convention, any farther than the terms of his demands were complied with. As to Mr. Keene's conduct, however other people might affect to defend it, he would venture to aſſert that it could by no means be juſtified. His grace then proceeded to tell the houſe, upon the beſt information, that the declaration was made in due form, before the convention was either ſigned or ratified; ſo that if the South-ſea company ſhould refuſe to pay the ſixty-eight thouſand pounds, he was certain that the Spaniſh court would inſiſt upon a nullity of all that had been done. They would tell us, that this declaration was of the ſame force with any article of the convention: that they had given us fair warning of it before the treaty was ſigned: and that, if we had not been pleaſed with the terms, we were under no obligation to ſign the convention, ſince it was not their fault if we were not ſufficiently appriſed of the conſequences. His grace owned, indeed, that the king of Spain had a right to demand from the South-ſea company the performance of engagements entered into by them: he ſaid, he could not conceive that his Catholic majeſty had any right to tell them, that if they would not pay whatever arbitrary demand he was pleaſed to make, he would revoke the contract. Upon the whole, his grace declared, he was for complying with the motion, that the houſe might have the opportunity of ſtrengthening his majeſty's hands, the better to enable him to obtain juſtice for the company, as well as the reſt of his ſubjects. Notwithſtanding theſe, and many other ſenſible and cogent arguments in favour of the motion, it was thrown out on a diviſion, by a majority of forty-nine againſt forty-two.

A meſſage having been delivered to the upper houſe from his majeſty, importing, that he had ſettled thirty-nine thouſand pounds per annum on the younger children of his family, and deſiring their lordſhips would bring in a bill to enable him to make that proviſion good; after ſome debate the houſe complied with his majeſty's requeſt, and a bill was ordered to be prepared for the purpoſe.

On the tenth of May the duke of Newcaſtle produced a ſubſidy-treaty, by which his majeſty obliged himſelf to pay to the king of Denmark ſeventy thouſand pounds per annum, on condition of that prince's furniſhing his Britannic majeſty a body of ſix thouſand men when demanded. At the ſame time his grace delivered a meſſage from the king, deſiring the houſe would enable him to fulfil this engagement; and alſo to raiſe what money and troops the exigency of affairs might require during the approaching receſs of the parliament.

This demand was violently oppoſed by the anti-miniſterial lords, at the head of whom was lord Carteret, and as vigorouſly ſupported by the other ſide. In the end, it was approved by the majority, and an addreſs was preſented, aſſuring his majeſty that the houſe would ſupport him in fulfilling his engagements, as well as in making ſuch further augmentation of his forces by ſea and land as he ſhould think neceſſary for the honour, intereſt, and ſafety of his kingdoms.

The ſame meſſage being communicated to the commons, they voted ſeventy-five thouſand five hundred and eighty-three pounds for the ſubſidy to Denmark, and five hundred thouſand pounds for augmenting the forces on any emergency. As Great Britain ſtood engaged by the convention to pay to the crown of Spain the ſum of ſixty thouſand pounds, in conſideration of the ſhips taken and deſtroyed by ſir George Byng, in the year 1718; which ſum was to be applied to the relief of the Britiſh merchants who had ſuffered by the Spaniſh depredations, the commons inſerted in the bill a clauſe, providing for this ſum to be paid by parliament.

In the courſe of this ſeſſion a very ſalutary law paſſed for the encouragement of the woollen manufacture, and two bills in behalf of the ſugar colonies; one permitting them, for a limited time, to export their produce directly to foreign parts, under proper reſtrictions; the other, making more effectual proviſions for ſecuring the duties laid upon the importation of foreign ſugars, rum, and molaſſes, into Great Britain, and his majeſty's plantations in America.

The public buſineſs being entirely finiſhed, the king came to the houſe of peers on the fourteenth day of June, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a

ſhort ſpeech, in which he recommended unanimity amongſt ourſelves, as the only ſure means of diſappointing the expectations of our enemies.

And now the rumour of a war with Spain began to revive, notwithſtanding the parliamentary ſanction the convention had received: for the king of Spain did not only ſuffer the four months to elapſe, within which time he was to pay the before-mentioned ninety-five thouſand pounds, on pretext of the South Sea company's failure of paying his demand of the ſixty-eight thouſand pounds; but inſtead of fulfilling the terms of the convention, he ordered ſeizures to be made of the ſhips and goods of his majeſty's ſubjects wherever they could be found, in his dominions or otherwiſe: and alſo ordered all the Britiſh ſubjects in his dominions to depart in a ſhorter time than allowed by treaties. This proceeding put an end to the conferences which we had ſtill carried on with that crown; and Mr. Keene preſented a thundering declaration to the court of Madrid, which was followed by an order of council at home (dated July 10, this year, 1739) for granting letters of marque and repriſal to our merchants. The preamble to this order breathes a true ſpirit of reſentment, and had the honour to be ſigned by the two archbiſhops, and ſome other privy counſellors, in the abſence of the miniſter, who had retired into the country. In the mean while, the land forces were augmented; many ſhips were put into commiſſion; and there was a very hot preſs for ſeamen to mann them; for which purpoſe an embargo was laid on all merchant-ſhips; and ſeveral other ſteps were taken that ſeemed to give countenance to the earneſt hopes and expectations of the nation.

The orders for repriſals had been very prudently diſpatched, above a month before their publication in London, to commodore Brown, who then commanded a ſquadron at Jamaica, in order to give him an opportunity of making the beſt uſe of them before the Spaniards could have notice of their deſigns, and conſequently be prepared againſt them. A reſolution was alſo formed of endeavouring to preclude the Spaniards from the reſources of their wealth in the Weſt Indies and the South Seas.

With this view two ſquadrons were immediately ordered to be got ready with all expedition; the one to be put under the command of George Anſon, eſq. who was then captain of his majeſty's ſhip the Centurion; and the other, under that of captain Cornwall. The ſquadron under Mr. Anſon was to take a regiment of foot on board, with three independent companies, to be commanded by colonel Bland, to ſet ſail with all poſſible expedition, and not to call at any place till they reached Java Head in the Eaſt Indies, and there ſtay no longer than to take in water, and afterwards proceed to Manila in Luconia, one of the Philippine iſlands belonging to the Spaniards. Captain Cornwall's ſquadron was to be of equal ſtrength with the former, and to paſs round Cape Horne, directly into the South Seas; and after cruizing along that coaſt, and attempting the Spaniſh ſettlements there, if practicable, was in its return to rendezvous at Manila; and after its junction with captain Anſon, the ſquadrons were to act in concert for the execution of ſome conſiderable projects, for which they were to receive farther orders. This ſcheme was in general ſo well liked by the nation, that about the beginning of September orders were ſent by a ſmall veſſel to captain Anſon, to return with his ſhips directly to Portſmouth.

The great view of the nation being now to diſtreſs the Spaniards, in order to promote it the more effectually, another ſquadron was ordered to be fitted out for the Weſt Indies, and the command of it given to Edward Vernon, eſq. then juſt made vice-admiral of the blue, who, on account of the eminent ſervices he had formerly done his country in that part of the world, was looked on by all as the moſt proper perſon to be entruſted with ſo important an enterprize. Though the conduct, fidelity, and diligence of this brave ſea commander, added to a thorough knowlege of the American ſeas, had been already ſufficiently ſhewn, to the entire ſatisfaction of the nation, yet his ſervices had been hitherto diſregarded, at leaſt unrewarded, by the government. But though his rank among the flag officers had been ſo long overlooked and neglected; and though he had withdrawn from any public employment, and on ſeveral accounts had been diſguſted at the conduct of the miniſtry; yet upon application made to him to undertake the command of a ſquadron for the ſervice of his country, he immediately laid aſide all private animoſity, and ſacrificing every other conſideration to the welfare of the public, very chearfully obeyed the ſummons, deſiring only a few days to ſettle his family affairs. The ſquadron being got ready, the admiral was, under his majeſty's ſign-manual, appointed commander in chief of all his ſhips in the Weſt Indies. Soon after, arriving at Portſmouth, he took under his command nine ſhips of the line, beſides leſſer veſſels, and ſoon after ſailed on his expedition.

In the beginning of September don Geraldino, the king of Spain's envoy-extraordinary, and Terry, his agent at London for the Aſſiento contract, both left this kingdom, and returned home; and Mr. Keene, the Britiſh miniſter, left Madrid about the ſame time. On the nineteenth of October his majeſty ſigned a declaration of war againſt Spain, which was proclaimed on the twenty-third in the uſual manner, and at the accuſtomed places, amidſt innumerable crowds of people, who teſtified their ſatisfaction thereat. In his declaration, his majeſty charges the king of Spain with breaking the convention lately concluded, by not paying the ſtipulated ſum, admitted to be due to the ſubjects of Great Britain, in the time appointed; and alleges, that his declaring war againſt the ſaid king is for the maintaining the honour of his crown and kingdom, and for the obtaining redreſs for the much-injured merchants and traders who, from all parts of the kingdom, made earneſt petition for relief. It was indeed high time for our government to take this ſtep (though done with more than ſeeming reluctance) for the violence and inſolence of the Spaniards in America were become abſolutely intolerable, principally owing to our own ſhamefully puſillanimous temporizing at any rate, rather than reſolutely doing ourſelves juſtice by force of arms.

In ſome little time after the declaration of war, an account came from admiral Haddock of his having taken two rich Caracca ſhips; but this good news was in ſome meaſure allayed by the eſcape of the Aſſogue ſhips, the intercepting of which was the chief object of our government. These ships, instead of coming from La Vera Cruz, by the Madeira or Canary Islands, as usual, sailed by the Bahamas, north about, and then westward, till within sight of Ireland, and so by the Land's-End of England, made Ushant (the point of France) whence creeping along shore, they at last crossed the Bay of Biscay. A squadron of the English fleet was then cruizing off Cadiz and Cape St. Vincent, and another off Cape Finisterre; but the Spanish admiral, by some means or other, seems to have had notice of all their stations, and took care not to come within eighty or one hundred leagues of them.

We heard of nothing for some time but places sacked, ships taken, and all advantages gained on our side. The Spaniards were in the utmost consternation, and seemed neither to have power nor inclination to oppose our progress.

Mean while, the conduct of the French court and the States-general gave occasion to various surmises. It was strongly apprehended that the former, notwithstanding their professions to the contrary, would declare in favour of the Spaniards, while the latter appeared disposed to observe a strict neutrality. Mr. Horace Walpole, the minister's brother, had been sent to the Hague, in order, if possible, to persuade the States-general to espouse our cause; but all he could obtain from their High Mightinesses was a vague promise, that they would still continue to cultivate the friendship of the English; and would not fail, in case of necessity, to furnish us with the succours stipulated by treaty.

The events of war still proved very unfavourable to the emperor: he had bestowed the command of his army upon veldt-marshal count Wallis, who assembled his forces in the neighbourhood of Belgrade, and advanced towards Crotska, where he was attacked by the Turks with such impetuosity and perseverance, that he was obliged to give ground, after a long and obstinate engagement, in which he lost above six thousand men. The Turks were afterwards routed at Jaboutra: nevertheless, their grand army invested Belgrade on the side of Servia, and carried on the operations of the siege with extraordinary vigour. The emperor dreading the loss of the place, seeing his finances exhausted, and his army considerably diminished, consented to a negotiation for peace, which was finally concluded in the month of November. By this treaty the house of Austria ceded to the grand seignior, Belgrade, Sabatz, Servia, Austrian Walachia, the isle and fortress of Orseva, with the fort of St. Elizabeth; and the contracting powers agreed that the Danube and the Saave should serve as boundaries to the two empires.

The Russian general, count Munich, had obtained a victory over the Ottoman forces at Cholzun in Moldavia, and made himself master of that place; but the czarina finding herself abandoned by the emperor, and unable to cope with the whole power of the Turkish empire, took the first opportunity of putting an end to the war, upon honourable terms. After a short negociation the conferences ended in a treaty, by which the czarina was left in possession of Asoph, on condition that its fortifications should be demolished; and the ancient limits were re-established between the two empires.

The vast trade which England enjoyed at the beginning of this war proved of the greatest detriment to herself, and advantage to her enemies, as it presented them with the more frequent opportunities of making captures at sea. The French lent them both ships and seamen, who sailed under Spanish colours; and their success in privateering at first was so great, that the commercial part of the nation exclaimed vehemently, and not without some shew of reason, at the negligence of the admiralty in providing proper convoys for our merchant ships. The city of London, as the greatest sufferer on this occasion, was inflamed to a degree of distraction against the minister, whom they accused of turning against his country a war, into which, it was well known, he had been forced against his will, and which he was wont contemptuously to stile "the merchants war." Thanks were ordered to the city members for their having opposed the convention; and at the same time a paper of instructions to them was drawn up, replete with the most stinging reflections on the minister and his measures, and requiring the members to make the passing a place and pension-bill the previous step to the passing of any money-bill whatever. The example of London was followed by other great cities and corporations all over England. This proceeding was represented, by the friends of the ministry, as utterly unconstitutional, and tending to deprive the representatives of that very liberty which their constituents seemed so earnestly to contend for. But here I would beg leave to ask, what other way those constituents could possibly find of making known their real sentiments to their representatives, whose duty it most undoubtedly is to deliver to the great assembly of the nation the sense of that part of it which they have the honour to represent? The Londoners gave still more remarkable instances of their resentment against those who voted for the convention, by setting aside sir George Champion, member for Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire, the next alderman in rotation to the chair, from being lord-mayor this year, which office he was never after suffered to possess, because he gave his vote to that measure. For several years this innovation caused great feuds in the city at the annual election of a mayor.

This year was distinguished by the rise of a new religious sect, called Methodists, the disciples of one Whitefield, a clergyman of a warm and enthusiastic turn, and of two brothers named Wesley, who have since found so many votaries amongst the common people, as greatly to alarm the friends of rational religion and true piety.

The British parliament meeting on the fifteenth day of November, his majesty in his speech informed both houses, that he had augmented his forces both by sea and land; but expressed his apprehension that the court of Spain had been encouraged to that conduct which had made it necessary for him to have recourse to arms, by the heats and animosities which had been raised here at home. Affectionate addresses were presented by both houses, after a faint opposition made by the ministry.

In the course of the debate on this subject in the lower house, sir John Barnard took occasion to complain of the little care that had been taken, since the commencement of hostilities, to protect the traders of Great Britain, who, he affirmed, had been been much greater ſufferers by captures than the Spaniards. In anſwer to this inſinuation ſir Charles Wager, then at the head of the admiralty-board, obſerved, that as to the Engliſh having been greater ſufferers by captures than the Spaniards, he believed it was true, and there was a ſufficient, perhaps an invincible, reaſon for it; namely, that the former had a great deal more to loſe than the latter: that the ſea was covered with Engliſh ſhips, and the extent of their trade gave the Spaniards an opportunity of making frequent captures: that the Spaniards had but very little foreign commerce in Europe, and the little they had was carried on in neutral bottoms, ſo that the flags of other nations protected their property; but that, in his opinion, the war in all other reſpects had been duly proſecuted. He then proceeded to ſhew, that the government had no fewer than thirty-four ſhips of war employed in its ſervice in the Weſt Indies; a greater number than had ever been employed in thoſe parts in any former period.

The ſeceding members had now reſumed their ſeats in the lower houſe; and Mr. Pulteney, in an eloquent ſpeech, thought proper to vindicate their conduct in the extraordinary ſtep they had taken. He was anſwered by ſir Robert Walpole, who was pretty ſevere upon the late ſeceſſion, which he treated with a good deal of contempt and indignation. He aſſerted, that it was chiefly owing to their abſence that ſo many uſeful and popular bills were paſſed towards the end of the laſt ſeſſion; and if they were returned only to oppoſe and perplex, he ſhould not be at all ſorry to ſee them ſecede again.

The minority, however, continued inflexible in their oppoſition to the miniſtry; and on the twenty-firſt of November ſir W. Wyndham, at the end of a long ſpeech, in which he inveighed with great acrimony againſt the conduct of the adminiſtration, moved, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, as a dutiful return to his gracious deſire of the advice of his parliament at this critical and important juncture; and as a farther teſtimony of their firm reſolution vigorouſly to ſupport his majeſty in the proſecution of the war againſt Spain, humbly to beſeech his majeſty never to agree to any treaty or negociation for a peace with that crown, unleſs the acknowlegement of the natural and undoubted right which the Engliſh had to navigate in the American ſeas, to and from any part of his majeſty's dominions, without being ſeized, ſearched, viſited, or ſtopped, under any pretence whatſoever, ſhall have been firſt obtained as a preliminary article."

This motion was too reaſonable and popular for the miniſter to venture to oppoſe. It accordingly paſſed without a contradictory voice, met with the concurrence of the lords, and on the twenty-third of November was preſented by both houſes to his majeſty, who in his anſwer was pleaſed to tell them, that their unanimous and vigorous ſupport, by enabling him to carry on the war, would be the beſt means for procuring a ſafe and honourable peace; and that they might depend upon his uſing his utmoſt endeavours to obtain effectual ſecurity for the juſt rights of navigation and commerce belonging to his ſubjects.

Mr. Pulteney ſoon after revived a bill which he had formerly prepared for the encouragement of ſeamen, which, after a long diſpute and eager oppoſition on the part of the miniſtry, paſſed both houſes, and obtained the royal aſſent. It is hereby enacted, that during the preſent war merchant ſhips may be navigated by any number of foreign ſeamen not exceeding three-fourths of the ſhip's company: and for the better encouragement of foreign ſeamen to ſerve on board Britiſh ſhips during this war, ſuch foreign ſeamen ſerving (as well on board our merchant-men as ſhips of war) for two years, ſhall afterward be deemed, in all reſpects, natural-born ſubjects, but without capability of enjoying any poſts or offices of truſt, &c. under the government. This act alſo empowers the crown in any future war, by proclamation, during ſuch war and no longer, to permit the like number of foreign ſeamen to ſerve in merchant ſhips, privateers, and men of war. This prudent law was followed by another very wiſe one, in ſundry reſpects reſembling it, viz. An act for naturalizing foreign proteſtants in the Britiſh American plantations. The more immediate object of this ſtatute was in favour of ſome thouſands of proteſtants perſecuted and oppreſſed in Germany and elſewhere; all of whom were, before and about this time, ſettled in the different provinces of the Britiſh continent colonies of America, chiefly on the back parts thereof weſtward. As a further encouragement to ſeamen to enter into his majeſty's ſervice, a proclamation was ſoon after publiſhed, importing, "That his majeſty would grant to his ſubjects ſeparate or united charters or commiſſions, for the more effectual enabling them to attack or deſtroy the ſhips, goods, factories, and ſettlements of the Spaniards, and to ſecure to them and their heirs the full and undoubted right, property, and title, to what they ſhould take or cauſe to be taken from the enemy."

The minority having, in their obſervations upon the management of the war, complained, amongſt other things, of admiral Vernon having been ſent out of Great Britain without a ſupply of land forces, the government, to remedy this inconvenience, had given orders for raiſing ſix regiments of marines, to conſiſt in the whole of four thouſand eight hundred and ninety men, at the expence of one hundred and eighteen thouſand two hundred and fourteen pounds to the public. When this eſtimate was laid before the houſe of commons, Mr. Sandys, or lord Polwarth (I am not clear which) moved for an addreſs to the king, deſiring that this body of forces ſhould be compoſed of draughts from the old regiments: that as few officers ſhould be appointed as the nature of the ſervice would admit: and that the houſe would recommend this method to his majeſty, in tender compaſſion to his people, already burthened with many heavy and grievous taxes. Although this motion was calculated to anſwer the moſt juſt and ſalutary purpoſes, yet, as it tended to deprive the miniſtry of an opportunity of greatly extending its influence by new creations, they ſet all their force to oppoſe it; and it was finally rejected, by a majority of one hundred and ſeventy-ſeven againſt ninety-five.

The minority were not diſcouraged by this repulſe, but renewed their attacks againſt the miniſter, in the form of ſeveral motions, for enquiring into the conduct of thoſe who concluded the convention, &c. &c. But they were all over-ruled.

The penſion-bill was again revived, and ſo powerfully ſupported by the eloquence of Mr. Pulteney, ſir W. Wyndham, and Mr. Lyttleton, that it made its way through the lower to the upper houſe; but there it was again loſt, upon a diviſion, after a long and violent debate.

On February 12, after all the eſtimates for the ſervice of the current year had been ordered in, ſir Robert Walpole (as chancellor of the Exchequer) preſented to the houſe a meſſage from his majeſty, importing, that having under his royal conſideration certain meaſures which would be attended with ſome extraordinary expences, not comprehended in the eſtimates laid before the houſe, his majeſty hoped they would enable him to carry on the ſame in the moſt effectual manner. This meſſage was referred, without one contradictory voice, to the committee of ſupply, who, upon the fourteenth of the ſame month, reſolved to grant his majeſty two hundred thouſand pounds to account for carrying on the war, and about nine thouſand five hundred pounds for ſervices that year, not provided for by parliament; which was agreed to by the houſe. A million was likewiſe granted out of the ſinking fund, and about two hundred thouſand pounds for the ordinary of the navy.

The government having found very great difficulty in manning their ſhips of war; and the practice of preſſing for that purpoſe having been long a ſubject of complaint in England; ſir Charles Wager preſented a bill to the houſe for regiſtering all ſeamen, watermen, fiſhermen, lightermen, keelmen, bargemen, and ſea-faring men, capable of ſerving at ſea throughout his majeſty's dominions. The minority exclaimed againſt this practice as of French origin, and tending to reduce a Britiſh ſailor to the moſt abject degree of ſlavery. In fine, by mere force of declamation of the anti-miniſterial party, this meaſure was rendered ſo odious, that it was judged moſt prudent to drop it for the preſent. Here I cannot help obſerving, that the gentlemen in the oppoſition ſeemed to act more from a principle of animoſity to the miniſter, than from a true attention to the good of their country; for ſure we ſtand in great need of ſome ſuch method of having always in readineſs a competent number of ſeamen to man the royal navy, without having recourſe to the barbarous and unconſtitutional practice of preſſing. The bill offered by ſir Charles had in it perhaps ſome reſtrictions not ſtrictly conſiſtent with the freedom of Engliſhmen; but ſurely ſuch amendments might have been made therein as would have rendered it a conſtitutional and wholeſome law.

The king having by meſſage communicated to the houſe his intention of diſpoſing of his daughter the princeſs Mary in marriage to prince Frederic of Heſſe-Caſſel, and expreſſed his hope that the commons would enable him to give a ſuitable portion with his daughter, they unanimouſly agreed to grant forty thouſand pounds for that purpoſe, and preſented an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for having communicated to the houſe this intended marriage.

The two firſt months of the year 1740 were diſtinguiſhed by a moſt intenſe froſt, which began on Chriſtmas day 1739, and continued almoſt eight weeks. The Thames was entirely frozen up, and multitudes of people walked over that river upon the ice. Carriages of all kinds paſſed to and fro as on firm ground. Booths were erected, and a public fair kept upon it. The poor were very great ſufferers by this calamity, as the price of coals and other neceſſaries of life was very high, particularly towards the cloſe of the froſt. Let it however be recorded, to the honour of Engliſh humanity, that the charity and munificence of the great and opulent kept pace with the diſtreſſes of their wretched fellow-creatures. The benevolence of his majeſty and the royal family ſet the example to the nobility, who were readily followed in ſo laudable a work, by all ſuch who had the power of relieving the wants of thoſe in leſs happy circumſtances, Societies for the more equal diſtribution of private charities were every-where formed, and ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſonages in the kingdom made it their pride to become not only ſtewards, but even collectors for the poor.

Little more remains to add to the hiſtory of parliament this ſeſſion, ſave the mention of ſome excellent laws of which it was productive. A bill for prohibiting commerce with Spain created ſome difference between the two houſes, which occaſioned ſeveral conferences; but the lords at laſt dropped their amendment, and it paſſed. The ſtate of paper-money in the Britiſh colonies in America was taken into conſideration, and found to be very deplorable, and prejudicial to trade; and ſeveral unanimous reſolutions for addreſſing his majeſty on that head were paſſed by the commons, particularly, that his majeſty ſhould require and command the reſpective governors of his colonies and plantations in America not to give aſſent to, or paſs any act whereby bills of credit may be iſſued in lieu of money, without a clauſe to be inſerted in ſuch act, declaring that the ſame ſhall not take effect until the ſaid act ſhould be approved by his majeſty. An excellent law was continued relating to the premiums upon the importation of all kinds of materials for ſhip-rigging, and for encouraging the Greenland fiſhery, by granting a farther bounty to all ſhips employed in the whale-fiſhery during the war, and for protecting their crews from being impreſſed.

On the twenty-ninth of April his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech, in which he thanked the commons for the ſupplies they had ſo liberally granted, recommended unanimity and concord to both houſes, and expreſſed his hopes that the preparations which he was making for carrying on the war, in the moſt vigorous and effectual manner, would be bleſſed with ſucceſs, equal to the juſtice of his cauſe. The parliament was then prorogued to the third of June, and by various prorogations afterwards to the eighteenth of November following. In the beginning of May his majeſty ſet out for Hanover, after having appointed a regency. In a few days after his departure the marriage of the princeſs Mary with the prince of Heſſe was ſolemnized by proxy, the duke of Cumberland ſtanding for that prince; and in June her highneſs ſailed for the continent. Some little time before the ſeſſion of parliament broke up, the duke of Argyll reſigned all his poſts under the government. So much for the common domeſtic occurrences of this period. I now come to conſider events more intereſting to the public, and ſuch as for a time filled the nation with great ſatisfaction, and ſeemed to charm the voice of oppoſition into ſilence.

On the thirteenth of March, while the Britiſh parliament was yet ſitting, captain Rentone arrived from from vice-admiral Vernon, with the important advice that he had made himſelf maſter of the town and forts of Porto Bello, with ſix ſhips only.

Porto Bello ſtands on the north ſide of the Iſthmus of Darien, which, running from eaſt to weſt betwixt the North and South Seas, joins the two continents of North and South America. It is eighteen leagues from Panama, which lies on the north ſide of the Iſthmus, has a convenient bay about a mile deep, with good anchorage and ſhelter for ſhips, and near half a mile broad at the mouth of the river. At the entrance of the north ſide of the bay, cloſe by a ſteep rock, ſtood a ſtrong caſtle, called the Iron Caſtle, mounting ſeventy-eight great guns, with a battery beneath, parallel with the water, of twenty-two guns. The caſtle and fort were defended by a garriſon of three hundred men. On the oppoſite ſide of the bay, but about a mile farther up, on an eminence, ſtood La Gloria, another caſtle, conſiſting of two regular baſtions toward the ſea, mounting ninety guns, with a curtain between of twenty-two guns, beſides a line of eight guns pointing to the mouth of the harbour; the whole defended by four hundred men. A little above this caſtle, near the other end of the town, on a point running into the bay, ſtood Fort St. Jeronymo, a ſort of quadrangular redoubt, ſtrongly built, well mounted with cannon, and properly manned. Under the cannon of Gloria Caſtle and Fort St. Jeronymo, all the enemy's ſhips in the harbour rode at anchor; and this defence, with the guns of the Iron Caſtle, rendered the entrance of the harbour extremely difficult. At the bottom of the harbour lies the town of Porto Bello, built along the ſhore in the form of a creſcent. It is the market through which all the wealth of Peru, and the manufactures of Europe, circulate annually. It was taken by the Buccaneers in 1688; but afterwards, being reforti-fied more ſtrongly, it had for ſome time been reckoned impregnable; ſo that it was formally given out, that a ſquadron of ſhips, and at leaſt eight thouſand men, could not take it, when the Britiſh ſhips lay rotting, and our ſailors dying away, at the Baſtimentos, under the unfortunate Hoſier. Admiral Vernon, however, had, ſome time before this expedition, given out that he would engage to take it with "only ſix ſhips of war." He proved the truth of his aſſertion, in the manner I ſhall now relate.

Admiral Vernon arrived at Port Royal at Jamaica on the twelfth of October, 1739, where he firſt took care to notify his arrival to Mr. Trelawney, the governor of that iſland; and at the ſame time deſired his aſſiſtance and concurrence in the enterprize for which he had been ordered into thoſe parts, aſſuring him of his own zeal to execute the ſame, and his endeavours to maintain the moſt cordial harmony with his excellency. The admiral was, ſoon after his arrival, joined by commodore Brown, with the Hampton Court only; and having obtained a full ſtate of the Spaniſh ſhipping in thoſe ſeas, and the places at which they were ſtationed, he from thence concluded that they had concerted to meet at Carthagena, in order to go and open the fair at Porto Bello, the money having been ſome time before carried from Panama: he therefore reſolved to ſail immediately, and get, if poſſible, to Porto Bello before them, that he might loſe no time. Upon communicating his inſtructions, and the proper ſignals, to his captains, and having taken in the neceſſary ſtores, on the third of November he ordered commodore Brown to hoiſt his diſtinguiſhing pendant on board the Hampton Court, and get ready to ſail with the other captains, on the fifth, early in the morning. The admiral's whole ſquadron was to be employed on this ſervice, conſiſting of ſix ſhips only, viz. the Burford, his own ſhip (with captain Watſon under him) of ſeventy guns, and five hundred men; the Hampton Court, the commodore's ſhip (who had captain Dent under him) of ſeventy guns, and four hundred and ninety-five men; the Worceſter, captain Perry Mayne, of ſixty guns and four hundred men; the Stafford, captain Trevor, of ſixty guns, and four hundred men; the Princeſs Louiſa, captain Waterhouſe, of ſixty guns, and four hundred men; the Norwich, captain Herbert, of fifty guns, and three hundred men; the whole number of ſailors on board this ſquadron being two thouſand four hundred and ninety-five men, beſides two hundred land forces, commanded by captain Newton.

On the fifth the admiral ſailed from Port Royal, and ſteered for Porto Bello; but by reaſon of contrary winds, it was the evening of the twentieth before he could get ſight of that harbour; and then, there being but little wind ſtirring, leſt his ſquadron ſhould be driven to the eaſtward of the harbour, he made the ſignal for coming to an anchor, about ſix leagues off the ſhore. On the twenty-firſt in the morning, he plied in line of battle to windward; but the wind ſtill continuing eaſterly, he was forced to confine his attack to the Iron Fort, cloſe to which captain Rentone piloted the ſquadron.

Commodore Brown, in the Hampton Court, who led the attack with undaunted reſolution, having fired upwards of four hundred ſhot in about twenty-five minutes at the Iron Fort, and being well ſeconded by captain Herbert in the Norwich, and captain Mayne in the Worceſter, the admiral perceived that the Spaniards had quitted ſeveral parts of the fort; whereupon he made a ſignal for the boats, in which were about forty ſailors, with a company of marines and their officers, to land with all imaginable expedition, whilſt he was coming up to the fort to batter it. The admiral luffing up as near the fort as he conveniently could, was ſaluted with a whole volley, every ſhot of which almoſt took place, though but three men were killed, and five wounded. Our ſailors, whoſe courage always increaſes with danger, returned their ſalute ſo effectually, that though the enemy diſcharged a few more ſhot, they did us afterwards no conſiderable damage; for the fire of the Burford's ſmall arms ſcoured the lower batteries of the Spaniards, driving them from thence, where they could do moſt execution: and by this means alſo our men were ſecured in landing. As ſoon as they had ſet foot on ſhore, our ſeamen began ſcaling the walls, which they chiefly performed by one man ſetting himſelf cloſe under an embrazure, whilſt another climbed upon his ſhoulders; and thus they entered under the mouths of the great guns, which ſtruck ſuch a general panic into the Spaniards, that the officers and men at the lower batteries quitted them, and fled further up into the fort, after they had firſt hung out a white flag for capitulating; which the admiral anſwered with another another from his ſhip; but ſuch was the eagerneſs of the men on board his ſhip and the Stafford, that it was ſome time before they could be made to deſiſt from firing.

In the mean while, the ſeamen who had climbed up the walls of the lower battery having firſt ſtruck the colours, afterwards drew up the ſoldiers; upon which the Spaniards, who had retreated into the caſtle, ſurrendered at diſcretion. Of theſe only five officers and thirty-five men remained out of three hundred, the reſt having been killed, wounded, or made their eſcape.

The ſhips which had gone in before the admiral fell ſo far to leeward, that they were not within ſight of Gloria Caſtle; but the admiral's own ſhip lying open to it, the Spaniards kept firing one of their largeſt guns at him till night, but did little or no execution.

Next morning, being the twenty-ſecond, the admiral went on board the Hampton Court, commodore Brown, in order to call a council of war, and give the neceſſary directions for warping the ſhips up in the night, to attack Gloria Caſtle, as it would have been impracticable to have attempted it in the day time. But in this he was prevented, by the enemy's hoiſting a white flag, and ſending a boat with a flag of truce to the admiral, and the conditions ſigned on which they deſired to capitulate; which were, "That the governor would deliver up all the fortifications, provided the garriſon might be allowed to march out with the honours of war; have an indemnity for themſelves, the town, and the inhabitants; and be permitted to keep all the ſhips in the harbour. This laſt article could not by any means be admitted, the admiral being reſolved to have thoſe ſhips which had done the Engliſh merchants all the damages they complained of on theſe coaſts. Accordingly, he drew up the articles on which he was willing to treat, and ſent them back to the governor, allowing him only a few hours to take his reſolution: but within the time limited the conditions offered were accepted; in conſequence of which the admiral ſent captain Newton, who commanded the detachment of ſoldiers from Jamaica, with about one hundred and twenty men, to take poſſeſſion of Gloria Caſtle and Jeronymo Fort, being the two fortreſſes which defended the harbour, the one above, the other below the town.

In the harbour were two Spaniſh men of war of twenty guns each, together with a ſnow; the crews of which, upon ſeeing the regular and bold attack made on the Iron Fort, and deſpairing of being able to defend themſelves, fell to plundering the town in the night of the twenty-firſt, and committed ſhocking outrages on the inhabitants. Our admiral being now maſter of the place, proceeded to blow up the fortifications, ſpiked up above eighty iron cannon, and brought off, on board his own fleet, a great number of braſs ordnance, and a great quantity of ammunition, leaving the harbour quite open and defenceleſs. Thus was this place totally deſtroyed; and tho' the admiral, for want of land forces, was not able to puſh his conqueſts further up the country, yet the national advantage ariſing from what he had already done was very conſiderable, particularly with regard to the traders of Jamaica, who had now a fair opportunity of opening an extenſive commerce with the Spaniards, who were fond of clandeſtinely conveying their money from Panama over the Iſthmus.

Soon after the reduction of this place, the admiral was joined by captain Knowles, in the Diamond; by the Windſor, captain Berkely; by the Angleſea, captain Reddiſh; and by captain Stapleton, in the Sheerneſs; which ſhips he had detached from Jamaica on different cruizes.

Mr. Vernon, during his ſtay at Porto Bello, ſent a letter to the preſident of Panama, demanding a releaſement of the factors and ſervants belonging to the South Sea company, whom the Spaniards had confined in that place; together with the reſtitution of their own perſonal effects, as well as thoſe of the aforeſaid company. In conſequence of this meſſage, the preſident ſent an officer, with Dr. Humphreys and Dr. Wright, factors; and alſo with the ſervants of the company, who were delivered to the admiral on board his own ſhip.

On the thirteenth of December the admiral ſailed with his ſquadron from Porto Bello, on his return to Jamaica. In the paſſage the ſquadron met with hard gales, by which it was diſperſed, and ſeveral of the ſhips received damage in their maſts and rigging. Nevertheleſs, they at laſt all joined the admiral in Port Royal, where we ſhall leave him meditating future conqueſts, and return to England.

No ſooner was the ſucceſs of the Britiſh admiral made known to the people at home, than a profuſion of rejoicings overſpread the united kingdoms and Ireland. Bonfires blazed in every ſtreet, and the houſes were illuminated: the ſhouts of "Vernon for ever!" were heard from every tongue: both houſes of parliament, the city of London, and all the conſiderable corporations in the kingdom, addreſſed his majeſty upon the occaſion. The houſe of commons ſent the admiral their thanks; the city voted him its freedom. In ſhort, a Roman conſul, after reducing a province, never received greater marks of public applauſe from his country than admiral Vernon did upon his demolition of Porto Bello.

Admiral Haddock was all this ſummer cruizing in the Mediterranean, and had for ſome time actually blocked up the mouth of that part of Cadiz where the Spaniſh fleet was then laying. The Spaniards, in order to releaſe their ſhips, made a feint with another ſquadron under admiral Pintado, to recover the iſland of Minorca. Admiral Haddock fell into the ſnare: he quitted his ſtation to haſten to the relief of that iſland, when the Cadiz fleet embraced that opportunity to get out with nine men of war and two frigates, which eſcaped to Ferrol, and joined another ſquadron in that port. But the want of ſupplies of treaſure from New Spain detained this united fleet in harbour till the French thought proper to pull off the maſk, by ſending a ſtrong ſquadron from Breſt and Toulon, under the command of the marquis d'Antin, to Martinico, one of their Weſt India ſettlements, with ſecret orders not only to act offenſively againſt the Britiſh ſubjects, either jointly with the Spaniards or ſeparately, but even to concert meaſures with them for attacking Jamaica; and at the ſame time declaring, that France could no longer behold, with an eye of indifference, the enterprizes which the Engliſh nation had formed in America, nor ſuffer them to make any new eſtabliſhments there.

The Britiſh miniſtry, who had little ſuſpected any ſuch behaviour from France, were thunderſtruck at this proceeding, while the voice of the public called loudly for proſecuting the war with the utmoſt vigour, in order to convince that court that we were not to be intimidated by their inſolent threats. It was therefore neceſſary to make a ſhew of ſome ſecret expedition, to amuſe the nation, and ſmother their riſing diſcontents. With this view, a powerful fleet was aſſembled at Portſmouth, when, on the twenty-fourth of June, ſir John Norris, admiral of the red, hoiſted his flag on board the Victory, a firſt-rate, of one hundred and ten guns, having under him Philip Cavendiſh, eſq. admiral, and ſir Chaloner Ogle, rear-admiral of the blue. Some thoughts were at this time entertained of one day making his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland lord high-admiral of Great Britain; for his highneſs ſuddenly quitting the camp, which had been formed at Hounſlow in expectation of an invaſion, arrived unexpectedly in a ſhallop at the Iſle of Wight, where he reviewed a body of marines encamped there, and then went, by the ſame ſhallop, on board the Victory man of war, to ſerve as a volunteer in the intended expedition.

The deſtination of this fine fleet, conſiſting of twenty-one ſail of the line, and three fire-ſhips, was variouſly conjectured. The moſt received opinion was an attempt to be made on the Spaniſh ſquadrons in Ferrol: but whatever were the real motives, the project at laſt came to nothing; for, after the fleet had been detained about a week at St. Helen's by contrary winds, it ſailed from thence on the fourteenth of July with the convoy and the merchant ſhips for Portugal and the Streights; but meeting with hard gales at ſouth-weſt, in which the Lion man of war, of ſixty guns, ran foul of the Victory, and carried away her bowſprit, and the Lion loſing her fore-maſt, the fleet returned to St. Helen's, and on the twenty-ſecond ſailed again, but was detained at Torbay for near a month; and at laſt, on the thirtieth of September (the ſeaſon of action for ſuch large ſhips being over) returned to Spithead, where his royal highneſs diſembarked. Thus inglorioufly ended a very expenſive armament, which had engroſſed the whole attention of the public, and drawn upon it the eyes of all Europe, without effecting any one purpoſe.

In the ſame month of September a ſmall ſquadron was fitted out under the command of commodore Anſon, which gave riſe to that gentleman's memorable voyage round the globe. His orders were to ſail to the South Seas, in order to attack the enemy's colonies, and co-operate occaſionally with admiral Vernon acroſs the Iſthmus of Darien. The ſcheme was well laid; and though it failed in its principal purpoſe, was afterwards productive of great glory to the commodore, and of much advantage to the nation. This ſquadron conſiſted of the following five ſhips of war; the Centurion (the commodore's own ſhip) of ſixty guns, and four hundred men; the Gloſter and Severn, of fifty guns and three hundred men each; the Pearl, of forty guns, and two hundred and fifty men; and the Wager, of twenty-eight guns, and one hundred and ſixty men; beſides the Trial ſloop, of eight guns and one hundred men, and two victualling ſhips.

Anſon's ſhips did not arrive at Madeira before the twenty-fifth of October, where they watered and took in refreſhments of ſeveral kinds. On the fourth of November the commodore iſſued orders to the captains, appointing their rendezvous, in caſe of ſeparation, at the iſland of St. Catharine's, on the coaſt of Brazil in South America; and the ſame day the ſquadron weighing anchor from Madeira, ſteered their courſe for St. Catherine's, where they arrived on the twenty-firſt of December, having in the paſſage loſt a great number of their men by the intemperature of the warm climates, while many others were confined to their hammocks in violent fevers, paſt all hopes of recovery, and ſome in a very languid condition, affected with fluxes, and other diſorders conſequent on a recovery from theſe fevers.

The commodore made all poſſible diſpatch for Cape Horn, but was detained by unavoidable accidents till the eighteenth of January, when the ſquadron, after burying many of their men, and ſickneſs ſtill increaſing, left the iſland, and ſailed to Port St. Julian, on the coaſt of Patagonia, of which an account ſhall be given in the ſequel.

Mean while the Ferrol ſquadron, conſiſting of twelve ſhips of the line, from ſixty to eighty guns, and three frigates, under the command of Don Roderigo de Torres, having found means to eſcape the look-out kept for them by admiral Haddock, ſailed on the twentieth of July for America, with two thouſand land forces on board. Theſe unexpected events threw the government of England into ſome conſternation. It was, however, reſolved, to ſend ſuch a fleet to attend them as ſhould be ſufficient to encounter all events; but before we give an account of the preparations made in conſequence of theſe reſolutions, it will be neceſſary to return to the gallant admiral Vernon, whom we left at Jamaica, equipping his ſquadron with the utmoſt expedition for another enterprize.

After having made all the neceſſary preparations the nature of the ſervice required, the admiral ſailed from Port Royal in the latter end of February this year, in the Stafford, accompanied by the Princeſs Louiſa, Windſor, Norwich, Falmouth, and Greenwich men of war, and a proportionable number of fire-ſhips, bombs, and tenders, with a deſign to bombard Carthagena, and afterwards to annoy the Spaniards in Fort Chagre, lying a little to the ſouth-weſt of Porto Bello. After ſurmounting ſome difficulties, he anchored in the bay of Playa Grande, before Carthagena, and immediately began a briſk bombardment againſt the town, which did abundance of damage to ſome of the principal edifices. But not having ſtrength enough to make himſelf maſter of the place, he thought proper to return to Porto Bello to refit, from whence he detached cruizers from time to time to lye off Fort Chagre, and ſoon after put to ſea to attack it in perſon, which he did on the twenty-third of March, and obliged the garriſon to ſurrender. On this occaſion the admiral gave equal proofs of his courage and humanity, by the terms of capitulation he granted the enemy.

Advice of this ſucceſs arrived in England in the month of July; but at the ſame time the admiral in his letters bitterly complained againſt the delays that had happened in not ſending him further reinforcements of ſhips, men, ſtores, and proviſions; and threw out likewiſe many ſevere reflections, as if the miniſter intended to ſacrifice him to his private connections with France; an inſinuation which, however, appears to have been rather owing to an over-heated imagination, or to miſinformation, than to any real foundation. In truth, the contents of theſe letters were probably repeated in private epiſtles to his own friends, ſo that they became ſoon public, and the miniſtry found it behoved them to proſecute the war with greater vigour than they had hitherto done; and therefore, to avoid any further outcries againſt them, they determined to ſend the admiral a reinforcement of ſhips, and a ſufficient number of troops, to enable him to look any enemy in the face.

Accordingly, Harriſon's and Wentworth's regiments of foot, with ſix more of marines, beſides draughts from other regiments, were ordered to embark for the Weſt Indies, under the command of lord Cathcart, a nobleman of approved honour, and great experience in the military art. A noble fleet was aſſembled at Portſmouth, under the command of ſir Chaloner Ogle, conſiſting of twenty-one ſail of the line, beſides frigates and fire-ſhips, with about twelve thouſand ſailors on board, and the above-mentioned regiments, and other detachments of foot, of which lord Cathcart was appointed commander in chief. They were likewiſe furniſhed with hoſpital-ſhips, ſtore-ſhips, all ſorts of warlike implements, and every conveniency: in a word, never had the nation more reaſon to hope for ſucceſs from any undertaking. This fleet, however, did not ſet ſail till the latter end of October this year; and by theſe, and ſuch-like unaccountable delays, by which our ſhips were detained in the harbour to ſo late a ſeaſon of the year, they were incapable of getting through the Channel till the Spaniards had ſtrengthened their ſettlements in the Weſt Indies, and put themſelves in a condition of making a vigorous reſiſtance whereever they ſhould be attacked in that quarter of the world.

This year was diſtinguiſhed by three events, which made a remarkable change in the ſyſtem of affairs in Europe: the firſt was, the death of the king of Pruſſia, a prince very little eſteemed either in his public or private character. He was ſucceeded on the throne by his eldeſt ſon Frederic, the reigning king of that realm, who has ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf both as a warrior and a legiſlator.

The ſecond was, the death of Charles VI. emperor of Germany, the laſt prince of the houſe of Auſtria, who expired at Vienna on the ninth day of October, 1740, and was ſucceeded in his hereditary dominions by his eldeſt daughter Maria-Thereſa, married to the grand duke of Tuſcany, who was proclaimed queen of Hungary, Bohemia, &c. &c. But notwithſtanding the ſecurity of the famous pragmatic ſanction, her title to many of her father's dominions was diſputed by ſeveral princes of the empire, which produced a long war in Europe. The young king of Pruſſia was no ſooner informed of the emperor's death than he entered Sileſia at the head of twenty thouſand men, ſeized certain fiefs to which his family laid claim, and publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring that he had no intention to contravene the pragmatic ſanction. The electors of Bavaria and Saxony refuſed to acknowlege the arch-ducheſs as queen of Hungary and Bohemia, alleging, that they themſelves had pretenſions to theſe countries, as deſcendants, the one of the emperor Ferdinand I. who was head of the German branch of the houſe of Auſtria; the other, as deſcendant of the emperor Joſeph, elder brother of the deceaſed emperor Charles.

The third event was the death of the czarina Anne-Iwanowna, who by her will appointed prince Ivan (or John) ſon of duke Anthony-Ulric, of Brunſwic-Lunenburg-Bevern, and the princeſs Anne of Mecklenbourg, her ſucceſſors. She by the ſame will appointed the duke of Courland regent of the empire, and even guardian of the young czar, though his own parents were alive. The regent, however, was ſoon turned out, and the czar's mother ſucceeded him in that truſt till her ſon was finally depoſed, and the princeſs Elizabeth placed on the throne of the Ruſſias.

His majeſty being returned from his German dominions, aſſembled the parliament on the 18th of November, and opened the ſeſſion by a ſpeech, in which he obſerved, among other things, "That the court of Spain having already felt ſome effects of the reſentment of the Engliſh, began to be ſenſible that they ſhould be no longer able, by their own ſtrength, to defend themſelves againſt the efforts of the Britiſh nation: that if any other powers, agreeably to ſome late extraordinary proceedings, ſhould interpoſe, and attempt to preſcribe or limit the operations of the war againſt his declared enemies, the honour and intereſt of his crown and kingdoms muſt call upon his parliament to loſe no time in putting the nation in ſuch a condition as might enable him to repel any inſults, and fruſtrate any deſigns formed againſt him, in violation of the faith of treaties; and he hoped any ſuch unprecedented ſteps, under what colour or pretence ſoever they might be taken, would inſpire his allies with a true ſenſe of the common danger, and would unite them in the ſupport and defence of the common cauſe: that the great and unhappy event of the death of the late emperor opened a new ſcene in the ſtate of affairs of Europe, in which all the principal powers might be immediately or remotely concerned: that it was impoſſible to determine, with any degree of certainty, what courſe the policy, intereſt, or ambition of the ſeveral courts might lead them to purſue in this critical conjuncture; it ſhould be his care ſtrictly to obſerve and watch their motions; to adhere to the engagements which he had formerly contracted for maintaining the balance of power, and the liberties of Europe; and, in concert with ſuch powers as were under the ſame obligations, to act ſuch a part as might beſt contribute to avert the danger that threatened the tranquillity of Europe."

When the peers returned to their houſe, the duke of Argyll made a motion for an addreſs "to congratulate his majeſty on his ſafe return to his regal dominions; to aſſure his majeſty that this houſe will ſtand by him with their lives and fortunes in proſecution of the juſt and neceſſary war in which he was engaged: and as a farther proof of their duty and affection to his majeſty's perſon, family, and government, to declare to him that they would exert themſelves in their high capacity of hereditary great council of the crown, to which all other councils were ſubordinate and accountable, in ſuch a manner as might tend to promote the true intereſt of his majeſty and his kingdoms in this critical conjuncture."

His grace ſupported this motion by a ſpeech replete with all the nervous eloquence for which he was juſtly diſtinguiſhed. He arraigned in very ſevere terms the conduct of the miniſtry, in relation to the naval operations of this year, particularly the fruitleſs parade of the Spithead fleet under ſir John Norris. He ſpared not to accuſe the miniſtry, obliquely, of having given orders that no attempts ſhould be made upon the Spaniſh coaſts in Europe; and alleged, that the Weſt India fleet would not have ſailed yet, had it not been for his majeſty's return from abroad. Even the royal ſpeech (which he treated as the work of the miniſter's pen) did not eſcape his cenſure, for not naming the power that might preſume to attempt limiting the operations of the war; and he concluded with declaring, that the motion now before the houſe had been drawn up entirely by himſelf, without the knowlege or privity of any other perſon.

In oppoſition to this propoſal the earl of Holderneſs moved for a more explicit addreſs, viz. to acknowlege his majeſty's great wiſdom, and his regard to the true intereſts of his kingdom, in reſolving to carry on this juſt and neceſſary war in the moſt vigorous and effectual manner, and in not ſuffering himſelf to be diverted from thoſe prudent and ſalutary meaſures; to aſſure his majeſty, that if any power ſhould attempt to preſcribe or limit the operations of the war, ſuch a ſtep would not fail to inſpire his parliament with a juſt indignation, and determine them to concur in all proper means for vindicating and defending his honour and dignity againſt any who ſhould preſume to offer him ſuch an inſult; to declare to his majeſty, that this houſe will ſtand by and ſupport him in fulfilling the engagements he had contracted for maintaining the balance and liberties of Europe, on the event of the late emperor's death, as well as in the proſecution of the preſent war; and, finally, to expreſs their unſhaken and unalterable fidelity and affection to his majeſty's perſon and government, and their ardent wiſhes that all his enterprizes, for maintaining the honour of his crown, and the rights of his people, might be bleſſed with ſucceſs.

I have exhibited theſe two motions at full length, becauſe they contain the ſentiments of the two great parties which then prevailed in parliament. The reader, from what has gone before, can eaſily figure to himſelf the facts and arguments adduced in the debates which followed upon theſe two motions, and which were managed on the court ſide by the lord-chancellor Hardwick, the lord Cholmondeley, and the lord Harvey; on that of the oppoſition, by the duke of Argyll, the lord Carteret, the earl of Cheſterfield, and the lord Talbot (ſon to the deceaſed nobleman of that name); I ſhall therefore only obſerve, that on the queſtion being put, the court motion was carried by a majority of twenty-eight voices.

The debates in the lower houſe upon the queſtion of their addreſs turned upon their declaring, that they would make a due examination into the application of the ſupplies given the laſt ſeſſion of parliament. But as this inſinuated ſome diffidence of the miniſtry, it was over-voted, and an addreſs preſented, recapitulatory of the ſeveral paragraphs in the king's ſpeech, with expreſſions of approbation, and of general concurrence with the meaſures of the miniſtry.

The like fate attended a motion made on the firſt of December in the upper houſe for an addreſs to his majeſty, humbly deſiring he would give directions to the proper officers to lay before the houſe copies of the ſeveral orders and inſtructions ſent to admiral Vernon, from the time of his ſailing from England in 1739, to the twenty-fourth day of June in the current year.

The anti-courtiers, not diſcouraged by this defeat, propoſed another addreſs to his majeſty, humbly entreating he would be pleaſed to give orders to lay before the houſe copies of all the letters written by vice-admiral Vernon to the commiſſioners of the admiralty, or to his majeſty's ſecretaries of ſtate, from the time of his leaving England to the twenty-fourth of June laſt inclusive; as alſo all the letters written by the ſaid commiſſioners or the ſecretaries of ſtate to the ſaid admiral within the time above-mentioned. The miniſter, by a ſtrange inattention to his own intereſts, ſuffered this motion to paſs with ſome few amendments. The addreſs was accordingly preſented, and the papers laid before the houſe; the conſequence of which proved very fatal to his authority; for the admiral in ſome of his letters complained bitterly of the ſtores which had been ſent him; and in one particular paſſage he affirmed that they were not good enough even for a Spithead expedition.

This and other information, derived from the peruſal of theſe papers, furniſhed the oppoſition with matter for another motion for an addreſs to his majeſty, to lay before the houſe the repreſentations which admiral Vernon had made to the miniſtry or admiralty, touching the want of more ſhips or more men, &c. This motion was, however, rejected by a majority of ſeventy-one againſt forty-four; as was alſo another motion made by the duke of Argyll (in conſequence of the houſe taking into its conſideration the ſtate of the army) for a reſolution, "That the augmenting the army by raiſing regiments, as it is the moſt unneceſſary and moſt expenſive method of augmentation, is alſo the moſt dangerous to the liberties of the nation." This propoſal, I ſay, was alſo over-ruled, but not without a nervous ſpirited proteſt being entered againſt it by the country lords.

The reader will eaſily perceive that the upper houſe was the great ſcene of political altercation during this ſeſſion. The duke of Argyll, the lord Carteret, the lord Bathurſt, the earl of Cheſterfield, and lord Talbot, ſeemed to be animated with uncommon fervor; and ſeveral of their ſpeeches would not have diſgraced the moſt celebrated orators of the Roman ſenate, when that republic was in its moſt flouriſhing ſtate. In theſe debates the young earls of Halifax and Sandwich acquired a conſiderable ſhare of reputation, for the ſtrength of argument and elocution they diſplayed againſt the meaſures of the miniſtry. The controverſy was very unequally maintained on the ſide of the government; and their peremptory overruling every motion that was made againſt them, ſerved only farther to increaſe the unpopularity of lays that had happened in not ſending him further reinforcements of ſhips, men, ſtores, and proviſions; and threw out likewiſe many ſevere reflections, as if the miniſter intended to ſacrifice him to his private connections with France; an inſinuation which, however, appears to have been rather owing to an over-heated imagination, or to miſinformation, than to any real foundation. In theſe debates the young earls of Halifax and Sandwich acquired a conſiderable ſhare of reputation, for the ſtrength of argument and elocution they diſplayed againſt the meaſures of the miniſtry. The controverſy was very unequally maintained on the ſide of the government; and their peremptory overruling every motion that was made againſt them, ſerved only farther to increaſe the unpopularity of the miniſter, which now roſe to ſuch an height, that his name was ſcarce ever mentioned with common decency but by his own friends.

The minority thought this the moſt favourable juncture they could obtain to put in execution a deſign which they had long framed, of a perſonal attack on the miniſter; and after ſome conſultation between the leading members of both houſes of the country party, it was determined to begin this attack in the lower houſe. Accordingly, on the eleventh of February, Mr. Sandys went up to ſir Robert Walpole, and informed him, that in two days time he ſhould bring a charge againſt him in public. Sir Robert was no ſtranger to the intended motion, nor to the day on which it was propoſed to be made: he therefore, with an appearance of great compoſure, thanked Mr. Sandys politely for this previous notice: he ſaid, he deſired no favour but fair play; adding, "As I am not conſcious of any crime, I do not doubt of being able to make a proper defence."

On Friday the thirteenth of February, the day appointed for the accuſation of the miniſter, Mr. Sandys, in a ſtudied ſpeech, entered into a long deduction of the miniſter's conduct, which he carried back as far as the year 1720, from whence he was ſuppoſed to date his preſent power. He inſiſted, that it was well known both within doors and without, that one ſingle perſon in the adminiſtration was the chief, if not the ſole, adviſer and promoter of all the wrong meaſures which had been for many years purſued at home and abroad: "Therefore, added he, the diſcontents, the reproaches, and even the curſes of the people, are all directed againſt that ſingle perſon: they complain of preſent meaſures; they have ſuffered by paſt meaſures: they expect no redreſs; they expect no alteration nor amendment, whilſt he has a ſhare in directing or adviſing our future adminiſtration. Theſe, ſir (addreſſing himſelf to the ſpeaker) are the ſentiments of the people, in regard to that miniſter: thoſe ſentiments we are in honour and duty bound to repreſent to his majeſty; and the proper method of doing this, as eſtabliſhed by our conſtitution, is to addreſs his majeſty to remove him from his councils: I therefore move that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to remove the right honourable ſir Robert Walpole, knight of the moſt noble order of the garter, firſt commiſſioner of the Treaſury, comptroller and under-treaſurer of the Exchequer, and one of his majeſty's moſt honourable privy-council, from his majeſty's preſence and councils for ever."

This motion was ſeconded by the lord-viſcount Limerick, ſuſtained by Mr. Pulteney, ſir John Hynde Cotton, ſir John Barnard, Mr. W. Pitt, Mr. Gibſon, and other diſtinguiſhed ſpeakers in the oppoſition, who with great energy and accuracy pointed out and expoſed all the material errors and malpractices of the adminiſtration. They charged the miniſter with having endeavoured to ſupport his own intereſt by the moſt pernicious and barefaced acts of corruption; with having betrayed the intereſt and power of Great Britain in the late convention. It was likewiſe alleged, that he had deviated from the plan of policy which he himſelf, in his impeachment of the earl of Oxford, had laboured to eſtabliſh: and in confirmation of their opinion, the treaty of Hanover was urged; a treaty, it was ſaid, which was plainly calculated to aggrandize the houſe of Bourbon, and depreſs that of Auſtria. They farther affirmed, that all the great expences which the nation had incurred, by augmenting the army, and paying ſubſidies to foreigners, were owing to that treaty; and that his majeſty had been led into this dangerous miſtake by the ignorance or perfidy of the miniſter, who had made him believe that the emperor had, in conjunction with Spain, formed a deſign to place the pretender upon the throne of Great Britain; a charge for which, from the ſubſequent events, there never appeared to have been the leaſt foundation.

All theſe arguments were anſwered by Mr. Pelham, who undertook to defend or excuſe all the meaſures which the others had condemned. In doing this he obſerved, that the treaty of Utrecht was very imperfect; that the quadruple alliance was therefore formed, in order to ſupply the deficiencies of that treaty, by ſtrengthening the emperor in Italy, and transferring to him the kingdom of Sicily from the duke of Savoy, and at the ſame time giving an irretrievable blow to the marine of Spain, by the ſea engagement of ſir George Byng in 1718: that the king of Spain was forced by Great Britain to accede to the quadruple alliance, which brought on the congreſs of Cambray: during the dependence of which, the emperor and the king of Spain concluded the treaty of Vienna, a treaty that was extremely prejudicial to the intereſts of Great Britain, and to which the treaty of Hanover was no more than a counterbalance: that as to the charge of an intention to ſet the pretender on the throne of England, it was a thing of which his majeſty was fully convinced; and as it was a matter known perſonally to himſelf, and had never been diſproved, he had a right to make uſe of it in his ſpeech to the parliament. In a word, this gentleman in his harangue omitted nothing that could be expected from a warm friend and unſhaken adherent.

Sir Robert Walpole obſerved an attentive ſilence during the courſe of the debate: at length, finding the whole artillery of oppoſition and defence nearly exhauſted, he aroſe to ſpeak in his own defence, which he did in a moſt maſterly manner, delivering himſelf with the utmoſt coolneſs, deliberation, and decency, which was the more extolled, as it is certain his opponents had indulged themſelves in the moſt groſs and virulent perſonal invectives againſt his perſon and conduct. He began by recapitulating all the particulars of the general charge that had been brought againſt him, and endeavoured to elude their force. He ſought not to conceal, on the contrary he frankly owned, that he was to be conſidered as the ſole miniſter, and in ſuch character anſwerable for any ſtep taken by the government that was either diſgraceful or diſadvantageous to the nation. With reſpect to the article of bribery and corruption, he ſaid, if one inſtance had been adduced, if it had been ſhewn that he ever offered a reward to any member of either houſe, or ever threatened to deprive any member of his office or employment, in order to influence ſuch perſon in his vote as a member, there might have been ſome ground for this charge; but when it was ſo generally laid, he did not know what he could ſay to it, unleſs to deny it as generally and as positively as it had been asserted. Such a declaration, however, made in the hearing of so many persons who owed their seats in that assembly purely to the force of his interest, who many of them subsisted only by the provisions he had obtained for them, in consideration of their constant attendance in parliament, and readiness on every occasion to throw their negative or assent into the ministerial balance; must surely have impressed every hearer, must impress every reader to whom it is related, with a very indifferent opinion of the modesty or veracity of this great man in a public capacity. The conclusion of his speech, however, shews such an intimate knowlege of mankind, and the first part of it is so highly picturesque of some events and changes, within the memory of every one who peruses these sheets, that I cannot resist the temptation of transcribing it verbatim:

"Gentlemen (said he) have talked a great deal of patriotism: a venerable word, sir, when rightly understood. But I am sorry to say, that it has of late been so much hackneyed about, that it is in danger of falling into disgrace: the very idea of true patriotism is lost, and the term has been prostituted to the very worst purposes. A patriot, sir! why patriots spring up like mushrooms; I could raise fifty of them within the four-and-twenty-hours. I have raised many of them, sir, in one night. It is but refusing to gratify an unreasonable or an insolent demand, and up starts a patriot. I have never been afraid of making patriots, sir; but I disdain and despise all they can do.—No man, I believe, who ever had the honour of serving the crown, ever had such an attack made upon him as the present motion; a motion which gentlemen have been so long meditating, so long threatening, and which they had so much desire to support: but, sir, has it been supported? has it been attempted to be supported with even the shadow of evidence?——Yes, sir, I have long heard of this motion, and let gentlemen contradict me if they can, when I say, I could have prevented it; by what means, I leave the house to judge. But I chose, sir, they should do their utmost; and I rejoice in this debate, let the issue of it be what it will, more than I ever did in any one thing that has happened to me in the course of my life."

The debate continued till three o'clock in the morning, when above sixty of the country party being retired (who thereupon acquired the nickname of sneakers from their colleagues) the question was put, and received a negative from a majority of two hundred and ninety against one hundred and six.

The same motion was made in the upper house by lord Carteret, who ushered it in by a speech embellished with all the ornaments of rhetoric, and warmed with the noble spirit of British liberty and independence. The dukes of Argyll and Bedford, the earls of Westmoreland, Berkshire, Carlisle, Abingdon, and Halifax, the lords Bathurst and Haversham, supported the motion, while the minister was as warmly defended by the lord-chancellor, the dukes of Newcastle and Devonshire, the bishop of Salisbury, the earl of Ilay, brother to the duke of Argyll, the lord Hervey, and the earl of Oxford.

This last nobleman was one of the Tory party, and had always distinguished himself by his opposition to the minister. Nevertheless, upon this occasion, he spoke against the motion, not (as he declared) from any conviction which he had of the minister's innocence, but because he thought the principle upon which the motion was built, especially no legal evidence having been brought to support it, was cruel, unjust, and unconstitutional; and he was old enough, he added, to remember the hard measure which a minister of his own family, chiefly through the influence of the present minister, had received from general and unsupported charges. The whole house was charmed with this generous declaration. At length, the subject being entirely exhausted, the question was put, and the motion rejected by a majority of forty-nine.

The triumph of the minister, however, was dearly bought; it shook his character beyond a possibility of reparation, and his authority from this instant gave daily proofs of a decline. Immediately after carrying the question, the duke of Marlborough moved for a resolution, "That any attempt to inflict any kind of punishment on any person, without allowing him an opportunity to make his defence, or without any proof being brought of any crime or misdemeanor committed by him, is contrary to natural justice, the fundamental laws of the realm, and the ancient established usage of parliament, and is an high infringement of the liberties of the subject." This motion was seconded by the duke of Devonshire and the lord Lovel, and opposed by lord Gower, as an intended censure on the proceedings of the day; but notwithstanding his utmost efforts, and those of the rest of the friends of the minority, it was carried in the affirmative: thirty peers, however, entered a vigorous protest.

In the beginning of April the king went to the house of peers; and after passing certain acts that were prepared for the royal assent, he, in a speech to both houses, observed, "That the war which had lately broke out, and been carried on in part of the Austrian dominions, and the various and extensive claims which were publicly made on the late emperor's succession, were new events that required the utmost care and attention; the rather, as they might involve all Europe in a bloody war, and, in consequence, expose the dominions of such princes as should take part in support of the pragmatic sanction, to imminent and immediate danger: that the queen of Hungary had already made a requisition of the twelve thousand men expressly stipulated by treaty; and, in order to fulfil his engagements, he had demanded of the king of Denmark and of the king of Sweden, as landgrave of Hesse Cassel, their respective bodies of troops, consisting of six thousand men each, that so they might be in readiness to march forthwith to the assistance of her Hungarian majesty: that he was concerting such farther measures as might obviate and disappoint all the dangerous designs and attempts that might be formed or carried on in favour of any unjust pretensions to the prejudice of the house of Austria, in this complicated and uncertain state of things: that during the time when, by reason of the approaching conclusion of the present parliament, it might be impossible for him to have their advice and assistance, many incidents might arise which might render it necessary for him to incur still greater expences for maintaining the pragmatic sanction: and that therefore, in a conjuncture ſo critical, he had thought it proper to lay theſe important conſiderations before them, and to deſire the concurrence of his parliament, in enabling him to contribute, in the moſt effectual manner, to the ſupport of the queen of Hungary, the preventing, by all reaſonable means, the ſubverſion of the houſe of Auſtria, and the maintaining, upon a firm foundation, the liberties and balance of Europe."

The two houſes joined in an affectionate addreſs, promiſing effectually to ſupport his majeſty againſt all inſults and attacks that might be made upon any of his territories, tho' not belonging to the crown of Great Britain; and that they would enable him to contribute in the moſt effectual manner to the ſupport of the queen of Hungary. The commons accordingly granted three hundred thouſand pounds for this purpoſe; a million was deducted from the ſinking fund towards the expence of the year; and the land-tax continued at four ſhillings in the pound, to which it had been raiſed the preceding year. The preparations for this war had already coſt five millions. On the twenty-fifth day of April the king cloſed the ſeſſion, the laſt of this parliament, with warm expreſſions of tenderneſs and ſatisfaction in its conduct. Henry Bromley, Stephen Fox, and John Howe, three commoners of great property, who had ſignalized themſelves in defence of the miniſter, were now ennobled and created barons, of Montfort, Ilcheſter, and Chedworth. A camp was formed near Colcheſter; and the king having ſettled the regency, ſet out in May for his German dominions.

Before I proceed to the military and other tranſactions of the year 1741, I muſt take notice, that about the end of the preceding year (1740) the anti-miniſterial party ſuſtained a great loſs by the death of ſir W. Wyndham, who was juſtly regretted as an orator, a patriot, and a man, the ſtrenuous and unvarying aſſertor of the liberties of his country, and one of the chief ornaments of the Britiſh nation.

In the courſe of the ſame year general Oglethorpe, governor of Georgia, had, with ſome ſuccours obtained from the colony of Carolina, and a ſmall ſquadron of the king's ſhips, made an attempt upon Fort Auguſtine, the capital of Spaniſh Florida, and actually reduced ſome ſmall forts in the neighbourhood of that place; but the Carolinians withdrawing in diſguſt, diſſenſions prevailing among the ſea-officers, the hurricane months approaching, and the enemy having received a reinforcement, he abandoned the enterprize, and returned to Gorgia.

It is now time to attend the motions of the grand fleet that left England under ſir Chaloner Ogle, and the progreſs of the war in 1741. This noble armament was overtaken by a violent ſtorm in the Bay of Biſcay, not long after its departure from the Britiſh coaſts, by which the fleet, conſiſting of about one hundred and ſeventy ſail, were ſcattered and diſperſed. Notwithſtanding this misfortune, ſir Chaloner proſecuted his voyage, and anchored in the neighbourhood of Dominica, with a view of providing himſelf with wood and water in that neutral iſland, where the intended expedition received a fatal check, by the death of the brave lord Cathcart, who was carried off by a dyſentery. By his death the command of the land forces devolved upon general Wentworth.

Sir Chaloner having furniſhed his fleet with the ſupplies they ſtood in need of, ſailed from Dominica, in order to join admiral Vernon at Jamaica. As he was coaſting by the iſland of Hiſpaniola, he deſcried four large ſhips; upon which he immediately diſpatched lord Auguſtus Fitzroy with an equal number of his ſquadron to ſpeak to them. Lord Auguſtus came up with and hailed them; they refuſed to anſwer; (they could not ſhew their colours, it being night): upon which his lordſhip ſpoke to them more plainly, from the mouths of his guns; and a ſmart engagement enſued, which laſted moſt part of the night. Upon the appearance of day, the four ſtrange ſhips hoiſted French colours, and were found to be part of the French ſquadron that had ſailed from Europe under the marquis d'Antin, to ſupport the Spaniſh admiral Torres, in caſe he ſhould be attacked by the Engliſh. As war, however, was not as yet declared between our court and that of France, the two commanders made mutual apologies for the miſtake that had happened, and parted as friends, though not without having a conſiderable number of men killed and wounded on each ſide. In the mean time, ſir Chaloner Ogle continuing his route, arrived on the twenty-ſeventh of December at St. Chriſtopher's, the place of general rendezvous, where he was joined by the reſt of the fleet, and all the tranſports and ſtore-ſhips which had been ſeparated from him. The fleet then proceeded for Jamaica, where it arrived on the ninth of January 1741.

This reanimated admiral Vernon with freſh ſpirits, who now found himſelf at the head of the moſt formidable fleet and army that had ever been ſeen in thoſe ſeas, with full power to act as opportunity ſhould offer. The conjoined ſquadrons conſiſted of twenty-nine ſhips of the line, with almoſt an equal number of frigates, fire-ſhips, and bomb-ketches, well manned, and plentifully ſupplied with all kinds of proviſions and warlike ſtores and neceſſaries. The number of ſeamen amounted to fifteen thouſand; that of the land forces, including four regiments of American troops, and a body of negroes enliſted at Jamaica, fell very little ſhort of twelve thouſand. The joy of the admiral was indeed greatly allayed by the news of lord Cathcart's death, whoſe loſs he heartily condoled as a moſt valuable officer; yet as his ſucceſſor, general Wentworth, appeared ſincerely diſpoſed to ſupply that loſs, Mr. Vernon promiſed himſelf that the ſervice would be reſolutely carried on, and with all poſſible harmony between the land and ſea forces. The event, however, proved the reverſe.

Admiral Vernon having received intelligence, from a Spaniſh lieutenant who had been taken priſoner in a ſmall ſloop, that the Breſt and Toulon ſquadrons, under the command of the marquis d'Antin, were arrived at Port Louis, and that the French preparations in Martinico ſeemed to threaten ſome formidable enterprize againſt Jamaica, his whole attention had for ſome time been taken up in concerting ſuch meaſures as might beſt prevent the deſigns of the enemy, and ſecure that valuable iſland. By later advices he had been informed, that the French fleet had ſailed to Hiſpaniola. All which intelligence he laid before a general council of war, held at Spaniſh-town in Jamaica, on the eleventh of January, when it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the whole fleet ſhould beat beat up to windward, to obſerve the motions of d'Antin. It happened, however, that on the arrival of our fleet off that iſland, we found that the French admiral had ſailed for Europe to recruit himſelf with men and proviſions, having, during his ſtay in thoſe parts, loſt upwards of three thouſand men, and the reſt that ſurvived were reduced to three ounces of bread a day, and that half worms and dirt.

Vernon, diſappointed in this quarter, called another grand council of war on the ſixteenth of February, in which it was determined to proceed directly for Carthagena; which reſolution was afterwards confirmed by a third general council of war, held the twenty-fourth by the four principal military and naval officers, when it was reſolved vigorouſly to attack Carthagena both by ſea and land. The fleet being ſupplied with wood and water at Hiſpaniola, ſet ſail for the continent of New Spain, and on the fourth of March, in the evening, anchored at Playa Grande, to the windward of the town of Carthagena. As it was well known that the Engliſh meditated an attack upon this place, the Spaniards had omitted nothing to put it in a proper poſture of defence. Admiral de Torres, and Don Blas de Lezo, a ſea-officer of great experience and reputation, had already arrived with the Ferrol ſquadron, and reinforced the garriſon, which now amounted to upwards of four thouſand men. The following particulars relating to this place will enable the reader to form a judgment of the nature of the enterprize againſt it.

CARTHAGENA is the capital of a province of the ſame name, on the Terra Firma, in South America, in ten degrees and a half north latitude, and ſeventy-ſeven weſt longitude; three hundred and ten miles eaſt of Porto Bello, and four hundred ſouth of Port Royal in Jamaica. Though the ſea waſhes the walls of Carthagena, the town is inacceſſible on that ſide, by reaſon of the ſurf, the water ſhoaling near a league off, ſo that it can only be approached by the lake that forms the harbour; which laſt is bounded by a number of rocks: beſides, the ſea is ſeldom ſmooth; ſo that landing is at all times very difficult. The only entrance to the harbour is near a league to the weſtward of the city, between two narrow peninſulas, one called the Tierra Bomba, which is neareſt the city; the other, called the Barradera. This paſſage, called Bocca Chica, or the little mouth, was defended on the Tierra Bomba by the caſtle St. Louis, a regular ſquare fortification with four baſtions, mounted with eighty-two guns and three mortars; but the glacis or counterſcarp had not been finiſhed. To this were added fort St. Philip, mounting ſeven guns; fort St. Iago, with fifteen guns; and a ſmall fort of only four guns, called the Battery de Chamba, which ſerved as redoubts to the caſtle of Bocca Chica. On the other ſide of the mouth of the harbour was a faſcine battery of fifteen guns, called the Barradera; and in a ſmall bay on the back of that, another battery of four guns; and facing the entrance of the harbour, on a ſmall flat iſland, ſtood fort St. Joſeph, of twenty-one guns. From this fort to Bocca Chica caſtle a boom of cables were fixed acroſs, faſtened by three large anchors at each end; and juſt within the boom four men of war were moored in a line, on board of which was the Spaniſh admiral. Theſe ſpread ſo far over the extent of the mouth of the harbour, that no ſhip could paſs a-head or a-ſtern of them.

Beyond this paſſage lies the great lake or harbour of Carthagena, ſeveral leagues in circumference, and land-locked on all ſides. About midway to the town it grows narrower, and within about a league of the town, two points of land jutting out form the leſſer harbour. Near the nethermoſt of theſe was the ſtrong fortreſs of Caſtillo Grande, about eight miles up the town, being a regular ſquare with four baſtions, defended to the land by a wet ditch and proper glacis, and one face towards the ſea, with a raveline and double line of guns: the number of guns in the fort was fifty-nine. Oppoſite to this caſtle was a horſe-ſhoe battery of twelve guns, called Mancinilla. In the middle, between the two forts, is a large ſhoal, with not above two or three feet water. In each of theſe were ſhips ſunk, to prevent the Britiſh fleet from getting by.

Near three miles further up the harbour, on two flat ſandy iſlands or keys, ſtands Carthagena, well fortified to the land, with lakes and moraſſes running round it, and defended with one hundred and ſixty guns, and the ſuburbs, called Himani, with one hundred and forty. South of the city, about a mile from Himani-gate, on an eminence about fifty or ſixty feet high, ſtands the caſtle of St. Lazaro, being a ſquare of about fifty feet, with three demi-batteries, and two guns in each face, one in each flank, and three in each curtain: it overlooks all the town.

The admiral having received from captain Knowles (whom he had ſent to reconnoitre the place) the above intelligence, with every other material point relative to its ſituation and ſtrength, directed ſir Chaloner Ogle to proceed with his whole diviſion of ſhips, conſiſting of four of eighty, five of ſixty, and one of fifty guns, beſides frigates and bomb-veſſels, to demoliſh the forts and batteries, and to ſcour all the country between them, ſo as to ſecure a deſcent for the forces. In the mean time general Wentworth, with ſome of the principal land officers, went on board the Lion, to reconnoitre the town, the neighbouring coaſt, and the ſeveral forts.

On the ninth of February the Engliſh forces were landed on Tierra Bomba iſland, near the mouth of Bocca Chica harbour. There they erected a battery, with which they made a breach in the principal fort; while the ſhips under ſir Chaloner Ogle, aſſiſted by thoſe of commodore Leſtock's diviſion, divided the fire of the enemy, and co-operated with the endeavours of the army. The breach in Bocca Chica caſtle being now deemed practicable, general Wentworth reſolved to aſſault it, which was accordingly done. On the twenty-fourth the forts and batteries were abandoned by the enemy: the Spaniſh ſhips that lay athwart the harbour's mouth were taken or deſtroyed: the paſſage was opened; and admiral Vernon, with the whole fleet, got into the harbour, and then lay before Caſtillo Grande, which the enemy likewiſe abandoned, and which was taken poſſeſſion of by captain Knowles, who acted as the admiral's engineer during the whole of this expedition. The forces and artillery that had been landed on Tierra Bomba were now reimbarked, and ſailing up the great lake, were ſet on ſhore again within a mile of the city.

Thus far every thing had gone on more proſperouſly than either the admiral or general had apprehended. They were too much elated, however, with this good fortune; for they now diſpatched captain Laws, commander of the Spence ſloop of war, with letters to the duke of Newcaſtle, ſecretary of ſtate, promiſing no leſs than the abſolute reduction of Carthagena: but they were fatally miſtaken; for fort Lazaro remained yet to be taken before they could attack the main body of the place. Beſides, by this time a miſunderſtanding had ariſen between the admiral and general, which ſoon grew to ſuch a height as to impede every operation for the advantage of the public: they maintained a reſerve towards each other: they had their ſeparate parties; and nothing was heard but mutual recriminations. The admiral upbraided the general for his inactivity, in giving the enemy time for compleating the fortifications they had begun at the foot of the hill on which the fort ſtood. The general, on the other hand, accuſed the admiral of dilatorineſs in landing the tents, ſtores, and artillery of the army, which had obliged the troops to lie three whole nights expoſed to the noxious dews, ſo fatal in that climate, which greatly reduced their numbers.

The truth is, that great overſights were committed on both ſides; and indeed each ſeemed more bent upon mortifying his rival than zealous for the honour and intereſt of the nation. Wentworth, however, reſolving to do ſomething, at leaſt in appearance, prepared on the eighth of March to attack fort St Lazaro; but inſtead of beginning the attack in the night, as he ought to have done, he waited till it was almoſt broad day. The guides who were to conduct the troops were alſo killed in the march; the troops miſtook their way, and advanced to the ſtrongeſt part of the fortification, which they could not have mounted, even though they had not had any enemy to oppoſe them. The bravery of the Engliſh on this occaſion was ſuch as almoſt to exceed belief: twelve hundred men, under general Guiſe, paraded on the ſtrand, where they formed, and began the attack with amazing intrepidity, amidſt an inceſſant ſhower of balls and bullets from the artillery and ſmall arms of the Spaniards. Colonel Grant, who commanded the grenadiers, was mortally wounded: the ſcaling ladders were found too ſhort; the officers were perplexed for want of order and directions. Nevertheleſs, the ſoldiers maintained their ground for ſeveral hours with the moſt heroic reſolution, till at length they were drawn off by the general's orders, with the loſs of about ſix hundred of the flower of the army; that is, above half the number of thoſe who marched to this ill-timed, ill-conducted attack. On this occaſion the admiral inveighed in the ſevereſt terms againſt the general, for not acquainting him with his deſign, that he might have ſent a body of ſeamen to aſſiſt in ſcaling the walls. Wentworth on his ſide inſiſted, that, if the admiral had ſent ſhips near enough to have battered the walls of the caſtle and town, when the forces advanced to the attack of fort St. Lazaro, the place might have been taken.

Vernon, in order to diſculpate himſelf of this charge, and to throw the whole blame of the miſcarriage on the general and other land forces, ſent in the Galicia, one of the Spaniſh ſhips which he had taken at Bocca Chica, fitted up as a floating battery, with ſixteen guns on a ſide, to batter the town. This veſſel, manned by detachments of volunteers from different ſhips, and commanded by captain Hore, was warped into the inner harbour, and moored before day as near the walls of the town as poſſible. In this ſituation ſhe kept up a regular fire, expoſed to the artillery from three baſtions, a half-moon, and a ravelin, from five in the morning till near twelve at noon, without ever flagging; but as the vice-admiral ſaw ſhe could do no material ſervice againſt ſtone walls at that diſtance, he ſent orders to captain Hore to bring her off, to prevent her ſinking at her anchors. From this experiment the admiral drew this inference, that there was not depth of water in the inner harbour ſufficient to admit large ſhips near enough to batter the tower with any proſpect of ſucceſs, as the Galicia had been moored in as ſhoal water as the boats could float her anchors.

After the miſcarriage of this attack, all hopes of poſſeſſing the town were entirely vaniſhed: the troops ſickened ſo ſurprizingly faſt, that, according to the account of the general himſelf, no leſs than three thouſand four hundred and forty-five men periſhed in the ſpace of two days, amongſt whom were many of the principal officers. This dreadful viſitation determined the council of war to come to a reſolution to return to Jamaica with the utmoſt expedition. Accordingly, after having entirely demoliſhed all the fortifications, the fleet ſet ſail in the beginning of May, and arrived in Port-Royal harbour on the nineteenth of the ſame month, after a quick and ſafe paſſage.

Thus ended, to the aſtoniſhment of all Europe, the diſgrace of the Britiſh arms, and the no ſmall exultation of the enemy, the greateſt attempt that had ever been made in thoſe parts of the world, whether we conſider the ſtrength of the armament, the expence of the undertaking, or the expectations of the public. Upon the news of the firſt ſucceſſes arriving in England, the people were ſeized with a phrenzy of joy: it was in the midſt of the general elections for the approaching new parliament. Not only London and Weſtminſter, but many other places, vied with each other in having Mr. Vernon for their repreſentative. His birth-day was celebrated with demonſtrations of joy, like thoſe which greet a monarch returning in triumph to his capital, after conquering an enemy that threatened his ſtate with deſtruction. All Europe indeed conſidered itſelf as deeply intereſted in the iſſue of this expedition. Spain gave up her monarchy in America for loſt; the French were filled with the moſt dreadful apprehenſions, and gave their ambaſſador at the Hague orders to repreſent the progreſs of the Engliſh in America as the common cauſe of all Europe, which muſt be ruined, ſhould they ſucceed. But I ſhall now proceed to cloſe this account of the naval war in America during the year 1741, with the equally inglorious and fruitleſs expedition againſt Cuba.

On the return of the Britiſh fleet and forces to Jamaica from the ſiege of Carthagena, the remains of the army continued in a feeble and languid condition. The ſhips which came out with ſir Chaloner Ogle were now generally feeble; all which afforded a melancholy ſcene to the ſurvivors of the late fatal expedition. On this occaſion Mr. Vernon, to his great honour, acted as the father of the fleet; and it was chiefly owing to the care he had of the ſeamen's proviſions, and of keeping them temperate, that it was not abſolutely ruined. Seven of the eight eighty-gun ſhips being unſheathed, they would have been totally deſtroyed by remaining any longer on ſervice in theſe climates; upon which the admiral very prudently ſent them home, under commodore Leſtock, with four other ſhips of war and ſeveral frigates, with all the ſick land officers, and all the ſoldiers who had been rendered unfit for ſervice, and the homeward-bound fleet of merchantmen.

Mr. Vernon having taken all the neceſſary ſteps towards refitting the remainder of his fleet, and putting it in a proper condition for returning to ſea, in order, if poſſible, to re-eſtabliſh by ſome more ſucceſsful ſtroke, the degraded reputation of the Britiſh arms, called a general council of war for regulating the future proceedings of the ſea and land forces. To this court he produced letters he had received from the adminiſtration at home, preſſing him to attempt the reduction of St. Jago, the capital of the iſland of Cuba. His majeſty, in his inſtructions to the admiral on his leaving England, had indeed mentioned the Havannah, La Vera Cruz, Mexico, Carthagena, and Panama; but by the miſcarriage before Carthagena, the Engliſh were too much reduced to attempt any other place: beſides, de Torres, the Spaniſh admiral, was then in the harbour of the Havannah, with a ſquadron more than equal to that which remained with Vernon. St. Jago de Cuba therefore was the only object our forces could proceed againſt; and the taking it would ſecure Jamaica and the Britiſh trade in thoſe ſeas, and preſerve a communication with Jamaica for ſupplies, and likewiſe cut off the correſpondence between the Spaniards and Hiſpaniola. All theſe conſiderations determined the council of war to declare for this attempt; and the vice-admiral and general Wentworth accordingly gave the neceſſary orders for proceeding on the expedition with all poſſible diſpatch. The people of Jamaica, who were particularly deſirous of this conqueſt, conſidering the great diminution of the land forces, which were by this time reduced to leſs than three thouſand men, put one thouſand of the beſt diſciplined blacks their iſland afforded on board the fleet, which ſet ſail, to the number of nine ſhips of the line, beſides tranſports and ſtore-ſhips, on the twenty-eighth of June; and on the eighteenth of the following month got into Walthenham Bay, about twelve leagues to windward of St. Jago. Here they had the pleaſure to find themſelves in one of the moſt ſpacious and ſafe harbours in the world, perfectly pure and healthy, and ſecure againſt all hurricanes; the admiral immediately gave it the name of Cumberland Harbour, in honour of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland.

The iſland of Cuba is the largeſt, and far the moſt temperate and pleaſant of all the Antilles, lying between nineteen and twenty-three degrees of north latitude, and from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and four degrees of longitude, being about two hundred and thirty leagues in length, and in the broadeſt part forty leagues wide, in the narroweſt about twelve. It has Florida and the Lucayan iſles on the north, Hiſpaniola on the weſt, Jamaica and the ſouthern continent on the ſouth, and the gulph of Mexico on the eaſt. It is a country abounding not only with the neceſſary conveniencies of life, but even with the more delicate bleſſings of nature. St. Jago de Cuba, lying at the eaſtern part of the country, is the moſt ancient in the iſland, and generally eſteemed the capital, though now the governor reſides at the Havannah, whoſe port is much ſuperior to that of St. Jago in its ſituation for trade, though the former is much more commodious for privateers, as it commands the windward paſſage. This city is but very indifferently fortified, the harbour being ſo well ſecured by nature, as to give the Spaniards no reaſon to apprehend any attack from the ſeaward, which is rendered impracticable by the narrowneſs of the harbour's mouth, and the ſingular difficulty of ſhips getting into it, occaſioned by the obſtruction of the eddy-wind that comes down the two hills, on which ſtand the citadel, called the Moro Caſtle, and the Eſtrella, another fort, and which would infallibly drive them on the weſtern ſhore, expoſed to the batteries of the two caſtles.

Mr. Vernon having collected all the neceſſary intelligence relating to the ſituation and ſtrength of the town, port, and citadel of St. Jago, fixed on Cumberland harbour, as the neareſt and moſt commodious ſituation to diſembark the troops for their proceeding to march and attack the town on the land-ſide, where, as they did not expect to be ſurpriſed, the Spaniards were at preſent entirely defenceleſs. The troops were accordingly landed, and encamped at the diſtance of twenty miles farther up the river. Mr. Vernon appeared to entertain very ſanguine hopes of the ſucceſs of this expedition, not doubting but that he ſhould be able to ſecure ſuch a footing in the iſland of Cuba as to render it impoſſible for all the power of Spain to drive us out while we remained maſters of the ſea; and in the warmeſt manner recommended to the general alacrity and diſpatch in his operations by land. Wentworth, however, who ſeemed to make a point of differing in opinion from the admiral, in relation to every object of ſervice, affected to treat the whole deſign as chimerical and impracticable; and having ſent out parties to reconnoitre the country, he on their report (though they met not with the leaſt oppoſition) in a letter to the admiral, abſolutely declined the ſervice, on account of the length of the road, and the inſurmountable difficulty (as he was pleaſed to repreſent it) of bringing up cannon ſufficient to act againſt the place with effect. As the admiral had no compulſive power over the land forces, he was obliged to give way to the opinion of a council of war of the land officers, who, notwithſtanding the admiral gave them poſitive aſſurances of a ſpeedy reinforcement of ſhips and troops from England, declared for an immediate reimbarkation for Jamaica, which was effected on the twentieth of November: and thus was this ſecond expedition abandoned, even before it met with reſiſtance, infinitely more to the diſgrace of the land forces than their late fatal repulſe before Carthagena, where they had indeed done the enemy ſome miſchief, by deſtroying ſix Spaniſh men of war, the like number of galleons, and all the other ſhipping in the harbour, beſides demoliſhing all the fortifications.

The affairs of Europe next call for our attention, which were now involved in greater confuſion than ever. The king of Pruſſia had demanded of the court of Vienna part of Sileſia, by virtue of old treaties of co-fraternity, which were either abſolute or annulled, and promiſed to aſſiſt the queen of Hungary with all his forces in caſe ſhe would comply with his demand, as alſo to ſettle the imperial crown on her huſband. It was eaſily foreſeen, that if the queen refuſed theſe offers, Germany muſt be thrown into a total confuſion; but that princeſs entertained too high a ſenſe of her dignity to conſent to diſmember her patrimony. She was weak, but intrepid. Perhaps ſhe was the more encouraged to this refuſal by the little account in which Europe then held the king of Pruſſia, and the certain aſſurances ſhe had received of being powerfully ſupported by the Britiſh court. The active and diſcerning Pruſſian, however, readily perceived, that the outward grandeur of the court of Vienna was no more than a name, and the ſtate in which Europe then was, would infallibly procure him allies. Accordingly, on the refuſal of his offers, he marched his army into Sileſia in the month of December of the preceding year, and proſecuted his conqueſts with great rapidity.

In the mean while, Maria Thereſa took poſſeſſion of all the dominions which had been left her by her father, and was crowned at Preſburg on the twenty-fourth of June, 1741, N. S. She had gained the hearts of the whole nation by that popular affability which her anceſtors had diſdained to practiſe; but more particularly by conſenting to take the ancient coronation-oath of Andrew II. king of Hungary, made anno 1222, by which the ſovereign promiſes to maintain inviolably the privileges of his ſubjects, on pain of being himſelf treated as a traitor. Her firſt care was to ſecure to her huſband the grand duke a partnerſhip of her crown, under the title of co-regent, to which the ſtates of Auſtria readily conſented. This princeſs flattered herſelf that theſe beginnings would have ſmoothed his way to the imperial throne; but ſhe had no money, and her troops were greatly diminiſhed, or diſperſed in the different parts of her dominions; while Pruſſia, puſhing his vaſt ſucceſs, made his public entrance into Breſlau, and confirmed all the privileges of the inhabitants. One of his generals ſurpriſed the town and fortreſs of Joblunka, on the confines of Hungary. Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Deſſau, who commanded another army, which formed the blockade of Great Glogau on the Oder, took the town by ſcalade, made the generals Wallis and Reyſtic priſoners, and got poſſeſſion of the military cheſt, fifty pieces of braſs cannon, and a great quantity of ammunition.

The queen of Hungary had appointed count Neuperg, one of the moſt experienced generals in Europe, to aſſume the command of her troops in Sileſia, who after ſome time, and with no ſmall difficulty, got together an army of about twenty-four thouſand men, with which he flew to the relief of the invaded province; and the king of Pruſſia found himſelf under the neceſſity of coming to an engagement at Molwitz, near the river Neiſs. This battle, which was fought on Monday the tenth of April, was very obſtinate and bloody, the two armies being nearly equal in point of ſtrength. The engagement laſted from two in the forenoon till half an hour paſt ſix in the evening. In the beginning the Auſtrians put the Pruſſian cavalry into great diſorder, and at length entirely broke that body: they then fell in flank upon the firſt line of the infantry. The battle was thought to be loſt, and the king of Pruſſia was in danger of being made priſoner; but his ſecond line of infantry, by the noble ſtand they made, retrieved the fortune of the day; and in the end the Auſtrians were obliged to retire, which they did in good order, under the cannon of Neiſs, leaving the field of battle to the Pruſſians. This victory, though by no means deciſive, ſerved greatly to raiſe the character of the Pruſſian troops, and the opinion of the military accompliſhments of the young monarch. This battle was ſoon followed by the ſurrender of Neiſs, which, though extremely well fortified, and fully provided for a vigorous defence, ſubmitted after a few days ſiege.

In the mean time, the Auſtrian miniſtry entertained the moſt ſanguine hopes from the reſolutions of the Britiſh parliament, already related; as likewiſe from the arrival of the king of England in his German dominions. Nevertheleſs, they thought it neceſſary ſtrongly to ſollicit the aid and aſſiſtance of the States-general, who, beſides being bound by the moſt ſolemn engagements to ſupport the pragmatic ſanction, were under the ſtrongeſt obligations to the houſe of Auſtria and to his Britannic majeſty. The king of Pruſſia had, however, foreſeen this application; and to counterbalance its effect had given the Dutch to underſtand, that if they intermeddled in the affair, he ſhould inſtantly revive the old pretenſions of his family on part of the eſtates of the principality of Orange. He likewiſe enforced this intimation by a body of ſix thouſand men, which he placed on the Dutch frontiers. In this ſituation, the States thought it moſt prudent to confine themſelves to the milder methods of intreaty and mediation; in which they were joined by his Britannic majeſty, who ordered the earl of Hyndford, his ambaſſador at the court of Pruſſia, to concur with Ginckle, the Dutch miniſter, in preſenting a remonſtrance to the king of Pruſſia againſt continuing his troops any longer in the duchy of Sileſia. To this memorial the count de Podewitz, by order of his Pruſſian majeſty, returned an anſwer, in which he reduced his demands to the Lower Sileſia, with the town of Breſlau, being left to him either by mortgage or otherwiſe, in lieu of his pretenſions to the ſeveral diſtricts he had claimed as his right in that duchy; for which he would not only engage to aſſiſt the queen of Hungary with his whole force, for the preſervation of the late emperor's ſucceſſion, but alſo to give his vote and intereſt to the grand duke for procuring to him the imperial crown. At the ſame time, he perſiſted in his intention to maintain poſſeſſion of the territories he had ſeized, which, he ſaid, could not be conſidered as a violation of the pragmatic ſanction.

The court of Vienna rejected all theſe propoſals with diſdain, adhering in their firſt reſolution to enter into no accommodation, without the previous abandoning of Sileſia by the Pruſſians, tho' at the ſame time they had the greateſt reaſon to believe that France and Bavaria were ſolliciting the alliance of Pruſſia: and this refuſal on the part of the queen of Hungary was, by moſt politicians at that that time, thought the more impolitic, as Spain and Bavaria had openly avowed their ill intentions againſt the houſe of Auſtria. This, joined to the timidity and irreſolution of the Dutch, ſhould certainly have prevailed on the court of Vienna to have relaxed a little in its obſtinacy, and have ſecured ſo powerful a confederate from France and Bavaria. To this however it may be replied, in defence of her Hungarian majeſty, that her honour and dignity had been wounded in the tendereſt part by the hoſtile proceedings of Pruſſia; that ſhe and her miniſtry had been rendered ſtill more preſumptuous by the proffered friendſhip of Great Britain; and by hearing that the Engliſh parliament had reſolved not only to pay the Danes and Heſſians, but likewiſe to ſupply them with half a million of money for her defence. Nay, the queen had been actually encouraged by our court and by the Dutch to inſiſt upon it as a preliminary in any agreement to be made between her and the king of Pruſſia, that the troops of the latter ſhould withdraw from Sileſia; and even promiſed her hopes of their aſſiſtance, if he refuſed to comply.

By ſome means or other his Pruſſian majeſty had come to the knowlege of this promiſe, as alſo of a ſcheme that had been formed by the Auſtrian miniſtry for a general confederacy againſt him, and a partition of his dominions; in which the king of Great Britain, as elector of Hanover, was allotted a conſiderable ſhare: and as he had received no intimation of ſuch a deſign from England, he immediately concluded that it had been approved by his Britannic majeſty, and from that inſtant vowed an implacable enmity towards the houſe of Auſtria and the Britiſh nation: in conſequence of which, he entered into cloſe connections with the court of Verſailles, the event of which will appear in the ſequel.

France now beheld, with an eye of pleaſure, the period that preſented a favourable opportunity of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, and advancing a poor and powerleſs prince of her own nomination to the imperial throne. This prince was no other than Charles Albert, elector of Bavaria, who had, while yet in his infancy, been made priſoner by the Auſtrians after the battle of Hochſtet, and ſtripped even of his title of Bavaria. France found her account in ſetting up this prince: ſhe thought it would be no difficult matter to procure for him, at one and the ſame time, the empire, and a part of the Auſtrian ſucceſſion; by which means the Lorraine branch of Auſtria would be deprived of that ſuperiority which the old one affected to have over the other princes of Europe, and the old rivalſhip ſubſiſting between the dependents of Bourbon and Auſtria would be aboliſhed.

Flattering as theſe proſpects ſeemed, the French miniſtry heſitated for ſome time; nay, they even continued to give the queen of Hungary the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of the good intentions of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty. Cardinal de Fleury, the prime miniſter of France, was then in his eighty-fifth year, and was fearful of ſtaking his reputation, his old age, and his country, on the hazard of a new war. He alſo thought himſelf reſtrained by the pragmatic ſanction, to which he had acceded, and authentically guarantied. Though Fleury was not diſtinguiſhed either by the genius of Richelieu or the abilities of Mazarine, yet, while ſuffered to purſue his own plans, he was a more uſeful member than either to his country. On this occaſion, however, he was forced to give way; for no ſooner was it known at the court of Verſailles that the houſe of Brandenbourg had divided itſelf from that of Auſtria, than the whole French nation cried aloud for war. His moſt Chriſtian majeſty himſelf was brought over to the party of thoſe who oppoſed the pacific ſchemes of the cardinal miniſter; and the latter, about the beginning of the year, was compelled to ſend inſtructions to the marſhal count de Belleiſle (afterwards duke) to prepare a plan for negotiating in Europe the means of carrying on a war, to fix the elector of Bavaria on the imperial throne, and ſecure to him part of the Auſtrian ſucceſſion.

Belleiſle readily obeyed orders ſo agreeable to his own views, and of which he himſelf indeed had been the principal promoter: he drew up his ſcheme, and never did the execution of any project appear more certain. It imported, that before the month of June 1741, fifty thouſand French troops ſhould paſs the Rhine towards the Danube; that an army of forty thouſand ſhould be formed on the ſide of Weſtphalia, in order to overawe the electorate of Hanover, while Saxony (who ſeemed inclined to join the confederacy) Pruſſia, and Bavaria, were to have been ſeconded by the army on the Rhine, by advancing towards the Danube. The elector of Cologn alſo attached himſelf to this intereſt, being that of his brother the intended emperor. The old elector palatine alſo joined to ſet Bavaria on the imperial throne, in whoſe favour every thing ſeemed united. He was to be aſſiſted in ſeizing upon Auſtria, Suabia, and Bohemia; for the imperial dignity alone would have been hardly worth acceptance. This alliance was moreover to join Spain, in order to put Don Philip, ſon of Philip V. and nearly related to Lewis XV. in poſſeſſion of Parma and the Milaneſe.

This ſcheme was ſo well reliſhed by the warlike party in the French court, that they propoſed its being carried into immediate execution; to which they were the more particularly encouraged, by hearing of the miſcarriage of the Engliſh attempts againſt the Spaniſh ſettlements in the Weſt Indies. The marſhal count de Belleiſle was diſpatched to the court of Munich, where he had an interview with the elector of Bavaria at his palace of Nymphenburgh, and concluded a treaty there between the French king and the elector, whereby his moſt Chriſtian majeſty engaged "to get the elector acknowleged emperor, and to aſſiſt him, in caſe of oppoſition, with his whole force; and, in return, the elector ſtipulated, if he obtained the imperial dignity, that he would never attempt to recover any of the imperial towns or provinces conquered by France, unleſs the king ſhould be inclined to reſtore them; and if ſo, the elector was to reimburſe his majeſty forty-five millions of livres for his expences in ſupporting the election. The elector alſo promiſed to renounce the barrier-treaty, and agreed, that whatever conqueſts France ſhould make in the Netherlands, ſhe ſhould irrevocably keep."

The French having now received a large ſum of money from Madrid, began to put their troops in motion; and his Chriſtian majeſty publiſhed a declaration towards the cloſe of this ſummer, importing, "That the king of Great Britain having aſſembled an army in Germany (meaning about twenty-ſix thouſand men which, as elector of Hanover, he had on foot in thoſe parts of his dominions) he, as guarantee of the treaty of Weſtphalia, was reſolved, without prejudice to the pragmatic ſanction, to ſend a body of forces to the Rhine, in order to ſecure the freedom of the approaching election of an emperor, and to be ready to aſſiſt thoſe princes who might call upon him for the performance of his engagements."

Belleiſle was now appointed to carry his own ſcheme into execution, under the double character of ambaſſador and general. He had an interview with his Pruſſian majeſty in his camp at Franckfort. That monarch, from the motives we have already related, was ready to enter with the greateſt cordiality into an alliance with France, and a treaty was concluded on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, whereby it was agreed, "That the elector of Bavaria ſhould be choſen emperor, and ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of Bohemia, the Upper Auſtria, and Tyrol: that the elector of Saxony, if he joined the confederacy, ſhould enjoy the Upper Sileſia and Moravia: and that the Lower Sileſia, the town and territory of Neiſs, and the town and country of Glatz, ſhould remain to the king of Pruſſia." The marſhal next repaired to the court of Dreſden; and the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, being informed of the advantageous terms that were ſtipulated for him, ordered his troops to join the allies even before he had ſigned the treaty.

Immediately on the concluſion of this treaty, the elector of Bavaria commenced his military operations by aſſembling his forces, conſiſting of thirty thouſand men, in a camp near Scharding, where they were ſoon after joined by an army of forty thouſand French, under the command of the marſhals Broglio and Belleiſle, who had paſſed the Rhine and entered Bavaria. At the ſame time the elector received a patent from the moſt Chriſtian king, appointing him his lieutenant-general, with full power and authority to command the French auxiliary army in Germany, wherever there ſhould be occaſion.

The elector thus ſtrengthened, declared war againſt the queen of Hungary, by the title of grand ducheſs of Tuſcany, and eaſily penetrated into Auſtria; while that hapleſs princeſs was ſcarcely able to oppoſe the king of Pruſſia. Bavaria ſoon made himſelf maſter of Paſſau, a ſtrong city ſituate at the confluence of the Danube, Inn, and Ilts, belonging to cardinal Lemberg, biſhop of that ſee. This city was the key from Bavaria into Upper Auſtria. He afterwards took poſſeſſion of Lintz, the capital of the lower territory; and from thence ſent a ſummons to count Khevenhuller, governor of Vienna, and ſpread conſternation to the very gates of that metropolis.

Another body of French troops, to the number of thirty-five thouſand men, commanded by marſhal Maillebois, quitted their camp at Sedan, a town of Champagne in France, and marched ſo far into Weſtphalia as to appear on the frontiers of Hanover. The views of France in this manœuvre were to frighten the miniſtry of Hanover into a neutrality. The king of England was then in his electorate, and the whole of his forces compoſed a body of no more than twenty-ſix thouſand men. Theſe were too inſufficient to oppoſe ſuch a numerous army; and the king of Pruſſia having another conſiderable body of troops upon the other ſide of the Hanoverian dominions, ſo conveniently poſted, that the greateſt part of the electorate might have been deſtroyed by it in leſs than twenty-four hours, his Britannic majeſty in theſe circumſtances was obliged to think of neutral meaſures for Hanover; and a convention for the neutrality of that electorate was ſigned there upon the ſixteenth of September.

The news of this ſurpriſing event ſtruck the whole court of Vienna with unſpeakable conſternation, to find itſelf abandoned at this melancholy juncture. Not one of the princes, either within the empire or without, at this time, ſupported that pragmatic ſanction which ſo many of them had guarantied. Vienna, poorly fortified on that ſide where it was threatened, could not have held out long; or indeed the taking of it ſeemed rather a certainty. The Dutch beheld unmoved the army under Mallebois parade it in Weſtphalia: the king of Great Britain, at the very inſtant he was ready to march to the aſſiſtance of the diſtreſſed queen, at the head of an army he had aſſembled for that purpoſe, was obliged to lay down his arms to ſecure the ſafety of his own electorate, and to ſwell the number of her foes: the queen of Spain, another Semiramis in ambition, who governed entirely the Spaniſh court, had cauſed it to publiſh a memorial, alleging the pretenſions of that crown to all the dominions poſſeſſed by the late emperor.

Thus the queen of Hungary, almoſt before ſhe had been inveſted with the regal purple, found herſelf ſurrounded by a troop of foes, rapacious and eager to devour the four poſſeſſions bequeathed to her by her anceſtors. In this diſtreſsful ſituation, however, this princeſs gave proofs of a magnanimity equal to that of the moſt renowned heroes of antiquity, without the leaſt alloy of that weakneſs liable to her ſex. She quitted Vienna, and threw herſelf into the arms of the Hungarians. Having aſſembled the four orders of the ſtate at Preſburg on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, ſhe appeared in the midſt of them, holding in her arms her eldeſt ſon, who was yet a cradle infant; and addreſſing them in Latin, a language in which ſhe expreſſed herſelf perfectly well, ſpoke nearly in theſe words: "The perplexed ſituation, ſaid ſhe, to which, by the permiſſion of Divine Providence, I find myſelf reduced, is attended with ſuch dangerous circumſtances, that I have no hopes of extricating myſelf from it without ſpeedy and powerful ſuccours. Abandoned by my friends, perſecuted by my enemies, attacked by my neareſt relations, I have no other reſource left but to ſtay in this kingdom, and commit my perſon, my children, my ſceptre, my crown, to the care of my faithful ſubjects. I do not heſitate to intruſt them with all: their loyalty and bravery leave me no room to doubt but they will exert all their ſtrength, ſpeedily and reſolutely, to defend me and themſelves in this melancholy conjuncture."

All the Palatines, at once ſoftened and animated by this pathetic ſpeech, drawing forth their ſabres, exclaimed as one man, "Moriamur pro rege noſtro Maria-Thereſa! We will die for our king Maria-Thereſa!" they always ſpeaking of the ſovereign in the maſculine gender. Nor was this a ſudden burſt of affection only called forth by the preſent preſent view of majeſty in diſtreſs; their real actions correſponded with their words. Before they roſe they paſſed a decree againſt the elector of Bavaria, which they made perpetual, for excluding that prince and his family for ever from the crown of Hungary. The whole nobility inſtantly armed themſelves and their followers. Old count Palfy, whom the queen uſed always to ſtile affectionately her father Palfy, marched to the relief of Vienna with thirty thouſand men; Khevenhuller had raiſed a body of twelve thouſand; Neuperg was in Bohemia at the head of about twenty thouſand; the grand duke, and his brother prince Charles of Lorraine, who was the delight of the Auſtrian ſoldiery, commanded another large army; and prince Lobkowitz, count Berenklau, count Traun, with many other officers of diſtinction, exerted themſelves ſtrenuouſly in defence of their beloved queen, than whom no ſovereign was ever better ſerved by her ſubjects, and no one ever better deſerved it. Several fortunate circumſtances alſo concurred about this time to ſave her majeſty from the ruin which threatened to overwhelm her.

Cardinal de Fleury, ſtill deſirous of peace, tho' hurried againſt his inclinations into a war, was very ſlow in furniſhing Belleiſle with the neceſſary ſupplies for effecting his extenſive ſcheme. In particular, he furniſhed him only with ten thouſand cavalry, though the marſhal had always declared that he could not anſwer for ſucceſs without double the number; and his allies could not furniſh him with the other neceſſaries he ſtood in need of, without too much diſtreſſing themſelves. The elector of Bavaria alſo was guilty of a moſt imprudent and impolitic meaſure; for inſtead of advancing to the attack of Vienna (which every one expected) while the inhabitants were in the depth of conſternation, and would in all probability have made little or no reſiſtance, after leaving twelve thouſand men under count Segur, to guard the banks of the river Inn, and preſerve his communication with Bavaria, towards the middle of October he turned off towards Bohemia, and allowed the Auſtrians to recover from their panic, and prepare themſelves for a vigorous defence of Vienna.

The active Khevenhuller, who was univerſally eſteemed the braveſt of the Auſtrian generals, failed not to improve this incident to the advantage of his royal miſtreſs, and marched at the head of a powerful army into Bohemia, with a view of covering Prague, or bringing the fate of Germany to the iſſue of a battle. In this however he failed; for the elector of Saxony, who had by this time declared againſt the queen of Hungary, tho' indebted to her father for his crown of Poland, had joined his troops, under count Rutowſki, to thoſe of the Bavarian and French, who, on the tenth of November, advanced to Prague, the capital of Bohemia, without any reſiſtance; and being then upwards of ſixty thouſand ſtrong, and the garriſon conſiſting only of three thouſand men, they took the place by ſcalade, and made general Ogilvy, who commanded therein, priſoner, together with his whole garriſon.

The grand duke and count Khevenhuller were already within five leagues of Prague when it was taken; but being unable to prevent its fate, and finding ſubſiſtence fail in the quarters which they occupied, he retired to the ſouthern part of the province. There they divided their army into three bodies. The grand duke commanded one, prince Lobkowitz another, and Khevenhuller a third: the two firſt gained a great many advantages, which it would be tedious to enumerate; but the moſt important affair was conducted by Khevenhuller, who marched againſt M. Segur, whom the elector of Bavaria had left commander of the forces in Auſtria. Him Khevenhuller attacked and defeated; and encouraged by theſe ſucceſſes, advanced to Lintz, the capital of Upper Auſtria, which he inveſted. The place was defended by a garriſon of ten thouſand Bavarians and French; but the count being joined by the army under the grand duke, carried on his attacks with ſuch impetuoſity, that the garriſon was obliged to ſurrender, on condition of not ſerving for one whole year againſt her Hungarian majeſty.

In the mean time, the elector of Bavaria being in poſſeſſion of Prague, the court of France now put in execution the plan of promoting him to the imperial dignity. The miniſtry of Verſailles had previouſly intereſted the electoral powers in his favour; and he being crowned king of Bohemia at Prague on the ſixteenth of December, whereby the vote of that kingdom was ſuppreſſed, there remained no obſtacle to his advancement, and he was elected emperor by the majority of ſuffrages in the electoral college on the twelfth of February following, on which very day he received information of the misfortune he had ſuſtained in the loſs of Lintz.

France, however, thinking its work but half done while the queen of Hungary, its devoted victim, had a town left wherein to ſhelter her head from the ſtorm that ſurrounded her, had employed its emiſſaries at Conſtantinople, to excite the Ottoman forces to augment the enemies of this wretched princeſs; in which caſe ſhe muſt have inevitably been undone. In this alarming conjuncture, ſhe wrote a letter with her own hand to the grand ſeignior, who, with a magnanimity that might do honour to the beſt of Chriſtian princes, aſſured her in return, that, far from taking advantage of her diſtreſſes, he ſhould ſeize all opportunities to convince her of his friendſhip. The pope permitted her to levy a tenth on the revenues of the clergy within her dominions, and even to uſe all the church plate, for the ſupport of the war. The czarina having alſo expreſſed an inclination to aſſiſt this unfortunate princeſs, the French reſolved to find her employment in another quarter, by perſuading the Swedes to declare war againſt Ruſſia, which they accordingly did, on the moſt frivolous pretences; and having aſſembled a numerous army in Finland, and equipped a large ſquadron of ſhips, they commenced hoſtilities, by blocking up the Ruſſian ports in Livonia; but a large detachment of their army being defeated by the Ruſſians near Wylmanſtrandt, that fortreſs was immediately after taken from them by aſſault; and the revolution in Ruſſia happening ſoon afterwards, by which the princeſs of Mecklenburgh and the infant czar were depoſed, and the princeſs Elizabeth, daughter of the late Peter the Great, raiſed to the throne of Ruſſia, a ceſſation of arms was agreed upon in December between the two powers.

Though deprived by this event of the ſuccour which ſhe had ſo much reaſon to expect from the friendſhip of the depoſed princeſs; yet fortune on a ſudden ſeemed to relax of her ſeverity in favour of Maria-Thereſa; for while marſhal Khevenhuller was beſieging Lintz, general Bernes ſeized the great magazine which the French and Bavarians had eſtabliſhed at Cremſmunſter; and general Berenklau, in his march towards Bavaria, maſtered the towns of Hallſtadt and Iſchel, making the garriſon, conſiſting of four hundred men, priſoners; and proſecuting his ſucceſſes, opened a way for the huſſars to make incurſions very far into the electoral dominions. Soon after he joined colonel Mentzel with a body of troops under his command; and they proceeding together, attacked the Bavarians at the village of Wittich, and obtained a complete victory, in which the enemy loſt upwards of three thouſand men, and their general, Preyſing, was taken priſoner. By theſe and other unlooked-for ſucceſſes, her Hungarian majeſty recovered Auſtria, and procured winter-quarters for her troops in Bavaria.

As the campaign terminated with an auſpicious proſpect in favour of the queen of Hungary, againſt the confederate army, it will be now requiſite to take a view of the ſituation of affairs in her Italian dominions.

The miniſters of France and Spain had omitted no ſollicitations to engage the king of Sardinia in the alliance againſt her: but this prince, jealous of the Spaniards gaining any ſettlement in Italy, determined to eſpouſe the cauſe of the houſe of Auſtria; and not only denied a paſſage through Piedmont for fifteen thouſand French troops to join the Spaniards, but alſo formed two camps on his frontiers, to oppoſe the entrance of the Spaniards into his country, which compelled them to run the hazard of ſending their troops by ſea. The republic of Genoa was deeply engaged in the French intereſt: the pope, the Venetians, and the duchy of Tuſcany, were neutral. The king of the Two Sicilies, awed by the Britiſh fleet, had hitherto profeſſed a like neutrality; but being evidently attached to the Spaniſh intereſt, privately reſolved to aſſiſt that court againſt the queen of Hungary.

I have already obſerved, that the queen of Spain had formed a plan for erecting the Auſtrian dominions in Italy into a monarchy for her ſecond ſon Philip; and no ſooner was the court of Spain aſcertained of our king's having ſigned a neutrality for his Hanoverian dominions, than they embarked a body of fifteen thouſand men under the duke de Montemar, captain-general of Spain, at Barcelona, which were tranſported to Orbittello, on the coaſt of Tuſcany, under convoy of the united ſquadrons of France and Spain, in the month of October. The Britiſh admiral Haddock was then lying at anchor in the bay of Gibraltar with a fleet of twelve ſhips of the line, who no ſooner heard of the Spaniſh fleet paſſing the Streights than he put to ſea after them. He fell in with them in a few days, but to his great mortification found that they had been joined by the French ſquadron at Toulon, and ſaw the ſhips of the two nations drawn up in line of battle. As he bore down upon the Spaniſh fleet, the French admiral ſent a flag of truce to inform him, that as the French and Spaniards were engaged in a joint expedition, he ſhould be obliged to act in concert with his maſter's allies. Thus circumſtanced, our admiral was obliged to decline the engagement, the force of the combined fleets being double that of the Engliſh ſquadron, and to make the beſt of his way for Port Mahon, leaving the enemy to proſecute their voyage without moleſtation. But it was too late in the year for the Spaniards to commence any military deſigns; therefore they put their troops into winter quarters, waiting for a reinforcement from Spain and the return of ſpring, before they attempted any thing farther to diſturb the repoſe of her Hungarian majeſty's dominions in Italy.

Although king George, as elector of Hanover, had been obliged to deſert the cauſe of this princeſs; yet he did not fail, as king of Great Britain, to eſpouſe it to the utmoſt. He had the pleaſure to ſee his opinion warmly eſpouſed by all his ſubjects, who were univerſally warmed in her favour. The ducheſs of Marlborough, whoſe deceaſed huſband had fought for Charles VI. aſſembled the principal ladies of diſtinction in London, whom ſhe induced to advance for this cauſe one hundred thouſand pounds, forty thouſand of which ſhe laid down herſelf. The queen of Hungary however nobly declined accepting the money, chuſing rather to wait for ſuch ſums as might be granted to her by the nation in parliament aſſembled.

The king returned to England in the month of October, and on the firſt day of December the ſeſſion was opened, Mr. Onſlow being re-choſen ſpeaker. Never had there been a more violent conteſt than that occaſioned by the late elections for the new parliament. The miniſter, ſecure in his own influence, was unpardonably remiſs in ſolliciting his friends on this occaſion. The minority beheld with pleaſure this overſight, which they converted to their own advantage, and exerted themſelves with ſuch diligence, that they obtained at leaſt an equality of voices.

His majeſty, in his ſpeech to both houſes, ſaid, "That, agreeable to the advice of his parliament, by whoſe advice and concurrence he had undertaken the preſent war, he had ordered the chief operations to be carried on in the Weſt Indies: that he needed not inform them of the powerful confederacy which had been formed againſt her Hungarian majeſty; that was a matter too generally known to require any particular explanation: that had other powers, who lay under the like obligations with himſelf, been as punctual in fulfilling their engagements, the ſupport of the common cauſe would have been attended with leſs difficulty: that he had, purſuant to the advice of his parliament, ever ſince the death of the late emperor, exerted himſelf in ſupport of the houſe of Auſtria; he had endeavoured, by the moſt proper and early applications, to induce other powers who were equally engaged with him, and united by common intereſt, to concert ſuch meaſures as ſo important and critical a conjuncture demanded; and where an accommodation ſeemed to him neceſſary, he had laboured to reconcile thoſe princes, whoſe union would have been the moſt effectual means to prevent the miſchiefs which had happened, and to ſecure the intereſt and ſafety of the whole: that although his endeavours had not hitherto had the deſired effect, he could not but ſtill hope, that a juſt ſenſe of the common and imminent danger would produce a more favourable turn in the councils of other nations: that he hoped the parliament would think it expedient to put the nation in ſuch a condition as might enable it to aſſiſt its friends, and defeat its enemies; and he flattered himſelf they would make it their ſtudy to proceed with unanimity, vigour, and diſpatch, in all their deliberations."

and

After this ſpeech had been reported to the commons by their ſpeaker, Mr. Herbert (afterwards earl of Powis) moved for an addreſs of thanks, including an approbation of the means by which the war had been proſecuted. This motion being ſeconded by Mr. Trevor, lord Noel Somerſet, afterwards duke of Beaufort, ſtood up, and moved that it ſhould be inſerted in the addreſs, "that his majeſty ſhould not engage theſe kingdoms in a war for the preſervation of his foreign dominions." He was ſeconded by Mr. Shippen, who had remarkably diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his conſiſtency of principles, through a long courſe of parliamentary attendance, and who on this occaſion was an eminent proof of the acquiſition liberty of ſpeech in that houſe had made ſince himſelf was committed to the Tower for an expreſſion which at this time would have paſſed unnoticed. Mr. Gibbon, an ancient member, who had been always in the oppoſition, obſerved, that it would be the higheſt abſurdity to return thanks for the proſecution of a war which had been egregiouſly miſmanaged. Sir Robert Walpole having made a ſhort ſpeech in defence of the firſt motion for an addreſs, was anſwered by Mr. Pulteney, who, after entering into a long detail of the miniſter's conduct, which he cenſured in every point, ſuffered himſelf to be ſo far carried away by the heat of his imagination, and the acrimony of his animoſity, as to charge ſir Robert in direct terms with perſonal attachment and affection to the enemies of his country; an exaggeration which took greatly from the force of his other arguments, which were founded on real facts. After much debate, the miniſter agreed to leave out the paragraph approving of the manner in which the war had been proſecuted; and the addreſs paſſed in the following terms: "We will, ſaid they, grant ſuch effectual ſupplies as ſhall enable your majeſty not only to be in a readineſs to ſupport your friends and allies, at ſuch time and in ſuch manner as the exigency and circumſtance of affairs ſhall require, but to oppoſe and defeat any attempts that ſhall be made againſt your majeſty, your crown, and kingdom; or againſt thoſe who, being equally engaged with your majeſty, by the faith of treaties, or united by the common intereſt or common danger, ſhall be willing to concert ſuch meaſures as ſhall be found neceſſary and expedient for maintaining the balance of power in Europe."

The coldneſs of this addreſs tended greatly to the prejudice of the miniſter: his mercenary friends ſuſpecting his power was upon the decline, began by degrees to forſake him; and thoſe who followed him from principle, imagined that he had been too negligent in the intereſts of a maſter who had ſo highly favoured him. The miniſter alſo at this time committed another piece of miſconduct which did him infinite prejudice: this was the ſetting up for chairman of the committee of elections, a perſon who was very little eſteemed by either party *, againſt one whoſe intereſt was warmly eſpouſed by the adverſe faction, and was in his own character unexceptionable †. This queſtion being carried againſt the miniſter, gave a mortal damp to his intereſt, and was the prelude to ſtill greater mortifications that awaited him; for the oppoſition in the houſe of commons finding their aſcendancy, ſoon manifeſted the force of their ſuperiority, which was ſeen in the debates on the controverted elections for Boſſinney in Cornwall, the city of Weſtminſter, the ſhire of Berwick, and Clapperton in Wiltſhire, which were all decided in favour of the oppoſition.

At that for Weſtminſter, a party of ſoldiers being called on pretence of a riot, the poll books were ſhut, and the two court candidates, lord Sundon and ſir Charles Wager, returned by the high bailiff. The electors of Weſtminſter hereupon preſented a petition, which being taken into conſideration, the election was declared void, the high bailiff committed to cuſtody, the juſtices who ſent for the ſoldiers reprimanded on their knees at the bar of the houſe, and a writ ordered for a new election, when lord Percival and Mr. Edwin were choſen. When the election was declared void, there were great rejoicings throughout the city of Weſtminſter. The court loſt this election by a majority of two only (viz. two hundred and twenty-two againſt two hundred and twenty.) This however ſerved evidently to demonſtrate the declenſion of the miniſter's intereſt, and the concluſion of his influence in the houſe of commons; and he himſelf was convinced it was high time to provide for his own ſafety, by retiring from a place where the majority of a ſingle voice might at any time have ſent him to the Tower. He had however the conſolation of being certain to find the royal protection extend, as far as it conſtitutionally could, to ſecure his perſon from the rage and fury of the times. He therefore continued to give his attendance in the houſe till the ſecond of February, and even during that time carried ſome points againſt the oppoſition; but the deciſion of the Chippenham election on that day being carried againſt him only by one vote, and he having been very roughly handled in the courſe of the debate, he came out of the houſe, and in the lobby declared he would never enter it more.

This declaration was not ſo ſoon expected either by his friends or his enemies, and ſeems chiefly to have been accelerated by the repulſe ſir Robert met with in an attempt which, if it had ſucceeded, would probably, by dividing the oppoſition, have ſecured him a longer political reign.

His royal highneſs the prince of Wales, who was juſtly the darling of the whole nation, eſteeming ſir Robert Walpole as a bar between the king and his people, between the king and foreign powers, and between the king and himſelf, ſtood in the front of the oppoſition, and had for ſome years lived at a diſtance from his royal father's preſence. Sir Robert therefore, finding himſelf ſo cloſely hunted, was reſolved to try, as the laſt expedient, to reconcile the king and prince, and thereby bring the latter off from the country party. With this view Dr. Secker, biſhop of Oxford, and now archbiſhop of Canterbury, was ſent to the prince with a meſſage, importing, that if his royal highneſs would write a ſubmiſſive letter to his majeſty, fifty thouſand pounds ſhould be added to his annual income, two hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be given him to pay his debts, he and his friends ſhould be readmitted into the royal favour, and ſuitable proviſions ſhould be made for them all. To this meſſage the prince replied with the ſtrongeſt proteſtations of duty towards his majeſty, but declared he could agree to no terms till he was removed. It was this anſwer that determined the miniſter to withdraw from power; but as it required ſome time to deliberate upon the firſt changes, it was requiſite to adjourn the houſe. Accordingly, on the third of February his majeſty came to the parliament, and adjourned both houſes to the eighteenth. In this interim ſir Robert Walpole was, on the eighth of February, created by his majeſty, baron of Haughton, viſcount Walpole, and earl of Orford; and on the eleventh he reſigned all his employments.

As the firſt happy effect of the change in the miniſtry, his royal highneſs waited on his majeſty at St. James's, attended by a great concourſe of nobility and other perſons of diſtinction; was received in a moſt gracious manner; and a guard was immediately ordered to attend his royal highneſs at Carleton-houſe. This happy reconciliation, with the change of the miniſtry, was celebrated with public rejoicings. It was now expected the national honour would be retrieved, and ſuch meaſures purſued as would be moſt conducive to the reſtoring and maintaining the ancient conſtitution, and to concur in making the ſtricteſt enquiry into the cauſe of paſt miſmanagements. It ſoon appeared, however, that the removal of ſir Robert Walpole had wrought no material alteration in the meaſures of the miniſtry, though ſome changes in the higher departments of government were abſolutely neceſſary: therefore, on the reſignation of ſir Robert Walpole, Mr. Sandys, who had long perſevered in oppoſing him, and had led on the attack againſt him in parliament, now ſucceeded him in his place of chancellor of the Exchequer, and was likewiſe appointed a lord of the Treaſury; and the earl of Wilmington ſucceeded him as firſt commiſſioner of that board. Lord Harrington, being dignified with the title of earl, was declared preſident of the council; and in his room lord Carteret became ſecretary of ſtate, jointly with the duke of Newcaſtle, who continued in his place as the other ſecretary. The duke of Argyll was made maſter-general of the ordnance, colonel of his majeſty's royal regiment of horſe-guards, and field-mareſchal and commander in chief of all the forces in South Britain; but ſoon after conceiving ſome diſguſt, he reſigned all his employments with the utmoſt indignation. The marquis of Tweedale was appointed ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland; a poſt which had been long ſuppreſſed; Mr. Pulteney was re-admitted to his ſeat in the privy-council, but, agreeable to the promiſes which he had made to the party, declined accepting of any place; the earl of Winchelſea and Nottingham was preferred to the head of the admiralty, in the room of ſir Charles Wager; and, after the reſignation of the duke of Argyll, the earl of Stair was appointed field-mareſchal of his majeſty's forces, and ambaſſador-extraordinary to the States-general.

As the Whigs who had confederated in the oppoſition never intended to continue an alliance with the Tories, any further than the removal of the miniſter, and an alteration in his ſyſtem of politics; they endeavoured to keep that party from the lead in government, and to prevent them from engroſſing any material charge in the adminiſtration. As the choice of thoſe already preferred had fallen principally upon the Whigs, it adminiſtered matter of great jealouſy to, and was conſidered as an ill omen by the Tories, who expected nothing leſs than to be admitted into a coalition of power; and though his majeſty had already ſupplied the principal miniſterial poſts with perſons who had long been moſt confided in by the people, the Tories had very juſt ſuſpicions they were to be deſerted by thoſe gentlemen in power; and that none, or only a very few of the Tories, would be permitted to preſide in the government. The duke of Argyll in particular was ſo diſguſted at this proceeding, that he with the utmoſt reſentment again threw up all his places, and was ſucceeded by the duke of Montagu in that of maſter of the ordnance.

The parliament met, purſuant to their adjournment, on the eighteenth of February, 1742, when petitions having been preſented by the merchants of London, Briſtol, Liverpool, Glaſgow, and many other trading towns in the kingdom, complaining of the loſſes they had ſuſtained by the bad conduct of the war; the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee to deliberate on theſe remonſtrances. The articles of the London petition were explained by Mr. Glover, an eminent merchant of that city, and author of the well-known poem of Leonidas. Six days were ſpent in peruſing papers and examining witneſſes; then the ſame gentleman ſummed up the evidence, and pathetically and eloquently expatiated upon the hardſhips ſuſtained by the Britiſh merchants, and the indifference, diſregard, and haughtineſs, ſhewn to them from the admiralty upon ſeveral applications, which he repreſented as the reſult of one uniform and continued deſign to make the merchants uneaſy with the war. He concluded with obſerving, that the Britiſh trade in this its day of oppreſſion, threw itſelf upon the protection of a Britiſh parliament, in full hopes of that wiſe and auguſt aſſembly taking their caſe into conſideration, and of providing for their future ſecurity by a law. The parliament paid a due regard to theſe petitions, and entered into vigorous reſolutions for the better protection of the Britiſh trade and commerce for the future. Accordingly, a number of ſmall men of war were appointed to cruize in the Channel and about the coaſts, to ſecure the merchant ſhips from the inſults of the Spaniſh privateers.

It was hoped, that in conſequence of the late change in the miniſtry, the great aſſembly of the nation would have become again the ſeat of concord: but alas! theſe hopes were quickly blaſted; and it appeared too plainly that thoſe who had declaimed the loudeſt for the liberties of their country, had been actuated ſolely by the moſt ſordid views of ſelf-intereſt. The members of the long oppoſition were now divided: thoſe who were in power, joined by ſome of the late miniſterial friends, and promoting others of their own, obtained a viſible aſcendancy in the parliament; many of the leading Tories were neglected by the miniſtry; party began again to kindle; and another oppoſition quickly diſcloſed itſelf. Whigs and Tories were blended in ſuch confuſion, ſome in and others out of employ, that there was hardly making any diſtinction.

The public voice was at this time unanimous for an enquiry into the adminiſtration of ſir Robert Walpole. The crime they imputed to him was that of applying not only all the favours of the crown, but even the public money, towards gaining a corrupt influence at elections and in parliament; and in their frenzy of reſentment, nothing leſs was expected as an atonement than the loſs of his life, his honours, and the utter ruin of his family. The wiſer and more moderate part of the ſenate, however, were diſinclined to take ſuch ſevere revenge on a miſtaken man, who, though he might have treſpaſſed upon the power in his hands, yet the laws might have been tortured more to have reached him capitally, than he had ſtrained his power to maintain himſelf; and therefore at the ſame time they concurred in detecting and expoſing the miſmanagement of his adminiſtration, in order to gratify the wiſhes of the nation, they at the ſame time determined to protect him from the rage and violence of party fury.

On the ninth day of March the lord viſcount Limerick moved the houſe of commons, that a committee might be appointed to enquire into the conduct of affairs at home and abroad for the laſt twenty years (the ſpace of time the late miniſter had been at the helm.) He was ſeconded by ſir John St. Aubyn, Mr. W. Pitt, and lord Percival, the new member for Weſtminſter. The motion was oppoſed by ſir Charles Wager, Mr. Pelham, and Mr. Henry Fox. Several of the members, who were otherwiſe inclined to have favoured the motion, oppoſed it alſo, becauſe they apprehended it to be too extenſive, both as to time and matter; and that an enquiry for ſo long time back was without a precedent, and if allowed would be ſuch a precedent as might be of dangerous conſequence in future times. In fine, the motion, after a long debate, was rejected by a majority of two. Not diſcouraged by this diſappointment, the ſame nobleman, on March 23, made another motion, "That a committee be appointed to enquire into the conduct of Robert earl of Orford, during the laſt ten years of his being firſt commiſſioner of the Treaſury, and chancellor and under-treaſurer of his majeſty's Exchequer," which was carried in the affirmative by a majority of ſeven; and the houſe reſolved, "That a committee of ſecrecy, in number twenty-one, ſhould be choſen by balloting;" and in the mean time preſented an addreſs to the king, aſſuring him of their fidelity, zeal, and affection.

The place and penſion bills, and that for repealing ſeptennial parliaments, had been regarded as the great criterions of the party during their late oppoſition, and it was now determined to put the ſincerity of the preſent adminiſtration to thoſe teſts. The penſion-bill went through the lower houſe, but was rejected in the upper, lord Carteret voting againſt that very meaſure which he had ſo lately endeavoured to promote. It was generally thought that the motion for repealing the ſeptennial act would have been carried; but as it was made by ſir Robert Godſchall, and ſeconded by ſir John Barnard, it was rejected by a majority of twenty voices. Among thoſe who ſpoke againſt it were Mr. Pulteney and Mr. Sandys, who having, during the late oppoſition, been always the chief promoters of it, were thereby expoſed to a great deal of cenſure. The people, enraged by the miſcarriage of thoſe their favourite ſchemes, exclaimed with great vehemence, that they had been deceived and betrayed; and that an infamous compromiſe had been made between the old and the new miniſters, in order to elude the hopes and wiſhes of the nation: the cry for juſtice againſt the late miniſter was revived, and re-ecchoed from all parts of the kingdom, and ſomething in decency muſt be done to ſilence it.

The committee of ſecrecy being choſen, they proceeded to buſineſs; and upon the thirteenth of April the lord Limerick reported to the houſe, that the committee met with great obſtructions in their enquiry; for having ordered Nicholas Paxton, eſquire, ſollicitor to the Treaſury; Gwynn Vaughan, eſquire; and Mr. Scroope, ſecretary to the Treaſury, before them for an examination, they refuſed to anſwer the interrogations exhibited by the committee. It ſeems that the two firſt of theſe gentlemen alleged, that the laws of England did not compel a man to ſay any thing which might tend to accuſe himſelf; and the latter, in whoſe name all the ſecret ſervice-money was iſſued, amounting to above a million, refuſed to anſwer any queſtion, pleading his majeſty's injunction to the contrary; and that he was not permitted to reveal any thing on that ſubject.

Mr. Paxton had been committed to Newgate by the commitee for his obſtinacy: and upon this report to the houſe it was reſolved, That leave be given to bring in a bill for indemnifying ſuch perſons as ſhould, upon examination, make diſcoveries touching the diſpoſition of public money, and concerning the diſpoſition of offices, or any payment or agreement in reſpect thereof, or concerning other matters relating to the conduct of Robert earl of Orford. This bill was drawn up, paſſed, and ſent up to the lords, when a motion was made for its being committed; upon which a long debate enſued, in the courſe of which the lord Carteret ſpoke ſtrenuouſly againſt it. This nobleman had been long remarkable for his oppoſition to the late miniſter, and had even made the motion in the houſe of peers for removing him from his majeſty's preſence and councils. On this occaſion he appeared in the light of his advocate. His lordſhip affirmed, that the bill now propoſed was contrary to juſtice, the laws of nature, and the fundamental maxims of the Britiſh conſtitution, and even without precedent: that againſt ſuch a method as this, no innocence could be a protection; for informers would naturally expect a reward, if they could fix any crime upon a man thus ſet up as the object of public reſentment: nay, that by this means a few of them would probably be induced to enter into a conſpiracy for charging him with ſome heinous crime; and that conſpiracy might be ſo cunningly formed, as to render it impoſſible for him to prove his innocence, or to avoid condemnation. After this and ſome other ſpeeches, the queſtion being at laſt put, it was carried in the negative by a majority of fifty-two; though no leſs than thirty-two lords, and amongſt them the moſt eminent and beſt eſteemed part of the nobility entered their proteſt againſt the rejecting jecting this bill; becauſe they conceived it might prove a dangerous precedent, of fatal conſequence to the conſtitution, ſince, whenever the nation ſhould be viſited by a wicked miniſter, thoſe who ſhould have ſerved him in defrauding or oppreſſing the public, and in corrupting individuals, would be furniſhed with an excuſe for refuſing their evidence; their danger would produce his ſecurity, and he might enjoy in ſafety the plunder of his country: nay, they even apprehended that the rejecting of this bill might be underſtood, by thoſe who could make any diſcovery, as if that houſe deſigned to diſcourage any evidence whatſoever that could affect the perſon whoſe conduct the ſecret committee was appointed by the houſe of commons to enquire into.

Thoſe members in the houſe of commons who were for proſecuting the enquiry, beheld with the utmoſt indignation the fate of their favourite bill. A committee was appointed to ſearch the Journals of the Lords for precedents; and their report being read, lord Strange, ſon to the earl of Derby, moved for a reſolution, "That the lords refuſing to concur with the commons of Great Britain, in an indemnification neceſſary to the effectual carrying on the enquiry now depending in parliament, is an obſtruction to juſtice, and may prove fatal to the liberties of this nation." The motion, which was ſeconded by lord Quarendon, ſon of the earl of Litchfield, gave riſe to a warm debate; and Mr. Sandys declaimed againſt it, as a ſtep that would bring on an immediate diſſolution of the preſent form of government.

Another motion was made in the courſe of this ſeſſion, which greatly engaged the attention of the public. This was for leave to bring in a bill for taking, examining, and ſtating the public accounts of the kingdom. The motion was carried, and the bill prepared, importing, among other things, that the number of commiſſioners for carrying the bill into execution ſhould be ſeven: that no perſon ſhould be a commiſſioner who had any office of profit, or was accountable to his majeſty: that the commiſſioners ſhould be members of this houſe; and that they ſhould be choſe by ballot. This motion was in its nature extremely alarming to the earl of Orford's friends, who were indefatigable in exerting their intereſt to procure on their ſide a majority of the commiſſioners; and having, in ſpite of all the endeavours of the oppoſite party, ſucceeded in this point, the patrons of the bill became ſo indifferent about it, that it was dropped.

It was with unſpeakable regret that the country party, and the bulk of the nation, beheld ſo many obſtructions thrown in the way of an enquiry which they had ſo loudly demanded; and that they were likely to be diſappointed in their ardent hopes of bringing the late miniſter to public juſtice. I have already hinted that the new adminiſtration only wanted to expoſe the miſconduct of the earl of Orford; and when this was done, they intended to protect him from any dangers ſuch a proceeding might naturally incur, and from the open and declared vengeance of an enraged and unthinking multitude. It was with this view that they had concurred with the other part of the late oppoſition, in promoting an enquiry into the conduct of the late miniſter, which they puſhed ſo far as to make it evident that he had been concerned in many flagrant acts of fraud and corruption in influencing elections; and, by making uſe of the wealth, power, and places of the crown, to introduce a criminal dependency in parliament, and to ſap the conſtitution at its very foundation. It was demonſtrated, that during the laſt ten years of his adminiſtration, no leſs a ſum than one million four hundred and fifty-three thouſand four hundred pounds of the public money had gone through his hands for ſecret ſervice; that above fifty thouſand pounds of this ſum had been paid to hireling writers; that on the very day which preceded his reſignation, he had ſigned orders on the civil liſt revenues for above thirty thouſand pounds. In a word, it was clearly manifeſted, as far as the enquiry extended, that the late miniſter had made too free with his truſt on the one hand, and the conſtitution on the other. The new miniſtry wanted no further or greater accuſation: the public were made ſenſible of his errors and miſmanagement. This was thought ſufficient: and though the blind and outrageous populace called aloud for his blood; yet thoſe at the helm, wiſely and juſtly conſidering that it would be no leſs than murder to ſuffer the life of a man to be taken away, when no law of the land had ſubjected him to death, ſtepped in the breach, and ſaved him from deſtruction; and the committee proceeding to make a further progreſs in their ſcrutiny, and having almoſt prepared a third report, were interrupted, by the prorogation of the parliament on the fifteenth of July.

In the mean time, in hopes of lulling the reſentments of the people, and, if poſſible, to conciliate their affections, the miniſtry aſſented to a bill for excluding certain officers from ſeats in the houſe of commons. They paſſed another for encouraging the linen manufacture, another for regulating the trade of the plantations, and a third to prevent the marriage of lunatics. They voted forty thouſand ſeamen, and ſixty-two thouſand five hundred land-men, for the ſervice of the current year: they provided for the ſubſidies to Denmark and Heſſe-Caſſel: they granted the ſum of five hundred thouſand pounds, and voted to ſend ſixteen thouſand three hundred and thirty-four effective men to the aſſiſtance of the queen of Hungary. The grants for the year 1742 amounted to five millions ſeven hundred and twenty-three thouſand five hundred and thirty-ſix pounds, for which the committee of ſupplies provided by a land-tax at four ſhillings in the pound; the malt-tax; one million from the ſinking fund; annuities granted upon it for eight hundred thouſand pounds; and a loan of one million ſix hundred thouſand pounds from the Bank. This produced in all ſix millions one hundred thouſand pounds; ſo that there was a ſurplus of three hundred and ſeventy-ſix thouſand four hundred and ſixty-three pounds.

Some time before the prorogation of the parliament, John lord Gower was appointed keeper of his majeſty's privy-ſeal; Allen lord Bathurſt was made captain of the band of gentlemen penſioners; and, to the ſurprize of every one, that great champion in the oppoſition, Mr. Pulteney, accepted of a coronet, by the title of earl of Bath.

I ſhall now reſume the hiſtory of the operations of war in the year 1742, which the money, the countenance, and the arms of this nation ſo greatly influenced.

Upon

Upon the duke of Argyll's throwing up all his places, the earl of Stair, who had been lately appointed ambaſſador to the States-general, was made commander in chief of the Britiſh forces deſigned for Flanders. His lordſhip had embarked early in the ſpring on his embaſſy for Holland, with orders to endeavour to concert, jointly with their High Mightineſſes, the proper meaſures for preſerving the liberty of Europe, and eſtabliſhing a juſt balance of power.

The troops deſtined for the queen of Hungary's ſervice, after paſſing in review before his majeſty, were embarked the latter end of April for Flanders, where they were to be joined by fifteen thouſand Hanoverians, and by the ſix thouſand Heſſians that were in Britiſh pay; and the earl of Stair, who had not been able with all his addreſs, which was allowed to be very great, to prevail on the Dutch to come to a reſolution of taking the field in conjunction with the Engliſh, was recalled from the Hague to take the command of the army; and the lord Carteret, principal ſecretary of ſtate, was diſpatched to Holland with freſh inſtructions.

Mean time, the change in the Britiſh adminiſtration had given a new aſpect to the face of affairs on the continent. The news no ſooner arrived in Holland than the States-general, tho' corrupted in great meaſure by the gold of France, ſhewed a more favourable diſpoſition to renew the ancient good underſtanding with England, ſo neceſſary for checking the ambitious views of the general enemy. It was no ſooner known in Germany than it infuſed new ſpirits into the councils, and gave freſh courage to the arms of her Hungarian majeſty. The king of Sardinia, who foreſaw his own ruin in that of the houſe of Auſtria, and had hitherto ventured only to refuſe the Spaniſh troops a paſſage through his territories, on their coming to invade the Auſtrian dominions in Italy, as ſoon as he was aſcertained of the alteration in the Britiſh miniſtry, diſcovered a reſolution to ſupport the queen of Hungary. France received the news of this change with the utmoſt conſternation. His moſt Chriſtian majeſty immediately called an extraordinary council of ſtate, wherein it was reſolved to put that kingdom in the beſt poſture of defence, and to purſue the affairs of the marine with the utmoſt diligence.

By this time Charles Albert, duke of Bavaria, was elected emperor, by the name of Charles VII. and recognized by the pope, who, according to the ancient cuſtom, on this occaſion granted the letters of diſpenſation, to excuſe the emperor going into Italy to take the two crowns of Rome and Milan. As ſoon as the election, the inveſtiture conſequent thereupon, and other ceremonials, were completed, the emperor revoked the Aulic council, or ſupreme court of judicature at Rome, and eſtabliſhed another at Franckfort; from whence the elector of Mentz, as chancellor of the empire, wrote to the queen of Hungary to tranſmit the records and papers belonging to that council from Vienna. This princeſs, however, diſacknowleged the validity of the imperial election: ſhe refuſed to comply with the demand; and ſoon after, the imperial diet or aſſembly of the ſtates was removed from Ratiſbon to Franckfort.

The elector of Bavaria, however, received but a ſmall ſhare of happineſs from his new elevation; for, amidſt the loud acclamations which every way approached him, he had the misfortune to behold his electoral dominions laid open to the victorious Auſtrians, conducted by the great Khevenhuller, the moſt conſummate general of the age. The ſtrong paſſes of that electorate had been already penetrated; ſeveral principal towns were reduced; and the Bavarian army defeated during the ſeverity of the winter ſeaſon. The Auſtrians ſoon after advanced into the bowels of this plentiful country; and Munich, the capital ſeat of the Bavarian family, fell an eaſy prey to the unreſiſted invaders.

The queen of Hungary was no ſooner informed of this event, than ſhe wrote a moſt affecting letter to Khevenhuller, and preſented him with the pictures of herſelf and her infant ſon, the archduke Joſeph (born March 13, 1741). The letter was read, and the pictures ſhewn, to the officers and ſoldiers, who, tranſported with an enthuſiaſm of zeal for their beloved ſovereign, ſwore they would live and die for her ſervice; and in their future behaviour, as if inſpired with theſe noble ſentiments, they diſcovered on all occaſions not only courage and reſolution, but even madneſs and fury.

About the ſame time baron Bernklau entered Bavaria by another quarter, with an army drawn from the woods and wilds in the remoteſt territories of Auſtria, whoſe appearance, ſcarcely bordering upon human, ſpread terror wherever they went, which was ſtill increaſed by their being allowed to live upon free quarters. They were however a very uſeful and indefatigable body of men: they drove count Thoring, with his Bavarians, under the cannon of Ingolſtadt, and performed many other important ſervices.

Soon after, viz. about the middle of April, the Bavarians received a reinforcement of twenty thouſand French troops, commanded by the duke de Harcourt, who were detached from Prague, and came by Amberg, through the Upper Palatinate. On the other hand, marſhal Khevenhuller, being joined by the prince of Saxe-Hilburghauſen, with an army of twenty-four thouſand men, had ſeized an advantageous poſt at Ortenburgh, in the neighbourhood of Paſſau, and detached general Bernklau to obſerve the motions of the confederates, who had ſent a body of four thouſand men to attack the Auſtrian garriſon in Munich. The garriſon, upon intelligence of their deſign, quitted the city, thinking it untenable; but before the French could arrive, the city was again repoſſeſſed by the Auſtrians.

The Bavarians having received a ſecond reinforcement from France, the confederate army was now augmented to fifty thouſand men, and pitched their camp at Neder Altach. This obliged Khevenhuller to recal his troops from Munich, and aſſemble his army all together near Villhoven, where, having thrown two bridges over the Danube, general Bernklau was detached, with baron Trenck, and a body of ſix thouſand men, to croſs that river, and march as far as Zell, where they encamped and entrenched themſelves within a league of the French and Bavarians, who thereupon marched back to Deckendorff towards the end of May; and from thence count Thoring and the duke de Harcourt advanced with a part of the army to the caſtle of Hilkerſberg, on the Danube, with a view to take poſſeſſion of the bridge the Auſtrians had thrown over that river. The Auſtrian garriſon, under the command of general Helfreich, immediately marched out to give them battle; and a ſevere action enſued, in which the Imperialiſts were defeated, with the loſs of one thouſand killed and wounded. After this action the French and Bavarians, though ſo greatly ſuperior to the Auſtrians, avoided an engagement. To counterbalance, however, in ſome meaſure, theſe advantages, mareſchal Broglio ſent a body of French and Bavarians under prince Maurice of Saxony (better known by the name of count Saxe and marſhal Saxe) who took by capitulation the town of Egra, while the citadel of Glatz, for want of proviſions, was obliged to ſurrender to his Pruſſian majeſty, who was conducting the operations of the war in Moldavia.

Prince Charles of Lorraine, brother to the grand duke, was in the heart of Bohemia, at the head of thirty-five thouſand foot, and eighteen thouſand horſe, and every-where favoured by the inhabitants. He commenced a defenſive war very ſucceſsfully, keeping the enemy in a continual ſtate of alarm, by cutting off their convoys, and harraſſing them perpetually on every hand with crouds of huſſars, Croats, Pandours, and Talpaches. The Pandours are Sclavonians, inhabiting the banks of the Drave and the Saave: they wear long garments, and in their girdles carry ſeveral piſtols, a ſabre, and a poniard. The Talpaches are Hungarian infantry, armed with a muſket, two piſtols, and a ſabre: the Croats are the militia of Croatia: the huſſars are Hungarian cavalry, mounted upon ſmall horſes, which are very ſwift, light, and hardy; they are employed to cut off poſts that are weak, and not properly ſupported by cavalry, which was every-where the caſe of the troops of France and Bavaria. The Auſtrians being enabled, by means of the great number of recruits which they daily received, to form a more regular plan of operations, prince Lobkowitz, at the head of eleven thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe, was appointed to watch the motions of the French in Bohemia, while prince Charles with his army advanced againſt the Pruſſians and Saxons, who were preparing to lay ſiege to Brinn; but on advice of prince Charles's march, laid aſide that intention, retired with great precipitation out of Moravia, and abandoned Olmutz.

This retreat was conſidered by the Auſtrians as extremely advantageous to their views, ſince it gave them an opportunity of uniting their whole force againſt the French under marſhal Broglio, who was too ſtrong for prince Lobkowitz ſingly; but before the Auſtrians could effect this junction, the king of Pruſſia having received a ſtrong reinforcement of thirty-two thouſand men, under prince Leopold of Anhalt-Deſſau, entered Bohemia, and with the utmoſt celerity endeavoured to circumvent the motions of the Auſtrians, and prevent their junction. By the force of generalſhip the king effected his deſign, and at laſt his army and that of prince Charles came to a pitched battle at Czaſlaw, a town thirty-five miles to the eaſtward of Prague. The regular troops on both ſides were nearly equal in number; but the Auſtrians had the advantage of a vaſt number of irregulars, who did them great ſervice in the action. The battle continued four hours with the moſt bloody obſtinacy: the Auſtrians demonſtrated the greateſt bravery; the Pruſſians fought with a degree of deſperation. Victory, however, was on the point of deciding for the former, when the irregulars, having forced their way into the Pruſſian camp, fell to plundering: their example was unfortunately followed by the regulars of the right wing, who had alſo broken into the enemy's intrenchments; and the main body of the Auſtrians being by this means left expoſed, his Pruſſian majeſty ſeized the critical moment; and renewing the attack with redoubled fury, obliged prince Charles to retire, with the loſs of three thouſand men, though his own loſs was not much inferior.

His Pruſſian majeſty, however, notwithſtanding his great ſucceſs, as well in Bohemia as Sileſia, began to think of compromiſing his differences with the queen of Hungary. He was chiefly induced to take this reſolution from his detection of the chicanery of the French court, which now firſt manifeſted itſelf towards his majeſty. According to the plan of operations concerted, the French army was to have joined the Pruſſian forces before the battle of Czaſlaw; but every courier brought freſh pretences for retarding their march. Theſe ſubterfuges were fully expoſed, by a copy of marſhal Broglio's diſpatches, of the fourth of May, which fell into the king's hands. By theſe he diſcovered that a reinforcement of five thouſand men was in march towards the marſhal's army, and that his inſtructions ordered him not to join the Pruſſians; to ſpare his troops as much as poſſible, and never to act near thoſe of the king; to form an army of obſervation of twenty thouſand men to watch the motions of the Pruſſians; to riſque nothing in conjunction with them, but to pretend to the king in excuſe, that no reinforcement was arrived, any more than marſhal Belleiſle, who was the only general that had orders to act in concert with the king. Notwithſtanding this diſcovery, he continued his operations againſt the Auſtrians, foreſeeing, that if theſe ſhould deſtroy the French, an event which was by no means improbable, he himſelf muſt be left to the mercy of the court of Vienna, from which he had every thing to fear. In order therefore to ſecure himſelf againſt this danger, he was obliged to ſave the French, though he was by no means ſatisfied with their conduct; but having gained the victory of Czaſlaw, he continued entirely upon the defenſive.

In a letter which he wrote to marſhal Broglio after the battle, he covertly reproaches the French with their perfidy, in the following terms: "I am quit with MY allies, for my troops have juſt now gained a complete victory: it is your buſineſs to make what advantage you can of it immediately, otherwiſe you may be anſwerable to YOUR allies." The marſhal pretended not to underſtand what his majeſty meant by the words, "I am quit with MY allies;" and wrote to Verſailles, "That the king of Pruſſia might have expreſſed himſelf more obligeingly, but that he did not underſtand the French tongue." He underſtood it well, and his meaning was clear.

While this monarch remained in a perfect ſtate of inaction, the French gained a victory over the Auſtrians at Sahay, on the road to Frauemberg; but ſcarcity of proviſions rendered the allies unable to make any advantage of their ſucceſs. The arrival of the recruits from France was too late: the troops under der Broglio were ſo much diminiſhed, that only twelve thouſand men could be muſtered at a review of forty-ſix battalions, which ought to have amounted to thirty thouſand men; the reſt of the army was ſcattered, while prince Charles of Lorraine and prince Lobkowitz united their forces. To add to this misfortune, there was but little agreement between the French generals. Had the Pruſſians acted conjunctly with the French and Saxons, it is certain, that being maſters of Prague, Egra, and all the northern Bohemia, victorious at Czaſlaw and Sahay, they might have remained maſters of Bohemia. The reaſon of the king of Pruſſia's inactivity was owing to the reſolution he had taken to accommodate his differences with the queen of Hungary, in caſe he could procure any reaſonable terms; and when marſhal Belleiſle waited upon him in his camp on the fifth of June, in order to concert with him what was to be done for the common cauſe, the king ſpoke thus to him: "I give you warning, that prince Charles is advancing towards M. de Broglio; and that if you do not improve the advantage you had at Sahay, I ſhall forthwith conclude a ſeparate peace."

Nor did he fail to adhere to this reſolution; for finding the queen of Hungary willing to cede to him the dominions to which he made pretenſions; and incenſed againſt the French, on account of the diſingenuous treatment he had received from them, he had a private interview with prince Charles of Lorraine, when the preliminaries of a treaty of peace were agreed upon, which were ſigned at Breſlau on the eleventh of June by the earl of Hyndford, the Britiſh miniſter at the court of Vienna, to whom her Hungarian majeſty had given full powers to act for her, and by the count de Podewitz, on the part of the king of Pruſſia. The ſubſtance of this treaty is as follows.

"The queen of Hungary cedes to the king of Pruſſia all Upper and Lower Sileſia, except the principality of Jeſchen and Troppau, and likewiſe the principality of Glatz in Bohemia. The king of Pruſſia engages, on his part, to obſerve an exact neutrality during the continuance of the war, and to withdraw his troops from the kingdom of Bohemia, within fifteen days from the ſigning of the preſent treaty; within which time the ratification thereof is to be made. His Pruſſian majeſty charges himſelf with the repayment of what was lent by the Engliſh merchants to the late emperor on the ſecurity of the revenues of Sileſia, by the contract made at London, January 10--21, 1735. His Britannic majeſty guaranties this treaty, as well in quality of king of Great Britain as elector of Hanover. By a ſeparate article, the king of Poland is invited to accede to this treaty, upon condition of withdrawing his troops within ſixteen days from the ratification hereof. The czarina, the States-general, the king of Denmark, and other powers of Europe, are invited to concur in this treaty."

By this treaty the queen of Hungary yielded to the king of Pruſſia not only more than he demanded fifteen months before, when ſhe might in return have been aſſiſted with troops and money, and his intereſt and influence in procuring the imperial crown for her conſort the archduke, but gave him into the bargain the principality of Glatz, only to remain neuter. But it muſt be conſidered, that at that time the king of Pruſſia was the only power who had commenced hoſtilities againſt her, with leſs pretenſions to any part of the Auſtrian dominions than any of the other competitors. An emperor was now elected in oppoſition to her hereditary right, and the king of Pruſſia was the moſt ſucceſsful of his allies. In drawing off him, ſhe judiciouſly imagined that he would attract the king of Poland: and in this ſhe was not miſtaken; for as ſoon as the notification of the preliminary treaty was made to him, the Saxon troops in Bohemia were immediately ordered to halt till further inſtructions. A negociation was ſet on foot, and a peace concluded between him and the queen of Hungary, which was proclaimed at Dreſden the ſeventeenth of September; and by which the queen yielded to his Poliſh majeſty, as elector of Saxony, ſome places in the circles of Elnbogen, Satzer, Leutmeriz, and Buntzlaw, in Bohemia; in conſideration whereof the elector guarantied to her the reſt of Bohemia.

The emperor was abandoned by theſe treaties, and not the ſlighteſt mention made of France: in other words, the French and Bavarians were left to contend for themſelves. Prince Charles of Lorraine, after the battle of Czaſlaw, marched towards Budwies, and joined prince Lobkowitz in his camp at Weſel, where the two armies formed a force of ſixty thouſand three hundred men. The confederate army was now forced to abandon all their poſts one after another: they daily loſt their proviſions and ammunition, of which part was pillaged by their own ſoldiers, and part carried off by the enemy. Prince Charles paſſed the Moldau in purſuit of a body of troops under M. d'Aubigné, who retreated in diſorder. He followed the French to Thein, to Piſeck, and from Piſeck to Pilſen, and from thence to Beraun. Theſe retreats coſt the French at leaſt as many men as a battle, and, beſides, contributed to diſpirit the troops. They were perpetually harraſſed in their precipitate marches by the huſſars; their baggage pillaged; and every Frenchman who chanced to ſtray from his corps was ſure to be knocked on the head by the purſuers, or the peaſants of the villages they paſſed through; and, had it not been for a moſt judicious ſtand made by marſhal Broglio againſt prince Charles, the whole French army muſt have been deſtroyed. This was an admirable piece of generalſhip, but did not at all reſtore his affairs. During the time he was making ſo many efforts to prevent being cut off by the united armies of prince Charles and prince Lobkowitz, he received advice of the defection of his Pruſſian majeſty, and the ſigning the treaty of Breſlau. This news came like a thunderbolt upon Broglio, and encreaſed the panic of his men, who never ventured to look back till they found themſelves under the protection of the cannon of Prague, where they were joined by marſhal Belleiſle from Dreſden, whither he had lately made a tour, with a view of diſſuading his Poliſh majeſty from abandoning the confederacy; but finding all his attempts ineffectual, he poſted away for Prague, reſolved to take the beſt meaſures for ſecuring that important city and the confederate army againſt the attack of the Auſtrians.

The city of Prague * is encompaſſed with a wall, baſtions, and other works; has a citadel in the new town, and a caſtle in the little town, well provided with cannon, which render it as ſtrong as a place of that extent can be; but it is commanded by the hills of Ginriſnitz, about a mile from the city. The French garriſon within, and the army under the walls of Prague, conſiſted now of twenty-four thouſand of the choiceſt troops of France: theſe were employed night and day in fortifying their camp, which they choſe on a very convenient ſpot of ground, being a ſort of peninſula, formed at the north end of the city by the winding of the river Moldau, by which the right, left, and rear, were ſecured againſt any attack; ſo that they had nothing but a narrow front to guard; and this was defended in flank by the cannon upon the ramparts of the city, as well as by the ſtrong intrenchments they had raiſed in front between the town and the river.

Prince Charles and prince Lobkowitz, with their combined armies, amounting to ſixty thouſand men, arrived within ſight of Prague on the twenty-fifth of June, and encamped on the hills of Ginriſnitz, about a quarter of a mile from the city; from whence the army marched, and encamped at Konigſhall, nearer to Prague, where, on the twenty-ſeventh, the grand duke of Tuſcany arrived in the camp.

The appearance of the Auſtrian army convinced the French that the force of oppoſition would be of little ſervice, and they reſolved to try if they could extricate themſelves by ſtratagems of negociation. With this view Belleiſle ſent a trumpet to demand a conference, offering immediately, in virtue of his plenipotentiary power, to open conferences for a general accommodation; but he received for anſwer, that the queen of Hungary was determined to take no ſtep of that kind without the participation of her allies. When Belleiſle found the Auſtrians were too wary to be trepanned into his cobweb negotiation, he held ſeveral conferences with count Konigſeck concerning a capitulation for the ſurrender of the place, offering to evacuate Prague and all Bohemia, the fortreſſes of Egra and Frauemberg included, on permiſſion of marching off with their artillery, arms, and baggage: but the court of Vienna inſiſting they ſhould ſurrender priſoners of war, the conferences were entirely broken off; and the place being inveſted on all ſides, the trenches were opened on the twenty-eighth of July.

It was a ſight altogether new to ſee an army of twenty-ſix thouſand of the beſt troops in Europe beſieged. The French general acquitted himſelf with great ſpirit and reſolution. He knew he had nothing but famine to fear: he was ſenſible the Auſtrians were very ignorant of the art of attack and defence; but they were formidable, by their numbers, by their knowlege of the country, by their valour in the field, and by their being acquainted with the language of, and poſſeſſed of the good will of the inhabitants. The queen had left nothing undone, on her part, which ſhe thought might contribute to the retaking of this capital. She gave all the horſes in her own ſtables to aſſiſt in drawing the artillery and ſtores. Her example was followed by her nobles, who ſtrove with each other who ſhould moſt contribute to the ſucceſs of this great expedition. In ſhort, the hopes of the queen of Hungary and her brave ſubjects ſeemed to riſe in proportion as ſhe was oppreſſed.

It was the misfortune of the French at Prague to find themſelves at a great diſtance from their own country, among a people to whoſe language they were ſtrangers, and by whom they were hated; to be expoſed to every kind of neceſſity, without any certainty of aſſiſtance. In Prague every thing began to fail but courage. About the end of July meat ſold there for four livres (three ſhillings and ſix-pence of our money) per pound. Horſe fleſh was eaten at the beſt tables; and thro' ſcarcity of forage, the beſieged were forced to kill or turn looſe upwards of fourteen thouſand horſes. Several of the principal French officers ſent their plate to the mint to be coined, to purchaſe ſubſiſtence for their ſoldiers. The Auſtrians indeed had not one good engineer among them; their works therefore were very indifferently carried on: the trenches were too long and too wide, and the French reaped ſome advantages from the errors of their enemies. They made many ſucceſsful ſallies: the moſt memorable was that of the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt; it was little leſs than a battle. Twelve thouſand of the beſieged, under marſhal Belleiſle, attacked the beſiegers in their works, carried a battery, made two hundred priſoners, filled up the works, took general Monty, and killed and wounded fifteen hundred men. Their own loſs was likewiſe very conſiderable: the duke de Biron, the prince de Deuxponts, and the prince de Beauveau, were wounded, and ſeveral officers of diſtinction loſt their lives. On the Auſtrian ſide, the grand duke and prince Charles, who greatly diſtinguiſhed themſelves during the whole engagement, were frequently expoſed to the utmoſt danger; the grand duke in particular eſcaped very narrowly, having his hat carried off by one of the cannon bullets.

In the mean time, cardinal de Fleury was making private overtures for an accommodation, and

* This city, ſo remarkable for the extraordinary ſiege ſuſtained there by the French under the marſhals Broglio and Belleiſle, is the metropolis of Bohemia, pleaſantly ſituated on the large river Moldau, one hundred and fifty miles north-weſt of Vienna, one hundred north-eaſt of Ratiſbon, and ſeventy ſouth of Dreſden. Few cities in Europe have a larger extent than Prague, which is divided into three parts, called the old, the new, and the middle city. The old city, on the eaſt of the Moldau, is very populous, and full of handſome, but old-faſhioned houſes; in which ſtands the univerſity, one of the moſt celebrated in Europe; and in this quarter great numbers of wealthy Jews have their reſidence. The new city was formerly ſeparated from the old by a wall, but now only by a ditch, into which the river can be let at pleaſure. The leſſer town lies on the weſt of the Moldau, and joins to the old town by a bridge of ſixteen arches, being in all one thouſand ſeven hundred feet long, and thirty-five broad, with two large gates under two ſpacious towers, one at each end, which makes this bridge one of the nobleſt ſtructures in the world, it being four hundred feet longer than Weſtminſter-bridge, and ſeven hundred and eighty feet longer than London-bridge. Part of this town is built on a riſing ground, at the top of which ſtands Upper Prague, where is a magnificent palace belonging to the crown. Prague is pleaſantly ſurrounded by fine fields and gardens, and adorned with a great many elegant houſes, churches and convents: the inhabitants are computed to be about one hundred thouſand; and, excepting London, Paris, and Rome, no city has a greater concourſe of nobility and gentry, who are exceeded by none in affluence and grandeur, equalled by few in politeneſs and civility to ſtrangers.

even went ſo far as to accept the king of Great Britain as mediator. He alſo offered to treat about the ſecularization of the biſhoprics of Oſnabrug and Hildeſheim, and the annexation of thoſe territories in perpetuity to the houſe of Hanover. While, on the one hand, the cardinal thus addreſſed the Britiſh court, who lent a deaf ear to his propoſals, as knowing their illuſory tendency, he applied on the other to veldt-marſhal count Konigſeck before Prague, to whom he wrote a letter, which was delivered to him by marſhal Belleiſle; in which the cardinal excuſes himſelf from having conſented to the preſent war, and ſays he was forced into it by the ſuperior power of others with the king. This was directly levelled at marſhal Belleiſle. The cardinal afterwards chuſing to diſavow this letter, it was printed by order of the court of Vienna, which ſerved greatly to leſſen the cardinal's credit.

By this time Prague, the late flouriſhing and happy capital of a ſpacious kingdom, with more than one hundred thouſand citizens within its walls, was ſubjected to all the calamities that war and famine could inflict. It would be foreign to our purpoſe to relate particularly every remarkable incident of this long and important ſiege: ſuffice it to ſay, that the French behaved with great ſpirit and intrepidity; nor could the Auſtrians and Hungarians, with their utmoſt efforts, make any regular approaches; ſo that the place might rather be ſaid to be inveſted than beſieged: yet it was apparent, that in the end the entire loſs of the French army, both in Prague and Egra, was inevitable. There was but one way to relieve them, which was to ſend to their ſuccour that army of forty thouſand men, which, under the command of marſhal Maillebois, had compelled the king of England to ſign the neutrality for Hanover: but this army was in Weſtphalia, about ſeven hundred miles from Prague. This expedient was propoſed by the marquis de Fenelon, ambaſſador in Holland. It had its inconveniencies, but yet was not without its advantages. France had in a manner exhauſted herſelf of men: ſhe had at different times ſent into Germany the better part of two hundred and twelve ſquadrons, and one hundred and ſeventeen battalions; and theſe had been from time to time recruited. Theſe troops, divided in Prague, Egra, Bavaria, and the Upper Palatinate, were above half waſted away. It was debated to march theſe weakened armies towards the complete and flouriſhing army of Maillebois, compoſed of forty-one battalions and ſixty-five ſquadrons, three thouſand Palatines, three thouſand Heſſians, and three independent companies of foot, and two of dragoons. It was obvious, that if all theſe forces united had acted with unanimity, and been aſſiſted by Pruſſia and Saxony, they muſt have ſucceeded in every thing. If marſhal Maillebois had advanced with his army along the banks of the Rhine, to penetrate into Bohemia, he had left France unguarded; ſo that even the Dutch might have become formidable, and harraſſed the frontiers with forty thouſand men they kept on foot for their own defence. Theſe conſiderations were urged by the cardinal and his party as ſtrong arguments againſt the meaſure projected; but the marquis de Fenelon, having undertaken for the continuance of Holland's neutrality, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty determined upon it, however hazardous, becauſe neceſſary; rightly conſidering, that great undertakings cannot be executed without riſking great loſſes; and it was agreed in council, that orders ſhould be ſent to M. Maillebois to begin his march from Weſtphalia without loſs of time; but the route and manner in which his army was to be conducted ſtill embarraſſed them extremely.

The ſcheme was imparted to his imperial majeſty, without whoſe conſent it could not be executed. Charles at firſt ſtarted ſome objections: he was deſirous that the troops under Maillebois ſhould continue in his electoral dominions: he repreſented in a memorial, that by delivering Bavaria, Prague would be ſet free of courſe, as the Auſtrians could no longer continue the ſiege of that place, when M. Maillebois' army ſhould reach the banks of the Danube. In this opinion the emperor was ſeconded by M. Maillebois himſelf, who was extremely averſe to ſet out on ſo diſcouraging an expedition. The French miniſtry, however, could not be brought to put their only reſource in the hands of an emperor who had been ſo little able to defend himſelf, and who by this time had incurred their contempt, and even ſuſpicion. Accordingly, Maillebois began his march from Weſtphalia to Bohemia about the middle of Auguſt, under the ſanction of a reſcript which the emperor ſent to the diet, in which he juſtified the march of Maillebois upon the principles of neceſſity, from the unconquerable obſtinacy of the court of Vienna.

The duke de Harcourt was then at the head of the French troops in Bavaria; Seckendorff commanded the Imperialiſts; and Khevenhuller the Auſtrians: but the deciſion of the fate of Prague, which was hourly expected, kept all parties in a ſtate of inaction. The count de Saxe, who had now entered into the ſervice of France, and gave daily proofs of his uncommon vigour, activity, and reſolution, was appointed to ſucceed the duke de Harcourt in the command of the French army.

Prince Charles, who ſtill continued before Prague, no ſooner received news of the march of M. Maillebois to the aſſiſtance of that city, than he turned the ſiege into a blockade; and committing the care of it to prince Lobkowitz and the Hungarian general Feſtititz, with a body of eighteen thouſand men, he ſet out to the defence of Bohemia.

After a moſt intricate and fatiguing march, the auxiliary army at length arrived on the frontiers of Bohemia, about the beginning of September. Every thing hitherto had been happily conducted: count Saxe was to join this army with the body he commanded in Bavaria. He had already acquired the character of an officer who would let no opportunity ſlip him. On this occaſion he found means to eſcape from Bavaria, where count Khevenhuller held him in a manner ſhut up, and by a dexterous march joined his forces to thoſe of Maillebois, after having taken the poſt of Elnbogen. Soon after, the Imperialiſts under Seckendorff arrived alſo from Bavaria; while Khevenhuller, who had in vain attempted to prevent this junction, joined the army under prince Charles, near Hayd. Mean while, the Auſtrians reduced the town of Frauneburg; and Trenck, the famous partiſan, made himſelf maſter, by a deſperate attack, of Chamb in Bavaria, which, on account of its ſituation, was the general general repoſitory of the effects and treaſure of the inhabitants.

Upon the departure of prince Charles from Prague, Belleiſle and Broglio reſolved to execute the ſame deſign which had been accompliſhed by the counts Saxe and Seckendorff; that of joining the marſhal de Maillebois, who, by the acceſſion of the troops from Bavaria, was now at the head of ſeventy thouſand men; and had marched with ſuch precipitation, that prince Charles could not bring him to an engagement. Mean while, Feſtititz, for want of a ſufficient force, was obliged to raiſe the blockade of Prague; and the French generals being now at liberty, took poſt at Leutmeritz, a ſmall town, lying half way between Prague and Kaden, in order to join the main army under Maillebois, who had by this time advanced in the neighbourhood of the latter place.

Prince Charles, well knowing that if the enemy's project ſucceeded, it would entirely alter the face of affairs in Germany, reſolved, if poſſible, to prevent its execution. With this view he made himſelf maſter of the paſſes in the mountains of Bohemia, where an hundred men may put a whole army to a ſtand. Count Saxe had detached a body of troops towards Kaden, a poſt of the laſt importance, to break down the bridge upon the Eger, over which the Auſtrians were to paſs. One company had already entered the place, and broken down part of the bridge. The Auſtrians came up at the ſame inſtant, repaired the bridge, and made themſelves maſters of the town. Thus was all communication cut off between the armies of Belleiſle and Broglio, and Maillebois. The latter could receive no accounts from Leutmeritz; and the only road to Kaden lay through a defile which it was impoſſible to penetrate. The main army had now ſcarce bread enough to laſt for three days; ſo that Maillebois was obliged to reduce the ſoldiers to half allowance. Diſcontent, want of diſcipline, miſunderſtanding, deſertion; every thing conſpired againſt the united army at this time. In fine, Maillebois ſeeing it impoſſible to effect his junction with the other two French marſhals, returned towards Bavaria, while Belleiſle and Broglio marched back to Prague. Maillebois, on his arrival on the confines of Bavaria, was diſgraced, and the command given to M. Broglio, who eſcaped in diſguiſe from Prague, and arrived in the auxiliary army on the twenty-ſecond of November, where he took upon him the chief command. The auxiliary army being now of conſequence ſuperior in Bavaria, Munich, the capital of that electorate, was a ſecond time relieved, and the emperor entered it again.

On the other hand, the Auſtrians having made themſelves maſters of Leutmeritz, M. Belleiſle, who remained in Prague, found himſelf cloſely pent up therein by prince Lobkowitz (who had renewed the blockade) together with his whole army, now reduced to about ſeventeen thouſand men, without money, ſubſiſtence, or hope of ſuccour; and they had no other proſpect but that of periſhing by famine or war. They were thus cruelly ſituated, when, about the latter end of November, M. Belleiſle received orders from his court to endeavour at effectuating a retreat from Prague. The general returned for anſwer, that he would engage to conduct his troops in ſafety to Egra, in ſpite of the enemy's army or the rigour of the ſeaſon: a bold undertaking, but which was as ſucceſsfully executed.

Belleiſle had formed his deſign of eſcaping with incredible ſecrecy; and, the better to conceal his purpoſe, he had remounted his cavalry, repaired his carriages, and made every other preparation for a longer defence. He had alſo engaged the whole attention of the Auſtrians, by frequent ſallies and ſkirmiſhes, in which the French had generally the better. At laſt, every thing being entirely got ready, he reſolved to carry his ſcheme into immediate execution: the danger was extreme. Prince Lobkowitz had diſtributed his army in ſuch a manner as to ſurround the town, the inhabitants of which were ſo many ſpies on the motions of the French. The weather growing more and more cold, became almoſt intolerable. There were upwards of two thouſand ſoldiers ſick in the place; and the marſhal himſelf had been a long time ſo ill of the ſciatica, or hip-gout, that he could not mount on horſeback; yet, in the midſt of theſe conſpiring obſtacles, he fixed on the night of the ſixteenth or ſeventeenth to make his retreat.

In order to ſecure it more effectually, it was incumbent on him not only to deceive count Lobkowitz, but alſo the inhabitants of the place, and even his own people. To this end, he was continually ſending detachments all around him to bring in forage, which were always accompanied with cannon and covered waggons; ſo that the ſurprize ſhould be leſs when he choſe to evacuate the place, which muſt be done with ſuch an equipage. Two days before his retreat he laid contributions, payable in four months. The day of his intended departure the gates of the town were kept ſhut; and having cauſed a report to be ſpread that he intended a general ſally at ſuch a quarter, he made his retreat by another road, and gained a day's march of prince Lobkowitz, before the other was apprized of his departure. This project he was enabled to execute with the greater facility, on account of the prodigious extent of the walls: and in order the more effectually to amuſe the enemy, he left a garriſon of about three thouſand men in the place, under M. Chevert. M. Belleiſle continued his retreat for ten days through ice and ſnow, the enemy's cavalry perpetually harraſſing him on his march. On the third day prince Lobkowitz appeared at the head of a body of horſe, on the other ſide of a plain, where the two armies might have come to an engagement; but the prince did not chuſe to attack forces who, from their ſituation, muſt neceſſarily fight with that ſort of deſpair that renders courage invincible: he determined therefore to cut off the retreat of the French, by taking poſſeſſion of the paſſes upon the two principal roads leading to Egra.

M. Belleiſle, however, once more eluded the deſigns of his enemy: he choſe a road which would have been in any other ſeaſon impaſſable: he marched his army acroſs vaſt frozen moraſſes that never perhaps had been trodden. In this exploit he merited the greater honour, as, notwithſtanding his being confined during the whole march to his coach or ſedan by a violent rheumatiſm, he always continued himſelf to point out the way. At length, having ſurmounted all his difficulties, he arrived at Egra on the twenty-ſixth day of December, having performed a march of one hundred and fifty miles, and not having loſt, by his own account, ſo much as a ſingle ſoldier, except thro' the inclemency of the ſeaſon, which killed about one thouſand.

The very day that M. Belleiſle reached Egra, the troops that had been left behind in Prague, under M. Chevert, capitulated on the moſt honourable terms, being allowed to march to Egra with all the honours of war. Thus the town of Prague, which had been taken by the French in a few hours, was evacuated after a ſiege and blockade of five months.

Having thus given an account of the campaign in Germany, the event of which was ſo very intereſting to England, it is now time to attend the progreſs of the war in Italy and the ſouthern parts of Europe, where the naval force of Great Britain had a conſiderable influence.

We have already taken notice of the junction of the French and Spaniſh fleets in the Mediterranean; of their having paſſed admiral Haddock; and of the latter having landed their troops at Orbitello in Italy; after which the French and Spaniſh ſquadrons put into the harbour of Toulon.

The queen of Hungary, alarmed at the dangers that threatened her, reſolved to apply to the king of Sardinia, whoſe intereſt it was to preſerve the preſent ſyſtem of power in Italy, and who, by his ſituation, was beſt able to check the ambitious views of the French and Spaniſh monarchs. His Sardinian majeſty was at this time ſufficiently jealous of the deſigns of the Spaniards in Italy; but, at the ſame time, he was afraid of being cruſhed between France and Spain before he could be properly ſupported. He had therefore temporized for ſome time: but being now alarmed at the progreſs of the Spaniſh arms in Italy, he reſolved to declare for the houſe of Auſtria. On this occaſion, however, his Sardinian majeſty took care to make the beſt terms for himſelf. He ſtipulated a ſubſidy from England; he reſerved in their full force all the claims of his family upon the Milaneſe; and he obtained ſeveral private ceſſions of places from the queen of Hungary, whoſe huſband's ſiſter he had married. On the firſt of January, 1742, he cauſed to be printed and publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he ſtated his claims; but it was not till the month of February that he reſolved to act in conjunction with the queen of Hungary; and then he was not upon the beſt of terms with her in the main: they only united againſt the preſent danger that threatened both.

The troops which had been ſent into Italy by the Spaniſh court were under the command of the duke de Montemar, famous for his victory at Bitonto, and afterwards remarkable by his diſgrace. Their route lying neceſſarily through Tuſcany, the grand duke, huſband to the queen of Hungary, gave them a free paſſage, having declared himſelf neuter in the cauſe of his wife. The duke of Modena, who was married to a princeſs of the blood-royal of France, alſo declared himſelf neuter. Pope Benedict XIV. through whoſe territories both the Spaniſh and Auſtrian armies were to paſs, promiſed the ſame neutrality. The republic of Genoa, from the ſame principle of neutrality, gave free paſſage to a body of French forces that arrived from Spain: and the king of Naples and the Two Sicilies adopted the ſame neutral ſyſtem, though his father and brother were principally concerned; yet, after all, not one of theſe potentates, ſo apparently neutral, were ſo in reality. Don Carlos in particular encreaſed the duke de Montemar's army with ſeveral Neapolitan regiments: the duke of Modena was already the ſecret friend of Spain: Genoa had much the ſame inclination: and the pope, although he had acknowleged the elector of Bavaria as emperor, was viſibly attached to the cauſe of the queen of Hungary.

Count Traun, the queen's governor in the duchy of Milan, aſſembling all his forces early in the year, joined them which were ſent him from Tirol, in order to oppoſe the Spaniards. About the beginning of March (1742) the king of Sardinia ſeconding warmly the Auſtrians, advanced towards the territories of Parma: he now exerted as much courage and abilities as he had diſplayed in the year 1733. In theſe two conjunctures he ſhewed how valuable his alliance was: he had excellent miniſters, and good generals, and was himſelf both a miniſter and a general; an oeconomiſt in his expences, ſkilful in his conduct, indefatigable in his hardſhips, and intrepid in danger.

In the mean while, the Spaniſh army aſſembled at Rimini, near the duke de Montemar's; and being joined by the Neapolitan forces, amounted to ſixty thouſand men, furniſhed with a large train of artillery. About the beginning of May they entered the Bologneſe. The king of Sardinia had by this time taken the field with thirty thouſand men, and appeared on the ſide of Parma; while the Auſtrians under marſhal count Traun advanced towards the Bologneſe with about ſeventeen thouſand men. The duke of Modena, relying upon the protection of the Spaniards, was ſo impolitic, in defiance of the neutrality he profeſſed, to enter into a private treaty with the duke of Montemar; of which the king of Sardinia being appriſed, entered the duke's territories, ſeized upon his duchy, and made himſelf maſter of his capital; while the duke, thus ſtripped of all his poſſeſſions, was obliged to retire to the Spaniſh army, of which he was by his late treaty to have the nominal command. This army, however, ſoon became ſo reduced by ſickneſs and deſertion, that the duke de Montemar, finding he could not maintain his ground againſt the Auſtrians and Spaniards, retired to Rimini, whither he was followed by the king of Sardinia.

By this time the Engliſh miniſtry had come to a reſolution to keep no farther meaſures with France: the conduct of the French admiral in the Mediterranean towards admiral Haddock was ſo ſtrong a demonſtration of the intentions of that court, as all their pretexts to a neutrality could not diſguiſe.

Admiral Haddock, what by the fatigues of the ſervice, what by anxiety of mind, owing to the numerous diſappointments he had met with, found his conſtitution ſo much impaired, that he reſigned the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean to commodore Leſtock, who had lately arrived from the Weſt Indies, and been ſent up the Streights with ten ſail of men of war, to reinforce Mr. Haddock, and oppoſe the united fleets of France and Spain.

Upon the departure of the admiral for England, the commodore uſed the utmoſt diligence in fitting the fleet for ſea. On the twelfth of April he ſet ſail from Port Mahon with a ſquadron of twenty-eight men of war, and ſoon after appeared before Toulon, at which the inhabitants were in the utmoſt conſternation: the country round was alarmed by fires, beacons, &c. But this proved a falſe alarm, the commodore not having the leaſt intention of moleſting them; for the united ſquadrons were greatly ſuperior to the Britiſh in force, the French under admiral de Court conſiſting of five ſeventy gun ſhips, ſeven of ſixty, four of fifty, two of thirty, and two of twenty; and the Spaniſh ſquadron under Don Navarro, of one ſhip of one hundred and fourteen guns, four of ſeventy, ſix of ſixty, and five of fifty; in all, thirty-ſix men of war: ſo that commodore Leſtock, after obſerving their ſituation, proceeded towards Antibes on the coaſt of Italy. In the mean time, upon the change of the Britiſh miniſtry, Mr. Leſtock was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral of the white; but as it was determined to ſtrike ſome bold ſtroke in the Mediterranean in the courſe of this ſummer, the ſupreme command of the fleet was beſtowed upon Thomas Matthews, eſq. vice-admiral of the red, who was at the ſame time inveſted with the character of ambaſſador-extraordinary and miniſter-plenipotentiary to the king of Sardinia, and the other princes and ſtates of Italy. He left England in the middle of April. In his paſſage he took ſeveral French and Spaniſh merchant ſhips, and at length ſafely joined rear-admiral Leſtock in the harbour of Villa Franca.

Perhaps no miniſtry ever took a more impolitic ſtep than in joining theſe two admirals in command, as it was well known that there had long ſubſiſted between them an inveterate diſlike to each other: nay, Matthews had even declared to the miniſtry on his appointment, that he accepted of the command only on condition that Mr. Leſtock ſhould be ſpeedily recalled. However, the latter was continued in the Mediterranean till the ſea-fight off Toulon, when it too plainly appeared that the glory and advantage of the nation was ſhamefully ſacrificed to the gratification of private reſentment.

Mr. Matthews' firſt care, after taking poſſeſſion of his command, was to provide for the well-guarding of the coaſts of Catalonia, Provence, and Italy; and he quickly gave an inſtance of his reſolution to ſtrike terror into the enemy, by rendering his fleet formidable; for a French man of war paſſing by Villa Franca, in ſight of the Britiſh fleet, and refuſing to pay the compliment to the flag, the vice-admiral fired at the Frenchman to bring him to; but the commander perſiſting in his obſtinacy, a man of war was ordered out to force him to comply, who poured a broadſide into the French ſhip, and ſunk her directly. His next exploit was to ſend captain Norris, in the Kingſton, of fifty guns, with the Duke fireſhip, captain Calis, to burn five Spaniſh gallies which had put into the bay of St. Tropez, a French port in the Mediterranean; an order which was effectually executed. But no action of his proved ſo agreeable to the people of Great Britain as that of ſending commodore Martin with a ſquadron of ſhips and bomb-ketches to Naples, to demand of the king of Sicily not only to withdraw his troops from acting in conjunction with thoſe of Spain, but to promiſe in writing not to give them any farther aſſiſtance in any reſpect; and in caſe of a refuſal on the part of his Sicilian majeſty to give the propoſed ſatisfaction, to bombard the city of Naples. Incredible was the conſternation that ſeized on the Neapolitans at the ſight of the formidable force Mr. Martin brought with him, and the peremptory manner in which he made the above demand: and however deeply his Sicilian majeſty might reſent this inſult upon his dignity, his private reſentment was obliged to give way to the intereſts of his ſtate, which was in no condition to defend itſelf. Accordingly, after ſeveral meſſages paſſing between the commodore and the duke de Montealegre, the Sicilian miniſter, the latter, in his maſter's name, promiſed in writing, that his troops ſhould be immediately withdrawn out of Lombardy; and that he would not in any manner whatſoever aid or aſſiſt thoſe of Spain any more during the preſent war in Italy. This promiſe was inſtantly performed: the Neapolitan troops were forthwith recalled; and the Spaniſh army being thus weakened, was not able during the remaining part of the campaign to perform any action of importance; and by this bold, but ſucceſsful ſtep of the Britiſh admiral, the queen of Hungary was ſaved from apparent deſtruction.

Soon after, viz. about the latter end of Auguſt, Mr. Matthews purſuing the ſpirited plan he had ſo happily begun, diſpatched the ſame ſucceſsful embaſſy to St. Remo, a Genoeſe town on the Mediterranean, thirty miles north-eaſt of Nice, with orders to deſtroy ſome conſiderable magazines which the Spaniards had gotten together there. This ſervice the commodore effectually performed, and in the beginning of September re-joined the vice-admiral, who took up his ſtation at Hieres-bay, where his ſhips lay in an excellent road, and commanded every veſſel that might attempt to enter or come out of the harbour of Toulon. The Britiſh fleet having by this time been joined by rear-admiral Rowley, was ſomewhat ſuperior to the united ſquadrons of France and Spain, who therefore kept cloſe within the port of Toulon.

The Engliſh fleet, however, could not controul the operations of the Spaniards by land; for the Spaniſh miniſtry, being fearful that if the Neapolitan troops were compelled to quit their army under the duke de Montemar, that general might be expoſed to the danger of being defeated by a ſuperior force; they determined to ſend another body of troops to his aſſiſtance, who were to march through the ſouth of France, and endeavour to penetrate into Italy through the paſſes of Piedmont. Accordingly, in April ſeventeen thouſand three hundred men aſſembled at Barcelona, under the command of the count de Glerices; and being joined on their march by other Spaniſh corps, were augmented to thirty thouſand. On this reinforcement, the whole army marched through Provence and rendezvouſed at Grace, about fifty miles diſtant from Toulon, where it waited for the arrival of Don Philip, ſecond ſon to the king of Spain, whom his ambitious mother had lately ſet up as a new candidate for royalty, declaring ſhe would leave no efforts unexerted to erect Lombardy into a kingdom in his favour. In May Don Philip with his court and a very ſplendid retinue entered Antibes, the laſt town of France towards Italy. In the beginning of June Don Philip put himſelf at the head of his troops, tho' the count de Glerices had the real command, on account of the prince's youth. Their plan was to force their way into Piedmont, by Nice and Villa Franca; but thro' the prudent diſpoſitions of his Sardinian majeſty, with the aſſiſtance of the Britiſh admiral, their deſigns were rendered impracticable; as was alſo another another attempt they made with a ſtrong body of Miquelets, to force a paſſage by Demont into the valley of Stura. Diſappointed in both theſe deſigns, the Spaniards defiled towards the left, thro' Dauphiné, and entered Savoy, where they met with very little reſiſtance; and on the tenth of September the infant Don Philip took poſſeſſion of Chamberry, the capital of that duchy, ninety miles from Turin, and immediately publiſhed a manifeſto, enjoining the deputies of the province of Savoy to come in and take the oaths to him, and to bring their arms and ammunition to his quarters, within the ſpace of five days at fartheſt, prohibiting them to pay any more taxes to the king of Sardinia, or to have any correſpondence with him, under pain of death.

While theſe things were tranſacting on the borders of Piedmont, his Sardinian majeſty was in a full career of ſucceſs againſt the Spaniards in Italy, having obliged the Spaniſh and Neapolitan army to retreat from Rimini towards the kingdom of Naples; and the Neapolitan troops being recalled, he had now an opportunity of returning to the relief of his own dominions, which he did with 24,000 Piedmonteſe, leaving a ſmall body of troops behind, under the command of the count d'Apremont, to co operate with the Auſtrians in his abſence. By forced marches he arrived at Turin on the eighth day of September. In the beginning of October he advanced to Conſians, in the neighbourhood of Chamberry; and the infant not chuſing to hazard a battle, retired with ſome precipitation towards Dauphiné, and took poſt under the cannon of fort Barreaux, while his Sardinian majeſty encamped within ſight of them at Mians, near Montmelian, on the frontiers of Dauphiné: and in this condition the two armies remained till the beginning of December, when the court of Spain, diſguſted with the inactivity of the count de Glerices, ſent the marquis de las Minas to ſuperſede him in the command of the army. This laſt general had no ſooner joined the army than he made a vigorous attack upon the caſtle of Apremont, in the neighbourhood of the Sardinian camp, and obliged the garriſon to capitulate: after which he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for attacking the king of Sardinia, who, upon the loſs of the laſt-mentioned important poſt, thought it moſt prudent to retire into Piedmont, the Spaniards at the ſame time marching back into Savoy, where they eſtabliſhed their winter quarters.

In the mean time the Auſtrians, upon the departure of the Piedmonteſe troops, returned into the duchy of Modena; and as ſoon as the duke de Montemar was informed of this ſeparation, inſtead of continuing his retreat towards Naples, advanced back again to St. Nicholas, within ten miles of Bologna, where he reſigned his command to the count de Gages, though the duke of Modena ſtill retained the title of generaliſſimo. This army attempted to penetrate into Tuſcany, but was prevented by the vigilance of count Traun, the Auſtrian general; and in the beginning of December both armies went into winter quarters, the Spaniards in the Bologneſe and Romagna, and the Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe in the Modeneſe and Parmeſan.

Admiral Matthews having received information that his Sicilian majeſty had ſent a reinforcement of ſix regiments from Naples to join the Spaniſh army, in December diſpatched a man of war to Naples with a letter, expoſtulating on this breach of the late promiſe of neutrality. The king in return ordered the duke de Montealegre to deliver to Mr. Allen, the Britiſh miniſter at his court, a declaration, importing, "That he was reſolved to adhere to his engagements; but as theſe regiments in queſtion belonged to his father the king of Spain, and had been only lent to him for his expedition to Sicily, it was not in his power to retain them when recalled, as they were not in his pay or ſervice." However, his Neapolitan majeſty, ſenſible of the weakneſs of his capital, from the laſt viſit paid him by the Engliſh, cauſed ſeveral new fortifications to be erected for the defence of the port of Naples.

While the French were expelled from Bohemia, and the dominions of her Hungarian majeſty in Italy ſecured in the manner already related, her poſſeſſions in Flanders were likewiſe powerfully protected by his Britannic majeſty: for no ſooner had marſhal Maillebois marched from Weſtphalia to the relief of Prague, than the Hanoverian troops, conſiſting of ſixteen thouſand two hundred and ſixty-eight men, began their march from Hanover and paſſed the Weſer, in their way to Flanders; for which country the ſix thouſand Heſſians in Britiſh pay, began to move about the ſame time (viz. the latter end of Auguſt). Theſe two bodies of troops joined the Britiſh forces at Bruſſels about the middle of October, and all together formed an army of about forty thouſand men, which encamped in the neighbourhood of the laſt mentioned city. It was generally ſuppoſed, that his Britannic majeſty would paſs over to Flanders this year, and take upon him the command of this army; wherefore large draughts were made from the Auſtrian garriſons in that country, in order to complete the whole force to fifty thouſand men; and it was confidently reported that king George meditated no leſs than the ſiege of Dunkirk, the fortifications of which the French had of late openly repaired. This at firſt ſo alarmed the court of France, that they aſſembled an army of twenty thouſand men in the neighbourhood of Dunkirk, and took every poſſible precaution againſt any attack upon them in the Low Countries, fortifying Givet, Philipville, Avennes, and Rocroi, where they put ſtrong garriſons, and laid up great magazines, while the earl of Stair quitted his negotiations at the Hague, and arrived at Ghent on the twenty-ſeventh of November. The French miniſtry, however, were ſoon relieved from their anxiety, by hearing that his Britannic majeſty's voyage to Flanders, and the meaſures concerted for commencing operations, were entirely laid aſide for this campaign, in conſequence of the Dutch having threatened to declare againſt thoſe who ſhould ſtrike the firſt blow in Flanders, and ſoon after the confederate army were ordered into winter quarters; the Britiſh and Heſſians in Flanders, the Auſtrians in Luxemburg, and the Hanoverians in the county of Liege, in readineſs to march in the ſpring whither it ſhould appear moſt convenient for the ſervice of her Hungarian majeſty.

During theſe tranſactions in Europe, in the courſe of this year, every thing ſeemed to go backward in America, owing to the diſſenſion between the admiral and general. They had in the latter end of the foregoing year received a reinforcement from England;

England; upon the arrival of which they held a council of war, to concert in what manner the ſhips and forces under their command might be moſt effectually employed for the advantage of the nation, and the annoyance of the enemy, when it was propoſed by the land officers to undertake an expedition againſt Panama, by which a body of three hundred men, with five hundred negroes and four hundred Muſquetos, were to be landed at Porto Bello, and from thence to march over the Iſthmus of Darien to the ſaid town of Panama. Mr. Vernon and ſir Chaloner Ogle having concurred with this opinion, Mr. Lowther was ſent over to the coaſt of Porto Bello on board the Triton ſloop, in the character of a trader, in order to obtain all the intelligence he could, for the better ſecuring the ſucceſs of the intended expedition: and in the mean time the admiral loſt no time in getting his ſquadron in readineſs; but the land officers were ſo very dilatory in their motions, that it was the latter end of March before the armament arrived at Porto Bello. The fleet conſiſted of eight ſail of the line, with three fire-ſhips and two hoſpital ſhips: the tranſports were about forty ſail, having on board three thouſand land forces, and five hundred negroes raiſed by governor Trelawney, who attended the expedition in the rank of a colonel.

Admiral Vernon met with no oppoſition on entering the harbour of Porto Bello, though the governor of the place had three companies of Spaniſh ſoldiers with him, beſides two more of mulattoes and negroes. The governor, upon the firſt ſight of the Engliſh fleet ſtanding in for the harbour, quitted the town with great precipitation, with the three companies of ſoldiers, and moſt of the inhabitants were preparing to follow him; but the admiral having obſerved on his firſt landing that the whole place was in great confuſion, and that the town was on the point of being abandoned, diſpatched an officer and an interpreter directly, to deſire of the inhabitants to lay aſide their apprehenſions, and continue peaceably in their own poſſeſſions, promiſing them the fulleſt protection in their lives and properties. Encouraged by this indulgence, a deputation came on board the admiral from the magiſtrates, thanking him for his humanity, and readily putting themſelves under his protection; which was accordingly granted them by the unanimous reſolution of the council of war. It was likewiſe reſolved that a detachment ſhould be ſent up the river Caſcahal, in order to cut off the communication between Porto Bello and Panama, and take poſſeſſion of the Contaderio, or cuſtom-houſe, and ſecure it with a guard; which was immediately put into execution.

Three days after the arrival of the fleet at Porto Bello, lieutenant Lowther came in; and a council of war being thereupon called, he was examined as to the practicability of the attempt againſt Panama, when he gave it as his opinion, that the putting this ſcheme into execution could not at preſent be attempted with any hopes of ſucceſs, on account of the rainy ſeaſon of the year, and the ſickneſs that prevailed in conſequence thereof amongſt the troops. This opinion was adopted by all the land officers, with the general at their head; and as they out-numbered the ſea officers three to two, their opinions were always deciſive: in ſhort, a general council of war meeting afterwards on board the Boyne, admiral Vernon's own ſhip, it was thereat agreed to wood and water the ſhips, and return to Jamaica.

The general, however, thinking it neceſſary to offer ſome reaſon for thus ſuddenly deſerting an enterprize which he had before appeared ſo ſanguine for, ſent a paper to the admiral, containing the reaſons of the land officers for laying aſide the projected attempt upon Panama, which were as follow: "That, from having conſumed near three weeks in their paſſage, which was uſually made in eight days, the rainy ſeaſon was come upon them, which might not only incommode them in their march, but, by the ſudden riſing of the rivers, might cut off their communication: that from having, during their voyage, loſt near one thouſand men of thoſe who had embarked at Jamaica, and from the fleet being unable to ſupply them with more than ſix hundred, their numbers would fall almoſt one third ſhort of that required for the attempt on Panama: that from the want of one of the ſhips with negroes on board, their numbers were reduced ſo low as to diſable them from carrying a ſufficient quantity of proviſions: that from an omiſſion in executing one part of the ſcheme laid down for carrying on the enterprize, the governor of Porto Bello, with three companies of Spaniſh ſoldiers, and two of mulattoes and negroes, were retired to Panama; on the cutting off of whoſe retreat their ſucceſs in ſome meaſure depended, as the governor was an officer of merit and ſervice, in whom the Spaniards had great confidence: that there was lately good intelligence of a large reinforcement arrived at Panama from Lima, and of works being thrown up towards the land: and for theſe reaſons they thought it was for the ſervice to lay aſide that enterprize as impracticable."

Nothing could exceed the vexation of Mr. Vernon at finding this expedition likely to conclude ſo inglorioufly; for he was convinced that two thouſand men would have been more than ſufficient for the taking of Panama; and it is certain that the governor of that place was in deſpair about its preſervation.

PANAMA is the capital city of the province of Darien, or Terra Firma, properly in South America. Hither the treaſures of gold and ſilver, and other rich merchandizes of Peru, are brought, and depoſited in magazines till they are tranſported to Europe; and here the merchandize of Europe, ſent to America by the galleons, is lodged, till exported to the ſeveral cities of Peru, to which it is aſſigned. The reduction of this city would have made us entire maſters of the Iſthmus of Darien, and thereby, in effect, of all the treaſures of Peru. By this conqueſt we ſhould have always had in hand an equivalent for any conceſſions that the fate of war might have obliged us to make to either of the branches of the houſe of Bourbon. But from the circumſtances, it appears that the general had not for ſome time been in earneſt in the proſecution of this ſcheme; for he was amazingly dilatory in getting ready the troops after it had been agreed on; and even when they entered Porto Bello, he neglected the advice given by Mr. Vernon in a council of war, to ſend a detachment up the river Caſcahal, in order to intercept the governor of Porto Bello and his troops, which might in all probability have ſucceeded, or at leaſt they might have cut off the two companies of mulattoes and negroes, who did not leave the place till next morning. But, to conclude, the reſult of the whole was, that the fleet and tranſports quitted Porto Bello and ſet ſail for Jamaica, where they arrived on the fifteenth day of May; and the nation, inſtead of driving the Spaniards out of the Weſt Indies, as was fully expected, and for which purpoſe above a million of money had been expended, only purchaſed this melancholy leſſon, that as diſſenſion is the misfortune of a free ſtate, ſo it is the ruin of a military project.

After the return of the fleet from Porto Bello, nothing material was tranſacted in the Weſt Indies either by vice-admiral Vernon or general Wentworth, if we except the taking poſſeſſion of, and ſettling the little iſland of Rattan, in the bay of Honduras. On the twenty-third of September arrived captain Fowke, in the Gibraltar man of war, at Port-Royal in Jamaica, with letters from the duke of Newcaſtle, his majeſty's ſecretary of ſtate for the ſouthern department, for admiral Vernon and general Wentworth to return to England; the vice-admiral to leave the command of the fleet to ſir Chaloner Ogle, and the general to ſupply the fleet with what number of ſoldiers ſhould be demanded to be under the aforeſaid admiral's command, the government being now fully ſenſible of the diſadvantage attending a command divided between the land and ſea officers. On the nineteenth of October vice-admiral Vernon, in the Boyne, ſet ſail from Port-Royal on his return to England, where he arrived ſafely in the month of December, as did general Wentworth ſome ſhort time after.

In the month of June the new colony of Georgia was invaded by an armament from St. Auguſtine, commanded by Don Manuel de Monteano, governor of that fortreſs. It conſiſted of thirty-ſix ſhips, from which three thouſand men were landed at St. Simon's fort, and began their march for Frederica, the principal town in the province: but general Oglethorpe, with a handful of men, took ſuch wiſe precautions for oppoſing their progreſs, and ſo harraſſed them in their march, that after ſeveral bloody rencounters, in which the Spaniards were always worſted, they retired to their ſhips and abandoned the enterprize.

After the departure of admiral Vernon from Jamaica, ſir Chaloner Ogle took all poſſible care for the ſecurity of the iſland and protection of the trade; but the Spaniſh ſquadron under admiral de Torres continuing ſtill at the Havannah, and being ſuperior to that under his command, was a check upon him in attempting any enterprize. However, the Spaniards were greatly diſturbed in their trade by the Britiſh cruizers and privateers in thoſe ſeas.

In England the parliament reſumed its ſeſſion on the ſixteenth day of November, when his majeſty acquainted the two houſes, that he had augmented the Britiſh troops in the Low countries with ſixteen thouſand Hanoverians and the Heſſian auxiliaries, in order to form ſuch a force, in conjunction with the Auſtrians, as might be of ſervice to the common cauſe in all events. He extolled the magnanimity and fortitude of the queen of Hungary, as well as the reſolute conduct of the king of Sardinia, and his ſtrict adherence to his engagements, though attacked in his own dominions. He mentioned the requiſition of Sweden for his good offices to bring about a peace between that nation and Ruſſia; the defenſive alliances which he had contracted with the czarina and with the king of Pruſſia, as events which could not have been expected, if Great Britain had not manifeſted a ſeaſonable ſpirit and vigour in the defence and aſſiſtance of her ancient allies, and in maintaining the liberties of Europe. He ſaid, the honour of his crown and kingdoms, the ſucceſs of the war with Spain, the re-eſtabliſhment of the balance and tranquillity of Europe, would greatly depend on the prudence and vigour of their reſolutions.

His majeſty alſo acquainted the houſe of commons in particular, that he had ordered the proper eſtimates for the ſervice of the enſuing year to be prepared and laid before them, and alſo the account of the expence of thoſe particular ſervices which he had already mentioned, and which they would find to have been concerted in as frugal a manner as the nature of them would admit. He was perſuaded, he ſaid, that they would readily grant him ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be found neceſſary for the ſecurity and welfare of the nation, requiſite for the ſupport of the common cauſe, and adequate to the common emergency.

The next day both houſes of parliament preſented very dutiful and loyal addreſſes to his majeſty, expreſſing their approbation of the meaſures he had taken for the ſupport of the queen of Hungary, and the reſtoration of the balance of power in Europe: but when the motions for theſe addreſſes were made, they met with a vigorous oppoſition before they paſſed in the affirmative. This was occaſioned by the influence of the diſguſted members, who had promoted another oppoſition to the new miniſtry. About this period a treaty of mutual defence and guarantee between his majeſty and the king of Pruſſia, was ſigned at Whitehall.

Notwithſtanding the ſtrenuous oppoſition to the new miniſtry, they carried moſt of their points. The committee of ſupplies ſat, for the firſt time, on the twenty-third of November, and continued by different adjournments to the ſecond of March, 1743, when the total of the grants amounted to five millions three hundred and fourteen thouſand one hundred pounds for the ſervice of the current year, and five hundred and ninety-eight thouſand three hundred and eighty-two pounds for a deficiency in the ſupplies granted for the preceding year, which made together the ſum of five millions nine hundred and twelve thouſand four hundred and eighty-two pounds. The committee of ways and means was eſtabliſhed on the twenty-fifth of November, and continued till the twenty-fourth of March, when they ſettled the ſum of ſix millions five hundred and ſixty-two thouſand four hundred and ninety-two pounds to anſwer the ſupplies, which was an exceeding of ſix hundred and fifty thouſand ten pounds. To raiſe this ſum the land-tax, at four ſhillings in the pound, was computed to furniſh two millions, the malt tax ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand; one million was taken from the ſinking fund; one million was to be borrowed at three per cent. and eight hundred thouſand pounds to be raiſed by a lottery; five hundred and eighteen thouſand ſix hundred pounds were to be borrowed by a loan on the exciſe bills, and four hundred eighty-one thouſand four hundred pounds, being the deficiencies on the pot-duty; beſides twelve thouſand four hundred and ninety-two pounds overplus in the Exchequer. The amount of the national debt, on the thirty-firſt of December, was forty-eight millions nine hundred and fifteen thouſand forty-ſeven pounds ſixteen ſhillings and nine-pence half-penny, of which very near two millions had been increaſed ſince the thirty-firſt of December 1741; and though it was ſo conſiderable, moſt of the grants ſtipulated for the ſervice of the year 1743 met with little oppoſition, the diſcontented party being reſolved to reſerve all their ſtrength for a more important object.

On the firſt of December the motion was revived for appointing a committee to examine into the conduct of the earl of Orford during the laſt ten years of his adminiſtration, which was carried in the negative by two hundred and fifty-three voices againſt one hundred and eighty-ſix; and afforded an inſtance of the ſuperiority of the miniſterial party; becauſe many members who, in the former ſeſſion, had clamorouſly inſiſted on an enquiry, now appeared as openly on the other ſide, and voted againſt it. On the third of December a motion was made by Mr. Lyttleton, ſeconded by ſir Watkyn-Williams Wynn, for reviving the place and penſion bills; which met with the ſame fate as the former, being ſet aſide by two hundred and twenty-one againſt one hundred and ninety-ſix.

On the ſixteenth day of December, the houſe of commons being then in a grand committee of the ſupply, a motion was made to reſolve, that the ſum of two hundred and ſixty-five thouſand one hundred and ninety-one pounds ſix ſhillings and two pence farthing ſhould be granted to his majeſty for defraying the charge of five thouſand five hundred and twelve horſe, and ten thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-five foot, of the troops of Hanover, together with the general officers and the train of artillery in the pay of Great Britain, from the thirty-firſt day of Auguſt to the twenty-fifth day of December incluſive: that the ſum of three hundred and ninety-two thouſand ſix hundred and ſeven pounds eight ſhillings and three pence ſhould be granted to his majeſty for defraying the charge of the ſaid troops, from the twenty-ſixth day of December 1742, to the twenty-fifth day of December 1743: and that the ſum of one hundred and ſixty-one thouſand ſix hundred and ſeven pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and one penny halfpenny ſhould be granted to his majeſty for defraying the expence of one thouſand two hundred and ſixty horſe, and four thouſand nine hundred and eight foot, of the troops of his majeſty the king of Sweden, as elector of Heſſe-Caſſel, in the pay of Great Britain, from the twenty-firſt day of December 1742, to the twenty-fifth day of December 1743. This motion was oppoſed with the utmoſt vehemence; and the debates which happened thereon in both houſes were attended with reflections more perſonal and ſevere than could well have been expected in an aſſembly that owned the elector of Hanover for their ſovereign. It was aſſerted that the act of ſettlement, which provides againſt Great Britain ever being engaged in a war on account of the dominions belonging to her king on the continent, had been violated. It was farther pretended, that the whole of the bargain for the electoral troops was an impoſition upon the Engliſh nation, inaſmuch as thoſe troops durſt not act againſt the head of the empire without expoſing his majeſty in his electoral character to the ban; and of the juſtneſs of this reaſoning, the late neutrality for Hanover was urged as an irrefragable proof. The meaſure of ſending the Britiſh troops to the continent, before a promiſe had been obtained of the concurrence of the States-general, was ſeverely cenſured; and, in anſwer to that part of his majeſty's ſpeech, wherein it is ſaid, that this had been done in purſuance of the repeated advice of his parliament, it was alleged, that ſuch advice was given only upon the ſuppoſition that the States-general, or ſome other power in Europe, would have joined Great Britain in her endeavours to preſerve the houſe of Auſtria.

The miniſtry, towards the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion, had contracted for ſixteen thouſand Hanoverians to be taken into the Britiſh pay, without the concurrence of parliament, whoſe approbation was expected when they aſſembled the next ſeſſion. This procedure was now repreſented as highly unconſtitutional, and derogatory from the honour and dignity of that auguſt aſſembly. It was now publicly aſſerted by ſome of the leaders of the oppoſition, that the intereſts of Great Britain had been made ſubſervient to the aggrandizing and enriching of Hanover, ever ſince the acceſſion of the houſe of Brunſwic; and that it was the groſſeſt impoſition, to make ſo opulent a kingdom dependent on and regulated by the intereſt of that electorate. Laſtly, it was urged that no ſupply ought to be granted on ſo improper an occaſion as the preſent; and that it was contrary to the national intereſt to retain ſuch unſerviceable auxiliaries in the Britiſh pay. The miniſtry, on the other hand, laboured to prove, that the preſervation of Europe required that the crown of Great Britain ſhould aſſiſt the queen of Hungary; and that ſuch aſſiſtance could not be properly granted without this body of Hanoverians. The reſult was, that the houſe came to a reſolution agreeable to the terms of the motion.

Though the continuance of the Hanoverian forces in the Britiſh pay had thus gained the approbation of the houſe of commons, it was afterwards more vigorouſly oppoſed in the houſe of lords; for on the firſt of February, 1743, when their lordſhips took into conſideration the ſeveral eſtimates of the expence occaſioned by the forces in the pay of Great Britain, earl Stanhope roſe up; and, after obſerving that theſe troops were raiſed without the advice or conſent of parliament; that it was a new burthen laid upon the nation by the deſpotic will of the miniſters; and that the demands made for their ſupport might be ſaid to be a tax laid upon the people, not by the parliament, but by the court, his lordſhip moved, "That an humble addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, to beſeech and adviſe him, that, conſidering the exceſſive and grievous expences incurred by the great number of foreign troops now in the pay of Great Britain; expences, increaſed by the extraordinary manner, as there was reaſon to apprehend, of making the eſtimates relating to them, and which did not appear to be conducive to the end propoſed; his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed, in compaſſion to his ſubjects, already loaded with ſuch numerous and heavy taxes, ſuch large and growing debts, and greater annual expences than the nation at any time ever before ſuſtained, to exonerate his ſubjects of the charge and burden of thoſe mercenaries who were taken into the Britiſh ſervice laſt year, without the advice or conſent of parliament." This motion was ſeconded by the earl of Sandwich, who took occaſion to ſpeak with great contempt of Hanover, and even ſeemed to forget, in mentioning certain illuſtrious perſonages, that decorum the ſubject required. The intent of this motion was to prevail on his majeſty to diſband this body of Hanoverians; but though it was ſtrongly ſupported, after a long and warm debate it was rejected, by the determination of ninety lords againſt thirty-five, which occaſioned a proteſt, entered and ſigned by thoſe lords. The chief ſpeakers for the motion were, the duke of Bedford, the earls of Cheſterfield and Sandwich, viſcount Lonſdale, and lord Hervey, who were oppoſed by the lord-chancellor, the duke of Newcaſtle, the earls of Cholmondeley and Bath, lord Carteret, and lord Bathurſt.

The Britiſh nation had for a long time entertained a great jealouſy of Hanover: the frequent viſits of the late and reigning monarch to their electoral dominions, contrary to the original terms on which the crown was conferred on them, had inclined their Britiſh ſubjects to entertain a ſuſpicion that they had only the ſecond place in the affection of their ſovereign; and no attempt for many years had raiſed a greater heat of reſentment, or excited louder clamours of indignation among the people, than the hire of the electoral troops; not that they had any juſt reaſon to imagine that his majeſty would incur, either by contempt or neglect, the diſaffection of his ſubjects, but becauſe they apprehended the miniſtry, ever ſince the acceſſion, had, to gain the affections of their ſovereign, preferred the intereſt and advantage of his electoral before his royal dominions.

It was repreſented by the gentlemen in the oppoſition to the preſent miniſtry, that while Great Britain was exhauſting herſelf almoſt to ruin, in purſuance of ſchemes pretended to be founded on engagements to the queen of Hungary; the electorate of Hanover, though under the ſame engagements, as well as under the ſame prince, did not appear to contribute any thing, as an ally, to her aſſiſtance, but was paid by Great Britain for all the forces it had then in the field. The reſtoring the balance of power in Europe, by raiſing the houſe of Auſtria to its former condition of influence, dominion, and ſtrength, was repreſented as an object not attainable by the arms of Great Britain alone. If the queen of Hungary, however, was to be aſſiſted, the miniſtry, they ſaid, had entered into wrong meaſures for granting her the proper aſſiſtance, becauſe, from the ſituation of her affairs, and that of all Europe, as well as the particular intereſt and policy of Great Britain, ſhe would have been more effectually ſerved with a ſupply of money than with a reinforcement of men, as the thirty-eight thouſand troops in pay in her ſervice coſt the Britiſh nation near a million and an half of money; one half of which ſum, it was ſaid, would have enabled her to maintain a greater number of men, capable of acting wherever her affairs might require.

In anſwer to theſe arguments, uttered by ſome of the moſt eminent and diſtinguiſhed men in the nation, it was ſaid by the friends of the new miniſtry, that if it was really the intention of Great Britain to prevent the houſe of Auſtria from being cruſhed, it was certainly more eligible to ſupport it with men than money: by perpetually recruiting ſo conſiderable an army, the Auſtrian dominions, populous as they are, might in time become unable to oppoſe France: there is a natural ſuperiority confederated forces have over a ſingle nation, which was manifeſted in the laſt general war, by the advantage that the united powers had over France; for the loſs of men with the former falling more equally, was the leſs felt; while the whole loſs of the latter fell upon her own nation, from whence alone ſhe was able to recruit; which circumſtance muſt enable the queen of Hungary to ſuſtain the war longer, and with leſs inconvenience than the French: not only ſo, but there was another objection againſt furniſhing that princeſs with a pecuniary aid, becauſe it could not be leſs than a million; and ſo glaring a ſum might have tempted the Auſtrian miniſters to a miſapplication of a conſiderable part of it. Such was the ſubſtance of the principal arguments urged for and againſt this famous meaſure.

It has been proved by repeated experience, that leſs abilities are required to oppoſe than to conduct, or even to defend an adminiſtration in England. The diſtinguiſhed talents for which the gentlemen of the new miniſtry had been ſo idolized, while engaged in the late oppoſition, were all obſcured from the eyes of the public, the moment they attained to the direction of affairs. The truth is, the number of their friends was ſmall, and they had little or no intereſt; for though the remains of the late adminiſtration, who were ſtill very powerful, concurred with them in, and ſupported all their meaſures; yet was not that from any real regard they bore them, but, as they thought it a common cauſe, to prevent the progreſs and ſucceſs of a third party, which they equally dreaded: and what added to the unpopularity of the new miniſtry was, the diſgrace they had incurred by having changed their party and principles, without having acquired any real power, particularly in money affairs, which was all veſted in the members of the old adminiſtration.

The miniſter (ſo lord Carteret was now termed) exerted himſelf with equal ſpirit and ability in defending the meaſures which the government had embraced; but foreſeeing that if the oppoſition in parliament ſhould continue to gain ſtrength, it might be attended with fatal conſequences to the internal peace of the kingdom; and rightly conſidering that the opinions of the people are regulated in a great meaſure by the determinations of the parliament, he was not ſatisfied with the bare refuſal of the lords to cenſure the meaſure of taking the Hanoverian troops into pay, unleſs they alſo came to a reſolution which might imply a full and unlimited approbation of that meaſure; and therefore, by his procurement, a motion was made (after the concluſion of the debate upon earl Stanhope's motion) by the earl of Scarborough, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, importing, That in the unſettled and dangerous ſituation of affairs in Europe, the ſending a conſiderable body of Britiſh forces into the Auſtrian Netherlands, and augmenting the ſame with ſixteen thouſand of his majeſty's electoral troops, and the the Heſſians in the Britiſh pay; and thereby, in conjunction with the queen of Hungary's troops in the Low Countries, forming a great army for the ſervice of the common cauſe; was a wiſe, uſeful, and neceſſary meaſure, tending to the ſupport and encouragement of his majeſty's allies, the real and effectual aſſiſtance of the queen of Hungary, and the reſtoring and maintaining the balance of power in Europe. This motion occaſioned a violent debate; but in the end it was carried by the court party, ſeventy-eight againſt thirty-five.

The miniſtry, however, had a very ſevere oppoſition to encounter, in their endeavours to carry a bill for repealing certain duties on ſpirituous liquors, and licences for retailing thoſe liquors, and impoſing others at an eaſier rate. This, it muſt be confeſſed, was a dangerous expedient; but the miniſtry could not at that time fall upon any other feaſible method of producing the ſums that had been granted to the government: beſides, experience had ſhewn that the public revenue had not been in the leaſt advantaged by the late impoſed ſevere duties, nor the health or morals of the people any wiſe mended. A motion was therefore made to reſolve, That the duty of twenty ſhillings per gallon upon ſpirituous liquors ſhould be diſcontinued; and that, towards raiſing the ſupplies granted to his majeſty, there ſhould be paid for every gallon of low wines, and ſpirits of the firſt extraction, made or drawn from any foreign or imported materials, ſix-pence over and above all other duties charged or chargeable on thoſe liquors. This bill made its way through the commons with very little oppoſition, but among the peers it produced the moſt obſtinate diſpute which had happened ſince the beginning of the parliament.

The lord Hervey had lately been diveſted of his poſt of privy-ſeal, which had been beſtowed upon lord Gower, and theſe two noblemen from that inſtant exchanged principles: the firſt commenced the ſplenetic patriot, oppoſing every meaſure indiſcriminately that was adopted by the miniſtry; the other as obſequiouſly falling in with and ſupporting them. Lord Hervey on this occaſion made a florid harangue upon the pernicious effects of that deſtructive liquor they were about to let looſe on their fellow-creatures. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, with ſeveral other prelates, expatiated on the ſame topic, who were joined by the duke of Bedford, the earls of Aylesford, Sandwich, and Cheſterfield, and the lords Lonſdale and Talbot. The duke of Newcaſtle, the earls of Ilay, Cholmondeley, and Bath, with the lords Carteret and Bathurſt, were numbered among its advocates, and ſhrewd arguments were advanced on both ſides of the queſtion; in the courſe of which there frequently appeared ſome brilliant ſallies of wit and humour. After very long, animated, and repeated debates, the bill paſſed without amendments, though the whole bench of biſhops voted againſt it. Experience has ſince ſhewn, that this meaſure has not been attended with the diſmal conſequences that were predicted by the lords in the oppoſition.

The minority in both houſes were now convinced that the miniſtry this ſeſſion had too much influence to be retarded in their meaſures. More provoked, however, than diſcouraged by their defeat, they reſolved to teaze thoſe in power with every motion they thought would prove moſt diſagreeable to them. The firſt was, to make an enquiry into the contract for the remittance of the money abroad neceſſary for the public ſervice; but this was over-ruled. The next was, to addreſs his majeſty to order the proper officer to lay before the houſe (of commons) copies of all the memorials, repreſentations, and declarations, together with the anſwers that had paſſed between the courts of London and Vienna, relating to the ſtate of the war in the empire, for the intereſt and ſupport of the houſe of Auſtria, from the firſt of September, 1741, to the ſixteenth of November, 1742.

The promoters and advocates of this motion urged in its favour, that nothing could be more reaſonable than that the parliament ſhould be made acquainted with all the particulars of an affair, for the ſupport of which they had granted ſuch immenſe ſums of money. To this the friends of the miniſter replied, with great appearance of juſtice, that if this motion ſhould paſs, no court in Europe could be ſafe in their political dealings with us. They affirmed, that the tranſactions between two courts might be, and generally were, of ſuch a nature, that were they to be publiſhed, the whole operations depending upon them might be defeated; and conſequently, that nothing could be more prejudicial to the queen of Hungary than the agreeing to ſuch a motion; and as ſucceſs was the beſt proof of prudence, the preſent criſis was ſo favourable to that princeſs, that it ought to entitle the miniſtry to the thanks of the houſe, rather than ſubject them to any invidious enquiry into their conduct. For theſe, and other reaſons of the like nature, the motion was rejected by a conſiderable majority.

The laſt motion was to addreſs his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to communicate to the houſe copies of all the letters and memorials which had paſſed between the courts of London and Berlin, relating to any auxiliary or foreign forces entering into Germany in ſupport of the queen of Hungary.

This motion appears to have been founded upon very wiſe, reaſonable, and equitable conſiderations. The king of Pruſſia had expreſſed great uneaſineſs at the ſituation of affairs in Germany, where the emperor, he ſaid, was on the point of being dethroned. The queen of Hungary was miſtreſs of his dominions; and in all appearance a total revolution of the German ſyſtem was about to take place. His Pruſſian majeſty frankly declared, that notwithſtanding the treaty of Breſlaw, he could not be an indifferent ſpectator of ſuch cruel degradations of the imperial dignity, which, as an elector of the empire, he was bound to ſupport. He hinted at the ſame time, that, as a German ſovereign, he could wiſh that the government of England would not think of ſending their arms into Germany, becauſe he could not behold the introduction of foreign troops into that country without the greateſt jealouſy and diſguſt. The queſtion, however, upon a diviſion, was rejected by a majority of eighteen voices.

No other material tranſaction paſſed in either houſe this ſeſſion; for on the twenty-firſt day of April, 1743, his majeſty went to the houſe, where, after paſſing the ſeveral acts ready for the royal aſſent, he made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he

he obſerved, "That, to the end that the Britiſh nation and the common cauſe might reap the moſt beneficial fruits from the vigorous reſolutions of his parliament, he had, at the requiſition of the queen of Hungary, ordered his army, in conjunction with the Auſtrian troops, to paſs the Rhine, as auxiliaries to her Hungarian majeſty, to oppoſe any dangerous meaſures that might affect the balance and liberties of Europe, or hinder the re-eſtabliſhment of public tranquillity upon juſt and ſolid foundations: that he had continued a ſtrong ſquadron in the Mediterranean, and another in the Weſt Indies, in order to proſecute the great work of diſtreſſing his enemies the Spaniards, and compelling them to accept of ſafe and honourable terms of peace, as well as of maintaining the rights of navigation and commerce belonging to his ſubjects; adding, that from the former of theſe ſquadrons his allies in Italy had found, and ſtill continued to receive, a moſt uſeful and advantageous ſupport." The lord-chancellor then, by his majeſty's order, prorogued the parliament.

The affairs of Europe were at this time in a very perplexed and complicated ſituation. All the provinces, from the heart of Sileſia to the extremity of Italy, experienced different reverſes of fortune. Auſtria was at this time at open war only with Bavaria; the queen of Hungary depended for ſupport on the king of England; and Charles VII. upon his moſt Chriſtian majeſty: yet neither Great Britain nor France had hitherto acted as principals in the war. Her Hungarian majeſty and the king of Sardinia had mutual claims upon each other, which would ſoon have effected a rupture between them, had they not been bound together by their common dread of the houſe of Bourbon. Naples, Florence, Geneva, and Rome, were neuter. The people of the Milaneſe, of Mantua, of Parma, of Modena, and Guaſtalla, long accuſtomed to be the prey of the conqueror, without daring to vote either for or againſt him, beheld with an impotent concern the frequent ſhocks they were expoſed to. Spain, who was a principal in the war againſt England, riſqued every thing in order to procure a ſovereignty in the heart of Italy for the ſon of her ambitious queen. The court of Spain had demanded of the ſtates of Switzerland a paſſage through their territories for ſome troops they were going to ſend into Italy, and were refuſed. The Swiſs nation is ever ready to lend out its ſoldiers to any prince who is ready to hire them; but they will ſuffer the troops of no potentate to enter their territories: the government is pacific, and the people warriors: hence their neutrality is always reſpected. To give a proper weight to her's, Venice levied twenty thouſand men.

All Germany ſeemed to behold with indifference the quarrel between Auſtria and Bavaria: even the elector of Cologne did not dare to take the part of his brother, who was emperor, fearing the fate of the duke of Modena. If Hanover took part in the quarrel, it was only as a country ſubject to the king of England, and her ſoldiers were paid by that crown. The German princes themſelves, although their troops were let out as mercenaries, were yet regarded as neuters.

England was more urgent with Holland than ever to declare war, and France laboured hard to prevent it. The marquis de Fenelon, the French ambaſſador at the Hague, had employed all his addreſs in perſuading the Dutch to declare themſelves neuter: but the Engliſh, with the prince of Orange at their head, prevailed ſo far, that in July of the preceding year their High Mightineſſes were brought to agree to a propoſition of putting forty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe into a proper condition for marching on the firſt notice. This vigorous reſolution was in ſome meaſure owing to the ſpirited conduct of a young gentleman named Van Haren, one of the deputies, who exerted himſelf with great zeal and activity in ſupport of the common cauſe. He compoſed ſome allegorical pieces to animate his nation againſt the king of France. Theſe pieces were full of beautiful ſtrokes of writing: the author knew well how to enrich his language, and to give it an harmonious turn, which it greatly wanted. He compared the ancient ſtate of Greece to that of Holland, at this time overawed by the French, as the Greeks had been by the Perſians and Macedonians. His ſtile, though ſublime and allegorical, was adapted to the underſtandings of the people, becauſe it was natural, and the allegory clear. They were read by the Dutch of all denominations: they were recited publicly after divine ſervice in the moſt frequented parts of towns, and even in the little villages; and thoſe who read them in public were handſomely rewarded by the auditors, as had been formerly the caſe with thoſe who pronounced Homer's pieces in public: in fine, theſe writings excited ſuch a ſpirit among the people, that the States-general found themſelves under a neceſſity of adopting ſtill more reſolute meaſures. The friends of the houſe of Orange began to exert themſelves: the ſtates of Groningen and Weſt Frieſland proteſted in favour of the prince againſt the promotion of foreign generals which was made in conſequence of the reſolution of the States general to augment their forces by ſea and land; in the diſtribution of which promotions, they made the prince but a lieutenant-general, which he rejected with indignation.

The French court had expected to bring over the new empreſs of Ruſſia, Elizabeth, to their meaſures; but they found her not diſpoſed to liſten to their offers. She remitted a conſiderable ſum of money to the queen of Hungary, and at the ſame time congratulated the elector of Bavaria on his election to the imperial throne. She had declared her nephew, the duke of Holſtein-Gottorp, her ſucceſſor, by the title of grand prince of all the Ruſſias.

The king of Sweden being of an advanced age, the diet aſſembled in order to ſettle the ſucceſſion; and the duke of Holſtein-Gottorp, as grandſon to the eldeſt ſiſter of Charles XII. was declared next heir to the crown; but underſtanding that he had embraced the Greek religion, and had been acknowleged ſucceſſor to the throne of Ruſſia, they annulled his election for Sweden.

The king of Pruſſia, though ſurrounded by the tumults of war, was cultivating in his own dominions the arts of peace, but ſtill with ſuch vigilance and attention as kept him always prepared for action.

In this critical ſituation were all the European powers in the beginning of the year 1743, when cardinal de Fleury departed this life at the age of eighty-nine. In him France loſt an able miniſter, who had for many years managed the affairs of that kingdom. He was always a friend to pacific meaſures: he endeavoured to accompliſh his purpoſes, by raiſing and fomenting intrigues at foreign courts; but the French to this day accuſe him of having been too neglectful of the military glory of France, and of having ſuffered her marine to be almoſt annihilated. No ſooner, however, were the cardinal's eyes cloſed, than Lewis XV. took the reins of government into his own hands, declaring he was ready to accept of an honourable peace, or to proſecute the war with vigour: and as he expected the allied army in Flanders would march into Germany, and act offenſively, he reſolved to aſſemble a numerous force to oppoſe them; and ordered the marſhal de Noailles, one of his beſt generals, to poſt himſelf on the banks of the Rhine with an army of eighty thouſand men, and on the approach of the Engliſh and their allies to march out againſt them.

His Britannic majeſty had repeatedly plighted his faith for the ſupport of the pragmatic ſanction. Urged by this conſideration, he reſolved in the courſe of the enſuing campaign to head his troops in perſon. Accordingly, immediately upon the prorogation of the parliament, he ſet out for Germany, accompanied by his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, the lord Carteret, and other perſons of diſtinction, and arrived at Hanover on the ſixth of May, his majeſty, before his departure from England, having thought proper to make a grand promotion of general officers, as alſo to appoint a regency for the government of the kingdom during his abſence, conſiſting of the following perſons; his grace the lord archbiſhop of Canterbury; the lord chancellor; the dukes of Grafton, Dorſet, Devon, Newcaſtle, Bolton, Montagu, and Richmond; the marquis of Tweedale, ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland; the earls of Harrington, Bath, Wilmington, Pembroke, Winchelſea, and Ilay; lord Gower, lord Carteret, and Henry Pelham, eſq.

At this period the queen of Hungary, who at the beginning of the laſt campaign ſeemed devoted to inevitable deſtruction, now appeared to triumph over all her enemies. The French were driven out of Bohemia and part of the Upper Palatinate; and the Bavarian and French forces being divided into too many ſeparate bodies, mouldered away by degrees. The mortality which got footing among the French troops in Bavaria was the beginning of their misfortunes. The French ſoldiers ſpent the latter end of the year 1742, and the beginning of 1743, crouded upon each other in German ſtoves, which alone deſtroyed them in great numbers; but that which was their greateſt bane, was a miſunderſtanding between marſhal Broglio and count Seckendorff, who then commanded the Bavarians: the latter, who acted under the emperor, was urgent with Broglio to ſend him reinforcements, which the marſhal conſtantly refuſed, alleging, that he had enough to do, with all the forces he could muſter, to make head againſt prince Lobkowitz, who having taken poſſeſſion of Prague, proceeded to Egra, which he immediately inveſted, though without ſucceſs.

By this time the campaign had been opened between the ſeveral parties engaged in the war. The emperor had exerted himſelf with great activity in recruiting his army; and having aſſembled a body of about twenty thouſand men, he pitched his camp at Lembatch, in the neighbourhood of Brenau; while prince Charles of Lorraine, aſſuming the command of the Auſtrian troops in Bavaria, advanced againſt his Imperial majeſty, and attacked him with great fury in his entrenchments. The Imperialiſts continued for ſome time to make a moſt deſperate reſiſtance; but about five thouſand of them being killed on the ſpot, and a great number taken priſoners, they were at laſt obliged to abandon the camp, with all their baggage and artillery, to the victors. The remains of the defeated army retired to Brenau, and all Bavaria was ſoon laid open to the incurſions of the Auſtrians, there being nothing now to oppoſe the progreſs of prince Charles, who took Dingelſing, Deckendorff, and Landſhut, upon the Iſſer, making a great number of priſoners every-where. The emperor ſaw himſelf once more forced to abandon his dominions, and ſhelter himſelf in Augſburg, an imperial town; but he did not remain there long, the approach of the famous partiſan Mentzel, at the head of a ſtrong body of Pandours, obliging him to retire for ſhelter to Franckfort. This rapid courſe of military events fell out in the months of May and June.

Prince Charles, flushed with victory and ſucceſs, advanced to the banks of the Danube, where the French marſhal Broglio was poſted, whom he obliged to quit his ſtrong camp at Pladling, and retire to Ratiſbon, and from thence to Ingoldſtadt. In this retreat the French ſuffered greatly from the Auſtrian huſſars and Irregulars, who hovered continually on their flanks and rear, cut off a great number of their men, and took a booty amounting to upwards of a million of florins.

Mean while, the campaign was equally vigorous and active in other quarters. As his Britannic majeſty had promiſed the queen of Hungary to order his troops into Germany, in purſuance of his engagement, the Britiſh forces commanded by field-marſhal earl of Stair began their march thither in the month of February, and on the nineteenth of May paſſed by the town of Aix-la-Chapelle, where they were were joined by the Hanoverians in the pay of England. They were likewiſe in expectation of being ſoon reinforced by another body of ſix thouſand troops belonging to that electorate, as well as by the Heſſians in the ſervice of Great Britain. As Franckfort was a neutral city, marſhal Stair, before he approached its neighbourhood, ſent a meſſage to the emperor, who then reſided in that city, to aſſure his Imperial majeſty, "That nothing farther was intended by the march of the Britiſh troops into Germany than to reſtore the public peace and tranquillity: that his Britannic majeſty, upon appointing him to the command of them, had expreſsly charged him to avoid every thing that might in the leaſt injure the dignity of the head of the empire: and that therefore his Imperial majeſty might aſſure himſelf, that the march of theſe troops ſhould be directed in ſuch a manner as not to diſturb his reſidence at Frankfort." At the ſame time, the marſhal cauſed it to be notified to the neighbouring princes and imperial towns, that he had no orders to act againſt the emperor, but only to oblige the French to leave Germany. In return, theſe ſeveral ſtates, and the regency of Frankfort in particular, expreſſed their intention to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality. The emperor, however, thinking it ſomewhat unſafe to remain in a neutral neutral city, retired to Munich, in company with the prince royal his ſon, and did not return till he was compelled to it, by the loſs of his hereditary dominions, as above related.

The Dutch having at length conſented to join the allied army with twenty thouſand men, believing alſo that now they could take ſuch a ſtep without any hazard, and that without declaring war againſt France, they might help to cruſh her; they ſent ſix thouſand men into Flanders to replace the Auſtrian garriſons, and propoſed to ſend an army of fourteen thouſand men into Germany; but they proceeded, in the true ſpirit of that republic, very ſlowly.

In the mean time, the army of the allies continued their march along the banks of the Rhine till the beginning of May, when they began to aſſemble near Hoechſt, on the borders of the Mayne, where proper ground was laid out for their encampment. The Auſtrians under the command of marſhal Neuperg and the duke d'Aremberg arrived about the ſame time, and encamped on the right, at a league diſtance from the Britiſh troops; and the Hanoverians under lieutenant-general Ilton coming up ſoon after, encamped on the left, marſhal Stair taking up his quarters at Hoechſt, which was about the center of the whole. The army of the allies, after making allowance for all deductions, was ſuppoſed to conſiſt of about thirty-ſeven thouſand men.

The court of Verſailles expected theſe motions of the allied army, and had been making preparations to obſtruct their junction with the Auſtrians in Bavaria. No ſooner, therefore, had the allies paſſed the Rhine, than marſhal Noailles, at the head of eighty thouſand men, entered the Palatinate; and after detaching count Segur to reinforce Broglio, advanced towards the Rhine, where he ſeized Spires, Worms, Oppenheim, and all the places on that ſide the river above Mentz, as alſo the city of Heidelberg on the Neckar; but was diſappointed in his attempt to ſurprize Hailbron, a well fortified town on the ſame river, by the vigilance of the garriſon. The French made no attempt to paſs the Rhine till the fourteenth of May, when they croſſed that river, and by a variety of marches and countermarches, reduced the allies to great ſtraits for want of proviſions: they even endeavoured to make themſelves maſters of Aſchaffenburgh, where there was a bridge over the Mayne; but the earl of Stair had the good fortune to prevent them in that enterprize.

On the nineteenth day of June his Britannic majeſty, attended by his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland and lord Carteret, arrived in the camp of the allies, where he was received with the moſt joyful acclamations by the army, which he reviewed the ſame afternoon, and that evening took up his head quarters at the palace of Aſchaffenburg, belonging to the elector of Mentz.

The French had poſſeſſed themſelves of all the upper poſts upon the Mayne: the boats below, obſtructed at once by the enemy's huſſars and the rapidity of the ſtream, were unable to come up with proviſions; and thus the allies, by a concurrence of untoward circumſtances, were ſurrounded on all hands by a ſuperior army, commanded by a cautious and vigilant general, who had taken his meaſures ſo wiſely, that nothing appeared left for the confederates but to ſurrender priſoners of war, or run the riſk of being cut in pieces in their retreat. While the allies were in this diſadvantageous ſituation, ſhort of proviſions, unable to procure forage, and almoſt ſurrounded by the French, couriers arrived from prince Charles, with intelligence of his ſucceſſes in Bavaria; and at the ſame time advice was brought, that the ſix thouſand Hanoverians and ſix thouſand Heſſians, which his Britannic majeſty furniſhed in his electoral capacity, and were now upon their route to reinforce the allied army, had effected a junction, and were within two days march of Hanover, under the command of prince George of Heſſe-Caſſel and general Druchleben, who wanted to know by what means they could conduct them to the confederates. As the French commanded the lower part of the Mayne, it was apprehended if the prince of Heſſe attempted to advance beyond Hanau, he might be intercepted; and as it was abſolutely neceſſary to accompliſh the junction between him and the main body of the confederates, his Britannic majeſty took a reſolution of marching the army back again to Hanau, and ſent orders to the prince of Heſſe to halt at that city; but in this caſe his majeſty found he muſt be expoſed to the fire of the batteries which the enemy had raiſed upon the Mayne. His rear was likewiſe in danger of being cut off by the French; for marſhal de Noailles had taken the precaution to throw bridges over the river between Dettingen and Aſchaffenburg, on the road to Hanau, which, by an unaccountable neglect, the allies had ſuffered him to do without interruption. On the twenty-ſixth of June the king cauſed his army to decamp before daylight without beat of drum, and ventured upon a moſt dangerous march, which indeed by no means could be avoided.

The road the allied army was to take was bounded by hills and woods on the right, and flanked on the left by the river Mayne, on the oppoſite ſide of which the French marſhal was encamped, who was no ſooner informed that our troops were in motion, than he declared they were marching to their deſtruction. He immediately cauſed thirty ſquadrons, conſiſting of the French houſhold troops, dragoons, and light horſe, to croſs the river, and advance towards the village of Dettingen, by which the Engliſh muſt neceſſarily paſs. Four brigades of infantry, with that of the French guards, were marched over two bridges, with orders to remain in the village of Dettingen, on one ſide of a hollow way, where they could not be perceived by our troops, of all whoſe motions marſhal Noailles had a clear view, and gave expreſs orders for his men not to fall upon the allies but at a certain advantage, as the very ſituation of the ground was a ſnare from which they could not eſcape. The enemy had before them a narrow paſs; the village of Dettingen was on their right, a wood on their left, and a moraſs in their center. M. Noailles earneſtly recommended to his nephew, the duke of Grammont, who commanded the troops ſent to oppoſe the march of the confederates, to wait in that poſition till the latter ſhould fall into his hands, which was unavoidable. In the mean time, he ſent five brigades to ſecure the poſt of Aſchaffenburg, which his Britannic majeſty had juſt quitted, who by this motion found himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides, and reduced to the melancholy alternative of ſubmitting at diſcretion, or fighting at very great diſadvantage.

All

All theſe wiſe diſpoſitions of the marſhal were, however, diſconcerted by the mad fierynes of temper of the duke de Grammont, who imagining that the firſt column of the allies had already paſſed, and that he had only to fall upon their rear, which could not withſtand him, quitted the very advantageous poſt he occupied, which he ought by all means to have kept, and advanced to give the confederates battle on an acceſſible ground, where his whole front was expoſed. The latter, who were filing off in order of battle, ſoon formed; and the French now fell into the very ſnare they had laid for the confederates, whom they attacked in diſorder, and with unequal force. The cannon which the enemy had planted on the other ſide of the Mayne raked us in flank, and killed a great number of our men, the Hanoverians eſpecially; but our batteries took the French in front. The advantage of cannon, which is very great, was ſoon overbalanced, the artillery on the oppoſite ſide of the river being rendered uſeleſs, as in the confuſion it muſt have annoyed the French themſelves, if it had been properly ſerved.

Marſhal Noailles, who had continued on the other ſide the river, that he might the better obſerve the diſpoſition of both armies, when he underſtood that the duke de Grammont had paſſed the defile, exclaimed in a violent paſſion, that he had ruined his whole ſcheme; and when he found the fatal event reſulting from the temerity of this officer, he paſſed over the Mayne to aſſiſt him; but it was too late: for the French having charged with a mad impetuoſity, which at firſt put ſome regiments of Britiſh cavalry into diſorder, continued running on with ſo little diſcipline and regularity, and the infantry of the allies behaved with ſo much intrepidity and deliberation, under the eye of their ſovereign, that the fate of the day was ſoon determined in favour of that army, which a few hours before ſeemed devoted to unavoidable deſtruction.

During the whole of the engagement, his Britannic majeſty rode up and down the ranks flouriſhing his ſword, and crying out to the Britiſh infantry, "Now boys! now for the honour of England! fire! advance boldly, and the French will ſt on run." The event fulfilled his prediction. The battle began about twelve o'clock, and about two in the afternoon the French gave way, and paſſed a rivulet which was behind them, where they again poſted themſelves in order of battle, upon an eminence commanding the plain: but notwithſtanding this advantageous diſpoſition, on a body of three thouſand Engliſh cavalry marching up towards them, they abandoned that poſt, and retreated over the Mayne with ſuch precipitation and confuſion, that ſeveral periſhed in the river, which they had ſo lately croſſed with all the pride of certain victory. It has been thought by ſeveral experienced commanders, that had the enemy been vigorouſly purſued, before they recollected themſelves from their firſt confuſion, it is more than probable they would have ſuſtained a total overthrow. The earl of Stair propoſed this meaſure, but his advice was over-ruled.

Thus ended this memorable engagement, in which the French loſt about five thouſand men, either killed, wounded, or taken priſoners, and amongſt them moſt of their generals and officers of diſtinction, as alſo ſix ſtandards. The loſs of the allies in this action amounted to near three thouſand: the chief officers killed on our ſide were lieutenant-general Clayton, who was ſhot by a random ball as the French were retreating; and major-general Monroy, of the Hanoverians. Among the wounded were the duke of Cumberland, who behaved very gallantly, and received a ſhot in the leg; the duke d'Aremberg, the earl of Albemarle, major-general Huſke, colonel Ligonier, and colonel Piers.

Immediately after the action, his majeſty continued his march to Hanau, where he was joined by the twelve thouſand Heſſians and Hanoverians. Before the allies left the field of battle, the earl of Stair ſent a trumpet to marſhal Noailles, recommending to his protection the wounded that were left behind: and it is but doing juſtice to the French general to obſerve, that he treated them with the utmoſt care and tenderneſs. A general thankſgiving was performed on the twenty-fourth of June by the whole confederate army at Hanau, on account of the late battle. The French alſo ſung Te Deum on the ſame occaſion; and aſſembling all their forces, afterwards removed their camp to Offenbach, a town on the ſouth ſide of the Mayne, at an equal diſtance between Hanau and Frankfort, and directly in ſight of the confederates.

While the two armies continued in this ſituation, prince Charles of Lorraine accompliſhed his work in Bavaria, and obliged marſhal Broglio to retire before him through Suabia, who repaſſed the Rhine on the borders of Alſace with much precipitation about the end of June, at the ſame time nearly that the emperor, believing himſelf no longer ſafe in Augſburg, had returned to take ſhelter in Frankfort, where he arrived the very evening of that day on which the battle of Dettingen was fought. As Frankfort was a neutral town, the officers of the French and allied armies repaired thither indiſcriminately after the action, and M. Noailles found the emperor infinitely chagrined, on account of marſhal Broglio's retreat; and to augment his misfortunes, he was without ſubſiſtence for himſelf and his family, in an imperial town, where no one would advance him any money, though the head of the empire. M. Noailles on this occaſion furniſhed him with forty thouſand crowns upon a letter of credit.

The two armies continued on different ſides of the river Mayne till the twelfth day of July, when M. Noailles, receiving intelligence that prince Charles of Lorraine was bending his march towards the confederate army, in order to put him between two fires, and that his highneſs was actually advanced as far as Heidelberg, the capital city of the elector-palatine, ſituate on the Neckar, and not above forty miles from Frankfort; he reſolved to prevent his deſign, by decamping on the twentieth at night, after ſetting fire to his magazines; and made ſo ſpeedy a retreat, that in four days the whole French army repaſſed the Rhine, between Worms and Oppenheim. His Britannic majeſty was viſited by prince Charles and count Khevenhuller at Hanau, where the future operations of the campaign were concerted.

In the mean time, his Imperial majeſty, wearied out with a deſtructive war, relenting for the calamities he had brought upon his electoral ſubjects, deprived of the means of ſupporting his auguſt auguſt dignity; and above all, finding that he could expect no other aſſiſtance from the French, now made advances towards an accommodation with the queen of Hungary, and ordered his general count Seckendorf, to enter into a treaty of neutrality in his name with prince Charles of Lorraine. Accordingly, the general had an interview with count Khevenhuller, deputed from prince Charles, at the convent of Lower Sconfield, near Rain, where a convention was ſigned on the thirtieth of June, importing, that the emperor ſhould remain neuter during the continuance of the preſent war; and that his troops ſhould be quartered in Franconia: that the queen of Hungary ſhould keep poſſeſſion of Bavaria till the peace: that Brenau and Scharding ſhould be delivered up to the Auſtrians: that the French garriſon of Ingoldſtadt ſhould be permitted to withdraw, and be replaced by Bavarians; but that the Auſtrian general ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of all the artillery, magazines, and warlike ſtores, belonging to the French, which ſhould be found in the place.

When this treaty of Hanau was ſent to London for ratification, the lords juſtices thought proper to annul it, owing to the repreſentations of the queen of Hungary, who inſiſted that the elector of Bavaria could not be conſidered as a neutral party in his own cauſe, and that this treaty was only intended to deprive her of the aſſiſtance of her allies. His Imperial majeſty, ſtill panting after peace, offered to allow the ſtrong towns in Bavaria to be garriſoned by neutral troops, and to renounce all pretenſions to the Auſtrian ſucceſſion: nay, he even offered to give his daughter in marriage to the archduke, who was then three years of age, and to ſecure the imperial dignity in reverſion to the houſe of Auſtria, by procuring the young archduke to be elected king of the Romans; and that he would abide by the judgment of the maritime powers, on the ſingle condition of obtaining a reſtitution of his hereditary dominions, even with the mortifying reſtriction of leaving all the fortified towns in the poſſeſſion of neutral troops. But all theſe conſiderable offers, though not immediately rejected, terminated without any effect, being evaded by the excuſes of diſpatching couriers, and ſuch-like pretences, till the concluſion of the treaty of Worms in September following; after which not a ſingle ſtep was taken towards an accommodation, this laſt treaty eſtabliſhing the future violence of the war, in oppoſition to the pacific propoſitions made at Hanau, when the war in Germany might certainly have been as ſatisfactorily terminated to all the contending parties, as it was after the loſs of ſo many thouſands of lives. In fact, ſeveral princes of the Germanic body began to reſent the inflexibility of the queen of Hungary, and to be alarmed at the ſucceſs of the houſe of Auſtria, and pitied the deſperate ſituation of the emperor, who now experienced every poſſible ſtroke of ill fortune; for while the above treaty was agitating, Egra and Ingoldſtadt, the only towns that were left him after the retreat of Broglio, were reduced by the Auſtrians. In Ingoldſtadt they found all the emperor's domeſtic treaſure, plate, jewels, pictures, cabinets, and curioſities, with the archives of the houſe of Bavaria, the moſt valuable effects belonging to the nobility of that electorate, a prodigious train of artillery, and a vaſt quantity of proviſions, arms, and ammunition. To increaſe the mortifications of this wretched head of the empire, if they could be ſaid to admit of addition, his old friend the elector of Mentz was dead, and his ſucceſſor was an avowed ſupporter of the Auſtrian intereſts. Not contented with the inſults they had already offered him, the council of Auſtria preſented to the imperial diet, even in the town of Frankfort, a reſcript, wherein the election of Charles VII. was proteſted againſt as null and abſolutely void. The new elector of Mentz, in his quality of high-chancellor of the empire, to which dignity he had been advanced againſt the emperor's inclination, regiſtered this proteſt in the protocol or journal of the diet. Charles could only complain, which he did by written remonſtrances, that produced a warm diſpute among the members of the Germanic body.

The king of Pruſſia in particular, who had backed the imperial negociations with the ſtrongeſt remonſtrances, finding the treaty of Worms had aboliſhed all pacific ſentiments at the court of Vienna, and willing to ſhew his influence in Europe, had an interview on the thirtieth of September with general Seckendorff at Anſpach, and from thence proceeded privately to Frankfort, where he had a conference with the emperor. This tour at that time occaſioned various ſpeculations: however, the nature of theſe conferences may be eaſily conjectured, from his future conduct in oppoſing the queen of Hungary, and by his proteſting againſt the inveſtiture of the duchy of Saxe-Lawenburgh, claimed by the king of Great Britain as elector of Hanover, which afterwards gave riſe to a difference between them.

On the twenty-fourth day of Auguſt the allied army paſſed the Rhine at Mentz, and king George fixed his head-quarters in the epiſcopal palace of Worms; the French marſhal Noailles having retreated into Upper Alſace, where he took poſſeſſion of the lines of Lauterburg, formerly caſt up by the Germans to defend their frontiers. The allies continued encamped about Worms till the latter end of September, when they advanced to Spires, where they were joined by twenty thouſand Dutch auxiliaries from the Netherlands. Continuing their operations, they took poſſeſſion of Gimmerſheim, and demoliſhed the lines which the enemy had formed on the Queich: then they returned to Mentz, and in October were diſtributed into winter quarters. While the allies lay at Worms, colonel Mentzel, at the head of a large body of Croats and Pandours, belonging to the queen of Hungary, made an irruption into a part of Lorraine, which they ravaged without mercy.

In September prince Charles with the Auſtrian army entered the Briſgau, and attempted to paſs the Rhine; but marſhal Coigny, who commanded a French army in that neighbourhood, appearing on the oppoſite banks of the river, with a body of fifty thouſand men, he was obliged to deſiſt from his deſign; and returning into the Upper Palatinate, quartered his troops in that country, and in Bavaria.

By this time the earl of Stair had ſollicited and obtained leave to reſign his command. His lordſhip appears to have been diſguſted at a ſuppoſed preference which the king ſhewed to the foreign generals in the ſervice of Great Britain: and this report gained ſo much ground among the people of England, as greatly to leſſen the ſatisfaction they would otherwiſe have received from the glorious action of Dettingen, and, perhaps, their demonſtrations of gratitude towards their ſovereign, who by his diſtinguiſhed bravery had been ſo eminently inſtrumental in the ſucceſs of that day. In the latter end of October the king of Great Britain returned to Hanover, and the army ſeparated; the troops in the Britiſh pay marched back to the Netherlands, the reſt took the route to their reſpective countries.

In the month of September a treaty had been concluded at Worms, between his Britannic majeſty, the king of Sardinia, and the queen of Hungary; by which the latter of theſe ſovereigns engaged to maintain thirty thouſand men in Italy. The king of Sardinia obliged himſelf to maintain forty thouſand infantry, and fifty thouſand horſe, on condition of his having the command of this combined army, and receiving an annual ſubſidy of two hundred thouſand pounds from Great Britain. As a further gratification, her Hungarian majeſty yielded to the king of Sardinia the city of Placentia, with ſeveral diſtricts in the duchy of Pavia, and in the Novareſe, and all her rights and pretenſions to Final, at preſent poſſeſſed by the republick of Genoa, which, they ſuppoſed, would make no difficulty to relinquiſh it, upon being repaid the purchaſe money, amounting to three hundred thouſand pounds. This ſum his Britannic majeſty promiſed to diſburſe; and, moreover, to maintain a ſtrong ſquadron in the Mediterranean, the commander of which ſhould be ordered to act in ſtrict concert with his Sardinian majeſty. Laſtly, the contracting powers agreed that Final ſhould be conſtituted a free port, like that of Leghorn.

This treaty, which was ratified by the regency at London, as ſoon as it could be tranſmitted thither, expoſed the Britiſh miniſter (lord Carteret) who conducted it, to great blame and cenſure. It was repreſented as a violation of common juſtice, ſince the Genoeſe were hereby negotiated out of their property, they having purchaſed the marquiſate of Final of the late emperor, for a valuable conſideration; and the purchaſe had been guarantied by Great Britain. Beſides, they were further injured by the condition of its being made a free port, which could not fail of prejudicing their commerce upon the Mediterranean. The Genoeſe themſelves ſeemed ſo ſenſible of the hard meaſure that had been dealt them by this latter article particularly, that they made ſtrong remonſtrances againſt it at the courts of London, Vienna, and Turin; and as little or no regard was paid to their repreſentations, they threw themſelves into the arms of Spain and France for protection.

The good underſtanding between the Czarina and the queen of Hungary was deſtroyed in the courſe of this year, in conſequence of a conſpiracy that had been detected by the court of Peterſburg, for removing the empreſs Elizabeth and recalling the princeſs Anne to the government; in which conſpiracy the marquis de Botta, who had reſided at the court of the Czarina, was ſuſpected of having been concerned. The empreſs demanded ſatisfaction of her Hungarian majeſty for the ill-conduct of her miniſter. The queen appointed commiſſioners to enquire into his conduct; by whom he was acquitted, to the great diſpleaſure of the empreſs of Ruſſia, who highly reſented that the court of Vienna ſhould require any other proof of the marquis's guilt than her aſſeveration. We muſt not forget, that a treaty of alliance was this year concluded between the Czarina and the king of Great Britain.

Let us now take a view of the campaign in Italy, which proved very unfavourable to the Spaniards.

His Sardinian majeſty on the cloſe of the laſt year had been diſpoſſeſſed of the whole duchy of Savoy, when the Spaniſh Infant took up his winter reſidence in Chamberry, while the king of Sardinia was obliged to retire to his Piedmonteſe dominions. During the ſeverity of the winter nothing was attempted on either ſide. In the ſpring of the year 1743, his Sardinian majeſty had aſſembled an army of forty thouſand men; but though he was greatly ſuperior to the Spaniards, he continued inactive; and the Spaniards in Savoy waited in expectation of a reinforcement from their court. But though the Spaniards were quiet on the ſide of Savoy, the Spaniſh queen, who lived only for the aggrandizement of her family, prevailed on her uxorious conſort, to ſend his general count de Gages a peremptory command, to attack without delay, the Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe under count Traun and count Aſpremont, in the eccleſiaſtical territories. This was accordingly done, without attending to the prior repreſentations of the count, who had ſent repeated advices to the Spaniſh miniſtry, of his army having been ſo much reduced by ſickneſs, death, and deſertion, as not to muſter above twenty-eight thouſand men, out of forty thouſand men that the duke of Montemar had left when he reſigned his command to him.

The royal command, however, was too abſolute to leave de Gages aught but compliance. Accordingly, he privately paſſed the Panaro in the beginning of February, and made himſelf maſter of Campo Santo and Final. On the eighth of February the count offered the Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe battle, which was accepted by them. The two armies were nearly equal, and a moſt obſtinate and bloody engagement enſued, which, however, was far from proving deciſive. The Spaniards loſt about four thouſand men, killed, wounded, and taken; among whom were the duke de Arcos, and three other generals. The confederates did not ſuffer quite ſo much; if we except the loſs of one of their principal generals, count de Aſpremont, who died of his wounds ſoon after the action. Some colours and cannon were taken on both ſides; and each ſung Te Deum for the victory.

Count de Gages, however, finding his army to diminiſh daily, and, having received advice that count Traun had been reinforced by ſeven thouſand men, repaſſed the Panaro, retreated ſuddenly out of the Bologneſe, and marched to Rimini, in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, where he fortified himſelf in a very advantageous camp. Before he quitted the Bologneſe, he had, by ſeveral different expreſſes, warmly ſollicited his Sicilian majeſty, to aſſiſt him with a body of Neapolitan forces; but that prince, though undoubtedly inclined to give aſſiſtance to the Spaniards, was ſo overawed by the proximity of the Britiſh fleet, that he durſt not venture on ſuch a ſtep.

After this engagement, the Auſtrians remained wholly inactive in the Modeneſe, till the month of September; when count Traun, whoſe age now rendered him little able to ſupport the fatigues of a winter campaign, ſollicited, and obtained leave of her Hungarian majeſty to reſign the command, and prince Lobkowitz was ordered to ſucceed him. This general, immediately on his arrival at the army, determined to enter upon action: accordingly, on the twenty-fourth of September he ſuddenly decamped, and advanced towards count de Gages; who with his forces being reduced, by the united calamities of famine and deſertion, to not more than ſeven thouſand men, retreated precipitately to Fano, a ſea-port town in the gulph of Venice. Here, however, the Spaniſh general ſeemed determined to wait for the enemy; as ſuch precautions had been taken, that the Auſtrians could make but little uſe of their cavalry, in which their ſuperiority chiefly conſiſted. In the mean time, the count repoſſeſſed himſelf of Peſaro, and began to fortify all the paſſes of the Foglia, in order to diſpute the paſſage of that river: but prince Lobkowitz knowing that the Spaniards would venture any engagement, to extricate themſelves out of ſo miſerable a country; and that the ſeverity of the approaching winter muſt greatly diminiſh their numbers, when they would be obliged to fly before him, without hazarding a ſtroke; thought it moſt adviſeable to diſcontinue his purſuit for the preſent; and put his troops into winter quarters about the middle of October.

The ſeaſon was far advanced before the Spaniſh troops, commanded by Don Philip, entered upon action, the French court having ſpent the ſummer chiefly in negotiations to draw off the king of Sardinia from the alliance; but finding that expedient fail, they at length ſent the prince of Conti, at the head of twelve thouſand men, to reinforce the Spaniards in Savoy, and force a paſſage into Piedmont, which the marquis de las Minas had unſucceſsfully attempted, with the loſs of three thouſand men. A body of four thouſand Spaniards were alſo ſent from Catalonia to join the young infant's army. In the mean time, the king of Sardinia had entered Savoy with forty thouſand men; upon which the young Spaniſh prince and the marquis de las Minas abandoned Chamberry on the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, and defiled through Dauphiné towards Briançon, thirty-ſix miles diſtant from Turin, where they were joined by the Spaniards and the French auxiliaries, when the whole army conſiſted of fifty-ſix thouſand men. Here they continued ſome time, to give the French army leiſure to recruit from the fatigue of their long march, as well as to concert the future operations of the campaign; and notwithſtanding the advanced ſeaſon, the prince de Conti, who was brave, fond of arms, and of an enterpriſing diſpoſition, perſuaded the marquis de las Minas to concur with him in a reſolution to attempt forcing the Piedmonteſe lines at Chateau-Dauphiné. This important poſt had been reinforced by the king of Sardinia and admiral Matthews; which latter had landed eight hundred men, and a great number of cannon, from his ſquadron at Villa Franca, to ſecure it as much as poſſible from the vigorous attack expected from the enemy.

The French and Spaniſh generals decamped from Briançon on the twenty-eighth of September, and arriving on the confines of Dauphiné early in the morning on the firſt of October, they made a warm attack upon the Piedmonteſe, who receiving them as warmly, obliged the aſſailants to retire with the loſs of eight hundred men. Nevertheleſs, they renewed the attack eight days ſucceſſively, but were always defeated, and at length obliged to quit their enterprize with very conſiderable loſs, and retire to Chamberry; but the French made good their winter quarters in Dauphiné and Provence, and the Spaniards maintained their footing in Savoy.

Our naval armaments in the Mediterranean continued in the ſame ſituation as at the concluſion of the preceding year, admiral Matthews continuing ſtill at the iſles of Hieres, to prevent the French and Spaniſh fleets from coming out of Toulon, which, as it was of the higheſt conſequence to their affairs in Italy, it was apprehended they would ſpeedily attempt. In fact, the Spaniards had for ſome time been particularly earneſt with the court of France to afford them a more effectual aſſiſtance than it had done for ſome time; and the French being at length determined to come to an open rupture with us, the courts of Verſailles and Madrid came to an agreement, that M. de Court, the French admiral, who was blocked up with admiral Navarro in Toulon, ſhould be now joined by the French ſhips that were fitting out in that harbour; that in the mean time a ſquadron ſhould be equipped at Breſt, to intercept the ſquadron which was on the point of ſailing for the Mediterranean to reinforce the Britiſh fleet there; and that at the ſame time orders ſhould be ſent to the combined fleets to put to ſea from Toulon, and fight Matthews. Of this deſign, however, the Britiſh admiral got intelligence, by intercepted letters, which he tranſmitted to the miniſtry in England, accompanied with the moſt preſſing ſollicitations to ſupply him with freſh ſhips, thoſe he had with him being ſo foul, and otherwiſe out of repair, that he apprehended he ſhould not be ſufficiently ſtrong to make head againſt the combined fleets with any proſpect of ſucceſs, ſhould they come out and attack him. In this ſituation were the Engliſh naval affairs at the cloſe of the year 1743.

In America they wore a more diſagreeable aſpect; for though ſir Chaloner Ogle, who had been left there, on the return of Vernon and Wentworth to England, in the double capacity of admiral of the fleet, and commander of the land forces on board, was an officer, in every reſpect, worthy of ſo important a truſt; yet he was deterred from perſonally attempting any material enterprize, becauſe the Spaniſh ſquadron, under admiral de Torres, which was ſtronger than that he commanded, ſtill continued at the Havannah. Sir Chaloner, however, determined to commence ſome attack againſt the Spaniards, which might not too greatly weaken his fleet. In the beginning of the year he ordered captain Knowles, commander of the Suffolk, a ſeventy-gun ſhip, who was well acquainted with the coaſt, to take under him the Burford, of ſeventy-guns, the Aſſiſtance, Norwich, and Advice, of fifty, and the Scarborough of twenty guns, and three ſloops, and to proceed to Antigua, where he was to be joined by the Eltham of forty guns, and the Lively of twenty; and with this ſquadron to make an attempt upon La Gueira and Porto Cavallo, on the Caracca coaſt; but the governor of the Caraccas having received intelligence of this expedition, had neglected nothing that tended to his ſecurity, by erecting new batteries,

ries, and augmenting the garriſons with a numerous body of Indians, Mulattoes, and Negroes; beſides, he had prevailed on the Dutch governor of Curaçoa, an iſland of the Leſſer Antilles, to ſupply him with a conſiderable quantity of ammunition; ſo that when commodore Knowles made the attack upon the place, he met with ſo warm a reception, that he was compelled to abandon the enterprize, and made his beſt way for the Dutch iſland Curaçoa; where he repaired the damage he had ſuffered in the attack of La Gueira. We had one lieutenant and ninety-two men killed, and three hundred and eighty wounded: among the latter was captain Luſhington, a gallant and experienced ſea-officer, commander of the Burford, who had his thigh taken off by a cannon ſhot, and expired at Curaçoa two hours after he was carried aſhore. The Spaniards, however, had no great cauſe for exultation, as their town and fortifications were almoſt deſtroyed, and they loſt above ſeven hundred men.

Commodore Knowles, not diſcouraged by the repulſe he had lately ſuſtained, and determined not to part with the Spaniards till he had made them feel the effects of his viſit, had no ſooner refitted his ſquadron than he put to ſea, in order to make an attempt upon Porto Cavallo, off which place he came to an anchor on the fifteenth of April.

The commodore, taking a view of the ſituation of the Spaniards, ſaw twelve of their ſmalleſt ſhips, and three gallies, hauled up to the head of the harbour out of gun-ſhot, and two large ones, one of ſixty, and another of forty guns, moored cloſe over to the other ſhore, as there was not depth of water for them to go up the harbour: one ſhip was laid acroſs the channel in the mouth of the harbour ready to be ſunk, to prevent any entrance, with a chain from the caſtle to her ſtern, and another from her head to the main, where the Spaniards had lately erected three faſcine batteries, which extended a conſiderable length. On a low point, called Punta Brava, were two other new faſcine batteries, one of twelve guns, the other of ſeven: but commodore Knowles perceiving they were ill deſigned, and might eaſily be flanked, thought it would be no difficult matter to render himſelf maſter of them; and that if the attempt ſucceeded, the guns of both might be made uſe of againſt the caſtle. Accordingly, it was agreed at a general conſultation held the next morning, to ſend in two ſhips to cannonade thoſe batteries, which was done; and they being ſilenced, the forces, conſiſting of twelve hundred ſoldiers and ſailors, were landed in the evening under major Lucas; but being ſeized with an unaccountable ſudden panic, they fell into the greateſt confuſion, firing upon each other, and flying with the utmoſt precipitation to their ſhips. On the twenty-firſt a general conſultation of officers was held, when it appearing that moſt of the ſhips had ſpent the greateſt part of their ammunition, and were all miſerably ſhattered in their maſts and rigging; in fine, that the ſquadron was no longer in a condition to renew the attack, the commodore abandoned the enterprize, ſent away the ſquadron to their reſpective ſtations, and after an exchange of priſoners with the governor of Porto Cavallo, returned with the other ſhips to Jamaica.

On the continent of America the operations of the war were very languid. General Oglethorpe having received intelligence, that the Spaniards meditated another invaſion from St. Auguſtine, was determined to prevent them. Accordingly, in the beginning of the ſpring of this year, he began his march towards St. Auguſtine with a body of forces, conſiſting of Indians, and a part of his own regiments, together with the Highlanders and Rangers, and encamped for ſome time in the neighbourhood of the town by way of defiance: but the Spaniards did not think proper to venture on an engagement; and the Britiſh general being too weak to undertake a ſiege, he returned to Georgia, which he continued to put in ſo defenſible a condition, as to leave nothing to fear from any attempt of the enemy. Towards the cloſe of the ſummer he embarked for England, and arrived in London on the twenty-eighth of September, where he met with a moſt gracious reception from his royal maſter, by whom he was ſoon after promoted on the military liſt.

Let us now take a ſurvey of the moſt important domeſtic tranſactions of the year 1743.

The remains of the regiments lately in the Weſt Indies returned home, were ſcarce the ſhadow of thoſe who were ſent out. As an inſtance of which, general Blakeney's regiment, which went out eight hundred ſtrong, now conſiſted only of eight men. Soon after the departure of his majeſty for Germany, an affair happened which, tho' inconſiderable in itſelf, threw London into a great conſternation. The Scottiſh regiment of Highlanders, commanded by lord Semple, had greatly diſtinguiſhed themſelves for their regularity, ſobriety, and military diſcipline. With theſe troops it was determined to replace thoſe lately arrived from the Weſt Indies. Accordingly, they were ordered up to London, and on the fourteenth of May reviewed by general Wade upon Finchley-common, and next day ordered to march to Graveſend. This they exclaimed loudly againſt, as a breach of the terms on which they had enliſted, namely, not to be ſent out of Great Britain; and on the ſeventeenth of the ſame month about one hundred and fifty of them mutinied, and marched off in a body towards their own country, but were ſoon overtaken, obliged to ſurrender, and brought priſoners to the Tower, where three of them were ſhot, and the reſt ſent to Jamaica and Georgia, and the main body of the regiment to Flanders, where they afterwards did excellent ſervice.

On the nineteenth of October her highneſs the princeſs Louiſa, his majeſty's youngeſt daughter, ſet out for Germany, in order to be married to the prince royal of Denmark. She was attended in her voyage by the counteſs of Albemarle, and baron Solenthall the Daniſh envoy, and arrived on the twenty-ninth at Hanover. From thence ſhe went to Altena, where ſhe was met by the prince royal, and married on the eighteenth of November; and on the eleventh of December the princely pair made their public entry into Copenhagen. It was rumoured that a croſs marriage between the ſame families was propoſed at the ſame time: it did not however take place.

A great conteſt happened this year amongſt the proprietors of the South-ſea company, relating to Mr. Knight, who had been their caſhier in the fatal year 1720, and had ever ſince lived in France as an exile: he had already procured his pardon from the crown, owing to ſome favourable circumſtances that pleaded in his behalf; and he now offered the company ten thouſand pounds by way of compoſition for all their claims againſt him. This offer was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by a great number of the proprietors, who thought it would have the appearance of a moſt ſcandalous compoſition on the part of the company. Innumerable pamphlets and other writings flew about on the occaſion: however, upon a ballot, the offer of Mr. Knight was accepted, by a majority of four hundred and ten againſt two hundred and ſeventeen. This year died the celebrated John Campbel, duke of Argyll and Greenwich, ſo eminent for his ſhining talents in the field and ſenate. He was ſucceeded in his Scottiſh title by his brother Archibald, earl of Ilay. The title of Greenwich by his death became extinct.

During the receſs of parliament, every endeavour had been exerted by the anti-miniſterial writers, to poiſon the minds of the people of England with ſuſpicions of the worſt tendency, to raiſe in them a ſettled averſion to thoſe at the helm, and even to alienate their affections from their ſovereign. With this view, all the arts of calumny and miſrepreſentation were employed: the burdens of taxes were exaggerated; the intereſt of the nation was affirmed to be directly ſacrificed to views of aggrandizing a foreign electorate; and no pains was ſpared to increaſe the jealouſy and national quarrel between the Engliſh and Hanoverians. The better to anſwer this laſt purpoſe, a report was as confidently as ſucceſsfully propagated, that the king had on all occaſions, during the laſt campaign, given preference to the foreign over the Britiſh troops, and that it was on this account only that the earl of Stair had thrown up his commiſſion, being no longer able to ſupport the inſults the Britiſh troops ſuſtained from their own mercenaries: they even went ſo far as to affirm, that the ſovereign himſelf appeared at the battle of Dettingen in a yellow ſcarf (the Hanoverian colour) and that his electoral troops were ſo ſecurely poſted, as not only to be out of all danger, but alſo of little or no ſervice in that engagement. Theſe reports, though many of them manifeſtly falſe, wrought their whole effect, and the minds of the people were inflamed to the higheſt degree of diſcontent, when the parliament, after ſeveral prorogations, reſumed its ſeſſion on the firſt day of December.

His majeſty in his ſpeech told the members, That the dominions of the queen of Hungary had been evacuated by her enemies, and that the powerful armies which had marched to her aſſiſtance had retired out of the empire: that, in this conjuncture, it was with great pleaſure he could acquaint them, that he had been joined by a body of troops of his good friends and allies the States-general: that, in further proſecution of theſe meaſures, the definitive treaty between him, the queen of Hungary, and the king of Sardinia, had been happily concluded; a treaty which in time ſhould be laid before them: that the advantages which muſt reſult from this alliance to the common cauſe were ſufficiently apparent; and it would be particularly conducive to the intereſts of his kingdoms, by diſappointing the ambitious views of the crown of Spain, with which they were at preſent engaged in ſo juſt and neceſſary a war; that, as he made no doubt but they would proceed upon theſe foundations with firmneſs and conſtancy, they might reaſonably hope to ſee the public tranquillity ſoon reeſtabliſhed, and a ſafe and honourable peace ſpeedily obtained: that ſuch were the ends which he had in view, and to the attainment of which he ſhould bend his whole ſtudy and attention; but, in order the more thoroughly to accompliſh them, vigorous and reſolute meaſures were neceſſary; and to concert and carry on ſuch meaſures, he did, with a juſt confidence, rely on their zealous, chearful, and effectual ſupport.

In the upper houſe lord Sandwich moved for an addreſs, beſeeching his majeſty to diſcontinue the Hanoverian troops in the pay of Great Britain, in order to remove the popular diſcontent, and ſtop the murmurs of the Engliſh troops abroad. In ſupport of this motion it was alleged, that theſe Hanoverians, though in the pay, could hardly be ſaid to be in the ſervice of the Britiſh nation: that ſome of them refuſed to form in the firſt line at the battle of Dettingen, and retired to the ſecond: that others refuſed to obey the orders of lord Stair, the Britiſh general, to march in purſuit of the enemy after the battle; and the greateſt number of them who, together with ſome of the Britiſh guards, compoſed what was called the rear-guard, under the command of a Hanoverian lieutenant-general, took a different route from the reſt of the army in their march to Aſchaffenburgh: that this ſtep not only rendered them wholly uſeleſs to the army when attacked by the French in front, but would have rendered them equally uſeleſs if the French from Aſchaffenburg, where the paſſage was left open to them, had attacked the allies in the rear, in which it was pretended that theſe troops were left as in the poſt of honour: that not contented to avoid being of uſe either in the front or in the rear, but determined to be of no uſe in any ſtation, they halted as ſoon as they came within ſight and reach of the battle, though preſſed by the Britiſh officers, and invited by the ardour of the Britiſh troops to ſhare the glory and complete the victory (as they might have done) of the day: that as by theſe means the future co-operations of the national troops with theſe mercenaries had been rendered impracticable, and even their meeting dangerous, it ſeemed indiſpenſibly neceſſary to remove the object that occaſioned the many inſtances of partiality by which the Hanoverians have been unhappily diſtinguiſhed, and the Britiſh forces undeſervedly diſcouraged. Theſe, and many other aſſertions of the like tendency, boldly thrown out, and no leſs powerfully ſupported by thoſe in the oppoſition to the government, appeared to make a conſiderable impreſſion upon many of the peers, which lord Carteret, who had accompanied his majeſty abroad, and was on the field of battle, obſerving, he roſe up to anſwer and confute them.

"From all, ſaid his lordſhip, I could ſee, and from all I could hear, from gentlemen who were in the action, the Hanoverians ſhowed as much courage, and as much obedience to the command of their ſuperior officers, as any troops ever did: from whence I infer, that they could do as much ſervice as any troops whatever; and that they were willing to do us ſervice, and to march whitherſoever they were commanded by our generals." Some of the lords having, during the courſe of the debate, advanced, that the Hanoverian troops durſt not fight againſt the emperor, becauſe he was their ſovereign, and elected with the concurrence of their maſter, his lordſhip obſerved, that this was a very miſtaken notion. "The emperor, my lords, continued he, neither began, nor does he now carry on the war againſt the queen of Hungary as emperor: he is engaged in war with her only as duke of Bavaria; and conſequently the members of the empire may aſſiſt either the one or the other, without committing any breach of any law of the empire. If our army did not attack the French, it was not to any backwardneſs in the Hanoverians, but to our not having an opportunity to attack them with any advantage."

In another paſſage of the ſame ſpeech (which made a great noiſe at this time) he obſerved, "that the noble lord (meaning the earl of Stair) who had the chief command, under his majeſty, of all the Britiſh troops, as well as the troops in Britiſh pay, is well known to moſt of your lordſhips; and any one who knows him muſt be convinced, that he would not tamely ſubmit to ſuch an affront as that of a diſobedience to his command. If he had reſented it, or if he had complained, I ſhould certainly have heard of it in the army; and as I never did, I muſt ſuppoſe there never was the leaſt occaſion for any ſuch complaints."

A great number of other members ſpoke both for and againſt the motion; the ſubſtance of whoſe arguments being in the main the ſame as already recited, ſhall not be here repeated. Upon a diviſion, the motion was rejected by a majority of 71 againſt 36 peers: but this occaſioned a very ſtinging proteſt, ſigned by about twenty-five peers. When the term for keeping the Hanoverians in Britiſh pay was nearly expired, and the eſtimates for their being continued the enſuing year were laid before the houſe, lord Sandwich renewed his motion; but the chancellor, as ſpeaker of the houſe, interpoſing, declared, that by their rules a queſtion once rejected could not be revived during the ſame ſeſſion. A debate enſued, and the ſecond motion was over-ruled.

The Hanoverian troops were voted in the houſe of commons. Nevertheleſs, the ſame nobleman moved in the upper houſe, "That the continuing ſixteen thouſand Hanoverians in Britiſh pay was prejudicial to his majeſty's true intereſt, uſeleſs to the common cauſe, and dangerous to the welfare and tranquillity of the nation." He was ſeconded by the duke of Marlborough, who had reſigned his commiſſion in diſguſt, and the propoſal gave riſe to another warm diſpute; but the minority, as formerly, were foiled in their attempts.

The miniſtry were no leſs warmly attacked in the houſe of commons. Mr. Grenville (the preſent earl Temple) moved for an addreſs to beſeech his majeſty, that he would not engage the Britiſh nation any farther in the war on the continent without the concurrence of the States-general, on certain ſtipulated proportions of force and expence, as in the late war. Another motion was made for laying a duty of eight ſhillings in the pound on places and penſions, and a third for repealing the ſeptennial act. Theſe propoſals were each of them productive of violent debates; but the court ſtill continued to maintain their ſuperiority. So great indeed was the credit and influence of the miniſtry, that although the national debt was increaſed by above ſix millions ſince the commencement of the war, the commons indulged them with a very large ſum for the expence of the enſuing year. The grants ſpecified in the votes amounted to ſix millions five hundred thouſand pounds. To this ſum were added three millions five hundred thouſand pounds, paid in perpetual taxes; ſo that the expence of the year aroſe to TEN MILLIONS; an amazing ſum! The funds eſtabliſhed for the annual charge were, the land-tax at two millions, the malt-tax at ſeven hundred fifty thouſand pounds, one million paid by the Eaſt India company for the renewal of their charter, one million two hundred thouſand pounds by annuities, one million from the ſinking fund, thirty-ſix thouſand pounds from the coinage, and ſix hundred thouſand pounds by a lottery.

The diſſenſions of the Britiſh parliament were ſuddenly ſuſpended in the beginning of the year 1744, by an event that ſeemed to call upon both parties to unite in their common defence. This was the intelligence of an intended invaſion in favour of the pretender, whoſe eldeſt ſon, Charles-Edward, had paſſed through Italy in December, in the diſguiſe of a Spaniſh courier, embarked at Final, landed at Antibes, and proſecuting his journey to Paris, had been indulged with a private audience of the French king; who thought, by the parliamentary diſputes and general diſſatisfaction of the people of Great Britain, that the whole nation was ripe for revolt, and therefore determined to make uſe of young Charles, who was a youth of promiſing talents, ſecret, brave, and enterpriſing, to effect the projected invaſion of this kingdom; which, ſhould it at laſt miſcarry, would, he foreſaw, make a conſiderable diverſion from the continent in favour of France, and embroil and embarraſs the king of England, who was the chief ſupport of the houſe of Auſtria and all its allies. The old pretender was perſuaded to ſuffer his ſon to try the experiment: the young man embraced the offer with the greateſt alacrity. The French miniſtry began to make preparations for carrying the ſcheme into immediate execution, and every thing was propoſed to be conducted with equal ſecrecy and diſpatch. The court of Spain, equally concerned in the ſucceſs of the project with that of Verſailles, undertook to furniſh the neceſſary ſums, which the exhauſted ſtate of the French finances would not ſuffer them to advance.

Count Saxe was appointed by the French king commander of the troops deſigned for this expedition, which amounted to fifteen thouſand. The count had been in England; and having obſerved the few number of ſtrong towns and fortreſſes in it, he had formed an idea that it might be eaſily over-run. Matters being at length compleatly ſettled, the troops began their march to Picardy, and a great number of veſſels were aſſembled for their embarkation at Dunkirk, Calais, and Boulogne, the young pretender himſelf repairing to thoſe places to ſuperintend the preparations.

In the mean time, the Britiſh miniſtry being appriſed of his arrival in France, were no longer at a loſs for the deſtination of the French armaments. Accordingly, orders were ſent to Mr. Thompſon, our reſident at Paris, to make the ſtrongeſt remonſtrances thereupon to the French miniſtry, but he received only evaſive anſwers.

It

It had been determined in the cabinet at Verſailles to land their troops in Kent, under a ſtrong convoy of men of war equipped at Breſt, and commanded by monſieur Roquefeuille, an officer of experience and capacity. This commander ſailed on the twenty-ſixth day of January from Breſt, directing his courſe up the Engliſh Channel with eighteen ſhips of the line. They were preſently deſcried by an Engliſh cruizer, who ran into Plymouth, and the intelligence was conveyed by land to the board of admiralty. As the French had been the greateſt part of laſt ſummer equipping a conſiderable armament at Breſt, a fleet of twelve men of war had been ordered to rendezvous at Spithead, under the command of ſir John Norris; but as no intelligence arrived that the French ſquadron was in readineſs for the ſea, ſir John did not take the command of theſe ſhips: but now that it was known for certain that the French fleet was at ſea, and perhaps in the Channel, he was immediately diſpatched down to the ſquadron, which he brought round to the Downs from Spithead; and being ſoon after joined by ſeven or eight ſhips of the line from Chatham, he found himſelf of ſuperior ſtrength to the enemy.

Every other poſſible precaution was taken by the government to guard againſt the impending danger: ſeveral regiments marched to the ſouthern coaſts of England; all governors and commanders were ordered to repair to their reſpective poſts; the forts at the mouth of the Thames and the Medway were put in a poſture of defence; and directions were given for raiſing the militia of Kent to defend the coaſt, if occaſion ſhould require. On the fifteenth day of February his majeſty in a meſſage informed both houſes of the French deſigns; in anſwer to which they jointly preſented a loyal addreſs, which was followed by others from the city of London, and moſt of the corporations in the kingdom, expreſſing their abhorrence of the French attempt, and promiſing to ſtand by his majeſty with their lives and fortunes. A proclamation was iſſued for putting the laws in execution againſt papiſts and nonjurors: the parliament alſo addreſſed his majeſty to augment his forces by ſea and land. And now it being known that the late diſſenſions among the great men in the army and ſtate had been the chief encouragement to the French to meditate their preſent ſcheme, the earl of Stair and the duke of Marlborough, in order to evince their loyalty to his majeſty, made him a voluntary tender of their ſervices in any ſtation which he ſhould think proper. Their offer was accepted: the earl of Stair was reinveſted with the chief command of all the forces in Great Britain: the duke of Montagu was permitted to raiſe a regiment of four hundred horſe at his own expence; and orders were ſent to bring over ſix thouſand of the Britiſh troops from Flanders, in caſe the invaſion ſhould actually take place.

Mean while, the French court proceeded with their preparations at Boulogne and Dunkirk, under the eye of the young pretender, and ſeven thouſand men were actually embarked; while Roquefeuille endeavoured to beat round the Channel, and take the tranſports under his convoy; but meeting with contrary winds and bad weather, it was the ſeventeenth of February before he got the length of the Iſle of Wight. Here he lay to, and ſent out a frigate for intelligence of what force was aſſembled at Spithead, which brought him information that no ſhips could be diſcovered in that road; upon which the French admiral, over haſtily concluding that the Engliſh, apprehenſive of an inſult from his ſuperior force, had withdrawn their ſhips into Portſmouth harbour, diſpatched M. de Barreil, his ſecond in command, with five men of war to Dunkirk, to haſten the arrival of the tranſports with the troops on board, while he himſelf, taking advantage of a ſpurt of fair wind, made ſail with the remainder of his fleet, and came to an anchor on the twenty-ſecond of February in the evening, off Dungeneſs, a ſteep promontory or head-land on the coaſt of Kent, about eighteen miles ſouth-weſt of Dover, and eight miles eaſt of Rye. While the French admiral lay here, ſir John Norris with his fleet, amounting to thirty ſail, the leaſt of which was of ſixty guns, weighed anchor from the Downs; and on the twenty-fourth in the forenoon M. de Roquefeuille, to his infinite ſurprize, ſaw the Britiſh fleet doubling the South Foreland and making towards him; and although the wind was againſt them, by the help of the tide gaining greatly upon him; but the tide of flood being ſpent, and the wind dying away, ſir John Norris found himſelf under the neceſſity of coming to an anchor, which he did about two leagues diſtance from the French. M. de Roquefeuille, finding that the Britiſh ſquadron was not only more numerous, and much ſuperior in force to that under his command, but that they had been likewiſe blocked up in a bay, from whence there appeared no poſſibility of eſcaping, ſummoned all his officers to a council, to demand their opinion how he ſhould act in this miſerable ſituation; when it was unanimouſly agreed to avoid an engagement, weigh anchor at ſun-ſet, and make the beſt of their way for their own coaſt. The council then broke up, and every officer returned to his ſhip to execute what had been reſolved upon. While they were weighing their anchors, a freſh gale of wind ſtarted up at eaſt north-eaſt, which increaſing every minute, ſoon became a ſtorm that hurried them down the Channel at the rate of ten miles an hour; ſo that next morning at day-break they were off Cape Barfleur: after which they were ſeparated by a thick fog, and arrived at Breſt in a very diſorderly manner, being greatly ſhattered by the ſtorm, to which however they owed their ſafety. A great number of their tranſports were driven aſhore and ſhattered to pieces, and the reſt were ſo much damaged, that they could not be repaired for a conſiderable time. The Engliſh remained maſters of the ſea, and kept the whole French coaſt in alarm. The deſigned invaſion was therefore quite laid aſide; the French generals returned to Paris, and the young pretender ſet out for the place of his former reſidence.

The Britiſh ſquadron was much damaged in the ſtorm; and ſir John Norris being thus diſappointed of attacking the French, and finding they had entirely effected their eſcape, thought proper to return to his ſtation in the Downs, where he arrived on the twenty-ſeventh of February, having before ſent away ſir Charles Hardy with all the three-decked ſhips to Portſmouth, where they could ride with greater ſecurity. On the ſecond of March the Habeas Corpus act was ſuſpended, and ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, among whom was the earl of Barrymore, of the kingdom of Ireland, were apprehended on ſuſpicion of treaſonable practices; but every one of thoſe ſuſpected perſons were afterwards admitted to bail, and diſcharged as ſoon as all fears of an invaſion were over. By virtue of the perpetual defenſive league between England and Holland, ſigned the third of March, 1678, and renewed and confirmed by the laſt treaty, which their High Mightineſſes concluded in the year 1728, with his reigning majeſty, the Dutch were obliged to furniſh, as auxiliaries to the Britiſh nation, a ſuccour of ſix thouſand troops and twenty men of war, to be employed in the ſervice of that crown, whenever demanded: the requiſition was made by our reſident at the Hague as ſoon as ever the deſigns of the French became apparent; and their High Mightineſſes immediately gave orders for the tranſportation of ſix battalions, of five hundred men each, into England as ſoon as poſſible. Theſe arrived at Graveſend on the eighteenth of March, and were followed ſoon after by three thouſand men more.

When Lewis found himſelf entirely diſappointed in his hoſtile ſchemes againſt the Britiſh nation, either to gratify his own reſentment, or to ſooth the anger of the court of Madrid, in which large ſums had been thus uſeleſsly ſquandered, he reſolved no longer to preſerve any meaſures with the Engliſh nation. Accordingly, Mr. Thompſon, our reſident at Paris, was given to underſtand, that a declaration of war muſt enſue; and this was actually publiſhed at Paris on the twentieth day of March, 1744, wherein the French king charged his Britannic majeſty with having diſſuaded the court of Vienna from entertaining any thoughts of an accommodation; with having infringed the convention of Hanover; with having exerciſed piracy upon the ſubjects of France; and even blocked up his moſt Catholic majeſty's fleet in his harbour of Toulon. In anſwer to this his Britannic majeſty, on the thirty-firſt of March, publiſhed a counter-declaration of war againſt France, to the great joy of the nation, which had long reflected with indignation upon the many inſults we had received from that faithleſs people. The Dutch, who upon ſuch an event were to ſupply us with twenty ſhips of war, did vouchſafe to ſend five or ſix, which, for any ſervice they were of, might as well have ſtaid at home. The elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe refuſed their ſtipulated ſuccours till we had an army formed in Hanover ſufficient to protect them. The Ruſſians alleged it was too late in the year to give us the aſſiſtance we had a right to demand. The king of Pruſſia inſiſted we were the aggreſſors, and therefore would ſend us no ſuccours. In April the French alſo declared war againſt the queen of Hungary, who returned a like declaration againſt France in the ſucceeding month; and thus all Europe was lighted up in flames.

On the third of April his Britannic majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and made a ſpeech to his parliament, in which he acquainted them with the French king's having declared war againſt him on the moſt ill-grounded and injurious pretences: that he had on his part alſo declared war againſt the French king, and had made the proper requiſitions to the States general for performing their engagements on this important occaſion. His majeſty then declared, that in the proſecution of his juſt cauſe, he relied on the divine protection, and the vigorous ſupport of his parliament, aſſuring them that he would do his part: that he had no intereſt at heart but theirs; and that common intereſt conjured them all to unite. To this pathetic ſpeech both houſes returned the moſt affectionate and loyal addreſſes, promiſing effectually to ſtand by and aſſiſt his majeſty in proſecuting the war againſt France with the greateſt vigour, and to furniſh whatever expences ſhould be found neceſſary for the ſame, as became a free and grateful people in defence of their liberties. The commons alſo, more evidently to demonſtrate their loyalty, brought in a bill for inflicting penalties of high-treaſon upon thoſe who ſhould maintain correſpondence with the ſons of the pretender. This bill was ſent up to the lords on the twenty-ſeventh of April, when lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, moved that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted for continuing the penalty of treaſon upon the poſterity of thoſe who ſhould be convicted of holding ſuch correſpondence, during the life of the two ſons of the pretender to the crown. This motion was ſupported by the duke of Newcaſtle, lord Carteret, and the whole ſtrength of the miniſtry, and oppoſed by the duke of Bedford, the earl of Cheſterfield, lord Talbot, and lord Hervey, who argued againſt it in the moſt pathetic manner, as an illiberal expedient, contrary to the dictates of humanity, the law of nations, the rules of common juſtice, and the precept of religion; as tending to involve the innocent with the guilty; and meant only to augment the miniſterial power, to plunder the nation, and enable courtiers to grow rich by public calamities. The lords who defended the motion aſcribed this propoſal purely to motives of preſerving their conſtitution and liberties, and of defeating the ſchemes which had been formed for diſpoſſeſſing the preſent royal family of the throne. After a long and violent debate the queſtion was carried in the affirmative, though not without occaſioning a proteſt, ſigned by eighteen lords. When the bill was returned with the amendment to the commons, the amendment was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by lord Strange, lord Guernſey, Mr. W. Pitt, and other members by whom the original bill had been countenanced: but the miniſterial party here, as in the upper houſe, carried their point: the bill was approved by the majority, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent.

On the fifteenth day of May his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he returned both houſes "his hearty thanks for the many demonſtrations they had given him during the courſe of it, of their good affections, and of their zeal for the ſupport of his government. He obſerved, that the great preparations made by France on the ſide of the Auſtrian Netherlands, muſt convince all Europe of the ambitious and deſtructive views of that crown in beginning the preſent war: that it ſhould be his care, in conjunction with his allies, to purſue the moſt proper meaſures to diſappoint theſe deſigns, and to proſecute the war in ſuch a manner as might be moſt effectual for obtaining a ſafe and honourable peace: that his good friends the States-general had already, in purſuance of his requiſition, agreed to furniſh the ſuccours ſtipulated by treaties, and had given the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of their ſenſe, not only of the common danger, but alſo of the inſeparable connection of their intereſts with thoſe of Great Britain; a diſpoſition which he would not fail to improve to the general good of the common cauſe: that he hoped the members of both houſes, upon their return to their reſpective counties, would be particularly careful to preſerve the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom, eſpecially at this critical conjuncture, when they were called upon by every motive of duty and intereſt, to cheriſh a more than ordinary zeal for the maintenance and defence of their religion and liberty, againſt the malicious deſigns of their enemies."

The late projected invaſion was replete with many ills againſt England, and its timely detection and prevention was conſequently a moſt fortunate circumſtance for her. The ſcheme had been laid with ſuch deep art and ſecrecy, that the commanders of the French fleet did not know the place of their deſtination till the moment they were to ſet ſail: it was, moreover, cloſely connected with another which, had it proved ſucceſsful, muſt have given the French the entire dominion of the ſea. The queen of Spain, impatient of the difficulties which retarded her ſon Don Philip in his progreſs in Italy, and enraged at the detention of the French and Spaniſh ſquadrons in the harbour of Toulon, had, by promiſing to ſuſtain all the loſs that might be ſuffered in ſuch an attempt, prevailed on the court of Verſailles to agree that the combined fleets ſhould ſail out of the harbour and attack that of England; after which, ſhould they gain the victory, they were to repair into the Engliſh Channel, in order to aſſiſt in the projected deſcent.

Accordingly, orders were diſpatched to the united fleets to put to ſea with all expedition, and dare the utmoſt hazards of an engagement. Admiral Matthews had by this time been reinforced from England, ſo that he had the ſuperiority of the French and Spaniards; and on the eleventh of January this year found himſelf at the head of forty ſail, of which twenty-eight were of the line *, having on board two thouſand four hundred and ninety guns, fifteen thouſand ſeamen, and eight hundred ſoldiers from Minorca; ſo that it is more than probable the enemy would have gladly avoided an engagement, had not their orders from their reſpective courts been ſo peremptory. Their whole force conſiſted of twenty-eight ſhips of the line; one of them, the Spaniſh admiral's, named the Royal Philip, mounted one hundred and fourteen guns: they had likewiſe ſix frigates; but all their ſhips were clean, and completely manned.

On the ninth of February, 1744, in the morning, the combined fleet came out of the harbour; and Matthews, who lay in the bay, and had intelligence of their deſign, made the proper diſpoſitions to engage them. He immediately got under ſail with his whole fleet; but the wind dying away, he was obliged to come to an anchor again in the bay. According to the diſpoſition of the line of battle made by the Britiſh admiral, the van was conducted by Mr. Rowley, rear-admiral of the white; the center by Mr. Matthews himſelf, lately made admiral of the blue; and the rear by Leſtock, who had been promoted to be vice-admiral of the blue. The next day, a ſmall breeze ſpringing up at eaſt, the two fleets neared each other; but it was night before Matthews could get near enough to the enemy, who ſeemed to decline the line of battle. By this time, however, vice-admiral Leſtock and his ſquadron was full five miles aſtern of the admiral; and the Spaniſh ſhips were aſtern of De Court, the French admiral, who ſtill avoided to engage with the Engliſh van under Rowley. Matthews, finding that the combined fleets kept aloof, and fearing that they might, by a change of wind, be enabled to elude the engagement, determined to break the form of a line of battle, which he had hitherto ſtudiouſly endeavoured to preſerve, and about twelve o'clock, on the eleventh, he made the ſignal for engaging: himſelf began the attack upon the Spaniſh admiral, Don Navarro, in the Real; rear-admiral Rowley ſingled out M. de Court, who commanded the French ſquadron; but Leſtock ſtill remained a great way aſtern. During the engagement, the captains Cornwall, Oſborne, Hawke, and Forbes, exhibited the moſt exemplary courage; but ſeveral other captains, who were immediately under the eye of Matthews, behaved in the moſt daſtardly and puſillanimous manner. Mr. Matthews, however, by the aſſiſtance of the Marlborough, reduced the Real to a perfect wreck; but the Marlborough, driving too near the admiral, in the very heat of the action, obliged him to fill his ſail and ſhoot a-head, to prevent her being on board of him, which, as there was very little wind, and a heavy ſwell, might have proved fatal to both of them. The Marlborough was now left alone to contend with the greateſt ſhip in the world. The brave captain Cornwall, her commander, after performing wonders, loſt both his legs and his life by a chain-ſhot. The firſt lieutenant taking the command, continued to fight with equal bravery; but being at length utterly diſabled, ſhe was about five o'clock towed out of the line of battle. The Royal Philip, however, was in as miſerable a condition, lying like a mere hulk upon the water; which admiral Matthews perceiving, he made a ſignal for the Anne galley fireſhip to go down and burn her. Theſe kind of veſſels are filled with gun-powder, and every other kind of combuſtible, and they faſten upon an enemy's ſhip with grappling-irons fixed at their yards, arms, and at booms, ſpread out in different places for that purpoſe. The moment the fire-ſhip is faſtened to her object, a match is ſet to the train of powder, while the crew hurry into a boat that waits a-ſtern for them. The captain is the laſt who enters it. In the mean time, the train catching, the fire-ſhip is inſtantly all in flames, and is blown up, together with the veſſel to which it is grappled. It is always cuſtomary to order a large ſhip to go down with this machine, to cover it from the fire of the enemy. Matthews took this precaution; but the ſhip he ordered to this ſervice did not obey his ſignal: nevertheleſs, the brave captain Mackay, who commanded this engine of deſtruction, continued advancing. By this time four Spaniſh ſhips had paſſed by Leſtock, and haſtened to the protection of their admiral: they poured their broadſides into the poor defenceleſs, and undefended Anne galley, which had by this time got within her own length of the Real; but unable to ſuſtain ſo terrible a ſalute, was now on the point of ſinking; which the captain perceiving, and ſeeing his own deſtruction inevitable, determined at leaſt to avenge himſelf in the hour of his death: he ſet fire to the train, hoping he might yet be able to get alongſide of the Spaniſh admiral, and blow her up along with himſelf; but it was too late: his veſſel was in an inſtant on fire, and blew up within a few feet of the Royal Philip, whoſe deck was covered with the wreck, but without receiving any damage from this dreadful exploſion.

The four ſhips which had paſſed Mr. Leſtock now directing their whole fury againſt the Namur, Mr. Matthews' ſhip (who ſtill lay within muſket-ſhot of the Real, with his maſts and rigging terribly diſabled) raked him fore and aft for ſome time. About five o'clock Mr. Matthews made the ſignal for the line a-head, and wore round; but he was only followed by the Dorſetſhire, Eſſex, Rupert, and Royal Oak, which were a-ſtern of him: theſe however formed the line with the admiral, and engaged the Royal Philip, and ſix other ſhips which had got into a cloſe line with their admiral. One ſhip of the Spaniſh line, named the Poder, ſtruck to captain Hawke of the Berwick, who ſent a lieutenant to take poſſeſſion of her: ſhe was afterwards retaken by the French ſquadron; but was found ſo diſabled that they left her deſerted, and ſhe was next day burned by order of admiral Matthews.

It is agreed that the Spaniſh diviſion muſt have been entirely deſtroyed, had it not been for M. de Court, the French admiral, who continued ſo cloſely to engage rear-admiral Rowley as to prevent his going down to the aſſiſtance of Mr. Matthews. About five o'clock the French admiral made the ſignal for the van to tack, with an intention to put admiral Matthews between two fires. This obliged Rowley to tack likewiſe, to join the center of our fleet, which was threatened with the moſt imminent danger by the above manœuvre of the French admiral, Leſtock not having, during all this time, brought up his diviſion to reinforce it; which was the more extraordinary, as four Spaniſh ſhips had actually paſſed him, and arrived to ſave their admiral, Navarro, in the Real. Night coming on, the firing ceaſed on both ſides, and the combined fleets took that opportunity of towing all the crippled ſhips before the wind, and making the beſt of their way from the Britiſh fleet, who loſt ſight of them about ten o'clock; and there being but little wind, Matthews brought to, that Leſtock and the ſternmoſt ſhips might get up to him. Next day the enemy appeared to leeward, and the admiral gave chace till night. They were obſerved again on the thirteenth at a conſiderable diſtance, and purſued till evening. On the morning of the fourteenth a great number of the ſhips of the combined fleets were ſeen diſtinctly from the maſt-head; and a freſh gale ſpringing up, Leſtock gave chace to, and had gained on them conſiderably by noon: but juſt as he was in full view of coming up with them, Matthews threw out his ſignal to leave off chace, and afterwards bore away for Port-Mahon to refit; while the enemy, continuing their courſe towards the coaſt of Spain, M. de Court, with his diviſion, anchored in the road of Alicant, and Don Navarro ſailed into the harbour of Carthagena.

Admiral Matthews, on his arrival at Minorca, accuſed Mr. Leſtock of having miſbehaved in the action, ſuſpended him from his command, and ſent him priſoner to England. This action off Toulon was, notwithſtanding the ſuperior force of the Engliſh, rendered indeciſive, or rather fruitleſs, by the mutual averſion the two commanders had for each other. Whether Leſtock would have willingly deprived Matthews of the glory of a victory, or whether Matthews did not chuſe to ſhare with him that glory, is a queſtion we cannot here decide. This much is certain, that the only fruits of our vaſt expence, and preparations of both us and the enemy in the Mediterranean, was the ſlaughter of a great number of men, and the diſabling many veſſels. There were complaints on all ſides; and the ſame diſguſt appears to have prevailed between the Spaniſh and French admirals as between the two Britiſh commanders. The Spaniards accuſed the French of having ſacrificed them to the whole fire of the Britiſh fleet; and though it was plain that De Court had ſaved them from deſtruction, yet, to gratify the Spaniards, the French commandant was diſgraced, though he was afterwards reſtored to his command with circumſtances that reflected double honour upon him.

It may eaſily be ſuppoſed that the conduct of our fleet on this important occaſion, would become the ſubject of a parliamentary enquiry in England. The trial of the delinquents came before a committee of the houſe of commons in the March following, when Leſtock exhibited a countercharge againſt Matthews, who had reſigned his command to rear-admiral Rowley, and had arrived in England. The houſe, however, not finding itſelf able to determine in this intricate affair, in which ſo many points of ſeamanſhip and naval manœuvres continually ſtarted up, preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring that a court-martial might be appointed to try the delinquents.

The court-martial was accordingly conſtituted and appointed, and proceeded to trial; but by reaſon of the many delays and obſtructions thrown in by both parties, did not paſs ſentence till the latter end of the year 1746, when ſeveral captains of Matthews' diviſion were caſhiered, vice-admiral Leſtock was honourably acquitted, and admiral Matthews rendered incapable of ſerving for the future in his majeſty's navy. The iſſue of this court-martial was thought to be the more extraordinary, as the admiral, who had diſplayed the greateſt courage and ſpirit, poſſibly not ſufficiently tempered with conduct, ſcarce eſcaped ſuffering an ignominious death for cowardice; while the vice-admiral, who had kept aloof during the whole engagement, and hazarded the deſtruction of his ſuperior and half of the fleet, by diſobeying, or pretending not to underſtand his ſignals, was acquitted with honour. Unhappily, deciſions of this kind are too frequently the reſult of intereſt and prejudice, rather than of a due attention to reaſon, or the merits of the cauſe.

Proper regard, however, was in other inſtances paid to real merit: a noble monument was erected to the memory of captain Cornwall in Weſtminſter-abbey, by a vote of the Britiſh parliament, and at the public expence; an honour to which, by his gallant behaviour in this and in ſeveral former actions, this commander was univerſally allowed to be juſtly entitled. The captains Forbes, Oſborne, and Hawke, had afterwards diſtinguiſhed honours and rewards beſtowed upon them ſuitable to their ſpirit, courage, and conduct, as had rear-admiral Rowley: in fine, nothing can be more probable than that, had all the commanders of the Britiſh fleet during the engagement off Toulon, done their duties equally well, the Spaniſh ſquadron, if not the French likewiſe, might have been totally deſtroyed, and a glorious end put at once to the war.

The conſequence however proved, that the advantage in the Toulon engagement was on the ſide of France and Spain. The Mediterranean was left open at leaſt for ſome time, and Don Philip was eaſily ſupplied with proviſions, which he much wanted, from the coaſt of Provence; but neither the French nor Spaniſh ſquadrons were able to make head againſt Matthews when he returned to his ſtation, after having refitted his ſhips. France and Spain being under a neceſſity of always ſupporting very numerous land armies, have not that continual fund of ſeamen, which are the reſource of Great Britain's power. It was now more evident than ever of how great importance the poſſeſſion of Minorca was to us, and the great prejudice Spain had ſuſtained in the loſs of that place.

In the beginning of this year, 1744, Don Philip in Lombardy, with the marquis de las Minas under him, found himſelf, by the arrival of an augmentation from Spain, and the junction of twenty thouſand French under the prince de Conti, at the head of ſixty thouſand men; with which his highneſs was adviſed, after the retreat of the Britiſh fleet to Minorca, to enter Dauphiné, paſs the Var, and renew his attempts to penetrate into Piedmont on the ſide of Nice, where his Sardinian majeſty could not immediately collect an army ſufficient to make any formidable reſiſtance, becauſe he could expect little ſupport from prince Lobkowitz, on account of his Sicilian majeſty having determined to aſſiſt the Spaniards in Italy. It was a bold reſolution of the enemy to attempt penetrating into a country, where a ſingle battalion may ſtop a whole army; where you are every inſtant obliged to fight amongſt rocks and torrents; and where all theſe obſtacles are heightened by the difficulty of getting proviſions. All the paſſages into Piedmont were defended with ſuch ſecurity as to deny any entrance on the ſide of Savoy, and an army of thirty thouſand Piedmonteſe was aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Villa Franca, where his Sardinian majeſty fortified his camp with ſtrong entrenchments, which were rendered more inacceſſible by the mountainous ſituation of the country; and his majeſty continued in this camp, to prevent the incurſions of the confederate forces, who were expected to make their attempt on the ſide of Nice.

The confederate army of French and Spaniards having quitted their cantonments, paſſed thro' Dauphiné, and made the neceſſary preparations for repulſing the Piedmonteſe troops from the paſſage on the ſide of Nice. About the latter end of March the infant Don Philip and the prince of Conti paſſed the Var, a river which falls from the Alps, and empties itſelf into the ſea of Genoa, below Nice: that city, with the whole country to which it gives name, being incapable of making any defence, quickly ſurrendered. The confederates then paſſed the river Paglioni, with an intent to encamp between Nice and Montalban, and ſeize on the fortified poſts which encompaſſed the king of Sardinia's camp; but before they could advance any farther, they were under a neceſſity of attacking the intrenchments near Villa Franca, and thoſe of the fortreſs of Montalban, in the midſt of rocks which form a long chain of inacceſſible ramparts. There was no poſſibility of marching but through narrow defiles, and over frightful precipices, expoſed to the enemy's artillery. Full in the front of this, they were obliged to climb up from rock to rock; and even on the Alps they had as great difficulties to encounter. Admiral Matthews having careened his ſhips, was returned to reaſſume the empire of the Mediterranean ſea. He landed a body of men at Villa Franca, who joined the Piedmonteſe, and ſome Engliſh gunners whom he lent them from his fleet did great ſervice: but the two young princes, who commanded an army of veteran troops who were every way fit for ſuch an expedition, and into whom they infuſed freſh ardour by their own example, concerted their meaſures ſo well, that they ſurmounted all obſtacles. The marquis de Biſſy, at the head of a detachment of French, and the marquis de Campo Santo at the head of another of Spaniards, ſoon made themſelves maſters of the enemy's batteries which flanked the paſſage of Villa Franca. Every thing was ſo well planned, ſo quick and ſo vigorouſly puſhed on the ſide of the confederates, and they made ſuch prodigious efforts, that this chief paſs of Villa Franca, the rampart of Piedmont, which was above the height of two hundred fathoms from the level, and defended by five thouſand troops, and which the king of Sardinia imagined to be quite inacceſſible, was carried by the French and Spaniards, though with the loſs of near ſix thouſand men, while that of the Piedmonteſe, who defended it, was about three thouſand killed and taken priſoners. Amongſt them was the marquis de Suze, natural brother to his Sardinian majeſty, who commanded the troops that defended the entrenchments. The confederates then purſuing their advantage, advanced from poſt to poſt, from rock to rock, carrying every thing before them.

In the mean while, another large detachment had made a furious aſſault upon the intrenchments of Montalban, commanded by general Sinzan, with five thouſand men. Twice were the enemy at the very top of theſe intrenchments: they had even made themſelves maſters of two batteries of cannon, but were obliged to abandon them, and to retire, with the loſs of four hundred men killed and as many wounded, beſides a great number of priſoners, among whom were a major-general, a brigadier general, a lieutenant-colonel, nine captains, and thirty-three ſubalterns. The Piedmonteſe defended themſelves ſo well as to have only one hundred men killed, ſixty wounded, and one hundred and forty made priſoners. Sinzan, however, finding that the marquis de Suze had been defeated, and that the French would now have it in their power to cut off the communication with Villa Franca, he held a council of war, in which it was agreed to abandon the entrenchments. This was done on the twelfth of April, three days after thoſe of Villa Franca had been forced; and a garriſon of three hundred and forty men being put into the citadel of Villa Franca, and ſixty into the fortreſs of Montalban, the Piedmonteſe troops, to the number of four hundred and fifty, with all the ammunition, proviſion, and artillery, embarked on board the Engliſh men of war for Oneglia, a port town in the territory of Genoa, but ſubject to his Sardinian majeſty, ſeven miles ſouth-weſt of Genoa, and forty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Coni, where they arrived on the twentieth of April, after a tedious and ſtormy paſſage.

Engliſh

The French immediately entered Villa Franca and Montalban, and a detachment of ten thouſand Spaniards was ſent under the duke d'Arcos, one of the Spaniſh generals, to attack the Piedmonteſe in Oneglia. Mean while, his Sardinian majeſty quitted his encampment, and retired towards Coni. The Spaniſh general having croſſed the territory of Genoa, arrived on the tenth of May before Oneglia, from whence general Sinzan retreated to Gareſſio, where he fortified himſelf among the eminences in ſo advantageous a ſituation, that he deterred the Spaniards from attempting to diſpoſſeſs him from his poſt. The duke d'Arcos then received orders to penetrate through the territories of Genoa into the Milaneſe, whither he was to be followed by the whole combined army: but admiral Matthews, who was then off the Genoeſe coaſt, acquainted the republic, "That if the ſenate permitted the combined army to paſs through their dominions, his Britannic majeſty ſhould regard it as a breach of their neutrality." This intimidated the doge and ſenate: they immediately intreated the confederate generals to abandon their deſigns, and had the happineſs of procuring a compliance.

In fact, notwithſtanding the ſucceſſes of Don Philip and the prince of Conti, the ſcaling of thoſe mountains at Villa Franca and Montalban, and the victories obtained among theſe precipices, they had not as yet been able to open a paſſage on that ſide: they could not advance for want of ſubſiſtence through thoſe defiles, and over thoſe rocks, where they were obliged to have the cannon dragged by ſoldiers, the forage carried on the backs of mules, and to march in ſeveral places on the declivity of a mountain, the foot of which was waſhed by the ſea, and where they were expoſed to the artillery of an Engliſh ſquadron ſtationed there to annoy them: they had moreover loſt above twelve thouſand men ſince the paſſage of the Var. The prince of Conti duly weighing all theſe conſiderations, propoſed to the infant and the marquis de las Minas to return into Dauphiné, and endeavour to force a paſſage on the ſide of Demont, which was readily aſſented to. The Spaniſh troops who had poſſeſſed themſelves of Oneglia were recalled; and having joined the marquis de las Minas at Nice, the confederate army, on the firſt of June, repaſſed the Var, and defiled towards the Upper Dauphiné. On the ninth of July they arrived near the paſſes of Chateau-Dauphiné, and encamped about Briançon, Guilleſtre, and Tournous, to be in readineſs to force their way into Piedmont, by Demont; and the adjacent paſſes were ſtrongly fortified by his Sardinian majeſty, who had removed from Coni for their protection.

The confederate forces having made the proper diſpoſitions, on the eighteenth of July, early in the morning, began the execution of their projected attacks. M. du Bois de Givry, a French lieutenant-general, and the bailli (or bailiff) of the great croſs of Malta, led nine French battalions of the regiments of Poitou, Conti, Salis, Provence, and Brie, betwixt two mountains: the count de Campo Santo followed him at the head of three Spaniſh battalions through another defile on the mountains of Traverſiera. The bailli de Givry having made good his paſſage, came and drew up on the ſide of a ſummit which terminated at the redoubt of Monte Cavallo, and was defended by a detachment of twelve hundred Piedmonteſe. The aſſailants had no artillery, and were expoſed to their enemy's cannon. Givry was wounded in the beginning of the action; and the marquis de Villemur being informed that a paſſage of equal importance had been juſt then luckily diſcovered, ſent orders for a retreat. Givry obeyed, and prepared to draw off his men; but both the officers and ſoldiers were too greatly animated to obey his directions. The lieutenant-colonel of the regiment of Poitou was the firſt who leaped into the Piedmonteſe entrenchments; the French grenadiers darted themſelves one upon another; and by the favour of a fog, which prevented the Piedmonteſe from taking any object for their fire, made themſelves maſters of the covered way; and the chevalier de Caſtagnola, who commanded the works, being wounded, and only four hundred and ſixty men remaining of the twelve hundred in the redoubt, which was extremely harraſſed, the commandant thought proper to retire with the troops which had ſuſtained the garriſon, leaving the French to take poſſeſſion of the redoubt, which was of the greateſt importance, as it opened them a paſſage into Piedmont; though this advantage was dearly purchaſed, the French having loſt one hundred and forty-three officers, and upwards of three thouſand five hundred men.

His Sardinian majeſty perceiving the loſs of theſe advantageous poſts, drew his troops from the frontiers, ſent his heavy cannon off before him, and afterwards marched to prepare for the ſecurity of Turin, by defending the village of Varita and the Po, according to the motions of the confederates. While theſe latter were taking Chateau-Dauphiné, they were obliged to take the place known by the name of the Barricades: this is a paſs of about three fathoms wide, between two mountains which rear their heads to the ſky. The king of Sardinia had turned the river Stura, which waters the adjacent valley, into this precipice. The poſt on the other ſide of the river was defended by three entrenchments and a covered way. This was the laſt paſſage that was forced: and ſuch was the conſternation of the Piedmonteſe, that, impregnable as it was thought, it was carried by the French and Spaniards with very little loſs. This advantage gained, the confederates left the Piedmonteſe army on the left, and inveſted Demont, a ſtrong fortreſs at the foot of the mountains, in the road to Coni. This fortreſs had been built, at an immenſe expence, on the top of a rock that ſtood by itſelf in the midſt of the valley of Stura, and was defended by a garriſon of fifteen hundred men, provided with fifty-eight braſs cannon, fourteen mortars, and a great quantity of ammunition and powder; and on account of its great ſtrength, it was expected that it would have made a vigorous defence. The trenches were opened on the fourteenth of Auguſt, when the beſiegers began to play; and on the eighteenth, having accidentally thrown a red-hot bullet into a place near the great magazine, general Vialetti, the governor, being afraid that he and all his garriſon ſhould be blown up, called for the aſſiſtance of the beſiegers to extinguiſh the flames: and thus the allies, with the loſs of only five men, got poſſeſſion of a fortreſs in four days, that otherwiſe would have coſt them ſeveral weeks ſiege, with the loſs of many thouſands of lives. By the reduction of Demont, the French and Spaniſh powers became maſters of the flat country of Piedmont, which they laid under heavy contributions. His Sardinian majeſty, diſpirited with his loſſes, and thinking it improper to venture a battle in the plain againſt a ſuperior army, flushed with the moſt extraordinary ſucceſſes, retired to Saluzzo, ſeventeen miles ſouth from Turin, to cover that metropolis, where he continued in expectation of a reinforcement of eight thouſand Auſtrians under general Pallavicini, from Mantua and the Milaneſe.

The princes were now determined to inveſt Coni, a ſtrong town and caſtle, ſeated upon a hill at the confluence of the rivers Shira and Gueſſa, thirty-two miles ſouth of Turin, and thirty-five north of Nice. Coni was garriſoned by twelve hundred men, commanded by baron Leutrum, who made the neceſſary meaſures for an obſtinate reſiſtance. The prince of Conti on the eighth of September appeared before the town, and opened his trenches on the thirteenth. On the fifteenth his Sardinian majeſty had the ſatisfaction of being joined by general Pallavicini with his reinforcement, when his army conſiſted of thirty-ſix thouſand men, which was ſuperior to the French and Spaniards, who were now reduced to thirty-three thouſand: they however had the ſuperiority in cavalry.

His Sardinian majeſty now reſolved to hazard a battle, ſenſible that this was one of thoſe occaſions in which ſuch an attempt is warranted by all the rules of ſound policy. If he won the day, the confederates had few reſources, and their retreat would have been attended with great difficulty: if he loſt it, the town was ſtill able to hold out in this advanced ſeaſon, and he had a ſafe retreat. Nothing could be more judicious than this prince's diſpoſition of his army; for having leſs cavalry than the beſiegers, and more infantry, he made his attack in ſuch a manner as to give his infantry the whole advantage of the ground, and ſecure his cavalry from any danger of a defeat.

The prince of Conti, informed of his Sardinian majeſty's intention to attack the confederates in their lines, took every neceſſary meaſure, in conjunction with the royal infant and the Spaniſh generals, for giving the Piedmonteſe a proper reception; and drew the army out of their intrenchments to meet the king of Sardinia, who arrived in the plain near Madonne de l'Olmo, in ſight of Coni, on the twenty-third of September. On the twenty-fourth the two armies engaged. His Sardinian majeſty maintained the fight till night, without flinching; when finding it impracticable to force the enemy's intrenchments, he retired in good order to a camp at Muraſſo. He afterwards found means to throw a reinforcement of men and a ſupply of proviſions into Coni, which enabled baron Leutrum, the governor, to hold out the place till the middle of October, when the marquis d'Ormea, who was poſted with a detachment of five hundred Piedmonteſe on the eaſtern ſide of the town, found an opportunity of getting count Soto, with ſix hundred men, into the garriſon. The beſiegers, diſcouraged by this augmentation of the garriſon, the advanced ſeaſon of the year, the heavy ſnows and rains, the over-flowings of the rivers, and the conſiderable and perpetual loſſes they ſuſtained by the fate of war and ſickneſs, whereby their army was almoſt one half diminiſhed, thought it moſt adviſeable to abandon the ſiege and make a retreat. Accordingly, in the beginning of November they quitted their trenches, and marched back to Demont, leaving their ſick and wounded, to the number of two thouſand, to the mercy of the Piedmonteſe. Having deſtroyed the fortifications of this place, they continued their retreat with great precipitation to Dauphiné, dreadfully harraſſed by the Vaudois and light troops in the ſervice of his Sardinian majeſty, who once more recovered poſſeſſion of Piedmont.

Thus terminated the campaign in Lombardy, which proved a moſt expenſive and fatal one to the Spaniards, whoſe miniſtry, to gratify the clamours of a diſcontented populace, cauſed the marquis de las Minas to be diſgraced and ſent into exile, to keep company with the duke de Montemar. The conduct of the prince of Conti, however, was univerſally applauded; and indeed with great juſtice; for during this whole campaign he had on every occaſion commanded like an experienced general, and fought like a valiant ſoldier. The French now took up their quarters in Dauphiné, the Spaniards reſumed theirs in Savoy; and his Sardinian majeſty cantoned his troops in Piedmont, returning himſelf to paſs the remainder of the winter at Turin.

Prince Lobkowitz continued to command in Italy, againſt the Spaniards and Neapolitans under the duke of Modena and count de Gages, who, with the remainder of their enfeebled army, conſiſting of only ten thouſand men, had taken up their winter-quarters in the neighbourhood of Fano, while the Auſtrians poſted themſelves at Rimini. The queen of Hungary had been perſuaded by the biſhop of Gurek, her ambaſſador at Rome, to attempt the conqueſt of Naples and Sicily, as the only means of indemnifying herſelf for the ceſſions ſhe had made by the treaty of Worms; and ſhe had actually declared war againſt the king of thoſe countries, who having renounced his neutrality, openly eſpouſed the cauſe of his father, ordered twenty-five thouſand of his own troops, under the duke de Vieuville, to join them; and, after ſending his queen and family to Gaieta, he ſet out to command them in chief himſelf. He then publiſhed a manifeſto in vindication of his conduct; in which he obſerved, that his moderation had not been properly valued by the courts of Vienna and London; that his frontiers were threatened with the calamities of war; and that the queen of Hungary had even formed a deſign to invade his dominions. This charge appears to have but too good foundation; the emiſſaries of the houſe of Auſtria had endeavoured to raiſe a rebellion in Naples, which prince Lobkowitz was ordered to favour by an invaſion. This general had quitted his cantonments at Rimini early in the ſpring, and began his march towards the Spaniards, who on his approach retired from their fortified paſſes on the Foglia, and departed from Peſaro in their retreat to the Neapolitan dominions. The Spaniſh general continued his retreat by Semigallia, and paſſed the river Tronto, which divides Naples from the Eccleſiaſtical State, taking poſt under under the cannon of Peſcara, a port-town in the province of Abruzzo, ſituate on the gulph of Venice, ninety miles north of Naples. Prince Lobkowitz did not immediately continue to purſue the Spaniards to the Neapolitan territories; but having received poſitive orders to penetrate into thoſe dominions, he proſecuted his march towards the Eccleſiaſtical State, and on the thirteenth of May the Auſtrian army arrived at Narni, within forty miles of Rome; and by the fifteenth was at Civita Caſtellana, within twenty-five miles of that city.

The army under count Gages was, by the juncture of the Neapolitans, become ſuperior to that of the Auſtrians; whereupon it was reſolved by his Sicilian majeſty, the duke of Modena, and the count, to advance to the neighbourhood of Rome, and check the progreſs of prince Lobkowitz. In purſuance of this determination, the combined army arrived in the Campagna di Roma, and on the twenty-ſecond of May poſted themſelves in an advantageous camp, on the eminences in the neighbourhood of Velletri, a town twenty miles eaſt of Rome, where they threw up entrenchments. Prince Lobkowitz, on his ſide, ſeized upon the riſing grounds oppoſite to the confederate camp, where he alſo entrenched himſelf; and both armies lay in ſight of each other for ſome time, without coming to any conſiderable action.

In the mean while, prince Lobkowitz detached a large body of forces under count Brown, who made an irruption into the province of Abruzzo, where he diſperſed a manifeſto, in which the queen of Hungary exhorted the Neapolitans to ſhake off the Spaniſh yoke, and return to their allegiance to the houſe of Auſtria. This ſtep, however, produced very little effect; and the Auſtrian detachment retired, at the approach of the duke of Vieuville with a ſuperior number of forces.

Prince Lobkowitz having received intelligence, on the tenth of Auguſt, that the flank of the Spaniſh camp, lying next to the plain, was negligently guarded, it incited him to form a deſign of ſurpriſing it, together with the town of Velletri, where the enemy had their head-quarters. Night being come, the Auſtrian general divided his army into three bodies, with which he intended to ſurround Velletri, and carry off his Sicilian majeſty and the duke of Modena. The better to cover his deſign, he ordered ſeveral falſe attacks to be made, in order to amuſe the enemy, and divert their attention from the place he had choſen for the important ſcene of action. Every thing ſucceeded to his wiſh. About midnight count Brown, at the head of ſix thouſand Auſtrians, having ſurpriſed and beaten the grand guard of the enemy behind Velletri, forced one of the gates and entered the town. The main guard were ſlain: thoſe who reſiſted were cut in pieces; and thoſe who made no reſiſtance were taken priſoners: in ſhort, terror and alarm were ſpread every-where. The king of Naples and the duke of Modena were very near being taken: the marquis de l'Hoſpital, ambaſſador from France to the court of Naples, had juſt time to awaken the king and the duke, who found an opportunity of eſcaping through the gardens to the village of Juliano, juſt before their apartments were entirely ſurrounded. The fire and the noiſe having rouſed the reſt of the Spaniſh and Neapolitan forces who were in Velletri, they flew to arms; an obſtinate engagement enſued; and count Brown, finding that his Sicilian majeſty and the duke of Modena had eſcaped, and were returning with count Gages and a ſtrong reinforcement to prevent his retreat, thought it moſt proper to retire, which he did in good order, taking with him all the baggage, plate, and furniture of his Sicilian majeſty and the duke of Modena, the French ambaſſador, and ſeveral other noblemen and officers of diſtinction: an immenſe booty! In their retreat the Auſtrians burnt the tents of the confederate camp behind Velletri. In this action the Spaniards are ſaid to have loſt two thouſand men, with eight hundred taken priſoners, together with ſome ſtandards and colours. The Auſtrians loſt about ſix hundred men; and general Novati, the ſecond in command, fell into the hands of the enemy: but the exploit was attended with no conſequence of importance.

The heats of the autumn proved ſo fatal to the Auſtrians, that prince Lobkowitz ſaw his army mouldering away, without any poſſibility of being recruited: the country, moreover, was ſo exhauſted, that he could with the utmoſt difficulty procure even common ſubſiſtence for his remaining troops. Theſe conſiderations determined him to think of a retreat. Accordingly, on the thirty-firſt of October he decamped ſuddenly to croſs the Tiber at Ponte Molle. Count de Gages was no ſooner informed that the Auſtrians were retreated, than he marched out with his whole army in purſuit of them. The Auſtrians marched under the walls of Rome, and on the 2d of November croſſed the Tiber, and broke down the bridges, though not ſo expeditiouſly but the confederate forces came up and attempted to do the ſame, which occaſioned a warm action, in which the Auſtrians loſt one hundred and twenty men, and the Spaniards about double that number. Seven hundred of the Auſtrian rear-guard were taken, with count Soto, who commanded them at Nocera; and the army of prince Lobkowitz ſuffered greatly by deſertion. Nevertheleſs, he continued his retreat in a very maſterly manner, croſſed the mountains of Gobbio, and arrived in the eſtates of Bologna and Romagna, when his highneſs was informed of the expulſion of the French and Spaniards out of the Piedmonteſe dominions, which occaſioned him to put his army in cantonments, and to fix his head-quarters at Imola, one hundred and eighty-two miles north-weſt of Rome; while count de Gages ſettled his in Terni, forty-ſix miles north-eaſt of Rome, and quartered his troops as far as Viterbo, determined to renew the next campaign with all poſſible vigour, and effect a junction with Don Philip.

The war in Germany, which had been almoſt extinguiſhed in the laſt campaign, began to revive, and raged with redoubled violence. All the conceſſions the emperor had offered to make were rejected; and the treaty of Worms diſpelled all hope of accommodation. The inflexibility of the houſe of Auſtria, however, proved in the end ſerviceable to the emperor. The forlorn condition of this unfortunate prince excited the compaſſion of divers princes: they could not behold without indignation the head of the empire ſtripped of his dominions, and reduced to live upon a precarious penſion, which was furniſhed him by France, and which was hardly ſufficient to procure him the neceſſaries of life. Theſe conſiderations, added to the intrigues of the court of Verſailles, brought about a German confederacy againſt the queen of Hungary; and on the eleventh of May a treaty of alliance and union was concluded at Frankfort between his Imperial majeſty, the king of Pruſſia, the elector-palatine, and the king of Sweden, as landgrave of Heſſe, reciting, that as in regard to the Auſtrian ſucceſſion things had been puſhed to ſuch an extremity as to endanger the total ſubverſion of the German empire; therefore the contracting parties, animated by a paternal affection for their dear country, as well as for the firm ſupport of the ſyſtem of the empire, had made between them an act for a binding and conſtant union, to the following purport:

"They agreed to employ their good offices, either to perſuade or compel the queen of Hungary to recognize the emperor's title, or reſtore his hereditary (Bavarian) dominions, and to give up the archives of the empire which were in her poſſeſſion. They guarantied to each other their reſpective territories; the diſputes about the ſucceſſion of the late emperor they referred to the deciſion of the ſtates of the empire: they promiſed to aſſiſt one another, in caſe of being attacked; and they invited the king of Poland, the elector of Cologne, and the biſhop of Liege, to accede to this convention." So far the treaty of Frankfort had a harmleſs tendency; and theſe were all the articles ever publiſhed by the contracting parties: but the court of Vienna afterwards publiſhed another ſeparate article, which they aſſerted was annexed to this treaty, and contained the great ſecret of this alliance. It imported, "That as there was but too good reaſon to believe, that the queen of Hungary could not be perſuaded by gentle means to conſent to a peace, according to the intent of the treaty, his majeſty the king of Pruſſia thought it indiſpenſibly neceſſary to have recourſe to ſtronger and more effectual methods; and as he was always deſirous of co-operating towards the pacification of Germany, he was, after the moſt mature reflection, firmly of opinion, that a ſhorter and more deciſive expedient could not be employed, than for him to promiſe and engage, as he did by the preſent article, to make an expedition towards conquering all Bohemia; to put his Imperial majeſty in poſſeſſion of that crown; and to guaranty it to him, his heirs, and ſucceſſors for ever: that, in return, his Imperial majeſty, touched with the moſt lively gratitude, did, for himſelf, his heirs and ſucceſſors, give up to his Pruſſian majeſty, irrevocably and for ever, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt authentic manner, the right which he had to the circle and town of Konigſgratz, and the circle of Buntzlau and Leutmeritz, ſo that the country ſituated between Sileſia and the river Elbe, and running from the town and circle of Konigſgratz to the confines of Saxony, ſhould belong to the king of Pruſſia, and that the courſe of the Elbe ſhould be the barrier of the two ſtates; but that the country which was ſituated on the other ſide of that river within Bohemia, ſhould remain to his Imperial majeſty, although it ſhould be appendant to the circles ceded to his Pruſſian majeſty, excepting the lordſhip and town of Partuwitz, and the town of Collin, which his Imperial majeſty did from that time give up to the king of Pruſſia. The two contracting parties farther agreed, that, after each ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of the reſpective territories mentioned in the article, they ſhould mutually guaranty them to each other for themſelves, their heirs, and ſucceſſors, for ever."

His Imperial majeſty publicly denied that there was ſuch, or any ſeparate article to the treaty of Frankfort; but the ſubſequent conduct of his Pruſſian majeſty, and the other confederating powers, ſhewed the queen of Hungary to be right in her aſſertion. The great object of this prince ſeems to have been to reconcile his conduct to his good underſtanding with his Britannic majeſty: with this view he publiſhed a manifeſto, which was extremely conciſe and well drawn up, and which was printed in the London Gazette, July 30, and was in ſubſtance as follows:

"That he could no longer remain an idle ſpectator of the troubles in Germany, but found himſelf obliged to make uſe of the force God had given him to reſtore the power of the laws, and the authority of the empire: that the queen of Hungary had treated the emperor's hereditary dominions with inexpreſſible cruelty: that Germany had been over-run with foreign troops, which had marched through neutral countries without making the uſual requiſitions: that the emperor's troops had been attacked under neutral fortreſſes, and obliged to abandon the empire, whereof their maſter was the head: that the imperial dignity had been treated with indecency by the Hungarian troops: that the queen, declaring the election of the emperor void, and the diet of Frankfort illegal, had not only violated the imperial dignity, but injured all the princes who had the right of election: that he had no particular quarrel with the queen of Hungary, and that he deſired nothing for himſelf, and only engaged in the war as an auxiliary for the liberties of Germany: that the emperor had offered to yield his pretenſions to the dominions of Auſtria, on condition that his hereditary countries ſhould be reſtored to him: that this propoſal had been made to the king of England at Hanau, and rejected in ſuch a manner as ſhewed the king of England had no intention to reſtore peace, but rather to make his advantage of the troubles: that the mediation of the Dutch had been deſired; but they had declined to interpoſe, knowing the inflexibility of the Engliſh and Auſtrian courts: that the ſame terms had been offered again at Vienna, and again rejected; and that therefore the queen muſt impute it to her own council that her enemies find new allies: that he was not fighting for any intereſt of his own: that he aſked nothing for himſelf, but was determined to exert all his power in defence of the emperor, in vindication of the rights of election, and in ſupport of the liberties of Germany, which the queen of Hungary would enſlave."

Such was the ſubſtance of this famous manifeſto, which was calculated with a view to induce the people and parliament of England to withdraw their aſſiſtance from her Hungarian majeſty: that this was the king of Pruſſia's intention, appeared more plainly from a reſcript which he ſent to M. Andrie, his ambaſſador at London; whereby he was ordered to declare to the Britiſh miniſtry the motives which obliged his maſter to ſupply the emperor with auxiliaries. This alſo was publiſhed in our news-papers; and the compoſition of of it plainly ſhews that his Pruſſian majeſty had acquired a perfect knowlege of the ſtate of parties in England.

In one part of it he expreſſes himſelf thus: "I hope, however, that no judicious Engliſhman, nor any Briton who is zealous for the conſtitution of his country, can poſſibly entertain the leaſt doubt with regard to the equity of my reſolution, of which he may eaſily convince himſelf, by barely tranſporting on the theatre of England what now paſſes on that of Germany: that as every true Engliſh patriot would look with indignation upon all ſuch intrigues as ſhould be carried on in his country towards making the now reigning family deſcend from the throne, in order to advance the pretender to it, and would oppoſe all ſuch practices to the utmoſt of his power; in like manner, there is no patriot or powerful prince of the empire, that can behold with indifference the preſent ſtate of the country, or can cooly ſuffer another member of the empire, ſuch as the queen of Hungary, to endeavour to ſpoil of his dignity and authority the emperor lawfully elected, in order to inveſt with that rank a candidate deſtitute of the qualifications which are moſt eſſential to fill the imperial throne. As, in conſequence of the ſame principle, no German prince has a right to meddle with the internal policy of Great Britain, nor the conſtitution of its government, I have ſome reaſon to hope that the Engliſh nation will not meddle with the affairs of the empire; and I entertain thoſe hopes the more confidently, becauſe England has no reaſon to interfere in this quarrel from any conſiderations of her trade or commerce: and although ſhe may have more regard for one German court than for another, yet I imagine ſhe will not pretend that ſuch powerful and reſpectable princes as thoſe of the empire ſhould be obliged to regulate their conduct according to the inclinations of thoſe among the Engliſh, who ſtrive to make their countrymen enter into foreign quarrels; in which England can have no manner of concern."

The emperor's health was at this time in a very declining condition, and the court of Vienna had formed a deſign, in the event of his death, of raiſing the grand duke, her Hungarian majeſty's conſort, to the imperial throne. The electors of Saxony, Mentz, and Cologn, ſeemed very well inclined to favour ſuch a project. Of all the princes of the empire, the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, was the moſt capable of affording aſſiſtance to her Hungarian majeſty. This prince, who at firſt had joined the king of Pruſſia againſt her, was now inclined to enter into an alliance with this princeſs againſt Pruſſia. In purſuing this meaſure, he did not intend to declare war againſt Frederic, but only to aſſiſt the queen in the ſame manner the States-general had joined with her againſt France, without declaring war againſt that crown. It did not appear that the elector of Saxony could have any great intereſt in making the queen of Hungary and the new houſe of Auſtria more powerful: nay, it rather ſeemed ſtrange that he ſhould chuſe to aggrandize that houſe than to raiſe himſelf upon its ruins: but a private pique betwixt him and the king of Pruſſia, the powerful negociations of England, the apprehenſion of the riſing grandeur of the houſe of Brandenburg, and the expectation of humbling it, produced a total alteration of maxims in the court of Dreſden.

As ſoon therefore as the king of Pruſſia had ſet his hand to the treaty of Frankfort with France and the emperor, the king of Poland ſigned an agreement privately with the queen of Hungary in the month of May, by which he promiſed to aſſiſt her with thirty thouſand men; and the queen yielded to him a part of Sileſia, which ſhe hoped to recover, and to which that prince pretended ſome ancient rights, as all the German princes have ſome pretenſions or other to the territories of their neighbours. On this occaſion, however, his Poliſh majeſty demanded a conſiderable ſubſidy; but it was thought unreaſonable that Great Britain ſhould load herſelf with the whole of the expence. Application was made to the States-general, who promiſed to contribute one third of the ſum; but the proportion was deemed too ſmall, and it was judged more equitable that the States ſhould pay two thirds of the ſubſidy.

While theſe tranſactions were in agitation, the king of France, ſecured of his influence in Germany by the potent confederacy he had brought about between the emperor, the king of Pruſſia, the elector Palatine, and the landgrave of Heſſe, no longer wore the mark of an auxiliary to the emperor, but having ſigned a declaration of war againſt the queen of Hungary, determined to make his firſt campaign in perſon in the Netherlands, where he had aſſembled a formidable army. He had appointed marſhal Coigni to defend the paſſage of the Rhine with ſixty-one battalions and one hundred ſquadrons; the Bavarian troops, conſiſting of near twelve thouſand men, and paid by France, were commanded by count Seckendorff, an officer in whom they at that time had the greateſt dependence. Marſhal Noailles was general of the army in Flanders, which conſiſted of ſixty-eight battalions and ninety-ſeven ſquadrons complete. Count Saxe was made marſhal of France, and commanded a ſeparate corps, compoſed of thirty-two battalions and fifty-two ſquadrons, alſo complete; thus the whole French army in Flanders amounted to above one hundred and twenty thouſand fighting men. The ſituation of the French, eſpecially in Flanders, was very different from what it had been the preceding year: the Engliſh might then have attacked the French frontiers with advantage, but now it was too late; and the Dutch, who refuſed to engage with us when the enterprize was eaſy, now took a ſhare in it, when it was become in a manner impracticable.

Lewis choſe rather to make his firſt campaign in Flanders than in Alſace, ſuppoſing that on the Rhine the war would only be defenſive; whereas every thing was diſpoſed for making it offenſive in the Auſtrian Netherlands. His army intended for this expedition aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Liſle, the capital of the French Netherlands, where the French monarch arrived on the firſt of May, attended by marſhal Noailles, count Saxe, count Clermont, and many other officers of diſtinction. On the fourth his majeſty reviewed his forces, and made ſome new regulations for the eſtabliſhment of military diſcipline; a thing difficult to maintain, and at that time greatly wanted.

Two days after the arrival of the French king at Liſle, the confederate army took the field, amounting to twenty-two thouſand Engliſh, ſixteen thouſand Hanoverians, eighteen thouſand Auſtrians, and twenty thouſand Dutch; in all, ſeventy-ſix thouſand men, if the reſpective quotas, which were greatly deficient, had been complete: theſe troops formed an encampment in the neighbourhood of Bruſſels. The Engliſh and Hanoverians were commanded by general Wade, an old officer, who had been bred up under the great duke of Marlborough, and was well acquainted with every part of Flanders, where he had ſerved a great many campaigns. The duke of Aremberg, of the houſe of Ligue, governor of Mons, and grand bailiff of Hainault, had the command of the queen of Hungary's troops: he was trained up under prince Eugene, had ſerved againſt the Turks and French, and was not a little inſtrumental to the ſucceſs of the battles of Belgrade and Dettingen; in both which he was wounded at the head of his troops. Count Maurice of Naſſau, who commanded the Dutch, was a deſcendant of the celebrated prince Maurice of Naſſau, one of the three brothers to whom the United Provinces were indebted for their liberty and greatneſs.

Theſe three generals certainly had it in their power to oppoſe the deſigns of Lewis; but the Dutch were, as uſual, temporizing and negociating. On the one hand, they were ſtrongly preſſed by the Engliſh to fulfil the treaty of alliance concluded between them in 1678, by which they are mutually bound to declare war within the ſpace of two months againſt any power that ſhould attack either of the two nations. On the other hand, they flattered themſelves with keeping the appearances of neutrality, even in the midſt of war itſelf, and were arming againſt France at the very time they were afraid of provoking that crown. In this dilemma, they deputed count de Waſſenaer to Lewis, expreſſing their apprehenſions at the warlike preparations his majeſty was making in the neighbourhood of their ſtates, and intreating him to deſiſt from any deſign of attacking their barrier. Their remonſtrances, however, produced no effect, and their requeſt was diſregarded. The French king told the Dutch miniſter, that as his moderation had hitherto ſerved to no other purpoſe than that of rendering his enemies more untractable, he was determined to proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigour.

Accordingly, on the eighteenth of May he made himſelf maſter of Courtray, a ſmall town, which had an Auſtrian garriſon. The day following the Dutch ambaſſador ſaw him inveſt Menin, one of their barrier towns, defended by the troops of the republic, to the number of fifteen hundred men, commanded by the baron d'Echteren. Menin, though one of the moſt regular and moſt tenable fortreſſes in the Netherlands, being one of the celebrated Vauban's maſterpieces, was compelled to ſurrender in four days, the French loſing forty men only in the reduction; whereas the ſame place had coſt the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene nineteen days, and at leaſt four thouſand men. Before the ſurrender of Menin, a detachment of thirty thouſand French, commanded by count Clermont, grandſon of the great Condé, had inveſted Ypres, where the prince of Heſſe-Philipſthal commanded a garriſon of two thouſand five hundred men. The trenches were opened on the firſt of June, when the king and marſhal Noailles arrived in the camp. The garriſon made a gallant defence; but upon the twelfth, at night, the French carried the covered way; upon which the lower town was abandoned, and on the fourteenth Ypres capitulated. In the ſeveral attacks the beſiegers loſt about three thouſand ſix hundred men, and the garriſon had about three hundred killed and wounded. This conqueſt, however, was cheaply purchaſed on the ſide of the French, as it brought them into poſſeſſion of the whole chatellany, comprehending the towns of Mont Caſſel, Baileul, Rouſſelaer, Poperingen, Warneton, Commines, and Houaric.

Every moment was now improved; for whilſt the French king's troops were taking poſſeſſion of Ypres, the duke of Boufflers reduced fort Knock, where baron de Hompeſch commanded a Dutch garriſon of one thouſand men, who ſurrendered on the ſeventeenth of June upon honourable conditions. On the twenty-eighth count Clermont laid ſiege to Furnes, which capitulated the fifth day after opening the trenches.

The allied army beheld the progreſs of the French without being able to oppoſe it. Marſhal Saxe, with an army of obſervation, conſiſting of twenty battalions and twenty-eight ſquadrons, lay poſted behind the Lys, between Ghent and Courtray, in ſo advantageous a manner as to be able to prevent any attempt of the confederates, and to facilitate the operations of the beſiegers; while the duke d'Harcourt commanded a flying camp of ſix thouſand men on the one ſide of Maubeuge, in the province of Hainault. While Furnes was inveſted, the French monarch made his public entry into Dunkirk, where he continued for ſome time, highly elated with the ſucceſs of this his firſt campaign. He had taken ſuch precautions for the ſecurity of Alſace, which was defended by Coigni and Seckendorff, with two conſiderable armies under their command, that he thought he had nothing to fear from the Auſtrians in that quarter: beſides, he had by this time received intelligence that the king of Pruſſia had made an irruption into Bohemia, ſo that he reſolved to proſecute his conqueſts in the Netherlands.

All theſe towering projects, however, were on a ſudden diſconcerted, by advice that prince Charles of Lorraine, after joining the Auſtrian army aſſembled under count Traun, near Hailbron, in the circle of Suabia, had paſſed the Rhine in the neighbourhood of Spire, within ſight of the French and Bavarians; that Alſace was invaded, and the frontiers of Lorraine. At firſt this intelligence met with no credit; but nothing was more certain. Prince Charles, by alarming the French in ſeveral places, and making different attempts at one and the ſame time, at length ſucceeded on the ſide where count Seckendorff was poſted, who commanded the Bavarians, Palatines, and Heſſians. Thus the Auſtrian army, conſiſting of ſeventy-two thouſand effective men, entered Alſace without the leaſt oppoſition: they immediately made themſelves maſters of Lautemberg, a poſt of no great ſtrength, but of the utmoſt importance. This paſſage of the Rhine, which did ſuch honour to prince Charles, was entirely owing to his diligence, and the negligence of the general of the Bavarian troops, whom marſhal Coigni was obliged to intruſt to guard the banks of the river towards Gemerſheim and Roſanbeau. Seckendorff undertook to defend them; and this was the very place where prince Charles effected his paſſage in the latter end of June.

Marſhal Coigni, whoſe army extended along the Rhine, now ſaw, with equal ſurprize and indignation, that his communication with France was cut off; that Alſace, the country of Metz and Lorraine, were on the point of falling a prey to the Auſtrians: in fine, that there was no other reſource left but to cut his way through the enemy, in order to re-enter Alſace, and cover the country. Having reſolved upon this meaſure, he inſtantly ſet out with the greateſt part of his army for Weiſſemberg, of which an advanced body of the enemy, under general Nadaſti, had taken poſſeſſion. After a bloody engagement, the French retook Weiſſemberg and the lines; but they were ſoon obliged, upon the arrival of prince Charles with his whole army, to retire towards Haguenau, which they were likewiſe forced to abandon. Flying parties of the enemy laid all the country of Lower Alſace under contribution, and ſpread terror even to the borders of Lorraine, and king Staniſlaus was obliged to quit that country with his whole court.

When the French king received this news at Dunkirk, he did not heſitate a moment concerning the part he had to take: he reſolved to interrupt the courſe of his victories in Flanders; and leaving marſhal Saxe with forty thouſand men to preſerve his new acquiſitions, to fly himſelf to the aſſiſtance of Alſace. After having cauſed M. Noailles to ſet out before him, he ſent the duke de Harcourt with a body of troops to guard the paſs of Phalſburg, and prepared to march himſelf for the Rhine, at the head of twenty-ſix battalions and thirty three ſquadrons. He ſet out from Dunkirk on the nineteenth of July, and on the fourth of Auguſt arrived at Metz, the capital of Lorraine, where he made a magnificent entry. Here he received tidings of an event which changed the whole face of affairs, obliged prince Charles to repaſs the Rhine, reſtored the emperor to his dominions, and reduced the queen of Hungary to a more dangerous ſituation, if poſſible, than any ſhe had yet been in.

The king of Pruſſia thinking his manifeſtos and reſcripts had given a ſufficient ſanction for the renovation of hoſtilities on his part, reſolved to make an irruption into Bohemia, conformable to the propoſitions of the court of Verſailles, whenever prince Charles ſhould appear too formidable on the Rhine. Although there were then in Saxony no leſs than forty thouſand regular forces, yet his Pruſſian majeſty ſeems to have had ſo contemptible an opinion of their valour or diſcipline, that he choſe to make his invaſion of Bohemia through that electorate, which he entered at the head of eighty-four thouſand men in the month of July, attended by a formidable train of artillery, having under him in the command the prince of Anhalt-Deſſau and marſhal Schwerin. The Saxons ſuffered him to march unmoleſted. At the ſame time general Marwitz, with a ſeparate body of twenty thouſand Pruſſians, advanced thro' Sileſia into Moravia; and though the Auſtrians had taken all poſſible care to retard the progreſs of both armies, by deſtroying the roads, bridges, and proviſions, the Pruſſians ſoon made themſelves maſters of Pardubitz and Podiebrad.

The two armies having joined on the frontiers of Bohemia, his Pruſſian majeſty entered that kingdom on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt; and having taken up his head-quarters at Peterſwald, he publiſhed a proclamation, which was diſperſed through the country, importing, "That he had entered that kingdom as an auxiliary to the emperor, and with a view to reſtore the authority of that prince, the conſtitution of the empire, and the peace of Germany. He promiſed protection to all the Bohemians who ſhould behave quietly and inoffenſively, and deliver up their arms; but threatened thoſe who ſhould reſiſt his army, which he affected to call the imperial auxiliary army, with all the rigours of military execution."

The king of Pruſſia, after the diſperſing of this proclamation, continued his march, and made ſuch rapid progreſs, that on the ſecond of September he inveſted Prague, though his heavy artillery was not yet come up, and actually made himſelf maſter of ſome of the advanced poſts. His artillery was, in the mean time, attacked by a detachment of Auſtrians, commanded by count Bathiani, who defeated the convoy; but the king having detached a party to recover it, the Auſtrians fled, and left them maſters of the cannon. The next ſtep his majeſty took was to cut off all communication between the city and count Bathiani's army, which was effected after a bloody ſkirmiſh, wherein the Pruſſians gained the advantage. The outworks of Prague were now attacked, and carried without much oppoſition: in a word, after the new and old towns, and the Jews town, were partly reduced to aſhes, general Ogilvy the governor once more ſurrendered the city (on the tenth day of its ſiege) with fifteen thouſand men in the garriſon, who were taken priſoners of war. Prince Frederic-William, the king's couſin, was killed at the firſt general attack, which was made in four different places.

As ſoon as the king had made himſelf maſter of Prague, wherein he put a garriſon of ſix thouſand men, he marched to Tabor, and took the towns of Budweis and Teyn, with the caſtle of Frauenberg, wherein was a conſiderable garriſon, who were made priſoners of war. There was now nothing to oppoſe him in Bohemia. Moravia was at the ſame time invaded: one French army was returning into Germany, whilſt another was victorious in Italy. Every one now imagined the king of Pruſſia would march to Vienna, preſcribe laws to the queen of Hungary, and terminate the war by a diviſion of the Auſtrian dominions.

But the victor found it more eaſy to make conqueſts than to retain them. The court of Vienna, immediately upon the irruption of the Pruſſians into Bohemia, had ſent expreſs orders to prince Charles to repaſs the Rhine, and haſten to the ſuccour of that diſtreſſed country. The marſhals Noailles and Belleiſle had been ſucceſſively ſent by the French king to reinforce marſhal Coigni, who thereby became ſuperior to the Auſtrians under prince Charles. A dangerous fever which ſeized the French king ſoon after his arrival at Metz, and which brought him to death's door, had prevented him from conducting his troops in perſon; and marſhal Noailles, to whom the command in Alſace now devolved in right of ſeniority, ſuffered prince Charles to repaſs the Rhine with very little moleſtation, although much ſuperior to him in numbers. He then marched to the Danube, laid the Upper Palatinate under contribution, and entering Bohemia, joined the troops under Bathiani. The king of Pruſſia complained moſt bitterly againſt the French generals for letting an enemy eſcape who was coming to wreak his vengeance upon one of their allies. By this time alſo the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, had openly declared in favour of her Hungarian majeſty; and prince Charles of Lorraine had the ſatisfaction to find himſelf reinforced by twenty thouſand Saxon troops, under the command of the duke of Saxe-Weiſſenfels, by which he was rendered ſuperior to his Pruſſian majeſty, whom he determined to attack. That monarch, however, retired before him, and the Pruſſians ſucceſſively evacuated the different poſts which conducted to Prague, and were in the end forced to evacuate that capital itſelf. After having diſputed the paſſage of the Elbe, the king gave orders for the garriſon, compoſed of eleven thouſand men, to quit the town, which they did on the nineteenth of November, leaving behind them their magazines and heavy artillery, among which were ſeven remarkable fine pieces of cannon, called the Seven Electors. The Pruſſians carried with them their field artillery, and a great number of waggons laden with ſtores and contributions; but the Auſtrians and Saxons harraſſing them in their march, great part of them fell into their hands, ſo that the king's troops were almoſt naked, and in great want of proviſions and neceſſaries. At length, having gained Sileſia, his Pruſſian majeſty diſtributed his army into winter quarters, and he himſelf returned to Berlin, extremely mortified at the iſſue of the campaign.

During theſe tranſactions, count Seckendoff advanced into Bavaria at the head of a ſtrong army, compelled the Auſtrians under general Bernklau to abandon that electorate, and the emperor once more entered his capital city of Munich on the 22d day of October. His Imperial majeſty on the third of November appeared before Paſſau, and ſummoned cardinal Lamberg, the biſhop, to admit a neutral garriſon; but the prelate anſwered, that as the Auſtrians were in poſſeſſion, it was not in his power to accede to the propoſal: therefore his Imperial majeſty, finding the ſeaſon too far advanced to think of beſieging ſuch ſtrong places as Paſſau and Ingoldſtadt, and that general Bernklau had received a ſtrong reinforcement out of Bohemia, diſperſed his troops into winter-quarters as far as the Upper Palatinate, and returned to Munich on the ſeventeenth of December, with the ſatisfaction of ſeeing himſelf ſecurely reinſtated in his electoral dominions; a ſatisfaction, however, which he did not long live to enjoy.

General Bernklau did not follow the example of the Imperialiſts in retiring into winter-quarters; but being joined by general Thungen with a large reinforcement from Bohemia, he ſuddenly changed the face of affairs in Bavaria, ſeizing upon the greateſt part of the Upper Palatinate. He alſo fortified and ſtrongly garriſoned Stadt-am-hoff, a place of great importance for ſecuring his quarters along the Danube. This general alſo, on the twentieth of December, inveſted Newmarck in the Upper Palatinate, where was a garriſon of two thouſand French and Imperialiſts, commanded by the marquis de Cruſſol, who, after a little reſiſtance, ſurrendered the town, and his men priſoners of war. Hemen and Amberg next capitulated, by which the Auſtrians were now in poſſeſſion of the whole Palatinate, where they remained quiet till the approaching ſpring again enabled them to reſume their operations.

While count Seckendorff was on his march in Bavaria, the French marſhals Noailles, Belleiſle, and Coigni, at the head of eighty thouſand men, entered the Auſtrian dominions in the circle of Suabia, where moſt of the places belonging to the queen of Hungary ſubmitted, and on the twenty-firſt of September the French inveſted the ſtrong and important city of Friburg, for which they had made the moſt formidable preparations. This city is capital of the territory of Briſgau, oppoſite to the Upper Alſace, ſituate twenty-eight miles ſouth of Straſburg, and the ſame diſtance north from Baſil, and was taken by marſhal Villars in 1712, without any conſiderable reſiſtance; but the French at this time expected an obſtinate ſiege, from the known valour and abilities of general Damnitz, who commanded in the place with a garriſon of five thouſand veteran troops, well provided with every thing for maintaining a vigorous defence. The French monarch having recovered from his illneſs, which had ſo long confined him at Metz in Lorraine, ſet out from thence in the beginning of October; and having in his way made a public entry into Straſburg, where his reception was one of the moſt magnificent ever beheld, he arrived in the camp before Friburg on the eleventh, where his majeſty was attended by the marſhals Noailles, Maillebois, Coigni, and Belleiſle, marſhal Schmettan the Pruſſian envoy, and the Saxon and Palatine miniſters. Some little time before his arrival, Lewis had the good fortune to engage in his ſervice, as a lieutenant-general, as great a genius in the art of beſieging fortifications, as any that modern times have produced. This was the famous count Lowendahl, to whoſe intrepidity and ſkill the taking of the place was chiefly owing. General Damnitz made a gallant defence, diſputing every inch of ground; and by his continual fire, frequent ſallies, and the ſpringing a great number of mines, made a terrible havock among the beſiegers, who now, animated by the preſence of their ſovereign, redoubled their efforts with incredible fury; and their bombs, of which they had thrown no leſs than eleven thouſand into the city, having reduced it to one common heap of ruins, the brave Damnitz was at length obliged to think of capitulating; and on the ſixth day of November hung out a white flag, and went in perſon to the French camp, to treat with the king about the ſurrender of the city, and had liberty to retire to the caſtles, the governors of which were to have a reaſonable time for knowing the ſentiments of her Hungarian majeſty, whether they ſhould capitulate likewiſe, or hold out. The anſwer was for the latter; in conſequence of which a freſh ſiege was begun, which continued till the twenty-eighth of November, when the garriſon were obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. In this remarkable ſiege, which, to ſay the truth, demonſtrated the French to be inferior to no nation in the world for power and courage, they loſt upwards of eighteen thouſand men. They found in the city and forts two hundred braſs and one hundred iron cannon, ſeventy field-pieces, two hundred hundred mortars, and all other military ſtores in proportion. This conqueſt terminated the campaign in Germany. The French army was cantoned along the banks of the Rhine, under the command of marſhal Maillebois, and Lewis returned to Verſailles, where he was received by his people with a degree of joy and homage approaching to adoration.

I have already obſerved, that the ſituation of the French army in the Netherlands had for ſome time prevented the confederates from undertaking any thing of importance; but after the departure of the French troops for Alſace, count Saxe had only fifty-eight thouſand men in the field, and twenty-two thouſand in the garriſons, while the allies were augmented to ninety-four thouſand men. The confederate generals finding their ſuperiority, quitted their encampment, paſſed the Schelde on the twentieth, and advanced to Helchin, with an intention to draw count Saxe to an engagement; who, inſtead of accepting the offer, kept cloſe in the ſtrong entrenchments he had thrown up behind the Lys. The allies finding that they could not, with any proſpect of ſucceſs, attempt to attack him in this ſituation, filed off in ſight of Tournay, and on the eighth of Auguſt encamped within four miles of Liſle, where they foraged unmoleſted for ſeveral days, and laid the open country under contribution; but they made no attempt upon Liſle itſelf, which in all probability would have ſubmitted at the firſt ſummons, had they attacked it immediately on their approach, for then it had no other garriſon than two or three battalions of militia; but count Saxe ſoon threw in ſo conſiderable a reinforcement as effectually to ſecure this important place. The conduct of the confederate generals was ſeverely cenſured in England, and ſerved as a matter of ridicule to the enemy. The truth is, that the Engliſh general, Wade, was ſuperannuated; his partner in command, the duke of Aremberg, is ſaid to have been unwilling to give umbrage to the French king, great part of his fortune lying within the territory of Liſle, where they were now encamped; the Dutch were averſe to any bold enterprize; and the train of artillery was by ſome fatality retarded, and lay at Oſtend. Add to this, that Wade and Aremberg were divided in their opinions, entertained an inveterate hatred and animoſity againſt each other, and ſtudiouſly avoided all manner of intercourſe. In fine, after having remained ſome time in ſight of Liſle, the confederates returned to their former camp on the Schelde, from whence they went into winter-quarters in the month of October; and count Saxe followed their example, having firſt abandoned Courtray, where he had demoliſhed the fortifications. He afterwards ſent a numerous body of his troops to aſſiſt in repairing the fortifications of Dunkirk, and alſo to fortify the ſluice at Mardyke.

After the engagement off Toulon, nothing of importance was performed by the Britiſh ſquadron in the Mediterranean; and indeed the naval power of Great Britain was, during this ſummer, altogether inactive. We ſhall therefore attend a naval operation of the Engliſh in the other hemiſphere, which is perhaps the moſt ſingular of any that hiſtory can produce. Mention has already been made of commodore Anſon's deſtination with a ſmall ſquadron in the autumn of the year 1740 to the South Seas, in order to diſtreſs the enemy there; and we conducted him as far as Port St. Julian, on the coaſt of Patagonia, where he arrived in the month of January 1741 *, reſerving the narrative of the reſt of his atchievements to this year, in which, on the fifteenth day of June, he returned from his voyage of three years and nine months, after having made the circuit of the terraqueous globe.

The ſecret of this expedition to the South Seas appears to have been ſo ill kept, that the Spaniards were appriſed of all the particulars concerning it, long before it ſailed from England; and had fitted out a ſquadron of five ſail of the line and two frigates, under the command of admiral Don Joſeph Pizarro, on purpoſe to defeat it. Had this fleet, which was every way ſuperior to Mr. Anſon, been able to have performed its voyage, the ſucceſs of that officer might have been very indifferent; but by various accidents, the whole of the Spaniſh armament was reduced to one ſixty-ſix gun ſhip, which was at length obliged to return to Europe.

While the commodore was in the bay of St. Julian he held a council of war, wherein he fixed the plan of his future operations; and after having coaſted along the cold and deſart country of Patagonia, he entered the Streights of Le Maire about the end of February 1741: but here the commodore loſt ſight of the Pearl and Severn, two of his great ſhips, and never ſaw them more during his voyage; they having been unable to weather Cape Horn, returned to Europe, having firſt been refitted at Rio de Janeiro in Brazil: in ſhort, the commodore now ſaw his whole ſtrength reduced (to uſe the words of the relator of the voyage) to a couple of ſhattered, half-manned cruizers, and a ſloop, ſo far diſabled, that in many climates they ſcarcely durſt have put to ſea. It was the thirtieth of November before the commodore completed his paſſage round Cape Horn, after ſurmounting difficulties which affect us with horror in the very relation. Upon doubling the Cape, his little ſquadron was again ſhattered and diſperſed by violent tempeſts; one half of the men periſhed aboard by an inveterate ſcurvy; the commodore's ſhip being ſeparated from the reſt, put into the iſland of Juan Fernandez † on the ninth of June, where they were afterwards joined by the Trial ſloop and the Glouceſter, three of his own ſhips being yet miſſing: the Anna Pink came in about the middle of Auguſt, and Mr. Anſon ſent the Trial ſloop to Mala Fuera, about twenty-two leagues to the weſt of Juan Fernandez, in queſt of the miſſing ſhips, but to no purpoſe. In the mean time, the people who were landed on the iſland recovered ſurprizingly; and nothing was omitted by the commodore that could contribute to their health, ſecurity, or accommodation for the future part of their voyage.

† Fernandez, or Juan Fernandez, is a ſmall uninhabited iſland of Chili, in South America, lying in the Pacific Ocean, three hundred miles weſt of St. Jago, viſited by all European ſhips that go into the South Seas, on account of its harbour, the fruits, herbs, and other proviſions to be met with on it. The editor of Lord Anſon's Voyage places this iſland in the latitude of 33 degrees 40 minutes ſouth, and 110 leagues weſt from the continent of Chili.

We have already obſerved that the Severn and Pearl were parted from the ſquadron; the Wager, a twenty gun ſhip, captain Cheap, had come with the commodore into the South Seas, but had been ſeparated from him in one of thoſe dreadful ſtorms the ſquadron had encountered, and was unfortunately wrecked on the deſolate iſland of Socoro; but the crew, to the number of one hundred, were all of them ſaved. Imagining, however, that the authority of their officers had determined with the loſs of the ſhip, they began to mutiny; and having confined the captain, and converted the long-boat into a ſchooner, eighty of them actually ſet ſail for Rio Grande on the coaſt of Brazil, where, after their number had been more than one half diminiſhed by ſickneſs, they at laſt arrived, in the month of January 1742. Cheap, with the ſmall number who remained behind, found means to be conveyed to Chiloe, from thence to Valparaiſo, and afterwards to St. Jago, the capital of Chili: there they continued upwards of a year, till at length a cartel being ſettled between the two nations, they were permitted to return to their own country.

Mr. Anſon had now with him the Centurion, the Glouceſter, the Trial ſloop, and the Anna Pink, which latter was loaded with proviſions; and the ſurviving hands being perfectly recovered, he put to ſea on the eighth of September, and took ſeveral conſiderable prizes in cruiſing near the iſland of Fernandez: but having ſoon after advanced towards the equator, he ventured to attack the city of Paita, upon the ſame coaſt of America, where he had learned from the priſoners taken on board one of his prizes, that a large ſum of money was at that very time lodged in the cuſtom-houſe, belonging to the Spaniſh merchants, and intended to be ſhipped on board a veſſel then in that port. In executing this bold and hazardous enterprize, he neither made uſe of his ſhips nor of the land forces on board them, but ſent no more than fifty-eight of his own ſeamen, commanded by his lieutenant, Mr. (ſince ſir Piercy) Brett. Theſe were ordered into boats, and taking advantage of the night, landed unperceived. The ſudden ſurprize, the confuſion, and the darkneſs, added to the ſhout the ſailors ſet up on entering the town, ſpread univerſal terror through the inhabitants, who, with their governor, abandoned the place with the utmoſt precipitation, thinking a whole army was at their heels. In the mean time the Engliſh, without being moleſted, carried off the treaſures which they found in the cuſtom-houſe and private dwellings. Mr. Anſon then cauſed the town to be ſet on fire, which was quickly conſumed. The loſs which the Spaniards ſuſtained by this expedition was much greater than the advantage the Engliſh made, for it amounted to about a million and an half of dollars; but the booty of the Engliſh did not exceed forty thouſand pounds.

Having thus plundered the Spaniards with as much eaſe as they in paſt ages had plundered the Americans, the commodore now prepared to ſail with all expedition to the ſouthern parts of California, or to the adjacent coaſt of Mexico, there to cruize for the Manilla galleon, which he knew was then at ſea, bound for the port of Acapulco, there to convert her lading into treaſure. It was then about the middle of November, and the galleon did not uſually arrive at Acapulco till the end of January. By croſs winds and bad weather it was the nineteenth of February, 1742, before the Engliſh ſquadron arrived off Acapulco, which lies at the beach of Mexico. The court of Madrid was not then aware of the riſk it ran of loſing that vaſt region of the world. Had admiral Vernon, who beſieged Carthagena upon the oppoſite ſea, ſucceeded, he might have aſſiſted Mr. Anſon, which was eaſy to be done over the Iſthmus of Darien. Thus Panama would have been taken by the Engliſh both upon the right and left, and the Spaniards deprived of the very center of their American dominions.

The commodore, on his arrival off Acapulco, had the diſagreeable intelligence that the Manilla ſhip had anchored in that harbour on the ninth day of January; that ſhe had converted her cargo into money, and was to have ſailed again on the fourteenth of March; but that, upon his ſquadron having been diſcovered by the Spaniards, the governor of Acapulco had countermanded her departure for that ſeaſon.

The commodore had now a moſt unfortunate proſpect; the rainy ſeaſon approached, and he had nothing left but to croſs the vaſt Pacific Ocean for the river Canton in China. The Trial was now grown ſo leaky that ſhe was no longer able to ſwim, and was therefore ſcuttled and ſunk, as were the prizes which had been taken, and the crews were put on board the Glouceſter and Centurion. With theſe two only remaining ſhips (the Anne ſtore-ſhip having been diſcharged and ſent home) the commodore ſtretched away for the river Canton, which he was in hopes of reaching in about two months; but the elements ſtill continued his implacable adverſaries. To add to his diſtreſs, the Glouceſter ſprung an irreparable leak at ſea, and the commodore was obliged to take her crew into the Centurion, and burn her. This laſt named ſhip was now the only one that was left of his whole ſquadron, and ſhe was in a moſt ſhattered condition. Incredible were the miſeries and hardſhips Mr. Anſon and his crew ſuffered from the leakineſs of their veſſel, and the ſcorbutic diſorder which raged amongſt them with the moſt alarming violence. At laſt, towards the end of Auguſt, they fortunately made one of the Marian or Ladrone iſlands *, called Tinian, which was at that time quite uninhabited. Not long before, it contained no leſs than thirty thouſand ſouls; but the greateſt part of the inhabitants had been ſwept away by an epidemic diſeaſe, and the ſurvivors had been removed to Guam, another iſland, by the Spaniards. Here, upon muſtering the whole of their able hands, including ſome negroes and Indian priſoners, they amounted to no more than ſeventy-one.

* Theſe iſlands, ſituate in the Pacific Ocean or South Sea, were firſt diſcovered by Ferdinand Magellan, a Portugueze, whom the emperor Charles V. and the king of Spain employed to diſcover a weſtern paſſage to the Eaſt Indies, on the ſixth of March, 1520; when touching at the iſle of Guam, one of the moſt ſoutherly of theſe iſlands, for water and freſh proviſions, the natives pilfered ſome of his goods, whence he called them the Ladrones, or Thieviſh Iſlands. Guam lying in the tract to the Philippines and Eaſt Indies, is ſtill the moſt frequented by the European nations; and here the Spaniards have a little fort, with a garriſon of thirty men. It is about forty miles in length, and ten in breadth.

The whole crew owed its preſervation to this iſland, which, according to the account publiſhed in Mr. Anſon's Voyage, was the moſt delicious ſpot imagination can form. It ſurpaſſed Juan Fernandez in fertility, abounded on all ſides with woods, ſprings, and rivulets, tame animals, fruits, pulſe, and every thing neceſſary for food, the conveniences of life, and for refitting the veſſel: but the moſt extraordinary thing found there was a ſort of tree, the taſte of whoſe fruit reſembled that of the beſt bread: a real treaſure to perſons in their condition!

It was the middle of October before the commodore was in a condition to put to ſea again; and on the 12th of November, after a great variety of other adventures, too numerous to be inſerted here, he arrived at Macao, which is a Portugueze ſettlement, ſituate in an iſland at the entrance of the river of Canton, but entirely under the power of the Chineſe. Here he had an opportunity of maintaining the honour of his country, by refuſing to pay the impoſts exacted by the emperor of China from all foreign ſhips. He inſiſted that no Britiſh ſhip of war was ſubject to them. His coolneſs and intrepidity ſtaggered the Chineſe. The viceroy of Canton granted him an audience, to which he was conducted through two ranks of ſoldiers, to the number of ten thouſand; after which the viceroy gave orders for his ſhip to be hove down, refitted, and furniſhed with proviſions and ſtores, to enable him to proceed to England.

By the fifteenth of April, 1743, his ſhip was in a condition to put to ſea; and having taken on board ſome Laſcars, or Indian ſailors, and ſome Dutch, whom he thought might be uſeful to him, he ſet ſail with a full determination to go in ſearch of the Manila ſhip or ſhips, which he had reaſon to believe were at this ſeaſon of the year returning from Acapulco. By the laſt of May the Centurion arrived off Cape Eſpiritu Santo, on the iſland of Samal, in the direct tract of the Manila ſhip. At length, upon the twentieth of June, the ſo much wiſhed-for veſſel was deſcried. This ſhip, called the Noſtra Senhora de Cabadonga, was mounted with forty guns; and the treaſure, with other effects on board, amounted to three hundred and thirteen thouſand pounds ſterling. The Centurion, though mounting ſixty guns, had but two hundred and twenty-ſeven men on board. The captain of the galleon choſe rather to venture the loſs of the treaſure than forfeit his reputation by flying from an enemy. Accordingly, an engagement enſued, in which the reſolution and ſkill of the Engliſh overbalanced all the ſuperiority of the Spaniards; and the galleon ſtruck, and ſurrendered into the commodore's hands, after having ſixty-ſeven men killed and eighty-four wounded; while the Centurion loſt only two men, and had one lieutenant and ſixteen hands wounded. The conqueror returned with this rich prize to Canton, where, after having refitted his ſhip, and ſupplied himſelf with all the neceſſaries of which he ſtood in need, he prepared to return to his native country, to taſte the ſweet reward of all his toils and labour. Before his departure from Canton, he ſold the hulk of the galleon to the merchants of Macao. On the eleventh of March, 1744, he arrived at the Cape of Good Hope; and having, by favour of a fog, unknown to himſelf, run through a fleet of French ſhips, he arrived ſafely at Spithead in the month of June, from whence his treaſure was brought up in great triumph to London, attended by thoſe brave ſeamen who had ſo well merited, by their unparalleled ſufferings and perſeverance, the ſhare they were entitled to in it.

There yet remain to be noticed ſome other naval tranſactions of the year 1744. The Mediterranean fleet being in the utmoſt neceſſity for ſtores and proviſions, a conſiderable number of veſſels, laden with theſe articles, were ordered to be convoyed thither by ſir Charles Hardy, vice-admiral of the red, with a ſquadron of eleven ſhips of the line, and one bomb-ketch. The vice-admiral, with the ſtore ſhips, ſet ſail from St. Helen's on the eighteenth of April, and conducted his convoy to Liſbon, where he was detained a conſiderable time by a ſquadron of fourteen ſail of the line and ſix frigates, ſent from Breſt for that purpoſe, commandmanded by M. Rochambault, who cruized off the Rock of Liſbon to intercept ſir Charles, in caſe he ſhould attempt to put to ſea. As ſoon as this was known to the Britiſh miniſtry, they ordered ſir John Balchen, who commanded a large fleet at Spithead, having under him vice-admiral Martin and vice-admiral Stewart, to ſail with the firſt favourable wind, and proceed in queſt of the Breſt ſquadron, to diſengage ſir Charles Hardy from his detention at Liſbon. While ſir John was putting himſelf in a condition to obey theſe orders, he was reinforced by the Dutch ſquadron of twenty men of war, commanded by admiral Bacchereſt, which their High Mightineſſes had at length conſented to ſend, in conſequence of his Britannic majeſty's repeated requiſition, and agreeable to the treaty of 1697. On the ſeventh of Auguſt the combined fleets ſailed from Spithead, to the number of twenty-one ſail of the line (a proper number being left behind for the Channel and port ſervice) and on the ninth of September caſt anchor off the Rock of Liſbon. Monſieur Rochambault, the French commandant, upon receiving intelligence that the combined fleets were arrived on the coaſt, and were ſo much ſuperior to him in force, thought proper to retire, and leave the ſea entirely open to them. By this means ſir Charles Hardy was at liberty to proceed according to his deſtination; but admiral Balchen, after having thus performed the duty he was ſent upon, and being upon his return home, was, on the third of October, overtaken in the Bay of Biſcay with a violent ſtorm of wind, in which his own ſhip, the Victory, of one hundred and ten guns, and eſteemed the fineſt firſt-rate in Europe, foundered on the Caſkets, a large and dangerous reef of rocks off Alderney; and this brave commander periſhed, with all his officers and crew, amounting to between eleven and twelve hundred choice ſeamen: among theſe were fifty gentlemen volunteers, of ſome of the beſt families in England. The reſt of the fleet with great difficulty eſcaped from the fury of the tempeſt, and got ſafe into Spithead.

On the fifth of May this year commodore Barnet, with a ſquadron of two ſhips of ſixty guns, one of fifty, and one of twenty, was diſpatched to the Eaſt Indies, to protect the Britiſh trade and ſettlements there. On his arrival there, he made prize of ſeveral French ſhips richly laden, and otherwiſe greatly annoyed the enemy.

The naval war in America produced nothing material between the Britiſh and Spaniſh ſquadrons, under the command of ſir Chaloner Ogle and admiral de Torres, whoſe ſquadrons were much of an equality, and continued in their former ſituation; the firſt remaining at Port Royal in Jamaica, and the other lying before the walls of the Havannah: but towards the end of this year the Spaniſh admiral made amends for this inactivity, by bringing under his convoy to Spain a moſt immenſe treaſure, leaving at the Havannah ſeven men of war for its defence and the protection of the Spaniſh trade.

Commodore Warren, who was ſtationed with a ſquadron for the protection of the Leeward Iſlands, took ſeveral valuable prizes from the French, and cut off ſeveral ſhips bound with proviſions to Martinico, whereby that iſland was reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs. In the month of July deputy-governor Hodge, of the iſland of Anguilla, one of the Caribbees, drove the French out of their half of the iſland of St. Martin's; and the inhabitants of St. Bartholomew, another of thoſe iſlands, declared themſelves his Britannic majeſty's ſubjects. In North America the French took and burnt our fort of Canſo in Nova Scotia, after making the garriſon priſoners of war.

On the twentieth of October this year the iſland of Jamaica was viſited by a moſt dreadful hurricane, which proved very fatal to the ſhipping there, as well as to the iſland in general. Six men of war were loſt, and upwards of ninety merchant ſhips. Fortunately ſir Chaloner Ogle, with ſome of the largeſt ſhips under his command, was at the time of the hurricane upon a cruize.

A very great number of rich French and Spaniſh prizes were taken this year by our fleets and cruizers; ſo that at the concluſion thereof, the balance from Spain, ſince the commencement of the war with that crown, was one million nine hundred and thirty thouſand pounds in our favour: and for this year, the firſt of the war with France, there remained a ſurplus on our ſide of ſeven hundred and ſeventy-three thouſand pounds; and it was computed we had above eleven thouſand French ſeamen priſoners in England. Many of our ſhips, however, were taken; and the Britiſh navy in particular ſuſtained a conſiderable loſs, by the capture and wrecking of ſeveral of its fine ſhips, particularly the Northumberland man of war of ſeventy guns, which was taken by three French ſhips of war and carried into Breſt, after her commander, captain Watſon, two of his lieutenants, and ſeveral of his men, had fallen in the engagement. The fatal loſs of the Victory was followed by that of the Colcheſter of fifty guns, which was wrecked upon the Sands, between the Long Sands and the Kentiſh Knock, and forty of her crew periſhed, the captain and the reſt being ſaved by boats from Harwich.

Let me now recapitulate the other tranſactions of this buſy year. On the twentieth of June a penſion of four thouſand pounds per annum was granted to Robert earl of Orford (late ſir Robert Walpole) in conſideration of his long and faithful ſervices. He did not, however, long enjoy this mark of his royal maſter's eſteem, dying in the March following. Though he had for ſuch a length of time directed the application of the public treaſure, his circumſtances were not affluent. He was liberal in his diſpoſition, and had many dependants to gratify; ſo that little was left for his own private occaſions. The reader has already ſeen his character as a miniſter: as a private man, he was univerſally beloved and eſteemed; and tho' he reſigned his places, he never loſt a friend. In his retirement he gave a noble proof of his gratitude and loyalty, by uſing all his intereſt to promote the ſervice of his majeſty, and never engaging in any oppoſition that could embarraſs it.

This year was alſo diſtinguiſhed by the deaths of ſeveral remarkable perſons, particularly, of Sarah, ducheſs-dowager of Marlborough, relict of the famous John duke of Marlborough, who, if we except Catherine empreſs of Ruſſia, was the greateſt female favourite of fortune that her age produced; but the moſt extraordinary thing relating to her was, that though the more than princely eſtate ſhe left was acquired wholly by the power of the Whigs, with whom both the duke and herſelf were conſtantly and cloſely connected, ſhe was, to the day of her death, in her heart attached to the family of the late king James; and ſhe had even brought her huſband, in king William's time, under ſome difficulties on that account.

Street robberies were arrived to an enormous height towards the cloſe of this year: the robbers marched in bands, armed with piſtols, cutlaſſes, and bludgeons; and were ſo daring as even to plunder and maim people in broad day-light, till, by proper rewards and vigorous meaſures, a ſtop was put to ſuch notorious villanies.

On the fourth day of December the marſhal duke of Belleiſle, and his brother the chevalier, happened, in their way to the imperial court, to ſtop at the village of Elbingrode, dependent on the electorate of Hanover, but which they, from miſinformation, ſuppoſed to be in the territories of his Pruſſian majeſty. There they were arreſted by the bailiff of that place, and conducted as priſoners of war to Oſterode, from whence they were removed to Stadt on the Elbe, and thence brought over to England, where they arrived on the ninth of December. They reſided at Windſor till the ſummer of the enſuing year, when they were allowed the benefit of the cartel, which had been ſettled between Great Britain and France at Frankfort, and releaſed accordingly.

A ſimilar accident happened this year to the earl of Holderneſſe, who had been lately ſent ambaſſador to the republic of Venice. His Excellency taking the route of Franconia, was ſtopped in the month of September by a party of Imperialiſts, within two poſts of Nuremberg: upon which the earl wrote to the count de St. Germain, who commanded a large detachment of imperial troops at ſome leagues diſtance, complaining of the inſult that had been offered to his character, by a power with whom his maſter was not at war. The French general replied, that his Excellency was at full liberty to proceed on his journey, provided he would give a letter of reverſal, promiſing to return and ſubmit to his arreſt, in caſe the imperial court

ſhould adjudge him to be a priſoner of war. The earl agreed to the propoſal; but the emperor, as ſoon as he was informed of the affair, ordered his letter of reverſal to be returned, and the officer who ſtopped his Excellency to aſk his pardon.

The Britiſh cabinet continued ſtill to be agitated by violent diſſenſions among the members who compoſed it. The great influence which lord Carteret, the prime miniſter, enjoyed with his ſovereign, raiſed the jealouſy of thoſe who were diſtinguiſhed by the name of patriots; and the obſequious attention he manifeſted on all occaſions to the views of the court, had ruined him in the good opinion of the populace. The duke of N..... and his brother Mr. P....., who were poſſeſſed of a very powerful intereſt in parliament, engaged in a political alliance with the leading men in the oppoſition, againſt the prime miniſter. This coalition, in compliance probably with the prevailing taſte of the Engliſh, who are remarkably fond of diſtinguiſhing party epithets, was named "The Broad Bottom," to expreſs its being eſtabliſhed on a true conſtitutional baſis, comprehending perſons of all parties indiſcriminately, whoſe talents and integrity ſeemed to fit them for the ſervice of the public. This appellation, however, like moſt others of the ſame kind, was afterwards converted into a term of deriſion. Lord Carteret, who was by this time become earl of Granville, in conſequence of his mother's death, foreſeeing that his continuance in the miniſtry would only tend to the embarraſſment of his majeſty's ſervice and his own continual diſquiet, very prudently made a voluntary reſignation of his employments. The ſeals of ſecretary of ſtate were then given to the earl of Harrington. The duke of Bedford was appointed firſt lord of the treaſury; and the earl of Cheſterfield, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and ambaſſador-extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the States-general. Mr. Doddington was made treaſurer of the navy; the privy-ſeal was returned to lord Gower: even ſir John Hynde Cotton was favoured with a place at court, being made treaſurer of the chamber. Mr. Lyttleton was admitted into the treaſury; and ſir John Phillips to the board of trade and plantations, though he ſoon after reſigned this employment. The duke of Devonſhire was made lord-ſteward of the houſhold, in the room of the duke of Dorſet, who ſucceeded the earl of Harrington as preſident of the council, on that nobleman's being made ſecretary of ſtate. It was not till Chriſtmas that theſe alterations were publicly known; and the nation quickly perceived it to be a change of men rather than of meaſures. The ſovereign, however, found his eaſe and advantage in it, his views being no longer thwarted by an oppoſition in parliament.

In the mean while, the parliament aſſembling on the twenty-eighth day of November, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he recapitulated the tranſactions and events of the current year, ſuch as have been already related. "He applauded the conſtancy and reſolution of her Hungarian majeſty, and the firmneſs and magnanimity of the king of Sardinia. At the ſame time he acknowleged, that the event of the laſt campaign had not entirely anſwered his wiſhes. Nevertheleſs, he declared himſelf determined, in conjunction with his allies, and with their effectual ſupport, and the aſſiſtance of his parliament, to carry on the war in ſuch a manner as might be moſt conducive to a ſafe and honourable peace: and concluded with obſerving, that towards accompliſhing the ſalutary purpoſes he had in view, nothing could be more effectual than the unanimity and diſpatch of his parliament in conducting the public buſineſs."

The plan of removals and promotions being now fixed, there was the moſt perfect harmony in both houſes, and there was ſcarcely a diviſion heard of during the ſeſſion. The uſual patriot bills (as they were called) for the repeal of ſeptennial parliaments, the purging the parliament of placemen, the remiſſion of the moſt unpopular taxes, and the like, were indeed moved for, but met with their uſual fate of being rejected; and nothing was wanting on the part of the new miniſtry to convince his majeſty that they were in earneſt to carry on the war. New levies for land and ſea were ordered, and the commons voted ſix millions and an half for the ſervice of the year 1745, to be raiſed by the land, the malt, and ſalt taxes, the ſinking fund, and an additional duty on foreign wines.

In the beginning of the year 1745, the earl of Cheſterfield ſet out on his embaſſy to the States-general, having in charge to perſuade that phlegmatic people, if poſſible, to engage heartily in the war; a point in which his lordſhip almoſt deſpaired of ſucceeding; yet his eloquence and addreſs was not wholly loſt: for though he could not bring them to become principals in the quarrel about the Auſtrian ſucceſſion, he brought them to ſettle their quota of troops, fleets, and ſubſidies.

The new miniſtry having agreed upon the expediency of carrying on the war in favour of the queen of Hungary, thought it was requiſite to proſecute it in the moſt vigorous manner; and that for this purpoſe a general ought to be employed, who might be above all dread of miniſterial power, and poſſeſſed of ſufficient authority to direct the allies in their operations. On this occaſion they caſt their eyes on the duke of Cumberland, who had given unqueſtionable proofs not only of his courage, but likewiſe of his knowlege in the military art. Accordingly, on the twelfth day of March, his royal highneſs was conſtituted captain-general and commander in chief of all his majeſty's forces.

Some little time before his majeſty had acquainted his parliament of his having concluded a treaty of quadruple alliance, in conjunction with the queen of Hungary and the States-general. By this treaty, which was ſigned at Warſaw on the eighth of January, "the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, confirmed and renewed the guaranty of the pragmatic ſanction, and promiſed to ſupport it with all his forces. It was further ſtipulated, that, as the kingdom of Bohemia was actually attacked, his Poliſh majeſty ſhould ſend to its defence an army of thirty thouſand auxiliary troops; that his Britannic majeſty and the States-general ſhould pay to that prince an annual ſubſidy of one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling; two thirds to be furniſhed by Great Britain, and one third by the United Provinces: that as ſoon as Bohemia and Saxony ſhould be free from danger, his Poliſh majeſty ſhould march ten thouſand men to the Netherlands, or to any other place within the empire, which the king of Great Britain and the States-general ſhould think moſt proper: for which a ſubſidy of ninety thouſand pounds ſhould be continued to be paid, according to the former proportions: that if, in conſequence of theſe meaſures, his Poliſh majeſty ſhould draw a war upon himſelf, he ſhould be ſupported by all his allies: that no peace ſhould be made without his conſent, and without procuring for him proper ſatisfaction; and that the empreſs of Ruſſia, the republic of Poland, and all the other powers of Europe, ſhould be invited to accede to this treaty, which was to continue after the war was concluded."

A great alteration was expected in the European ſyſtem by the demiſe of the emperor Charles VII. which happened on the ninth of January. This occaſioned his Britannic majeſty to take a reſolution of ſpeedily viſiting his German dominions, as his preſence might contribute to the tranquillity of Europe, and re-eſtabliſh the imperial dignity in the houſe of Auſtria. The parliamentary buſineſs being diſpatched, his majeſty on the ſecond of May went to the houſe of peers, and concluded the ſeſſion with a gracious ſpeech from the throne, acquainting the two houſes with his intention of going out of the kingdom for a ſhort time.

Many excellent bills for the internal good of Great Britain paſſed this ſeſſion, particularly, a bill to prevent exceſſive and deceitful gaming, and to reſtrain and prevent the exceſſive increaſe of horſe races; another, to prevent the pernicious practice of ſmuggling, which of late years was arrived to ſuch a height as bid defiance to all government; another for encouraging the Britiſh linen-manufactory; and another to prevent the importation of cambrics and French lawns. His majeſty the ſame day nominated a regency to adminiſter the affairs of government during his abſence, and the day following (May 3) embarked at Graveſend on board the Caroline yacht for Holland, where he was convoyed by a ſquadron under the command of Mr. Anſon, now created a rear-admiral, and landed at Helvoetſluys on the twelfth, from whence his majeſty proceeded directly for Hanover.

In the mean time, in order to give an additional effect to the negociation of the earl of Cheſterfield at the Hague, and to quicken the reſolution of the States-general in favour of the common cauſe, his majeſty was pleaſed to order the baron Schwigeldt, his Hanoverian miniſter at the Hague, to declare in his name, that he was willing to be conſidered as a principal in the war as elector of Hanover, and to furniſh thereto his contingent of German troops, independent of the other ſuccours he, as king of Great Britain, intended to give to the queen of Hungary.

This declaration of his Britannic majeſty was the more magnanimous, as the events of the laſt campaign had proved ſo unfavourable to the houſe of Auſtria. Maillebois was ſtill in Germany, at the head of a numerous army, with which he overawed the neutral princes, and oppreſſed the friends of her Hungarian majeſty. The revenues of that princeſs were greatly exhauſted, by the expence ſhe had incurred by maintaining her forces. Her loſs of territories in Sileſia and Flanders was far from being compenſated by the few advantages, and the ſubſidies ſhe received from Great Britain were altogether unequal to her neceſſities. On the other hand, France increaſed in power, in proportion as her difficulties increaſed: the money they had received from Spain, and the funds they had invented for increaſing the royal revenue, had enabled them to make great preparations for continuing the war another campaign: but notwithſtanding theſe favourable circumſtances, the death of Charles VII. entirely diſconcerted their plan of politics, and diſſolved the league of Frankfort, which had hitherto ſerved them, as an excellent pretext for proſecuting their ambitious purpoſes, under the mark of ſupporting the imperial dignity.

Upon the death of the emperor it was believed, that as the cauſe of the war no longer ſubſiſted, peace would be reſtored to Europe. They could not offer the empire to the young elector of Bavaria, ſon of the deceaſed Charles VII. as he was then but ſeventeen years of age. However, the court of France continued to pay the ſubſidy to his electoral highneſs. The princes of Germany flattered themſelves that the queen of Hungary would ſeek for peace, as the ſureſt means of placing her huſband, the grand duke of Tuſcany, upon the imperial throne: but her majeſty was determined, that her endeavours to procure the dignity for her conſort ſhould in no wiſe retard the military operations, which ſhe was reſolved to continue. The Engliſh miniſtry, who gave the law to their allies, by being the general pay-maſters, thought they ſhould be loſers by a peace, and gainers by protracting the war. The king of France, on the other hand, would not abandon his ſon-in-law the infant Don Philip, in Italy, the young elector of Bavaria in Germany, or the king of Pruſſia, who was returned to his old alliance. Thus the general war continued, though the object of it was no longer the ſame.

The court of France now caſt an eye upon the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, as a proper perſon for the imperial crown. He was not only qualified to aſpire to this dignity, but he might likewiſe render it ſubſervient to the enriching his family with a part of the Auſtrian inheritance, which he had at firſt attempted to acquire by the ſword: at leaſt, by detaching him from his new alliance with that houſe, there was a probability of ſtrengthening the king of Pruſſia, and of compelling her Hungarian majeſty to accept of terms of peace: but that able miniſter, count Bruhl, who now managed the affairs of Saxony, clearly ſeeing thro' the deluſive propoſals of the French court, perſuaded his maſter, the king of Poland, that he would find it very difficult, if not impoſſible, to keep the crown of Poland, if he accepted of the empire, as the republic of Poland would be afraid of having in him too powerful a chief; and his majeſty would thereby run the riſk of loſing a throne which he might ſecure to his poſterity; and that, after all, he was not ſure of carrying his point in competition with the grand duke of Tuſcany. In ſhort, whether his Poliſh majeſty thought himſelf not ſtrong enough, or whether he was reſtrained by the treaties of Vienna, Dreſden, and Warſaw, which had connected him with England and the queen of Hungary; or, laſtly, whether he was convinced by the arguments of his miniſter, and terrified by the example of the late elector of Bavaria, who was a tragical inſtance, that a grandeur not founded on intrinſic ſtrength, is oftentimes rather a humiliation; inſtead of making any pretenſions to the empire, he entered into a more intimate union with the queen of Hungary, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours to place the imperial crown on her huſband's head.

France, diſappointed on this quarter, would willingly have held out the imperial bait to his Pruſſian majeſty, had ſhe not been convinced of having irremediably incurred his reſentment and indignation, by ſuffering prince Charles to repaſs the Rhine, and deprive him of all his conqueſts in Bohemia: ſhe therefore, on the emperor's death, declared, that as the treaty of Frankfort was now diſſolved, ſhe was ready to agree to propoſals for a general pacification, and not to intermeddle in the election of an emperor. But her Hungarian majeſty, who ſtill imagined ſhe ſhould be able at laſt to dethrone the king of Naples, to recover Sileſia, and to beat the French in Flanders, would liſten to no terms of accommodation; in which reſolution ſhe was not a little confirmed, by the inclination the Engliſh diſcovered for trying the event of another campaign, and the firm attachment their monarch ſhewed to her intereſts. The French had now no other reſource left but in arms, and to await the iſſue of the different fluctuating intereſts which kept Europe in continual alarms.

Lewis XV. had taken the reſolution to act upon the defenſive in Germany, and upon the offenſive in Flanders and Italy; and accordingly he undertook in perſon to finiſh the conqueſts in the Auſtrian Netherlands, in which he had been interrupted during the preceding year. In the month of February this year he married his eldeſt ſon, the dauphin, to the ſecond infanta of Spain, in order to cement his connections with that crown: and this young prince, who had not yet completed his ſixteenth year, prepared to ſet out in the beginning of May along with his father. Before the king's departure, marſhal Saxe went to take upon him the command of the army in Flanders, which was to conſiſt of one hundred and ſix battalions, and one hundred and ſeventy-two ſquadrons, with ſeventeen independent companies; ſo that the whole army, had every thing been complete, would have amounted to ninety-eight thouſand men; but as they were greatly deficient, the total amount did not exceed ſeventy-ſix thouſand men. This army was provided with a train of one hundred and ſixty pieces of heavy artillery.

Marſhal Saxe, who commanded this army till the arrival of the ſovereign, was the eldeſt of the natural children of the late Auguſtus II. king of Poland, by Aurora counteſs of Konigſmark, one of the moſt celebrated beauties of her age. The marſhal had entirely devoted himſelf to the uſe of arms: he entered early into the ſervice of France; and by his diſtinguiſhed bravery juſtly attained to the higheſt ſtep of military preferment. The reputation of this general, and the reſolution of their monarch to make this campaign, invited the flower of the French nobility to take the field; ſo that the marſhal found himſelf joined by the dukes de Chartres and Penthievre, the prince de Dombes, count de Clermont, and count d'Eu; all five princes of the blood royal of France. He alſo found himſelf at the head of twenty-two lieutenant-generals and forty-five major-generals, of the moſt diſtinguiſhed rank, fortune, and reputation, eager to ſignalize themſelves, being filled with the moſt ſanguine hopes of ſucceſs, from their great ſuperiority over the allies, whoſe united forces amounted to no more than fifty-three thouſand men.

The duke of Cumberland, as commander in chief, arrived at the Hague on the ſeventh day of April; and after holding a conference with the States, he poſted to Bruſſels, where he found prince Waldeck, commander of the Dutch troops, and marſhal count Konigſegg, the general of the Auſtrians. William duke of Cumberland was now entering into the twenty-fourth year of his age: he was by nature, brave; and by a cloſe application to the ſtudy of the military art, had acquired thoſe lights which others gain only by experience: endowed with ſentiments worthy of his high birth, and bleſſed with the happy talent of conciliating alike the love and eſteem of both officers and private men, the allies with pleaſure inveſted him with the extenſion of the chief command over the whole confederate army. Full of that vivacity ſo natural to his years, his royal highneſs diſdained the boaſted ſuperiority of the French, whoſe advantage indeed principally lay in the ſagacity and experience of their commanders more than in their numbers.

Marſhal Saxe having made ſeveral feigned marches, which kept the allies in ſuſpence, and ſeemed ſometimes to threaten Aeth, and ſometimes Mons, all on a ſudden ſat down, on the twenty-fourth day of April, before Tournay, on the river Schelde, which was defended by a Dutch garriſon of eight thouſand men, commanded by baron Dorth. Tournay was one of the maſterpieces of the great Vauban, and ſuppoſed to be one of the ſtrongeſt places of the Dutch barrier. The raiſing of this ſiege, therefore, appeared to the confederates a point of the higheſt importance. Accordingly, his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland marched immediately from Bruſſels to Soignies, in the province of Hainault, within twelve miles of Tournay; and continuing his route, encamped on the twenty-ninth of April at Bruſſoel, with his right at Bougnies, and his left at Montbray, within little more than muſket-ſhot of the advanced poſts of the French. Marſhal Saxe had foreſeen the intention of the allies, and had made the moſt excellent diſpoſitions by entrenchments and batteries, in which he was greatly aſſiſted by the nature of the ground.

The two armies were ſeparated only by a rivulet, which lay on the left of the allies, and by copſes and hedges on the right, which the French had lined with their Graſſins, ſupported by ſeveral ſquadrons drawn up on a plain, that roſe by a gentle aſcent to their camp, which extended on the brow of the eminence from the village of St. Antoin towards the wood of Barri, which lay on their left; and was ſecured by lines filled with light troops. At St. Antoin they had erected a moſt dreadful battery; in their center was another battery; and between them lay the village of Fontenoy intrenched, and moſt formidably fortified: this latter village is ſituated about three miles S. E. of Tournay. The French monarch accompanied by the Dauphin, arrived in the camp before Tournay on the 28th of April.

The French king took his ſtation at the bridge of Calonne, cloſe by the village of St. Antoin; the bridge was lined with cannon, ſtrengthened with entrenchments, and defended by a battalion of guards, another of Swiſs, and three of militia, to facilitate the retreat of the king and the Dauphin, in caſe of any unlucky accident. In a word, never was army better ſecured than that of the French; nor could any troops attack under more diſadvantageous circumſtances than thoſe of the combined armies did.

The firſt object of the allies was to drive the French from all their little poſts, ſo as to get into the plain, and this ſervice fell to the ſhare of the Engliſh. Accordingly on the 30th of April, ſix battalions and twelve ſquadrons, with five hundred pioneers, ſix pieces of cannon, and ten haubitzers, were detached from each wing for that purpoſe, and after an obſtinate ſtruggle the enterprize ſucceeded; the army were diſlodged from all their poſts, and repulſed to the heights near their camp, where they drew up afreſh, and began to form new entrenchments. The confederate generals then went upon the ground from which the French had been driven, and, having carefully ſurveyed it, came to a reſolution to attack the enemy early next morning, which was the firſt day of May.

The right wing, compoſed of Engliſh and Hanoverians, was ordered to form in four lines before the village of Vezon, on this ſide of Barri wood; the left wing, conſiſting of Dutch and Auſtrians, was commanded to advance in three columns; the firſt to march by the village of Vezon, the ſecond through the heart of it, and the third to ſtretch into the plain between Fontenoy and St. Antoin. Prince Waldeck, with his Dutch, undertook to attack the former of theſe places. In order to facilitate theſe operations, the duke of Cumberland commanded brigadier Ingoldſby, with four battalions, and three ſix-pounders, to attack a fort in the front of the village of Vezon, which was mounted with cannon. Lieutenant-general Sir James Campbel was ordered to cover the infantry of the right wing, commanded by lieutenant-general Sir John (ſince earl) Ligonier; and Sir James had inſtructions to extend himſelf along the plain, from Barri wood towards the village of Fontenoy; an expedient which would have greatly forwarded prince Waldeck's attack: but the ſucceſs of the whole depended chiefly upon Ingoldſby's carrying the fort at Vezon.

About nine in the morning the engagement began, at the very beginning of which Sir James Campbell's leg was taken off by a cannon ball, which put an end to his life. By the confuſion occaſioned by this accident, and the dreadful fire made by the enemy, the Engliſh infantry under Sir John Ligonier were left terribly expoſed, but were, nevertheleſs, formed with the greateſt diſpatch; and the duke of Cumberland putting himſelf at their head, marched up to the attack of the left wing of the French at St. Antoin, while prince Waldeck, with the Hanoverians and twelve battalions of Dutch, moved at the ſame time to aſſault Fontenoy. The Britiſh infantry under their duke, drove the French beyond their lines. Upon this, count Saxe ordered his cavalry to advance, while the infantry, which had been formed a-new, opened a concealed battery that ſwept off whole ranks of our troops at a time; notwithſtanding which the Engliſh ſtood firm, and kept up their fire with an intrepidity that ſtruck the enemy with aſtoniſhment: and had Ingoldſby ſucceeded in his attack upon Vezon, which he unfortunately miſſed by making ſo long delay in conſulting with his officers in what manner it ſhould be done, that marſhal Saxe had time to ſtrengthen the fort with a number of additional troops and cannon, the Engliſh muſt have carried the day, the ill ſucceſs of which was in great meaſure owing to this delay; or had the Dutch under prince Waldeck done their duty, the French king and his ſon would, in all probability, have been taken priſoners; but the duke being obliged to march through a hollow-way, commanded by the fort that Ingoldſby ſhould have taken, the Engliſh were thereby expoſed to all the fire from that battery, as well as to a great number of croſs fires, which plied them on all hands, and did prodigious execution. At the ſame time the Dutch behaved with the moſt ſhameful puſillanimity, and inſtead of ſupporting the Auſtrians in the attack of Fontenoy (to which prince Waldeck twice led them with the greateſt courage) fled from the field with the utmoſt precipitation. To add to theſe diſaſters, the cavalry forbore to advance to cover the flank of the Engliſh infantry, ſo that his royal highneſs the duke, unable longer to ſtand the prodigious fire of the French batteries, to which he was now left expoſed on all ſides, was obliged to give back in ſome diſorder.

He ſoon rallied his troops however, who, returning to the charge with redoubled ardour, repulſed the enemy to their camp with a terrible ſlaughter; but ſo great was the diminution of the Britiſh troops by the perpetual firing of the French artillery, which took them both in front and flank, that being wholly unſupported by the left wing, while the enemy brought up the Iriſh brigade, and houſhold troops (who were freſh for action, not having yet engaged) to attack them in flank, they began to ſtagger, nor could ſupport the violence of ſo rude a ſhock, and were obliged to retire a ſecond time. The French cavalry endeavoured to break them in their retreat, but were ſo well received by the Britiſh guards, and major-general Zaſtrow of the Hanoverian troops, that the regiment of Noailles was almoſt deſtroyed.

About two o'clock in the afternoon the whole confederate army had orders to retire, which it did in ſuch excellent order that the French did not dare to make the leaſt attempt to diſturb them, and they returned to their camp at Bruſſoel; and quitting it the ſame night about eleven o'clock, marched directly to the camp at Leſſines near Aeth, leaving their ſick and wounded to the humanity of the victors.

Such was the deciſion of this memorable battle of Fontenoy, which anſwered no other purpoſe than to diſplay the unfortunate bravery of the Engliſh and Hanoverians; the latter of whom, by their behaviour this day, ſilenced all the charges that had been brought againſt them for their conduct at Dettingen, while the Dutch diſgraced all the glories which they had ſome years before acquired at the battle of Malplaquet, under the duke of Marlborough, where they had eight thouſand men killed.

In this action the confederates loſt ſeven thouſand three hundred and forty-ſeven men, including cluding a great number of officers; and among theſe lieutenant-general ſir James Campbell, major-general Ponſonby, the colonels Carpenter and Douglaſs, and lieutenant-colonel Gee. However, from the number of officers killed and wounded on the enemy's ſide, their loſs muſt be ſuppoſed to be much more conſiderable; there being four lieutenant-generals, four major-generals, and three brigadiers, killed; two lieutenant-generals, three major-generals, and twenty-two brigadier-generals, wounded, many of whom died ſoon after the engagement.

The reduction of Tournay was the neceſſary conſequence of the victory of Fontenoy, though baron Dorth, the governor, maintained the place with the greateſt bravery to the 21ſt day of June, and then obtained an honourable capitulation. The duke of Cumberland apprehending that the French would next make an attempt upon Ghent, ſent a detachment of four thouſand men to reinforce its garriſon; but they fell into an ambuſcade, when above one thouſand were killed and taken. That very night Ghent was ſurprized by a detachment of the French army. Dendermond, Oudenarde, Nieuport, and Aeth, ſucceſſively ſubmitted to the victors, who, to crown their ſucceſſes, made themſelves maſters of Oſtend, after a ſhort ſiege, on the 13th of Auguſt: and the French king, having thus ſubdued the greateſt part of the Auſtrian Netherlands, returned in the month of September to Paris, which he entered in triumph.

The confederate army lay all this time intrenched beyond the canal of Antwerp, for the diſparity between them and the enemy was too diſadvantageous to ſuffer the allies to think of giving the leaſt moleſtation to the French in their acquiſitions. On the 12th of October his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland left the confederate army, being called home to ward off the meditated ſtroke of a rebellion; of which an account will be given in its place. The combined forces ſoon afterwards took their winter-quarters in Bruſſels, Antwerp, and Mechlin; but the victorious marſhal Saxe, making the moſt of his ſuperiority, on the 29th of January following, inveſted Bruſſels; the garriſon of which, conſiſting of ten thouſand Auſtrians and Dutch under count Kaunitz, after a gallant reſiſtance, were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war on the 20th of February. This conqueſt terminated all the enterpriſing attempts of marſhal Saxe till the returning ſpring, when Antwerp was expected to ſwell the number of his ſucceſſes.

Maximilian Joſeph the young elector of Bavaria was the third from father to ſon, whoſe cauſe had been eſpouſed by France. She had reſtored his grandfather to his dominions, obtained the Imperial crown for his father, and now made a freſh effort to ſupport this young prince. Early in the ſpring the French king ſent ſix thouſand Heſſians in the pay of France, three thouſand Palatines, and thirteen battalions of German troops, to join the Bavarian forces under count Seckendorff; but theſe had defended the entrance of their country ſo ill, that in the beginning of April the elector of Bavaria was obliged to quit Munich, the ſame capital from which his father had been ſo often expelled, and to ſeek ſhelter in Augſburg. Bavaria had been ſo much ravaged that it was not able to ſupply forage to the French troops who came to the elector's aſſiſtance, and count Brown declared to count Segur, who commanded the French forces in Bavaria, that he would not march to meet the Auſtrians, and that all he could do was to wait for them. To complete the diſgrace of the French, count Seckendorff, who commanded the Bavarian army, correſponded with the queen of Hungary, and was negotiating a ſecret accommodation between his maſter, the young elector, and the court of Vienna; whereby he defeated every thing that had been done by France. Seckendorff had been long in the ſervice of the houſe of Auſtria, but upon ſome cauſe of diſtruſt had been confined by Charles VI. the laſt emperor of this family, upon whoſe demiſe he quitted the queen of Hungary to enter into the Bavarian ſervice; and being now diſguſted with the court of France, for having refuſed him a ſum of money he demanded for the payment of the Bavarian troops, he reſolved to traverſe all its projects.

While things were in this ſituation count Segur, who had only ſix thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, French and Palatines, not having been able to effect his junction with the Heſſians and Bavarians, was attacked by general Bathiani at the head of the Auſtrian army, within a few leagues of Donawert near a little town called Pfaffenhoven. All he had to do in this ſituation was to ſave his troops and the military cheſt; for this purpoſe he poſted his men ſo well by covering them with a wood, and poſſeſſing himſelf of an eminence, that they maintained a moſt unequal and a moſt obſtinate fight: the French alone loſt about two thouſand men killed and wounded; the Palatines, who were leſs expoſed, had very few killed, but one of their battalions was made priſoners of war. The marquis de Cruſſol, who was entruſted with the care of the rear, and the chevalier de la Marck, behaved with ſuch prudence and intrepidity, that even their enemies gave them the higheſt commendations.

This little army being obliged to yield to the ſuperiority of numbers, retreated to Donawert, where they croſſed the Danube, and joined the French under the command of marſhal Maillebois in Suabia. This incident completed the deſtruction of the French in this part of the empire.

The retreat of the French general obliged the prince of Saxe Hilburghauſen to retire with the Bavarian and Heſſian troops towards Landſberg; but the latter, to the number of ſix thouſand, being cut off, and ſurrounded in their retreat by a detachment commanded by general Bernklau, were obliged to lay down their arms, and to continue at Lechauſen, till their fates were determined between the courts of Vienna and Caſſel. Theſe troops ſome time after paſſed from the ſervice of the French into that of the Engliſh.

All this while the young elector of Bavaria was at Augſburg, devoured with the melancholy reflections of his own approaching misfortunes, and the paſt calamities of his unhappy family. The French king, however, was ſtill defending his cauſe on all ſides. Marſhal Maillebois, at the head of a numerous army, was driving that of the Auſtrians, commanded by the duke of Aremberg, beyond the river Lhon, and even menaced the electorate of Hanover. The king of Pruſſia kept prince Charles of Lorrain employed, and Lewis XV. was himſelf on the point of making a moſt powerful diverſion in Flanders. But all theſe conſiderations were ſuperſeded, perſeded, and the projects of France diſconcerted by the preſent exigence of the young elector's affairs, the intreaties of the empreſs his mother, enforced by the interpoſition of his Britannic majeſty; the advice of the elector of Cologne, his uncle; and of his general, count Seckendorff, who were inceſſantly repreſenting to him the ambitious deſigns of France, and earneſtly exhorted him to be reconciled to the court of Vienna, and conſent to the accommodation which count de Colloredo, the Auſtrian miniſter, was endeavouring to bring about at Tyrol. The miniſters of the contrary party oppoſed theſe efforts, eſpecially M. de Chavigny, count del Bene, and M. de Klingarff, the ambaſſadors from the courts of France, Madrid, and Berlin, who perſuaded the elector to repair to Manheim, a city belonging to the elector-palatine, and had almoſt ſeduced him to refuſe entering into any accommodation. But at length he opened his eyes to the true intereſt of his electoral houſe: he put off his deſigned journey to Manheim, and ſent orders to prince Furſtenberg to conclude an accommodation with count Colloredo, who was come to Fueſſen, on the Lech, for this ſalutary purpoſe. Theſe plenipotentiaries ſoon terminated the differences between the ſerene houſes of Auſtria and Bavaria, by concluding a treaty of amity and pacification, ſigned on the twenty-ſecond of April.

By this treaty her Hungarian majeſty agreed to acknowlege the imperial dignity, as having been veſted in the perſon of his father, to his own mother, as empreſs dowager; to reſtore his dominions, with all the fortreſſes, artillery, ſtores, and ammunition, which ſhe had taken. On the other hand, he relinquiſhed all claim to the ſucceſſion of her father, became guarantee of the pragmatic ſanction, acknowleged the validity of the electoral vote of Bohemia in the perſon of the queen, and promiſed to give his vote for the grand duke at the enſuing election of a king of the Romans.

Until this ſhould be determined, both parties agreed that Ingoldſtadt ſhould be garriſoned by neutral troops, and that Branau and Schardingen, with all the country lying between the Inn and the Saltza, ſhould remain in the queen's poſſeſſion, though without prejudice to the civil government or the elector's revenue. In the mean time, he diſmiſſed the auxiliaries that were in his pay, and they were ſuffered to retire without moleſtation.

On the demiſe of the emperor, the elector of Mentz, as arch-chancellor of the empire, appointed the firſt of June for the diet to aſſemble, and proceed to the election of a new emperor. The grand duke of Tuſcany had already declared himſelf a candidate for that dignity; and the court of Vienna had now engaged the votes of all the electors, except thoſe of Brandenburg and the Palatinate. France however was determined, if poſſible, to prevent the exaltation of the grand duke, and with that view exerted her utmoſt endeavours to procure ſuch an army in the empire as might intimidate the princes and neutral circles from electing a prince for emperor, whom ſhe would gladly have ſet at the remoteſt diſtance from that auguſt dignity. The French army in Germany was therefore augmented to ſeventy thouſand three hundred men; and the prince of Conti was appointed to take the command, in the room of M. Maillebois, who ſucceeded the prince in his command on the ſide of Italy, after having, as I have already obſerved, obliged the duke of Aremberg, who made an irruption into the Palatinate in the beginning of this year, to repaſs the Maine with his army of Auſtrians and Hanoverians, and afterwards to intrench himſelf behind the river Lohne, in expectation of reinforcements.

About the time that the prince of Conti arrived in Germany, marſhal Traun, who had ſucceeded count Bathiani in the command of the Auſtrian forces in Bavaria (on that general's being appointed to replace the duke of Aremberg in Germany) received orders to advance towards the Maine to join the confederates, and drive the prince of Conti from the neighbourhood of Frankfort, that the electors might be left at liberty to proceed to the election, agreeably to the laws and conſtitution of the empire. He accordingly marched from the Danube at the head of thirty thouſand men, and on the fourteenth of June effected his junction with count Bathiani at Wachterſpach, upon the river Kintz, when the united armies conſiſted of ſeventy-four battalions and one hundred and ten ſquadrons, in all ſixty-nine thouſand men, who were ſoon after headed by the grand duke himſelf in perſon, who obliged the prince of Conti to evacuate the imperial territories, and repaſs the Rhine at Nordheim with conſiderable loſs.

The neighbourhood of Frankfort being thus freed from the preſence of the French army that had been poſted there, under the ſpecious pretext of ſecuring the freedom of the election, but with a real view to influence the deliberations of the electors; the firſt conference was held for the election of a king of the Romans on the ninth of Auguſt, at which aſſiſted the miniſters of the ſeveral electors of Mentz, Treves, Cologn, Bohemia, Bavaria, Hanover, and Saxony: but the ambaſſadors of Brandenburg and the Palatinate having proteſted againſt every thing that could be done at thoſe conferences, were not preſent. However, the electoral college aſſembled on the ſecond of September for the election of an emperor, when they choſe the moſt ſerene prince Francis Stephen, duke of Lorraine and Bar, grand duke of Tuſcany, and co-regent of the dominions of her majeſty the queen of Hungary and Bohemia. On the twenty-fourth the new emperor, with his royal conſort, made his public entry with great magnificence, and was crowned with the uſual ceremonies. Their Imperial majeſties, after receiving the compliments of the chief princes of the empire, returned to Vienna, and the diet of the empire was removed to Ratiſbon, the uſual place of aſſembling under the Auſtrian emperors. The voting electors alſo entered into an aſſociation to defend the head of the empire, and the circles were required to furniſh a triple contingent for that purpoſe.

This agreeable alteration in the affairs of Europe was effected principally by the firmneſs and authority of his Britannic majeſty, who ſpared no pains to reconcile the princes of the empire in defence of public liberty. He prevailed with the elector-palatine to be leſs ſanguine in the cauſe of France: he actually ſucceeded in bringing the court of Heſſe-Caſſel to relinquiſh its connections with Lewis XV. and to reſtore the ſix thouſand Heſſians to Britiſh pay.

The king of Pruſſia, ſmarting with his loſſes ſuſtained laſt campaign, thoroughly diſguſted with the court of France, and releaſed from his engagements of the treaty of Frankfort by the death of the emperor, ſeemed inclinable to embrace a pacific ſyſtem; but the infatuation of the councils of Vienna would not permit him. Intoxicated with ſucceſs, they thought of nothing leſs than ſtripping him of all he had acquired. This inveteracy rouſed all the military abilities of his Pruſſian majeſty, which ſoon ſtruck Europe with aſtoniſhment. The Auſtrians had already made themſelves maſters of Troppau, Jaggerſdorf, Ratibor, and ſome other places of leſs note in Sileſia: but Frederic, who had hitherto affected to act upon the defenſive only, which had made his enemies imagine that he was both unwilling and unable to hazard an engagement, ſtarted ſuddenly into action, attacked the Auſtrians in his turn, and drove them from Troppau and Jaggerſdorf as far as Moravia, whilſt other parties of his troops poſſeſſed themſelves of the caſtle of Glatz, where a body of ſix thouſand Pruſſians, under general Lehwald, attacked twelve thouſand Auſtrians commanded by general Helſrick, five hundred of whom were killed upon the ſpot, three hundred taken priſoners, and the reſt completely routed. Ratibor, where was a garriſon of three thouſand Auſtrians, next fell into his hands. The defendants were all killed or taken priſoners, and the king entered Sileſia in May, at the head of ſeventy thouſand men.

Theſe exploits, however, were but faint preludes to the rapid conqueſts which were ſoon to diſtinguiſh this young monarch as the firſt hero of the age in generalſhip and valour. Prince Charles of Lorraine had by this time joined the confederate army of Saxons, Hungarians, and Auſtrians, under the prince of Saxe Weiſſenfels, at Konigſgratz in Bohemia, which was now augmented to ſeventy-ſix thouſand men, and from thence advanced in the latter end of May towards the mountains which ſeparate Sileſia from Bohemia, and on the third of June encamped in the neighbourhood of Friedberg. Upon the firſt motions of the confederates to enter Sileſia, his Pruſſian majeſty had drawn all the troops he had in Upper Sileſia, except the garriſon of Jaggerſdorf, into Lower Sileſia to reinforce his army, which was thereby augmented to eighty-four thouſand men. This ſuperiority determined Frederic to attack the confederates, who little expected any thing of the kind; for he had ordered his general du Moulin, with the vanguard of his army, conſiſting of fifteen thouſand men, to poſt himſelf near Striegau, where the right wing of the allies was encamped, and to make the neceſſary diſpoſitions to lead prince Charles into a belief that his majeſty intended to retreat to Breſlau. At their approach the confederates were the dupes of this artifice, and lulled into the moſt perfect ſecurity; when, on the fourth of June, at two o'clock in the morning, they found themſelves attacked by the Pruſſians with a degree of fury that carried all before it. The Saxons and Auſtrians maintained the fight for a conſiderable time with a reſolution that did them infinite honour; and prince Charles of Lorraine and the prince of Saxe-Weiſſenfels did every thing that could be expected from the moſt conſummate generals and the braveſt warriors, to turn the fortune of the day; but all in vain: the amazing military genius of his Pruſſian majeſty had led him to make ſuch diſpoſitions as muſt infallibly inſure him the victory. In fine, the allies were totally defeated, with the loſs of four thouſand ſix hundred men killed, and five thouſand three hundred taken priſoners, with all their artillery; and his Pruſſian majeſty carried off from the field a prodigious number of colours, ſtandards, kettle-drums, and other military trophies. The Pruſſians loſt about eight hundred men killed, and fifteen hundred wounded. Such was the iſſue of the famous battle of Friedberg, which, for the valour and great conduct of the generals on both ſides, but more particularly on that of the Pruſſians; the bravery and intrepidity of the private men; the general and long action, which laſted upwards of twelve hours, and the deciſiveneſs of the victory, may truly be ſtiled the moſt memorable of the war begun in SEVENTEEN HUNDRED AND FORTY-ONE.

The loſs of the battle of Friedberg by the Auſtrians induced his Britannic majeſty, who then reſided at Hanover, and was employed as uſual in ſtudying every method to reſtore the peace of Germany, to enter upon a proviſional treaty with his nephew of Pruſſia for that ſalutary purpoſe, to which the latter appeared to lend a willing ear. Accordingly, in the month of Auguſt a convention was ſigned at Hanover, wherein the king of Great Britain became guarantee of the king of Pruſſia's poſſeſſions in Sileſia, as yielded by the treaty of Breſlau; and that monarch promiſed to vote for the grand duke of Tuſcany at the election of an emperor. This was intended as the baſis of a more general accommodation: but no ſooner was it known at the courts of Vienna and Dreſden, than it was rejected in the moſt peremptory terms. This ſo enraged Frederic, that he immediately publiſhed a declaration of war againſt the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, in which he accuſed that prince of having formed a deſign, in conjunction with her Hungarian majeſty, to invade his territories, particularly the duchy of Magdeburg; and that for this purpoſe his Poliſh majeſty had demanded of the czarina of Ruſſia the ſuccours ſtipulated by treaty between the two crowns. He then publiſhed a manifeſto ſetting forth theſe particulars, and earneſtly ſoliciting the maritime powers to fulfil their engagements, and interpoſe their good offices with the court of Peterſburg to abandon that of Dreſden. But without waiting to ſee the reſult of theſe apprehenſions, he made a ſudden irruption into Luſatia, took poſſeſſion of Gorlitz, and obliged prince Charles of Lorraine to retire into Bohemia.

Prince Anhalt of Deſſau, the Pruſſian general, then enters Saxony towards the weſt, and makes himſelf maſter of Leipſic without oppoſition. The king of Poland, elector of Saxony, flies from Dreſden and takes refuge in Prague, the capital of Bohemia, whilſt his generals collect his forces; and being joined by a detachment of Auſtrian cavalry under prince Lobkowitz, make a ſtand to oppoſe the rapidity of the Pruſſian conqueſts at Pirna*. The latter, however, making themſelves maſters of Meyſſen, attacked the confederates, though double their number, on the fifteenth day of December, and obtained as complete a victory as that of Friedberg, where, beſides great numbers of the Saxons and Auſtrians left upon the field of battle, near four thouſand were taken priſoners, with all their artillery. The city of Dreſden, the capital of Saxony, no longer able to withſtand the victorious arms of his Pruſſian majeſty, ſubmits. Frederic enters the place in triumph, and the whole country is laid under contribution.

The king of Poland, thus ſtripped of his dominions, was glad to accept of ſuch terms as the conqueror thought proper to impoſe. The queen of Hungary alſo, tired of a diſpute in which ſhe had nothing to expect but multiplied loſſes and diſgrace, conſented at length to give up her claim to Sileſia; and a negociation being ſet on foot, under the mediation of the king of Great Britain, two treaties of peace were ſigned on the twenty-fifth of December, 1745; the one between the king of Pruſſia and the elector of Saxony, and the other between his Pruſſian majeſty and the emperor and the empreſs-queen.

By the latter of theſe treaties the king of Pruſſia acknowleged the emperor, as did alſo the elector-palatine, who acceded thereto. The emperor confirmed in favour of the houſe of Brandenburg certain privileges de non evocando, granted to it by the emperor Charles VII. concerning certain provinces in the king of Pruſſia's poſſeſſion not belonging to the elector of Brandenburg, and the treaty of Breſlau was renewed. By the treaty concluded at the ſame time between the king of Pruſſia and the king of Poland, in quality of the elector of Saxony, it was agreed, "That all the contributions that electorate was to furniſh to his Pruſſian majeſty to the twenty-ſecond day of December, 1745, incluſive, he ſhould retain to his proper uſe: that a million of German crowns ſhould be paid the next fair at Leipſic, with intereſt at five per cent. to be reckoned from the day of ſigning the treaty till the time of quitting the capital: that the ſubjects of his Pruſſian majeſty who were intereſted in the ſteur of Saxony ſhould be punctually paid: that the king of Poland, in quality of the elector of Saxony, ſhould make no innovations to the prejudice of the proteſtant religion in that electorate; and that the Saxon ſoldiers who had inliſted themſelves in the Pruſſian ſervice ſince the king's troops had entered that electorate, ſhould remain therein."

Immediately after the ratification of theſe treaties, the Pruſſian forces evacuated Saxony; all hoſtilities between them and the Auſtrians ceaſed, and the peace of Germany was reſtored.

The campaign in Italy was far from proving favourable either to the queen of Hungary or her ally the king of Sardinia. Count Gages croſſed the Appennine mountains in the month of April, in order to reach the ſtate of Lucca, and paſs from thence through the Genoeſe dominions, to join the army commanded by Don Philip in Lombady. Prince Lobkowitz, who, upon the opening of the campaign, finding himſelf too weak to obſtruct the progreſs of count Gages, had croſſed the Panaro, and retired into the Modeneſe, no ſooner heard of that general's march towards the Appennines, than he ſent ſeveral detachments to incommode his route, who did great execution upon his rear. However, the Spaniſh general, with infinite trouble, penetrated through the mountains: but if any ſnow or rain had fallen during their march, the whole army muſt have inevitably periſhed before they had entered the territories of Lucca, where they arrived the tenth of May. The republic of Lucca, notwithſtanding its avowed neutrality, was compelled to receive the Spaniſh general with civility, and even to furniſh him with proviſions.

Count Gages then proceeded by the eaſtern coaſt of Genoa to Leſtride Levant, while duke Philip, who had by this time received very conſiderable reinforcements from Catalonia, was permitted by the republic to approach through the weſtern part of their dominions; and the two armies at length compleated their junction on the fourteenth day of June, within a few miles of Genoa, where they encamped, and then conſiſted of ſixty-eight thouſand men. Soon after, the Genoeſe declared war againſt the king of Sardinia, and joined the French, Spaniſh, and Neapolitan forces with ten thouſand men, and a large train of heavy artillery. Mean while, prince Lobkowitz departed from Modena, and encamped at Parma; but being recalled to ſerve in Bohemia, he was ſucceeded by count Schuylemberg, who made the beſt diſpoſitions for defending the Milaneſe, the Parmeſan, and the Plaiſentin.

Don Philip, aſſiſted by marſhal Maillebois with forty thouſand French and Spaniards, was to penetrate into the Milaneſe, and act againſt the king of Sardinia, who was poſted with twenty thouſand men in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, while the duke of Modena and count Gages, with thirty-eight thouſand men, acted againſt count Schuylemberg, who had aſſembled twenty-five thouſand. Count Gages ſoon opened himſelf a paſſage into the Milaneſe by the reduction of Serravalle, and advancing on the ſide of Placentia, obliged the Auſtrian general to retire under the cannon of Tortona, to preſerve a communication with the king of Sardinia. Don Philip, on his ſide, took poſſeſſion of Acqui, Seva, and ſome other places, which opened a paſſage to Alexandria, where the Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe had united their force; but his Sardinian majeſty and count Schuylemberg finding they were in danger of being incloſed between the two Spaniſh generals, retired beyond the Tanaro in the middle of July, wholly unable to reſiſt the progreſs of the enemy.

Count de Gages then laid ſiege to and reduced Tortona, while the duke of Modena made himſelf maſter of the cities of Parma and Placentia, and recovered the dominions of the houſe of Farneſe. Count de Gages, after the reduction of Tortona, took the city of Pavia by ſcalade; the rich city of Milan ſubmitted to the Infant, though the Auſtrian garriſon ſtill maintained the citadel. The Spaniſh general then marched to reinforce the army under Don Philip, who being now at the head of ſixty-two thouſand men, forced the paſſage of the Tanaro, and obliged his Sardinian majeſty to quit the neighbourhood of Alexandria, and take ſhelter at Valenza, the capital of the Laumelin, on the other ſide of the Po.

The army of the three crowns finding nothing to oppoſe it, marched and laid ſiege to Alexandria, a conſiderable town on the Tanaro, which was ſurrendered within twelve days after its being inveſted.

inveſted. In the mean time, prince Lichtenſtein was ſent to take the command of the Auſtrian army in Italy, in the room of Schuylemberg: but all this new general or the king of Sardinia could do was to remain inactive ſpectators of the rapid ſucceſſes that attended the arms of the Spaniards. Valenza Caſal, the capital of the Montferrat, the important town of Aſti, the caſtle of Gabiano, and Verrue, all fell into their hands with very little trouble; and in a word all Piedmont on both ſides of the Po, almoſt as far as Turin, was reduced, and that capital threatened with a ſiege; ſo that by the month of October the territories belonging to the houſe of Auſtria in Italy were wholly ſubdued, and the king of Sardinia ſtripped of all his dominions. Nevertheleſs, he continued firm to his engagements, and refuſed to hearken to the ſpecious propoſals of the French for a ſeparate accommodation.

The Engliſh navy in the courſe of this year performed ſeveral ſignal ſervices. In the Mediterranean admiral Rowley had ſucceeded Mr. Matthews in the command. He had bombarded Savona, Genoa, Final, St. Remo, with Baſtia, the capital of Corſica, and made prizes of ſeveral Spaniſh ſhips. The Engliſh privateers likewiſe met with remarkable ſucceſs; but the moſt important atchievement, and that moſt worthy of hiſtorical notice, was the reduction of Louiſburg, the capital of Cape Breton in North America, a place of great conſequence, and which the French had fortified at an immenſe expence.

Cape Breton is an iſland of North America, in the Atlantic Ocean, ſeparated from Acadia, or New Scotland, by the narrow ſtreight of Canſo. It is about one hundred miles in length, and fifty in breadth, ſituate between forty-five and forty-eight degrees north latitude, and between ſixty-one and ſixty-two degrees weſt longitude. It is a country which produces hardly any corn or graſs, but large quantities of wood; is exceſſively cold, being covered with ſnow in winter, and ſubject to great fogs even in ſummer. It has, however, ſeveral good harbours, with an excellent fiſhery on the coaſt. The knowlege which the French had of the great benefit of this fiſhery, conjunctly with thoſe of the Banks of Newfoundland and on the coaſt of Acadia, and the hopes of one time monopolizing it made them, at the peace of Utrecht, ſtick at no terms to obtain Cape Breton to themſelves: and they had no ſooner effected this, but they immediately began to ſettle the iſland, to which they gave the name of l'Iſle Royale. A new colony was ſet on foot in 1714, to conſiſt of fiſhermen only: proper encouragement was given for eſtabliſhing the ſettlement, forts were erected, and the town of Louiſburg was built, and a garriſon poſted there for the protection of the iſland. The whole nation of France ſeemed to have their wiſhes entirely bent on the proſperity of this valuable colony; ſo that it annually became more populous, and the fiſhery flouriſhed ſo faſt, that they could and did afford to underſell the Britiſh nation at foreign markets. For the preſervation of this trade the colony had yearly reinforcements and ſhips of war ſent there from France, to viſit and ſupply them, with orders to protect and defend not only their ſea-coaſts, but their veſſels on the Banks of Newfoundland. This gave them a liberty of fiſhing almoſt wherever they pleaſed, in which they gradually increaſed, ſo as to put the iſland in a formidable poſture of defence.

The ſcheme of reducing this iſland is ſaid to have been firſt ſuggeſted by Mr. Auchmuty, judge-advocate of the court of admiralty in New England. It was recommended by their general aſſembly to our miniſtry here at home, and was approved by his majeſty, who ſent orders to commodore (afterwards ſir Peter) Warren, ſtationed off the Leeward Iſlands, to ſail for the northern parts of America, and aſſiſt all in his power the forces of New England in this expedition.

A body of ſix thouſand men was raiſed by the coloniſts themſelves, and put under the conduct of Mr. Pepperell, a trader of Piſcataqua, whoſe intereſt in that country was very conſiderable. He was indeed altogether ignorant of the military art; but this defect was amply made up by his amazing courage and reſolution. In April this year Mr. Warren arrived at Canſo with ten ſhips of war; and the troops of New England being embarked in tranſports, ſailed immediately for the iſle of Cape Breton, and landed on the thirtieth of the month in Gabaron Bay, about four miles from the fort of Louiſburg. The ground between the place of landing and the ramparts of the town was extremely boggy, unequal, and almoſt impaſſable; but the aſſailants ſurmounted all theſe difficulties, and formed two ſeveral camps, which were to direct two different attacks. The one played from the ſouth ſide of the harbour directly upon the town, and the other from the north part of it, to ſilence what was called the grand battery, which mounted thirty-five guns, of forty-two pounders each, and commanded the entry and the bay. Beſides theſe, the enemy had a draw-bridge at the weſtern gate of the town, where was a circular battery of ſixteen guns, twenty-four pounders each, commanding the upper part of the harbour; at the mouth of which was the iſland battery, of thirty-four guns, forty-two pounders. The walls, ramparts, and baſtions of the place, mounted ſixty-four guns, beſides ſixteen large mortars; and the garriſon conſiſted of twelve hundred regulars, under monſieur Chambon, the governor.

Diſmaying as it might have been ſuppoſed ſuch a formidable appearance of defence would be to raw and unexperienced troops; yet the New England men proved on this occaſion, that natural courage and intrepidity may well ſupply the place of military knowlege or experience: they waited but for the commands of their leaders to fly to execute them, however dangerous or precarious: they aſſailed the grand battery with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that they compelled the enemy to abandon it; and the immediate ſeizure of it contributed not a little to the ſucceſs of the enterprize. This paſſed on the northern ſide of the harbour; but the grand approaches were carried on upon the ſouthern ſide, while the fleet blocked up the place by ſea in ſuch a manner as to prevent the introduction of any ſupplies. The Vigilante, a French ſhip of war of ſixty-four guns, with ſeveral ſmaller veſſels, carrying all manner of military and other ſtores for the ſervice of the place, were intercepted by part of the commodore's ſquadron, while at the ſame time the camps of the beſiegers were plentifully ſupplied with proviſions from Boſton.

Boſton. The ſervice on the ſouthern ſide of the town was extremely laborious, the guns for mounting the batteries being dragged through bogs and incumbered places by the landſmen for above two miles. They ſucceeded, however, to admiration; and having erected ſeveral batteries on eminences that commanded the whole town, which they laid in ruin by their bombs and bullets, the governor, deſpairing of relief, capitulated on the fifteenth day of June, when the city of Louiſburg and the iſle of Cape Breton were delivered up to his Britannic majeſty. The garriſon and inhabitants engaged not to bear arms for twelve months againſt Great Britain or her allies; and being embarked in fourteen cartel ſhips, were conveyed to Rochfort in France. The natives of New England acquired great glory from this enterprize; the ſucceſs of which, however, was in no ſmall degree owing to the vigilance and activity of commodore Warren, as brave and experienced an officer as Great Britain could boaſt in her ſervice.

The poſſeſſion of Cape Breton was a moſt valuable acquiſition to Great Britain: it not only diſtreſſed the French in their fiſhery and navigation, but alſo effectually ſecured the Engliſh fiſhers on the Banks of Newfoundland from all apprehenſions of being rivalled or encroached upon in that lucrative branch of trade: it freed New England from the terrors of dangerous neighbours; overawed the Indians of that country; and ſecured the poſſeſſion of Acadia to the crown of Great Britain. His majeſty appeared ſo ſenſible of the important ſervice done him both by the land and ſea commanders on this occaſion, that he was pleaſed to confer the dignity of a baronet on Mr. Pepperell, and to raiſe Mr. Warren to the rank of admiral.

While the continent of Europe and the iſles of America were thus expoſed to the ravages of war, and ſubjected to ſeveral viciſſitudes of fortune, Great Britain underwent a dangerous convulſion in her own bowels by a rebellion, the moſt daring, and, conſidering the little encouragement it met with, the moſt alarming of any that appears in the Engliſh annals; a rebellion which was as fatal in its event, as it was proſperous in its commencement; and which, notwithſtanding its occaſioning ſome few calamities, confirmed in the hand of the ſovereign the ſceptre it meant to ſhake.

As the various incidents which occurred while this rebellion laſted are recent in the minds of moſt of my readers, and are tranſmitted in a number of hiſtories, ſome of which are in almoſt every body's hand, I ſhall not ſwell this work with a minute detail of particulars, but content myſelf with giving a brief and impartial account of the moſt material and intereſting circumſtances, which I ſhall carry down, without any interruption, to its concluſion in 1746.

I have already mentioned the miſcarriage of the invaſion projected in 1744; the ill ſucceſs of which, and the unanimity the Britiſh nation then ſhewed in defending the perſon and government of the reigning monarch, had determined the pretender to lay aſide all thoughts of reſuming an enterprize of that nature; and he had even ordered his ſon Charles to follow his example. Charles, however, was of a different opinion from his father: burning with ambition, and animated with the hopes of aſcending a throne, which he had from his infancy been taught to look upon as the right of his family, he reſolved to make one more effort. In this diſpoſition he was encouraged by the extravagant repreſentations of ſome needy fugitives, and by the perſuaſion of cardinal Tencin, the prime miniſter of France, who aſſured him of the moſt Chriſtian king's protection and aſſiſtance, who, though he entertained a great indifference for the Stuart family, thought it politic, in the preſent ſituation of his own affairs, to give them ſome kind of countenance. Tencin had no ſmall difficulty to perſuade the old pretender to be concerned in this ſcheme. At laſt, however, he ſucceeded, but could never bring the reſt of the French miniſtry to be of his opinion, they looking upon the whole to be an idle Quixotic enterprize. Nevertheleſs, in compliance with the ſeeming will of their monarch, the council determined that a ſhip of war ſhould convoy Charles, in caſe he ſhould chuſe to undertake the enterprize.

Charles appears to have founded his hopes of ſucceſs chiefly on the ſtrength of his own perſonal intereſt and qualifications, in which he had been flattered by the ſanguine miſrepreſentations of a few adventurers, who hoped to profit by the expedition, and boldly aſſured him that the majority of the Engliſh nation was diſaffected to the reigning family; and that the moſt conſiderable perſons in the kingdom would chearfully join him upon his firſt appearance. Cajoled by theſe ſoothing tales, and encouraged by the promiſe of powerful ſuccours from France, he thought he had but to ſet his foot on any part of the Britiſh ſhore, and to ſucceed. Being furniſhed with a ſum of money and a ſupply of arms by the court of Verſailles, he embarked on board of a ſmall frigate at Port St. Lazaro, on the coaſt of Brittany, accompanied by the marquis of Tullibardine and ſir Thomas Sheridan, with a few other Iriſh and Scottiſh adventurers; and ſetting ſail on the fourteenth day of July, was joined off Belleiſle by the Elizabeth, a French ſhip of war of ſixty-ſix guns, as his convoy. Their deſign was to ſail round Ireland, and land on the weſtern coaſt of Scotland; but falling in with the Lion, an Engliſh man of war of fifty-eight guns, commanded by captain Brett, who had been lieutenant of the Centurion under commodore Anſon, a very obſtinate battle enſued; and the Elizabeth being at length diſabled, was obliged to return to Breſt, while the frigate eſcaped, and continued her courſe ſo expeditiouſly, that on the 23d of July the young pretender found himſelf among the weſtern iſles of Scotland, where he continued cruizing till the twenty-ſixth, between the iſlands of Barra and South Viſta; but finding there was no probability of being rejoined by the Elizabeth, the frigate at laſt ſtood in for the coaſt of Lochaber, one of the maritime counties in the north-weſt of Scotland, principally inhabited by papiſts, and on the twenty-ſeventh of July landed the young pretender with his companions at Moidart, between the iſlands of Sky and Mull. The young adventurer went immediately to the houſe of Mr. Macdonald, of Kinloch-Moidart, where he remained for ſome time, before he was in any condition to make a public appearance.

While he was remaining in theſe parts, to wait the coming in of the chieftains of the clans affected to his ſervice, the government received notice of ſuch an attempt, aided by the French court; and a proclamation was publiſhed, offering a reward of thirty thouſand pounds for the apprehending and ſecuring the eldeſt ſon of the pretender, in caſe he ſhould land, or attempt to land, in any of his majeſty's dominions. The regency alſo ſent arms for the militia of Scotland and Ireland; but at the firſt beginning of the rebellion all intelligence of ſuch an attempt was diſcredited, becauſe it appeared too vain and audacious.

His Britannic majeſty was in his German dominions when he received the firſt intelligence of the arrival of the young pretender in Scotland, which occaſioned his immediate return to London, where he arrived on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, to the great ſatisfaction of all his faithful ſubjects, who knew how ſeaſonable his royal preſence was at this juncture. Charles having declared himſelf in Scotland, ſoon found his party conſiderably augmented, both by the acceſſion of ſeveral of the nobility and gentry, and the numbers they conducted to his ſtandard; ſo that his army was quickly increaſed to 4000 men. In ſhort, the rebellion ſoon wore too formidable an aſpect to be diſregarded. On September 5, his majeſty ſent notice to the lord-mayor of London (ſir Henry Marſhal) that the pretender's eldeſt ſon had landed in Scotland, and that ſeveral perſons had aſſembled there, and broke out into open rebellion; upon which the city of London waited upon his majeſty with a moſt loyal addreſs, and the merchants of this metropolis reſolved to raiſe two regiments at their own expence. Orders were iſſued to keep the trained bands in readineſs, to array the militia of Weſtminſter, and inſtructions were ſent to the ſame effect to the lords lieutenants of the ſeveral counties throughout the kingdom. Orders were likewiſe iſſued for the return of the three battalions of the foot-guards and ſeven regiments of foot from Flanders; and requiſition was made of the ſix thouſand Dutch auxiliaries.

Upon the firſt certainty of the young pretender's arrival in Scotland, ſir John Cope, who commanded the troops in that kingdom, aſſembled what forces he could get together, and advanced againſt the rebels. The latter, however, found means to give Cope the ſlip; and marching ſouthward, took poſſeſſion of Perth on the fourth of September, where the chevalier de St. George was proclaimed king of Great Britain, by the name of James III. There his ſon, the young adventurer, was joined by the titular duke of Perth, the viſcount Strathallern, lord Nairn, lord George Murray, and many perſons of diſtinction, with their followers; and the rebel army, now augmented to near five thouſand men, though very ill provided with arms, croſſed the Forth, in the neighbourhood of Stirling, and advanced towards Edinburgh, of which they took poſſeſſion on the ſeventeenth of September, all oppoſition to them hitherto being weakly or wickedly managed.

By this time general Cope, who had, for greater expedition, in his return ſouthward after the rebels, embarked his troops, was arrived at Dunbar, eighteen miles eaſt of Edinburgh; and having landed his forces, and received a reinforcement of two regiments of dragoons which he had left behind him on his going northward, began his march towards that capital. The rebels did not wait to be attacked by him, but came out to meet him; and on the twenty-firſt of September, at day-break, they ſet upon his little army at Preſton-pans, ſeven miles eaſt of Edinburgh, and totally defeated it, making moſt of his infantry priſoners. The dragoons made their eſcape to Berwick with little loſs, ſave that of the brave colonel Gardiner, a gallant officer, who diſdained to ſave his life at the expence of his honour. From this victory the young pretender reaped manifold and important advantages. His followers were armed, his party encouraged, and his enemies intimidated. He was ſupplied with a train of field artillery and a conſiderable ſum of money, and ſaw himſelf poſſeſſed of all Scotland except the fortreſſes, the reduction of which he could not pretend to undertake without proper implements and engineers.

Theſe advantages ſpread a general conſternation throughout England; but all orders and ranks vied with each other in diſplaying their loyalty. Several noblemen raiſed regiments at their own expence (which however were afterwards paid for by the public) and many aſſociations were entered into for the ſupport of his majeſty's crown and dignity, and the conſtitution in church and ſtate. The ſucceſs of the rebellion, and dread of a threatened invaſion from France, having cauſed a great run upon the Bank, above eleven hundred merchants and eminent tradeſmen met, and ſubſcribed their names to an agreement not to refuſe Bank notes in any payment to be made to them. In Ireland every vigorous and ſalutary method was alſo purſued, to prevent any abetting of the rebellion there by the friends of France and popery; and a reward of fifty thouſand pounds was publiſhed, in purſuance of the addreſs of the Iriſh parliament, for apprehending the pretender's eldeſt ſon. It muſt alſo be obſerved, that although the rebels had made themſelves maſters of Edinburgh, yet the caſtle, which is a very ſtrong fortreſs, was ſecured by general Gueſt, an officer of experience and capacity, who had a good garriſon under him; and upon the firſt news of the rebels advancing towards the city, he had taken care to ſecure all the ſmall arms he could lay hold of, which, with the money of the two Banks, were removed into the caſtle. Immediately after the defeat of Cope, the ſix thouſand Dutch troops, and three battalions of guards, with the ſeven regiments of infantry, now arrived from Flanders, were ordered to begin their march northward, under the command of field-marſhal Wade, who received orders to aſſemble an army, which marched to Newcaſtle; but the inclemency of the weather, and the fatigue that the Engliſh veterans had undergone in the campaign in the Netherlands, occaſioned a general indiſpoſition and a great mortality among the men. This obliged the marſhal to continue at Newcaſtle, where his army was gradually reinforced by ſeveral new-raiſed regiments of volunteers to 14,000 men.

The parliament meeting on the ſixteenth of October, his majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes; in which he gave them to underſtand, that an unnatural rebellion had broke out in Scotland; and that he relied upon their affections to him, and their care and concern for the public ſafety, to take ſuch ſteps as might enable him to extinguiſh this rebellion effectually, to prevent any foreign power from aſſiſting the rebels, and to reſtore the peace of the kingdom. Both houſes returned the moſt dutiful and zealous addreſſes to his majeſty; ſo that the whole ſouthern part of the united kingdom was preparing for defence. A general ſenſe of the national danger had diffuſed itſelf through every rank of people, and united them as one man, to repel the common calamity with which they were threatened. The commons ſuſpended the Habeas Corpus act; and ſeveral perſons were apprehended on ſuſpicion of treaſonable practices. The government being apprehenſive of a deſcent from France, appointed admiral Vernon to command a ſquadron in the Downs, to obſerve the motions of the enemy by ſea, eſpecially in the harbours of Dunkirk and Boulogne; and his cruizers took ſeveral ſhips carrying ſoldiers, officers, and ammunition, for the ſervice of the young pretender in Scotland.

This enterpriſing youth, after having made ſome unſucceſsful attempts to cut off the communication between the caſtle and city of Edinburgh; and finding his army now increaſed to eight thouſand men, reſolved to make an irruption into England, which he accordingly entered by the weſt border, on the ſixth day of November: on the twelfth he inveſted Carliſle, which ſurrendered in leſs than three days. Here he found a conſiderable quantity of arms, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king of Great Britain. Field-marſhal Wade had indeed put himſelf in march to relieve the place; but when he had advanced as far as Hexham he heard of its ſurrender. On the twenty-fourth the rebels, without any moleſtation, arrived at Lancaſter, and on the twenty-ninth took poſſeſſion of Mancheſter, where they formed a regiment of thoſe who had joined them in England, giving the command thereof to Mr. Townley.

By this time the duke of Cumberland was arrived from the Netherlands, and was followed by another detachment of dragoons and infantry. On the twenty-ſixth of November his royal highneſs ſet out to take upon him the command of the army, then on its march into Lancaſhire. In the beginning of December the rebels left Mancheſter, paſſed the river Merſey, and advanced to Congleton, as if they intended to meet and engage the duke, whoſe advanced guard was then at Newcaſtle-Under-Line; but ſuddenly they turned off to the left, and marched into Derby, ſeeming to have an intention to ſlip by the duke, and take their way directly to London, where, when the news arrived, it occaſioned inexpreſſible conſternation. The troops in the neighbourhood of the capital were ordered to march, and form a camp upon Finchley common. The run upon the Bank grew more preſſing, and all the public funds fell in their prices. On the fourth of December the rebels entered Derby; and ſoon after, contrary to all expectation, began to retreat northward by the route they came. As ſoon as his royal highneſs the duke got notice of their retreat, he ſet out in purſuit of them with all the cavalry in his army, and one thouſand of his infantry, mounted on ſuch horſes as the country afforded. Marſhal Wade, who had marched ſouthward as far as Wakefield after the rebels, detached a conſiderable body of horſe, under the command of major-general Oglethorpe, for the ſame purpoſe, and returned with the reſt of his army to Newcaſtle. On the eighteenth of December the duke came up with the rear of the rebels at Clifton in Northumberland, and after a ſmart attack drove them from the village with ſome loſs. On the thirtieth his royal highneſs retook Carliſle, after a ſiege of nine days, making their rebel garriſon priſoners, their main army having now reached Scotland: the duke then returned to London. Thus the matter ſtood at the cloſe of the year 1745.

On the fifth of January, 1746, the rebels, who had been ſome time before reinforced by a ſmall body of French and Iriſh under the duke of Perth, who had a commiſſion as general of thoſe auxiliaries, cloſely inveſted the caſtle of Stirling *, in which major general Blakeney commanded: but being ſo very little uſed to enterprizes of this kind, they made little progreſs in their operations. By this time a conſiderable body of forces was aſſembled at Edinburgh, under the conduct of lieutenant-general Hawley, who reſolved to relieve Stirling caſtle, and advanced to Linlithgow, on the thirteenth day of January. Next day his whole army rendezvouſed at Falkirk, while the rebels lay encamped at Torwood. On the ſeventeenth they marched to attack the king's forces; and an engagement was fought on Falkirk moor, in which the forces under Hawley, though much ſuperior in numbers to the rebels, were ſhamefully defeated, and Hawley retreated to Linlithgow, and the next day to Edinburgh, leaving part of his tents and artillery to the victors, who reſumed their attempt againſt Stirling-caſtle.

Upon this misfortune at Falkirk, it was thought expedient that the duke of Cumberland ſhould take upon him the command of the army in Scotland. His royal highneſs accordingly haſtened thither, and put himſelf at the head of the troops at Edinburgh, which conſiſted of fourteen battalions of infantry, two regiments of dragoons, and fifteen hundred Highlanders from Argyleſhire, under the command of colonel Campbel. On the laſt day of January his royal highneſs began his march towards Stirling; but the rebels, inſtead of waiting for him, retired with the greateſt precipitation northward; the duke, with the royal army, following them as faſt as the ſeaſon, and exceſſive bad roads, would permit. He did not arrive at Aberdeen, however, till the twenty-ſeventh of February. The Heſſians under their hereditary prince arrived on the eighth at Edinburgh; for the Dutch troops, it was now diſcovered, could not act, as they conſiſted of part of the garriſons of Menin, Ypres, &c. which had engaged not to ſerve againſt France; and accordingly they were ſoon after ſent home.

* Sterling, Stirling, or Striveling, the capital of a county of the ſame name in Scotland, and a royal burgh, ſtands on the declivity of a ſteep rock, at the foot of which runs the river Forth, with a ſtrong caſtle incloſed with a wall, except towards the north, where it is bounded by the Forth, which is croſſed by a bridge of hewn ſtone. This caſtle commands the paſſes between the north and ſouth of Scotland, was the reſidence of Scottiſh kings, and parliaments were formerly held here. The Highlanders in the rebellion of 1715 endeavoured to poſſeſs themſelves of this caſtle, but were prevented by the late John duke of Argyll. Stirling lies thirty miles north-weſt of Edinburgh.

Mean

Mean while, the rebels reduced the caſtle of Inverneſs and Fort Auguſtus, and laid ſiege to Fort William, and Blair-caſtle of Athol, but failed in both thoſe attempts. They had the advantage in ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with the king's troops in the Highlands, which however was counterbalanced by the loſs they ſuſtained in the capture of their ſhip the Prince Charles (formerly the Hazard ſloop, ſurprized by them in the harbour of Montroſe) which they had fitted out and ſent to France for money and arms; in her return with which ſhe was ſeized by a party of lord Loudoun's men, with all her crew and cargo. The duke was obliged to wait at Aberdeen for a reinforcement from England, and till the river Spey ſhould become fordable; the Heſſians, with ſome Britiſh regiments, taking poſt at Perth.

On the eighth of April his royal highneſs, with the army under his command, marched from Aberdeen, and on the twelfth paſſed the Spey without oppoſition, the rebels retiring upon his approach, though they might eaſily have obſtructed his paſſage: but indeed, from this, and many other parts of their conduct, they appear to have been under a total infatuation. His royal highneſs then proceeded to Nairn, where he received intelligence that the enemy had advanced from Inverneſs to Culloden, about the diſtance of nine miles from the royal army, with intention to give him battle. In the mean while, the earl of Cromartie and his ſon, who, with two hundred and eighty of their men, had been in Caithneſs to raiſe money and recruits for the rebels, were attacked by the earl of Sutherland's militia, routed, and Cromartie and his ſon, eighteen officers, and one hundred and eighty-five private men made priſoners.

While the duke was reſting in his camp at Nairn to refreſh his men, the rebels, in the night of the fifteenth, marched with an intention to attack the royal army by ſurprize before day-light; but their deſign proved abortive, by reaſon of ſome miſmanagement amongſt them; whereupon they returned to Culloden, reſolving in that ſtation to wait for the duke, who on the ſixteenth of April decamped from Nairn early in the morning; and after a march of nine miles, perceived the rebels drawn up in order of battle, to the number of five thouſand only, as they had not been able to aſſemble all their forces together, for want of money and proviſions. The royal army, which was much more numerous, much better cloathed, fed, and diſciplined, was drawn up in excellent order, and about two o'clock in the afternoon the engagement began.

The rebels, with their uſual fury, attacked the left wing of the royal army, by which ſome regiments of the firſt line were put into diſorder: but thoſe regiments being ſupported by the ſecond line, and the right wing of the rebel army not being properly ſupported by their left, the whole fell into confuſion; and his royal highneſs obtained a complete victory, with a very ſmall loſs. Twelve hundred rebels were ſlain on the field and in the purſuit; and the road, as far as Inverneſs, was ſtrewed with dead bodies. The earl of Kilmarnock was taken in the field of battle; the lord Balmerino ſurrendered himſelf a few days after; the marquis of Tullibardine followed his example: but the moſt extraordinary part of the priſoners were four ladies, who had been very inſtrumental in procuring friends for the Pretender, and one of them in particular, the lady Mackintoſh, though her huſband was at that time an officer in the king's army, had forced a great many of her clan to join the young pretender.

The victory of Culloden put a final end to the rebellion; but the duke continued with the army ſome time, to give proper orders for ſecuring the tranquillity of the country, till having received the ſubmiſſion of almoſt all the clans and chieftains, he returned at length to London, which he entered amidſt the acclamations of the people.

As for the vanquiſhed adventurer, upon his retreat from the field of battle, he had a conference with ſome of his principal adherents; but finding his affairs deſperate, he deſired each of them to conſult his own ſafety, while he himſelf, aſſuming various diſguiſes, wandered from place to place among the mountains and weſtern iſlands, often without any attendant, till two ſhips ſent on purpoſe from France to the coaſt, took him and about thirty of his followers on board, and landed him about the middle of Auguſt at Reſcourt, near Morlaix in Brittany, after he had endured, for near four months, a ſeries of greater hardſhips and calamities than perhaps any other perſon ever ſurvived.

The rebellion thus happily terminated, and peace and ſecurity reſtored to theſe kingdoms, addreſſes poured in from all quarters to his majeſty, felicitating him upon the ſucceſs of his arms, in ſupport of his rightful and juſt cauſe, againſt the inſolent attempts of a proſcribed popiſh pretender. The two houſes of parliament led the way in theſe congratulations, and alſo voted their thanks to his royal highneſs for his great and eminent ſervices, and ſoon after ſettled twenty-five thouſand pounds per annum on him and his male-iſſue.

It was now neceſſary, that thoſe who had violated their fidelity and allegiance to their ſovereign, and involved their country in ſuch calamity and confuſion, ſhould expiate their crimes, by ſatisfying the demands of national juſtice: the ſacrifices made to this claim, however, were as few as could be expected. An act was paſſed for attainting the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie; and the lords Balmerino and Lovat were tried, and found guilty by their peers. Cromartie was afterwards pardoned as to life, and Kilmarnock and Balmerino were beheaded on Tower-hill the eighteenth of Auguſt. Lovat underwent the ſame puniſhment the ſpring of the ſucceeding year. Charles Ratcliffe, eſquire, commonly called the earl of Derwentwater, was alſo beheaded on the eighth of December, by a rule of the court of King's Bench, in purſuance of a ſentence paſſed upon him in 1715, for being concerned in the rebellion in that year. As to the inferior agents in that unnatural attempt, a very inconſiderable number were executed, but a much greater tranſported to America; and notwithſtanding all the outcries of Jacobitiſm, ſtrict juſtice demands the acknowlegement, that no government ever ſhewed more mercy on ſuch an occaſion. A public thankſgiving was held on the ninth of October for the ſuppreſſion of the rebellion, which was obſerved with every ſpecies of public rejoicings that a grateful people could exhibit.

Having

Having thus connected into one view what relates to the riſe, progreſs, and extinction of this rebellion, I ſhall now take a retroſpect of the other remarkable events, as well foreign as domeſtic, of the year 1746.

We have already obſerved, that his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the ſixteenth of October, 1745; the primary proceedings of which related only to the domeſtic affairs concerning the rebellion; but as the ſuppreſſion of that commotion was ſpeedily expected, the parliament began to give their attention to the general ſtate of Europe; and on the fourteenth of January, 1746, the king went to the houſe of peers, and in a ſpeech from the throne gave his parliament to underſtand, that the States-general had made preſſing inſtances for his aſſiſtance in the preſent conjuncture, when they were in ſuch danger of being oppreſſed by France in the Netherlands: that he had promiſed to co-operate with them towards oppoſing the further progreſs of their enemies, and even concerted meaſures for that purpoſe. He declared, that it was with regret that he aſked any further aids of his people: he exhorted them to watch over the public credit; and expreſſed his entire dependence on their zeal and unanimity.

To this ſpeech both houſes returned the moſt loyal addreſſes, replete with the warmeſt expreſſions of duty and affection: but juſt as the grand affair of the ſupplies came upon the carpet, a violent commotion happened in the miniſtry, who, on the tenth of February, were all about to reſign their places, as the duke of Newcaſtle and the earl of Harrington, the two ſecretaries of ſtate, actually did; and the earl of Granville was appointed pro tempore ſecretary of ſtate. However, after bringing their royal maſter to their own terms, the former perſons again reſumed their ſeveral functions; and the quiet of the cabinet being again reſtored, the houſe of commons provided for forty thouſand ſeamen, nearly the ſame number of land forces, beſides fifteen regiments raiſed by the nobility, on account of the rebellion, and about twelve thouſand marines. They ſettled funds for the maintenance of the Dutch and Heſſian troops that were in England, as well as for the ſubſidy to the landgrave: they granted three hundred thouſand pounds to the king of Sardinia; four hundred thouſand pounds to the queen of Hungary; three hundred and ten thouſand pounds to defray the expence of eighteen thouſand Hanoverians; about thirty-three thouſand pounds in ſubſidies to the electors of Mentz and Cologne; and five hundred thouſand pounds in a vote of credit and confidence to his majeſty. The whole charge of the current year amounted to ſeven millions two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, which was raiſed by the land and malt taxes, annuities on the additional duties impoſed on glaſs, ſpirituous liquors, a lottery, a deduction from the ſinking fund, and exchequer bills, chargeable on the firſt aids that ſhould be granted in the next ſeſſion of parliament.

With regard to the proceedings of this ſeſſion, they were ſo unanimous as ſcarce to produce a ſingle debate, and therefore are beſt known by the titles of the acts that were paſſed. By one of theſe, the ſum of twenty-five thouſand pounds per annum was added to the revenue of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, for his gallant behaviour in ſuppreſſing the rebellion; and the thanks of both houſes was voted him upon his gaining the battle of Culloden. By another, the government was impowered to ſummon all ſuſpected perſons in Scotland to appear at Edinburgh, or wherever it ſhould be judged expedient, and oblige them to find ſureties for their peaceable deportment. By a third, the earl of Kellie, the viſcount Strathallern, the lord Pitſligo, and ſeveral other Scottiſh noblemen and gentlemen, were declared attainted, unleſs they ſurrendered themſelves to a juſtice of the peace before the twelfth day of July 1746. By a fourth, the exerciſe of the epiſcopal religion was prohibited in Scotland, except by ſuch miniſters or paſtors as qualified themſelves according to law, by taking the oaths to the government; an act which was deemed the more neceſſary, as moſt of the epiſcopalians in that kingdom were profeſſed Jacobites. A fifth act was paſſed for effectually diſarming the Highlands of Scotland, and preſerving the peace of that part of the country; for reſtraining the uſe of the Highland dreſs, which was ſuppoſed to keep up party-diſtinctions; for indemnifying ſuch perſons as had acted in defence of his majeſty's perſon and government, during the continuance of the unnatural rebellion; and for obliging the maſters and teachers of private ſchools in Scotland to take the oaths to his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors.

As to the war upon the continent this year, it raged with double violence, notwithſtanding the election of an emperor, and the re-eſtabliſhment of peace among the princes of the empire. The acquiſitions made by France in the Netherlands after the battle of Fontenoy, were equally dreadful to the ſurrounding nations, who expected that the remaining part of thoſe important provinces would be ſpeedily over-run. The Dutch in particular were overwhelmed with conſternation, as, after all their temporizing and daſtardly ſubmiſſions to the French court, they ſaw the uplifted arm of the ambitious Lewis ready to tear from them their whole barrier; for, taking advantage of the rebellion in England, which had occaſioned the recal of ſo many of our troops from the Netherlands, he had made a rapid progreſs in his conqueſts. His general, M. Saxe, in the beginning of February this year, laid ſiege to the town of Bruſſels; and though the place was defended by a garriſon of ten thouſand men, yet he compelled it to ſurrender after fifteen days open trenches, and made the garriſon priſoners of war: in fine, the enemy were in poſſeſſion of all the Auſtrian Netherlands, a few fortreſſes excepted. The Dutch looked for nothing leſs than an immediate invaſion of their province of Zealand: the Orange party called aloud for an augmentation of their forces; and that the republic, ſhaking off the lethargy under which it had ſo long remained, ſhould purſue every vigorous meaſure to repel the approaching danger: the common people ecchoed back the cry; they demanded a chief to lead them to the field, and to fix the divided councils of the ſtate; they inſiſted that the prince of Orange ſhould be made ſtadtholder, and even mingled menaces with their demands. In this dilemma the States-general ſent count Boetſlaer to London, to repreſent the imminent danger which threatened the republic; and to ſollicit in the moſt preſſing terms the aſſiſtance of his Britannic majeſty, that the allies might have a ſuperiority in the Netherlands by the beginning of the campaign. The king was well diſpoſed to comply with their requeſt; but the rebellion in his kingdom, and the diſſenſions in his cabinet, had retarded the ſupplies, and embarraſſed him ſo much, that he found it impoſſible to make thoſe early preparations that were neceſſary to check the career of the enemy. An anſwer to this purport was given to the Dutch ambaſſador. At the ſame time, the friends of the prince of Orange failed of ſucceſs in their attempt to get him elected ſtadtholder; and the command of the few troops that remained for the defence of their country, was conferred on prince Waldeck, a foreigner.

The confederate army was aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Antwerp, on the twenty-fourth day of March, by marſhal Bathiani, who had only four battalions and nine ſquadrons of the Britiſh troops, thirty-five ſquadrons of the Dutch, ten battalions and ſixteen ſquadrons of Auſtrians, with ſixteen battalions and twenty-ſix ſquadrons of Hanoverians; in all, forty-four thouſand men, under his command, though a large reinforcement was ſpeedily expected, when prince Charles of Lorraine was to appear at the head of the army; but till then Bathiani was obliged to entrench his little army behind the Demer, about ten miles from Antwerp, and fourteen from Bruſſels, where marſhal Saxe was aſſembled with the army of France, conſiſting of one hundred and twenty thouſand men. The French, with their monarch at their head, took the field on the 24th of April, and immediately bent their march towards the confederates; and on the firſt of May obliged them to abandon their advantageous ſituation, and to retire to Antwerp, from whence they were alſo obliged to recede on the ſixth of May, when they retreated to Breda, the capital of Dutch Brabant, after leaving a garriſon of two thouſand men in Antwerp.

The French king immediately inveſted this place, which, unable to ſtop the progreſs of ſuch a formidable force, ſurrendered on the ninth of May; but the citadel ſuſtained a ſiege of ſeven days, when the garriſon ſubmitted on honourable terms. Encouraged by this ſucceſs, Lewis ordered the prince of Conti to inveſt Mons with a ſtrong detachment, one hundred and forty pieces of cannon, and eighty mortars. Though the garriſon conſiſted not of more than four thouſand men, they continued for ſome time to make a reſolute defence; but on the twenty-ſeventh day of July were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. The reduction of Mons was followed by that of St. Ghuilain and Charleroi. By the taking of theſe places the French monarch found himſelf abſolute maſter of Flanders, Brabant, and Hainault; and now he iſſued an edict, re-annexing to his crown for ever that part which formerly belonged to them by the treaty of Ryſwick in 1697, and which the French had been conſtrained to relinquiſh by the treaty of Utrecht; and his majeſty granted the adminiſtration of the re-united country to monſieur Gerardine.

All this time the allies continued impotent ſpectators of the rapid conqueſts of the enemy, who had now only one formidable town from the ſea to the biſhopric of Liege, unreduced by their army: this was Namur, capital of the province of that name, ſituate at the confluence of the Sambre and the Maeſe; and this place they were determined to bring to their obedience. The confederate army, however, being at length reinforced by the Heſſian troops from Scotland, and a freſh body of Auſtrians under count Palfi, ſo as to amount in the whole to about eighty thouſand men; they reſolved to take the field, and make head againſt the enemy. Prince Charles of Lorraine, who had now taken the command, foreſeeing the ſtorm that was preparing againſt Namur, came to the reſolution of marching to the protection of that important city, and on the eighteenth day of July took poſt in an advantageous ſituation in that neighbourhood, and in ſight of the French army, which was encamped at Gemblours.

Here he continued till the eighth of Auguſt, when a detachment of the enemy, under count Lowendahl, ſeized upon Huy, where they found a large magazine belonging to the confederates, whoſe communication with Maeſtricht was thus cut off: upon which prince Charles found himſelf under the neceſſity of quitting his advantageous poſt, of abandoning Namur to its own ſtrength, and retiring on the north ſide of the Maeſe, to draw his ſupplies of proviſion and forage from the duchies of Limberg and Luxemburg. Namur was immediately inveſted by thirty-five thouſand French, under the count de Clermont, who cauſed the trenches to be opened on the ſecond of September; and on the twenty-third the French, after the loſs of four thouſand men (from the vigorous defence made by the Auſtrian garriſon) took poſſeſſion of this important city. Mean while, the allied army lay poſted at Maeſtricht, where they were joined by ſir John Ligonier, with three Britiſh battalions, and by two battalions of Bavarians, being a part of five thouſand men which that elector, ſince his accommodation with the queen of Hungary, had granted to be taken into the pay of the confederates. Prince Charles then reſolved to give the enemy battle. With this view he croſſed the Maeſe, and advanced towards them: but marſhal Saxe, appriſed of his deſign, had poſted himſelf ſo advantageouſly at Tongres, twelve miles from Liege, that the confederates were obliged to return to Maeſtricht. But marſhal Saxe being reinforced by the body of troops under the count de Clermont, after the reduction of Namur, determined to bring the confederates to an engagement, who had repaſſed the river Jaar in their retreat. He accordingly croſſed that river after them on the tenth of October, N. S. encamping within a league of them, who were now convinced of the marſhal's intention to attack them; and therefore taking poſſeſſion of the villages of Liers, Warem, and Roucoux, the confederate generals drew up their forces in order of battle.

The French advanced in three columns, with a large train of artillery in their front; and about noon a terrible cannonading began, which laſted till two, with great execution on both ſides. Prince Waldeck, who commanded the left wing, was then attacked with great fury, and after an obſtinate reſiſtance, obliged to give way. The villages were aſſaulted in columns by brigades, who were continually replaced as they were repulſed by thoſe who were poſted there; till at length, ſuperiority of numbers prevailing, the allies were conſtrained to abandon thoſe poſts, and retreat towards Maeſtricht, with the loſs of five thouſand men, among whom, however, were reckoned very few officers; and the French purchaſed the honour of the day at an expenſive rate, having loſt upwards of nine thouſand men in the action, with a great number of eminent officers, and without obtaining any material advantage, ſince they could not prevent the confederates from making good their retreat to Maeſtricht. With this battle the campaign cloſed in the Netherlands. The allies paſſed the Maeſe, and took up their winter-quarters in the duchies of Limberg and Luxemburg, and the country along the Lower Maeſe, while the French diſpoſed of their troops in their newly-conquered places.

In Italy victory changed ſides this campaign; after having favoured the combined army of France and Spain, ſhe now declared herſelf for the queen of Hungary and the king of Sardinia. By the peace of Dreſden, which the court of Vienna had concluded with the king of Pruſſia, it had been enabled to ſend, without interruption, ſeveral large reinforcements to the troops in Lombardy, which turned the balance on the ſide of the empreſs queen: prince Lichtenſtein was at the head of 40000 Auſtrians, his Sardinian Majeſty commanded a body of 36000 of his own troops, while the joint armies of France and Spain, including the duke of Modena's troops, did not amount, in the whole, to above 73000 men. The timely arrival of ſuccours from Germany, to make a powerful diverſion on the ſide of the Mantuan, obliged the French and Spaniſh generals to bend their force to that quarter; and this not only relieved the city of Turin from a bombardment, with which it was threatened, but encouraged his Sardinian majeſty to open the campaign with new ſpirit and reſolution. In February, baron Leutrum, the Piedmonteſe general, inveſted and took the ſtrong fortreſs of Aſti; he afterwards obliged the Spaniards to retire from before the citadel of Alexandria, which they had kept blockaded all the winter, and made 1000 of them priſoners in this town. Caſal fell next into his hands, and he recovered Valenza; whereupon M. Maillebois retired with the remainder of his forces from Tortona, into the neighbourhood of Genoa, by which all the Montferrat was freed from an enemy.

Don Philip met with equal diſgraces on his ſide, being obliged to abandon Milan, the capital of his projected empire, on the 8th of March, and to retire to Pavia, whither he was cloſely followed by prince Lichtenſtein, who had ſent a detachment to retake Guaſtalla, which was immediately recovered; and the marquis of Caſtellaer having abandoned Parma, that city, with its artillery, and a large magazine, fell into the hands of the Auſtrians. Don Philip and count Gages, alarmed at the near approach of the enemy, retired under the cannon of Placentia, where they were joined, on the 3d of June, by the French forces under Maillebois, and by the little detached army under Caſtellaer.

In the mean time, his Sardinian majeſty, having recovered all the Piedmonteſe fortreſſes, and driven Maillebois into the Milaneſe, entered that dutchy, to invade the territories of Genoa; where, on the 31ſt of May, he reduced Novi, 25 miles north from Genoa, and then advanced towards the Po, with an intention to join the Auſtrians, and bring the Spaniards and their auxiliaries to an engagement. Before this junction could be effected, however, the army of the three crowns attacked the Auſtrians in their camp at St. Lazaro, which brought on a moſt deſperate battle, in which Count de Gages and M. Maillebois acquitted themſelves with the greateſt intrepidity, and had actually forced the entrance into the Auſtrian intrenchments, and ſeized ſome cannon which defended the lines; yet it all proved ineffectual; the better fortune of the Auſtrians prevailed, the combined forces were routed, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation to Placentia, whither the victors did not think proper to purſue them. The combined forces had nine thouſand men killed and wounded, and near ſix thouſand taken priſoners, while the Auſtrians loſt only four thouſand three hundred men.

A ſhort time after the Auſtrians were joined by the Piedmonteſe, the king of Sardinia aſſumed the chief command, and prince Lichtenſtein being obliged to quit the army, to recover his health, was replaced by the marquis de Botta. Gages and Maillebois, leaving the marquis de Caſtellaer with four hundred men, to defend Placentia, intrenched themſelves between the Lambro and the Adda: from this poſt his Sardinian majeſty, who was now at the head of ſixty-four thouſand men, reſolved to diſlodge them; which he accordingly effected by the battle of Rotto Freddo, fought on the ninth day of Auguſt, when the enemy was obliged to retreat, in great diſorder, to Tortona, with the loſs of eight thouſand men, a conſiderable number of colours and ſtandards, and eighteen pieces of cannon. The Auſtrians however ſuffered conſiderably, having four thouſand men killed outright, among whom was the gallant general Bernklau. Immediately upon this victory Placentia ſurrendered, and its garriſon of nine thouſand men were made priſoners of war. Don Philip continued his retreat into the territories of Genoa; but his army was, by this time, reduced to leſs than thirty thouſand men: ſo that, unable to maintain his ground, he put his troops again into motion, and returned into Provence. The court of Madrid, enraged at the ill ſucceſs of its arms, and thinking, by changing its general, to change its fortune, recalled count Gages from the command of the Spaniſh forces, which was again beſtowed upon the marquis de las Minas.

In the mean time, the victorious confederates appeared before Genoa, on the fourth day of December: the ſenate finding itſelf abandoned by its allies, and unable to make any reſiſtance, were obliged to deliver up the gates of their city to the Auſtrians, together with all their arms, artillery, and ammunition. The marquis de Botta was left in the ſubjected city, with ſixteen hundred men; but this general, exacting the moſt ſevere contributions, and otherwiſe behaving in a haughty, and even cruel manner to this ſubjected people, irritated beyond farther ſufferance, they flew to arms; and being joined by the peaſants of all the neighbouring villages, and privately inſtigated and encouraged by the ſenate, they became ſo formidable, as, in a few days, to drive the Auſtrians out of the territories of the republic, after having killed and made priſoners great numbers. On the other hand, marſhal Brown, with an Auſtrian army, paſſed the river Var, and took poſſeſſion of Vence, the firſt town on that ſide in France. The French troops under M. Belleiſle, who had been ſent to ſuperſede Maillebois, in their retreat, made the whole country a deſert.

During theſe tranſactions, an event happened, which had ſome influence on the affairs of Europe; this this was the death of Philip of Spain, in the ſixty-third year of his age. He had received, a little before his death, a letter from count Gages, with an account of the battle of San Lazaro; the loſs of which, that general attributed to the peremptory orders which had been ſent him from the court of Madrid, where the queen of Spain managed every thing as ſhe pleaſed; and this circumſtance, it was ſuppoſed, haſtened the king's end. He was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Ferdinand, born of Maria Louiſa Gabriela, ſiſter to the king of Sardinia. The ſame month (July) was remarkable for the death of Chriſtian VI. king of Denmark, who was ſucceeded by his ſon Frederick V. who had married the princeſs Louiſa, youngeſt daughter to king George II.

The naval tranſactions of this year redounded very little to the honour of the Britiſh nation. The reader may remember, that commodore Barnet was ſent in the year 1744 with a ſquadron to the Eaſt Indies, where he made ſome conſiderable captures: upon the intelligence of which, the French monarch granted a commiſſion to monſieur de la Bourdonnais, who had the command of a French ſquadron in thoſe parts, conſtituting him commander in chief, as well of the ſhips of war belonging to France in thoſe ſeas, as of thoſe belonging to their Eaſt India company. Monſieur de la Bourdonnais having received this commiſſion, applied his whole attention how to oppreſs the Britiſh company; and as the moſt effectual way determined to attempt the reduction of Madraſs or Fort St. George. Barnet, the Engliſh commodore, died in the Indies, and was ſucceeded in command by captain Peyton, who had under him ſix ſhips of war, from ſixty to forty guns, which was more than a match for the French commodore. Nevertheleſs, upon the latter's appearing before Madraſs, Peyton declined an engagement, and abandoned that important ſettlement, which was taken without oppoſition by la Bourdonnais in the beginning of September. The French afterwards made an attempt upon St. David's, another of our ſettlements in the Eaſt Indies; but by the valour of the garriſon, and the arrival of commodore Griffin from Europe, with a ſtrong reinforcement of ſhips of war, the enemy were obliged to abandon their enterprize.

Nothing of importance happened in America this year, though it was a ſcene that ſeemed to promiſe the greateſt ſucceſs to the arms of England. Indeed our miniſtry, encouraged by the reduction of Cape Breton, had projected the conqueſt of Quebec, the capital of Canada, ſituate on the river St. Laurence. With this view a powerful ſquadron was fitted out at Portſmouth in the beginning of April, and commiſſions were ſent to the governors of the Britiſh colonies in North America, impowering them to raiſe companies to join the armament from England, which was to be commanded by admiral Leſtock and general Sinclair; but by ſome unaccountable delays, the departure of the fleet was poſtponed till it was no longer the ſeaſon to riſque the great ſhips on the boiſterous coaſt of North America. On the other hand, the court of Verſailles were as little ſucceſsful in their operations by ſea; for having ſent a formidable ſquadron, under the duke d'Anville, with three thouſand land-forces on board, to the Weſt Indies, as a convoy to a large fleet of merchant ſhips bound to that part of the world, and afterwards to undertake ſomewhat of importance againſt our ſettlements in North America, they met with ſuch ſtorms, and were afflicted with ſuch a ſickneſs, upon their voyage to Chebucto harbour in Nova Scotia, where they caſt anchor on the ſixteenth of September, that they could undertake nothing, and returned in a ſhattered and miſerable condition to Europe, after having loſt the duke their chief commander.

The Britiſh miniſtry, not willing that the expenſive armament they had fitted out for the reduction of Quebec, ſhould be wholly uſeleſs to the nation, reſolved it ſhould attempt a deſcent upon the coaſt of Brittany; if poſſible, to make themſelves maſters of port l'Orient, the repoſitory of all the ſtores and ſhips belonging to the French Eaſt-India company. The ſquadrons deſtined for this expedition, conſiſted of ſixteen great ſhips, eight frigates, and two bomb-ketches, commanded by Richard Leſtock, Eſq; who, ſince his acquittal by his court-martial, had been made admiral of the blue; eight battalions of land troops, with a detachment of matroſſes and bombardiers, were embarked in thirty tranſports, under the conduct of lieutenant general St. Clair; and the whole ſailed from Plymouth on the fourteenth day of September, ſteering directly for the coaſt of Brittany, which they made on the ſeventeenth, and at night anchored in the road of Polduc.

The appearance of ſo numerous a fleet, occaſioned unſpeakable terror among the inhabitants of the coaſt, as the beſt of its militia had been either ſent to Flanders and Italy, or to America, with the duke d'Anville; ſo that if the Britiſh forces had immediately landed, nothing could have prevented their ſurpriſing the city of Port l'Orient; but as they did not make their deſcent till the twentieth, in the afternoon, the French took the advantage of this delay, to put themſelves in as good a poſture of defence as time and circumſtances would allow. The ramparts were mounted with cannon from the ſhips in the harbour; new works were raiſed with ſurpriſing expedition; the garriſon was reinforced by ſeveral bodies of regular troops; and great numbers were aſſembled from all parts; ſo that our forces were in danger of being ſurrounded in an enemy's country. General St. Clair however cauſed a ſmall battery to be built, and began to open trenches before the place; but the fire from the town was ſo greatly ſuperior to that of the Engliſh, and ſtill continued to encreaſe; and admiral Leſtock declaring, in repeated meſſages, that in ſuch an advanced ſeaſon of the year, he could not, nor would not, continue with the great ſhips on that dangerous coaſt; St. Clair found there was nothing left for him but to retreat, which he effected in good order, and reimbarked with his troops on the twenty-eighth. Aſhamed, however, to quit the enemy's coaſt without doing ſomething, the fleet ſailed to Quiberon Bay, where they deſtroyed the Ardent, a French ſhip of the line, and afterwards made a deſcent on the peninſula, while the little iſlands of Houat and Heydic were reduced by the ſailors. This, however, was an enterprize as ill concerted as that againſt Port L'Orient had been executed; for theſe being almoſt deſart iſlands, the taking of them could anſwer no purpoſe. About the middle of October our fleet ſailed from the French coaſt, and returned to England. Thus this great armament, twice baffled in its enterprizes, produced nothing but blunders and laughter; whereas every other part of the war was too ſerious and too terrible.

The parliament meeting on the eighteenth of November, the king made a ſpeech to both houſes; in which, after taking notice of the ſignal ſucceſs which had attended the arms of his good allies the empreſs-queen and the king of Sardinia in Italy; and that an irruption was now actually making into France, by which that kingdom muſt be greatly diſtreſſed; he acquainted them, that having had ſome intimations of the enemy being inclined towards a pacification, he, to ſhow his ſincere diſpoſition towards the ſame, had conſented to the holding conferences at Breda; but that, in the mean time, he thought it highly neceſſary to take proper meaſures for purſuing the war with vigour; and for that purpoſe, that the confederate army in the Netherlands might be ſeaſonably augmented. He ſaid, he was ſorry to be obliged at the ſame time to acquaint them, that by reaſon of the unavoidable accidents and conſequences of war, the funds appropriated for the ſupport of his civil government had for ſome years paſt fallen greatly ſhort of the revenue intended and granted by parliament; and therefore he relied on their known affection to him, to find out ſome method to make good this deficiency.

The conductors of the former oppoſition in the houſe of commons, being now almoſt all of them concerned in, or connected with the adminiſtration, that houſe breathed only the moſt affectionate and complying addreſſes, which they enforced with a liberality that almoſt exceeds the bounds of credibility; for when they came to conſider the ſupply, they voted four hundred and thirty-three thouſand pounds to the empreſs-queen of Hungary, and three hundred thouſand to the king of Sardinia: they granted four hundred and ten thouſand pounds for eighteen thouſand Hanoverians, and one hundred ſixty-one thouſand ſix hundred and ſeven pounds for ſix thouſand Heſſians: they continued the ſubſidies to the electors of Cologne, Mentz, and Bavaria; and gave five hundred thouſand pounds to enable his majeſty to carry on the war with advantage: in a word, the whole of the ſupply amounted to no leſs than nine millions four hundred and twenty-five thouſand two hundred and fifty-four pounds. This was raiſed by a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound; by transferable annuities, at an intereſt of four, and a premium of ten per cent. and by new duties on houſes and windows, on coaches and wheel-carriages.

The king, in return for this liberality of his commons, and to convince his people in general that he was deſirous, by every poſſible means, to reduce the public expence, ſent a meſſage by Mr. Fox, ſecretary at war, to the houſe of commons, ſignifying his majeſty's conſent to the reduction of three regiments of horſe into dragoons, and propoſed the diſbanding the third and fourth troops of his own life-guards; by which reduction about ſeventy thouſand pounds a-year would be ſaved to the public; and, in caſe of neceſſity, a more numerous body of troops might be furniſhed for the ſame money. This propoſition was received by the commons with the warmeſt ſentiments of gratitude and thankfulneſs, which they expreſſed by a moſt loyal and affectionate addreſs. The enemies of England, however, affected to conſider this inſtance of oeconomy in her king as a proof of his inability to proſecute the war: but their rejoicing on this account ſoon received a deadly damp, on hearing that the commons of Britain, who were chiefly to be affected by the expence, had voluntarily, and almoſt unanimouſly, voted a larger ſum than had ever been granted in any one year for carrying on the war.

The ſpirit and zeal in the Engliſh parliament were in great meaſure owing to the pride and arrogance of the court of Verſailles. The States-general had received a public memorial in the year 1745 from the French monarch, inviting them to hold a general congreſs; to which they conſented: but the hard and unacceptable conditions propoſed by Lewis to their High Mightineſſes, rendered the negociation unſucceſsful. However, it gave riſe to the opening of conferences in this preſent year, 1746, at Breda, the capital of Dutch Brabant, where the earl of Sandwich, the Britiſh plenipotentiary, and the marquis de Puiſieux, the plenipotentiary of France, met count Waſſenaer, the Dutch miniſter, on the eighteenth of September, each of them being commiſſioned to enter upon a treaty for preventing the calamities of ſo ruinous a war: the count de Harrach was alſo ſent as a plenipotentiary from the court of Vienna. The conduct of the French, however, ſoon evinced their little inclination of coming to an accommodation. The firſt propoſal made by the earl of Sandwich was, that a ceſſation of hoſtilities ſhould immediately take place: but the French miniſter would conſent to no armiſtice, without the allies would accept of ſuch conditions as ſhould be dictated by the court of Verſailles. He even declared, that he had no power to admit of the title of Imperial majeſty, aſſumed by the court of Vienna, unleſs his court was indemnified for the extraordinary expences of the war occaſioned, he ſaid, by the obſtinacy of the queen of Hungary, and unleſs that princeſs would give full ſatisfaction to all the allies of France. He added, that he had inſtructions to admit of no mention, in the preliminaries, of the houſe of Stuart as having no right to the crown of Great Britain; becauſe his moſt Chriſtian majeſty would be entirely free and unreſtrained in reſpect to that houſe. From theſe arrogant declarations, which were more ſuitable to an abſolute conqueror than a negociator, it evidently appeared that the French were far from being heartily diſpoſed to a peace: on the contrary, they were reſolved to try the event of another campaign, during which they hoped they ſhould be able either to draw off the Dutch from their connections with the allies, or at leaſt to make themſelves maſters of the whole of their country. The conferences therefore immediately broke up, and the miniſters returned to their reſpective courts.

Ferdinand, the new king of Spain, immediately upon his acceſſion to the throne, took ſuch meaſures as ſeemed to indicate a diſpoſition to peace, and to promote the felicity of his ſubjects, by relieving them from all the perplexities of war. He not only manifeſted a reſentment againſt the French miniſters, whom he charged with having ſacrificed the true intereſts of his father, but actually made ſeveral overtures for terminating the differences between his crown and that of England. The Britiſh miniſtry hereupon ſent the marquis de Tabernega, a Spaniſh nobleman, who was, or pretended to have been, formerly a favourite of the new king, when prince of Aſturias, and who had long reſided in England, to Madrid, and entruſted him with propoſals to his Catholic majeſty; but from the courſe of the proceeding, it did not appear that this nobleman retained the leaſt degree of influence with Ferdinand, or was ever permitted to return into his preſence. Nevertheleſs, the negociation went ſo far, that the king of Portugal, as being the moſt proper power in Europe, undertook the office of mediator, and ſir Benjamin Keene was ſent to Liſbon on the part of Great Britain; but the influence of the queen-mother and the French party, with whom ſhe acted in the ſtricteſt concert, predominated in the councils of the court of Madrid: and this pacific ſcheme, however promiſing in appearance, proved in the end abortive.

This diſappointment, together with the rejection of a pacification at Breda, ſeem to have inſpired the Britiſh cabinet with a more than common martial ſpirit. The earl of Sandwich was ſent to the Hague to ſettle the contingencies of the war in the moſt effectual manner, and to bring the Dutch, if poſſible, to act upon the ſame plan as was purſued in the confederacy between England, Holland, and the houſe of Auſtria, againſt Lewis XIV. The concluſion of the laſt campaign, and the arrogance of the French in their late negociation, had by this time convinced their High Mightineſſes, that nothing leſs than the revival of ſuch a confederacy could oppoſe the irreſiſtible force of France, or preſerve their own liberties. Obliged, therefore, to conſult their own ſecurity in that of their allies, lord Sandwich found them in a diſpoſition to embrace his propoſals, and to adopt the moſt vigorous and reſolute meaſures; and a convention was entered into, by which Great Britain was to furniſh forty thouſand men, the States-general the like number, and the empreſs-queen ſixty thouſand; in all, one hundred and forty thouſand; theſe were to be excluſive of garriſons: and her Imperial majeſty alſo obliged herſelf to maintain ten thouſand men in the duchy of Luxemburg, to effect a junction of ſixty thouſand Auſtrians and thirteen thouſand Piedmonteſe, for the purpoſe of making an irruption into France on the ſide of Provence: and, laſtly, to employ a ſeparate body of fifty thouſand men on the Panaro, to keep in awe the king of the Two Sicilies, who, tho' he had re-embraced his neutrality, ſtill kept a conſiderable body of troops in pay. The Dutch being at length brought to act with reſolution, the duke of Cumberland ſet out for Holland about the beginning of December, to concert with marſhal Bathiani the plan of operations for the next campaign, in which he was to act as commander in chief of the confederate forces.

Before I conclude the events of this year, I muſt take notice of the diſmiſſion of the gallant admiral Vernon from his majeſty's ſervice. The great merits of this naval officer were univerſally acknowleged; but he had a warmth in his diſpoſition which frequently hurried him into exceſſes of reſentment which in his cooler moments he muſt certainly have condemned. He had thought himſelf ill uſed in ſeveral inſtances by the board of admiralty, to whom he had therefore ſet himſelf in open oppoſition, and had even, in defiance of their authority, exerted ſeveral privileges which belonged alone to that board. The lords commiſſioners expoſtulated with him thereupon. Their mildneſs had the contrary effect from what was intended by it: it begat in the admiral a contempt of their power, who, he thought, were afraid of diſplacing one ſo popular as himſelf. He anſwered their remonſtrances in the moſt harſh and indecent terms: he even went ſo faras to publiſh ſeveral lettetrs that had been ſent to him from that board, as well as from the miniſtry; many of which were ſuch as, in ſtrictneſs of honour, as well as in point of prudence, ought not to have been expoſed to view. Such a procedure was certainly not to be overlooked by any government that was willing to retain the leaſt ſhadow of authority. Mr. Vernon having openly avowed his being the publiſher of thoſe letters, the lords of the admiralty were forced to ſend for him, and to inform him that his majeſty had commanded them to ſtrike his name out of the liſt of the admirals; and the command of the ſquadron for Channel ſervice was beſtowed upon vice-admiral Martin, who was very active in ſuppreſſing the French privateers.

It was in this year that the court-martials on the admirals Matthews and Leſtock unanimouſly acquitted the latter, and declared Mr. Matthews incapable of ſerving in the royal navy for the future. It deſerves to be recorded, to the great honour of our conſtitution, that this court-martial having come to ſome inſulting reſolutions upon a proceſs being ſerved upon one of their members from the court of Common Pleas, tending to defame lord chief-juſtice Willes, who preſided in that court, were compelled to aſk pardon in open court of that magiſtrate, and to publiſh a recantation in the London Gazette.

The cruizers on all ſides, Engliſh, French, and Spaniards, were extremely active during the whole courſe of this year; and though we loſt a greater number of ſhips, this difference was more than compenſated, by the ſuperior value of the prizes taken from the enemy. From the French we took three ſhips of war, thirty-eight privateers, two Guinea ſhips, and ninety-four veſſels from St. Domingo and Martinico: and from the Spaniards, thirteen privateers and forty-ſeven merchant veſſels, including ſix regiſter ſhips, and ſeveral other veſſels, amounting in all (of both nations) to one hundred and forty-three. But war was not the only enemy to the opulence of Spain: its calamities were aggravated by the viſiting hand of heaven; and Lima, the capital of Peru, was ſwallowed up by a moſt tremendous earthquake, which began on the ſeventeenth of October, and continued till the tenth of November in very frequent and dreadful ſhocks, when it ended, after cauſing the total deſtruction of a populous city, ſix miles in circumference, as well as the fine port of Callao, and upwards of eighteen thouſand inhabitants, together with the public treaſure, to the amount of three millions of piaſtres, or about ſeven hundred thouſand pounds of our money, which had been accumulated there ſince the commencement of the war, and was not to be conveyed to Europe till the concluſion of a peace.

France,

France, notwithſtanding all her acquiſitions in the Netherlands, was ſo debilitated by her extraordinary efforts, that ſhe had only one violent puſh to make to enſure her the full completion of her extenſive projects. She could no longer depend on the king of Pruſſia, who had declared for a neutrality, as had alſo the princes of the empire. She was now deſtitute of the imperial name, authority, and troops: the forces of the elector-palatine and the landgrave of Heſſe no longer acted on her ſide; and the king of Naples had been obliged to recal his troops into his own dominions; ſo that ſhe was reduced, only with the aſſiſtance of Spain and Genoa, to make head againſt the forces of the Engliſh, Dutch, Auſtrians, and Piedmonteſe, which in a ſhort time muſt inevitably overpower all the reſiſtance ſhe could make. In this ſituation, it was reſolved by the council of Verſailles to make greater efforts than ever had been done in any former period. His moſt Chriſtian majeſty propoſed to open the campaign in perſon, at the head of one hundred and fifty thouſand men in the Netherlands; and ſixty thouſand were ordered to take the field in Provence. To give the greater effect to this immenſe armament, the French king revived in the perſon of marſhal Saxe, the title of marſhal de camp general, which empowered him to command not only the marſhals of France, but princes of the blood; an honour which had not been poſſeſſed by any perſon ſince the time of the great Turenne.

The duke of Cumberland had made excellent diſpoſitions for taking the field early in the ſpring; and accordingly, in the month of February 1747, though the ſeaſon was then remarkably ſevere, he began to draw the troops from their cantonments, and towards the latter end of March they took the field in three ſeveral bodies. His royal highneſs fixed his head-quarters at the village of Filberg, eleven miles from Breda, with eight thouſand Engliſh, eighteen thouſand Hanoverians, and ſix thouſand Heſſians; the Dutch were aſſembled at Breda, under prince Waldeck; and the Auſtrians, with four thouſand Bavarians, were collected in the neighbourhood of Venlo, on the eaſtern ſide of the Maeſe, under the command of marſhal count Bathiani: but though the whole army ſhould have conſiſted of one hundred and forty thouſand men, they did not amount to more than one hundred and twenty-ſix thouſand. Beſides, the confederates, through the inexcuſable negligence of the Dutch and Auſtrians, were ill provided even with the common neceſſaries of life; and were obliged, notwithſtanding their early appearance in the field, to continue inactive for ſix weeks together; while marſhal Saxe, in the mean time, kept his troops in their cantonments, between Antwerp, Bruges, and Bruſſels, where they were furniſhed with plenty of proviſions, and exempt from all kind of labour and fatigue. By keeping his troops in this good condition, he had leiſure to form a plan of operations which, if ſteadily purſued, bid fair to do credit to his new dignity. This was no other than to carry the arms of France into the very heart of the United Provinces, by inſtantly attacking Dutch Brabant. He tranſmitted his plan to the miniſtry at Verſailles, where a council was held to take it into conſideration; and being ſtrongly ſupported by cardinal Tencin and his party, and countenanced by the approbation of the monarch, it prevailed againſt the leſs ſanguine, but more prudent, part of the members; and orders were immediately diſpatched to the marſhal to begin his operations without delay, who had provided a large train of artillery at Ghent ready for the enterprize.

As a previous ſtep to this invaſion, a declaration was drawn up in the name of the French monarch, and communicated to the States-general by the abbé de la Ville, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's miniſter at the Hague. In this declaration great complaint was made of the States having afforded an aſylum in their dominions to the enemies of France, and thereby given them an opportunity of diſturbing the territories which ſhe had conquered from the queen of Hungary. The memorial farther imported, that the French king was obliged to take this ſtep by the neceſſity of war; but that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, to ſhew the tenderneſs and regard he ſtill retained for the republic, had given the moſt peremptory orders that his troops ſhould obſerve the ſtricteſt diſcipline, without interfering with the religion, government, or commerce of the republic. He likewiſe declared, that the countries and places, of which his army might be obliged to take poſſeſſion, ſhould be conſidered as no other than a pledge, which, as ſoon as the republic ſhould give him a ſufficient aſſurance they would no longer aſſiſt the enemies of his crown, he would readily reſtore.

Their High Mightineſſes had ſcarcely peruſed this famous memorial, when, to their terror and amazement, they found the French burſting open their barrier. Marſhal Saxe had entruſted the execution of his military operations againſt Dutch Flanders to count Lowendahl, who was his intimate friend and relation: and this general, aſſiſted by the marquis de Contades, marched from Ghent and inveſted Sluys, at the head of twenty-ſeven thouſand men. This fortreſs, formerly of conſiderable conſequence, but now in a declining condition, ſurrendered in a few days. The ſame was the fate of Sas Van Ghent, and of ſeveral other places of leſs importance, before the end of the month of April. The next place that Lowendahl inveſted was Hulſt; to the aſſiſtance of which the confederates ſent a detachment of three Engliſh battalions, under general Fuller. Part of theſe battalions being poſted in the fort of Sanberg, which covered Hulſt, continued to defend the place for ſome time with great reſolution, and even ſucceſs; but at length, overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to retreat to Welſthoorden, and leave the French to form the ſiege. The duke of Cumberland did indeed advance at the head of nine battalions, and made a ſurpriſing expeditious march, to ſave this important fortreſs; but juſt as he arrived in ſight of the town, it was infamouſly ſurrendered by the Dutch governor, though, it is ſaid, he had certain intelligence that theſe ſuccours would be there the very day he gave it up. But he was a mercenary hireling of France, as many more of his countrymen were at that time; and the firſt intimation the duke received of this event was by a general diſcharge of the artillery from the fortifications upon his troops; by which a great many lives were loſt, and his royal highneſs's own perſon in the moſt imminent danger. Lowendahl continuing his rapid progreſs, ſoon after compleated the reduction of all Dutch Flanders.

This ſucceſsful invaſion of their dominions by ſo powerful an enemy, at length rouſed the Dutch to ſuch a degree as procured a ſudden change in their government. The populace roſe in all parts of the United Provinces, exclaiming that they were now in a worſe condition than when invaded by Lewis XIV. in 1672; that they had been betrayed by their governors; and therefore, that it was high time to take the adminiſtration out of their hands, and veſt it in thoſe of a ſtadtholder; and that this ſtadtholder ſhould be no other than the head of the houſe of Orange. The name of this prince was William-Henry Frizo, prince of Naſſau-Diets, who had been left by William III king of England, ſucceſſor to the hereditary dominions of the houſe of Orange. The preſent prince, as hath been already obſerved, had eſpouſed the princeſs Anne, eldeſt daughter to his Britannic majeſty. The ſtates of Zealand were the firſt who, giving way to the national voice, and duly attentive to the intereſts of their country, appointed him their captain-general and admiral. Their example was followed by Rotterdam, and the whole province of Holland; and on the ſecond day of May his ſerene highneſs was inveſted with the power and dignity of ſtadtholder, captain-general, and admiral, of the ſeven United Provinces. This alteration in the Dutch government was productive of the moſt beneficial conſequences to the republic, to her allies, and indeed to all Europe. All commerce and contracts with the French were now prohibited; the peaſants were armed and exerciſed; a reſolution was made to augment the army with thirty thouſand men; the city of Amſterdam began to raiſe eighteen companies of militia, of one hundred men each; and ſeveral other cities followed their example. A council of war was eſtabliſhed for examining into the conduct of thoſe governors who had too haſtily given up the frontier towns; and orders were iſſued for commencing hoſtilities againſt the French, both by ſea and land.

In order alſo to counterbalance the great ſuperiority which the French poſſeſſed upon the continent, his Britannic majeſty formed a reſolution of engaging a body of Ruſſians in his ſervice. This meaſure had been ſome time in agitation; and the czarina, who had no reaſon to be ſatisfied with the court of Verſailles, ſeemed extremely well diſpoſed to agree to ſuch an expedient. The negociation, however, was attended with conſiderable difficulties; but at length her czarian majeſty ſigned a treaty with our court, whereby, in conſideration of an annual ſubſidy of three hundred thouſand pounds, ſhe engaged to keep on foot during the war, upon the frontiers of Livonia, a body of fifty thouſand foot, and forty or fifty gallies upon the coaſts of that province, to act in ſuch manner as his Britannic majeſty ſhould require in aſſiſtance of his allies. The States-general had been called upon early in this year, to take their ſhare both of the engagement and expence: but ſo dilatory had been their meaſures, that this proviſion was not ſtipulated till the ſummer; by which the advantages expected from this alliance were rendered ineffectual for this year's campaign.

So cloſe a connection, however, had now been eſtabliſhed between Great Britain and the States-general; and ſo ſenſible were the latter of the danger to which they were expoſed, that they were willing to co-operate heartily with the former in proſecuting the war: but as the Dutch had no good opinion of the ſitting parliament of Great Britain, which had worn ſo many various complexions, and which had concurred in ſuch various meaſures and oppoſitions, they inſiſted upon its being diſſolved, previous to their fully exerting themſelves. In order to remove all their doubts, his majeſty, notwithſtanding the ſeeming harmony ſubſiſting between him and this great aſſembly of the nation, reſolved, with the advice of his council, to diſſolve the preſent parliament, though it had not as yet ſat above ſix years. Accordingly, when the buſineſs of the ſeſſion was diſpatched, the king having given the royal aſſent to the ſeveral acts they had prepared, diſmiſſed them on the eighteenth of June, with a ſpeech filled with the moſt warm, the moſt tender, and the moſt grateful acknowlegements of the loyalty, zeal, and tenderneſs, he had experienced from them in the moſt critical emergencies of government: a conduct, he ſaid, that muſt for ever endear the memory of this parliament to poſterity. But, he obſerved, that as this parliament would neceſſarily determine in a ſhort time; and as nothing would give ſo much weight and credit to our affairs abroad in the preſent conjuncture, as to ſhew the dependence he had on the affections of his people, he had judged it expedient ſpeedily to call a new parliament, not in the leaſt doubting to receive new proofs of the ſame loyalty and affection of his faithful ſubjects in the choice of their repreſentatives. In conſequence of this declaration, the parliament was diſſolved, and writs were iſſued for ſummoning a new one. Among the laws paſſed this ſeſſion was an act for taking away and aboliſhing the heritable juriſdictions and tenor of ward-holdings in Scotland, which were reckoned among the principal ſources of thoſe rebellions which had broke out ſince the Revolution.

While count Lowendahl and the marquis de Contades were extending the French conqueſts in Dutch Flanders, marſhal Saxe, with their grand army, remained in their cantonments. The confederates, about the middle of April, began to rouſe from that ſtate of inaction, in which they had now continued above fourteen weeks, and formed a deſign to retake Antwerp: but this city was ſo effectually covered by the French grand army, and ſo well fortified and garriſoned, that they ſoon found the enterprize impracticable: upon which his royal highneſs the duke thought proper to take poſt between the Great and Little Nethes, to cover Bergen-op-Zoom and Maeſtricht. In the month of May the French king arrived at Bruſſels; and his general, marſhal Saxe having called in his detachments, made the whole army quit its cantonments, in order to diſlodge the confederates from the ſiege of Maeſtricht. With this view, he advanced towards Louvain; and the confederates perceiving his aim, put their army into motion alſo, to take poſt between that town and the enemy. On the twentieth day of July they took poſſeſſion of their ground, when the duke drew the army up in order of battle, placing his right at Beilen, and his left at Wirle; having in the front of the left wing the village of Val, or Laffeldt, in which he poſted five battalions of Britiſh and Hanoverian infantry. The French had taken poſſeſſion of the heights heights of Herdeeren, immediately above the allies, and both armies cannonaded each other till the evening.

By day-break, on the twenty-firſt of June, the French marſhal put his troops in motion; and by nine o'clock the confederate generals diſcerned the enemy's infantry marching down the hill, in a vaſt column, of ten battalions in front, and as many in depth, and advancing directly towards the village of Val, being a ſmall incloſure with five houſes in it, and which the confederates had ſtrongly fortified. It muſt be acknowleged, that no troops ever made an attack under more diſadvantages than thoſe of the French, on this occaſion. The ſituation of the ground was particularly againſt them; for, from ſeveral little eminences which commanded the face of the hill of Herdeeren, the Engliſh had placed batteries ſo as to play full upon their infantry, as well as upon the ſquadrons of horſe, their right and front flanks, during their deſcent. Add to this, that a cold rain, which had fallen almoſt inceſſantly for twelve or fourteen hours, had rendered the ground ſo ſlippery that the troops could hardly keep their feet. Notwithſtanding theſe obſtacles, and the heavy fire of the confederates, which did terrible execution among the French, they bore ſtill forwards with amazing reſolution, and about twelve o'clock began their attack againſt Val with great vigour and intrepidity; and were received with equal courage, and their firſt brigades diſperſed with prodigious loſs, as were their ſecond, third, and fourth diviſions; but freſh troops ſtill ſucceeding theſe with invincible perſeverance, the confederates, overpowered by numbers, were obliged finally to abandon the village, after it had been loſt and recovered four ſeveral times. The action was chiefly confined to this narrow ſpot, which was in a manner choaked with the bodies of the dead and wounded.

The duke of Cumberland perceiving how gallantly the Britiſh and Hanoverians behaved in the village, ordered the left wing to advance upon the French. The center likewiſe began to advance under prince Waldeck, who was at the head of the Dutch the whole day; and marſhal Bathiani brought up the Auſtrians towards Herdeeren, to annoy the flanks of the enemy. The French on their ſide prepared to receive the confederates, whoſe diſpoſitions, however, had been ſo well concerted as to enſure them the victory, in all human probability, when their plan was entirely overthrown, and the fortune of the day ſuddenly changed to their prejudice, by the daſtardly behaviour of ſome Dutch ſquadrons, who, perceiving the infantry before them preſſed hard upon by the French, inſtead of ſuſtaining them, turned their backs, and went off a full gallop to the right about, and in their flight overthrew five battalions of infantry of the confederate corps de reſerve, that were coming from the right towards Val. The French cavalry taking advantage of this confuſion, ruſhed furiouſly in among theſe ſcattered troops, whom they trampled under feet, and penetrated through and divided the lines of the combined army. The duke of Cumberland, who had rode to the head of the Dutch cavalry, and endeavoured, but in vain, to rally them, with difficulty rejoined the left wing; and in all probability the confederates would have ſuſtained a total defeat, had it not been for the exemplary bravery of ſir John Ligonier, who, by charging at the head of ſome Britiſh regiments of dragoons and a few ſquadrons of imperial horſe, the whole line of the French cavalry, with ſuch irreſiſtible fury as gave a check to their purſuit, enabled the duke of Cumberland to effect an orderly retreat to Maeſtricht. Sir John himſelf was taken priſoner in this gallant attack; but the regiment he commanded retired in excellent order. Beſides ſir John Ligonier, major-general count d'Yſſembourg, major-general Bland, colonel Conway, and lieutenant-colonel lord Robert Sutton, were ſome of them wounded, and all of them made priſoners: in a word, almoſt the whole loſs of the allies, amounting to ſix thouſand men, fell upon the Engliſh, Heſſians, and Hanoverians, they having in a manner oppoſed the whole French army, the ſhare of the Dutch and Auſtrians in the engagement, as well as their loſs, being too inconſiderable to be named. Notwithſtanding that the allies were compelled to yield the victory to the French, it was not till they had purchaſed it by the loſs of upwards of ten thouſand of their beſt troops, ſeveral ſtandards, and ſeveral pair of colours, with ſeven hundred priſoners taken, including ſixty officers, ſome of them perſons of diſtinction. After the battle, the garriſon of Maeſtricht was reinforced by two Engliſh, three Auſtrian, and five Dutch battalions; and next morning the allied army paſſed the Maeſe at Maeſtricht, and extended themſelves towards Viſt, in the duchy of Limberg, with their head-quarters at Heer, the French ſtill continuing at Tongres.

His moſt Chriſtian majeſty, in order to make the moſt of his late ſucceſs, determined to form the ſiege of Bergen-op-Zoom, the honour of conducting which he was pleaſed to confer on count Lowendahl, who, at the head of a detachment of thirty-ſix thouſand men, preſented himſelf before the place in the beginning of July. Bergen-op-Zoom is one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in Dutch Brabant: it was generally deemed impregnable, and had obtained the name of the Maiden Fortreſs, from its having never been reduced, though frequently beſieged by very conſiderable armies. It could not be blocked up by ſea; ſo that veſſels with proviſions and ammunition could ſail in and out of the harbour every day unmoleſted, while an army of twenty battalions and fourteen ſquadrons, detached by the States-general, under the prince of Saxe Hildburghauſen, was ſo ſtationed as to be able to relieve the garriſon, conſiſting of three thouſand men, with freſh troops at will. All theſe difficulties appeared ſo conſiderable, that it was the opinion of moſt people, even very good judges of the military art, that the French, by inveſting it, had committed a very raſh action; and the general to whom the operations had been conſigned would, in this enterprize, forfeit all the glory he had hitherto acquired. This was more particularly the belief of the people in England and Holland, who exulted before-hand in the mortification and diſappointment of the French king, which they looked upon as infallible: but the abilities, experience, and reſolution of count Lowendahl, and the ardour of his troops, warmed by his example, and fighting in a manner under the very eye of their ſovereign; joined to the negligence, inattention, and numberleſs faults of a ſuperannuated governor, effected what appeared to be, in the common courſe of ſuch affairs, impracticable.

Old baron Cronſtrom had been by the ſtadtholder appointed governor of Dutch Brabant, and had aſſumed the command of the garriſon of Bergen-op-Zoom, ſome little time before the French laid ſiege to the place. He was grown grey in the field, and his character ſtood unimpeached as to fidelity and courage. When count Lowendahl, on coming before the town, ſummoned him to ſurrender, he replied, that he would ſuffer himſelf to be buried under the ruins of the place before he would give up the favourite work of the famous engineer Coehorn. However, though an old commander may, by his advice and experience, prove of infinite ſervice in a council of war; yet the caſe is quite otherwiſe, when ſuch an one is to give life and movement to a numerous body of troops, and direct the operations of a garriſon, beſieged by a powerful and expert commander. Lowendahl was all fire and activity; Cronſtrom all phlegm and deliberation.

The eyes of all Europe were turned upon this ſiege, the moſt important and the moſt bloody (for the time it laſted) that had happened during the whole courſe of the war. From the ſixteenth day of July, N. S. to the fifteenth of September, every day, nay, almoſt each hour, was marked by ſome dreadful ſcene of horror and deſtruction, effected by the ſpringing of mines on each ſide, by the deſperate ſallies of the garriſon, and by the unremitting attacks of the beſiegers: the latter, however, were always the principal ſufferers; and we may preſume the ſiege would have been extended to a much greater length of time, had it ſucceeded only by the common methods practiſed on ſuch occaſions: but M. de Lowendahl having given out that he intended to make himſelf maſter of the ſeveral forts which defended the town before he ſhould make his grand attack, old Cronſtrom gave completely into the ſnare that was ſpread for him; and knowing that all thoſe forts were ſtill as tenable as ever; and preſuming that the dreadful execution made by his mines would at length damp the courage of the aſſailants, he gave himſelf up to an indolent ſecurity, which in the end proved fatal; for in the morning of the ſixteenth of September, the French general having thrown a prodigious quantity of bombs into the ravelin of Dedim, as ſoon as thoſe had their effect, the beſiegers threw themſelves into the foſſe, and mounted the breaches, burſt open the ſally-port of Fallenius, mounted four breaches in the baſtions of Pucelle and Coehorn, where they forced the intrenchments, drove all thoſe of the garriſon they found in their way from their poſts, ſpread themſelves from right to left on the curtains, formed in order of battle, and came down into the town before the body of the garriſon could be aſſembled. Baron Cronſtrom had ſo little apprehended an attempt of this kind, that he had not taken a ſingle precaution againſt it; and was actually ſlumbering out the indolence of age quietly in his quarters, where he would have been ſurpriſed and made priſoner by the enemy, had it not been for the amazing bravery of a body of Scots Highlanders, commanded by lord John Murray, who fell like lions upon the French who had ſurrounded his quarters, and fought until two thirds of them were killed upon the ſpot, and the remainder brought off the old governor, in ſpite of all the oppoſition of the enemy, to whom the place was now abandoned; while the troops that were encamped in the lines retreating with the utmoſt precipitation, all the forts in the neighbourhood immediately ſurrendered to the victors, who now became maſters of the whole navigation of the Schelde. The French king thought the conqueſt of Bergen-op-Zoom ſo important, that he made Lowendahl a marſhal of France immediately on the news being brought him. He alſo appointed count Saxe governor of the conquered Netherlands, and then returned to Verſailles elated with triumph. In a little time after this tranſaction, both armies retired into winter-quarters, when his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland returned to London, where he arrived on the thirteenth of November. Thus terminated the campaign of 1747, on the ſide of the Netherlands; a campaign replete with glory to the French; productive of infinite prejudice to the confederates; and particularly inglorious to the Dutch, by the loſs of their Maiden Fortreſs, which had never till now been violated by a foreign embrace.

I left the Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe, at the cloſe of the laſt year, purſuing the fugitive French, Spaniards, and Neapolitans, into the territories of Provence, under the conduct of count Brown, who had aſſumed the chief command on the abſence of his Sardinian majeſty, ſeized with the ſmall-pox. M. Belleiſle, who had ſucceeded Maillebois in the command of the French army, being greatly inferior to the Auſtrian general, was not able to oppoſe his progreſs, who ſent baron Roth, with twenty-four battalions, to undertake the ſiege of Antibes by land, while the Britiſh ſquadron under vice-admiral Medley was to aſſiſt him by ſea.

Antibes is a well-fortified town, ſituate in the Mediterranean, fifteen miles ſouth of Nice, and ſixty north-eaſt of Toulon. It was now defended by the chevalier de Sade, with a garriſon of eighteen hundred men; and all the neceſſary preparations were made for a vigorous defence. The Britiſh ſquadron having bombarded the town ſeverely for ſome time, baron Roth on the twentieth of January opened his trenches before it, while count Brown lay with the main army at Frejus, to cover the ſiege. One half of the town was reduced to aſhes; but the governor made a gallant defence, till M. Belleiſle, who had by this time received ſuch reinforcement as gave him the ſuperiority in the field, effected the paſſage of the Argens, and was advancing with a full reſolution to attack the Auſtrian general: but count Brown finding it impoſſible to continue his operations without expoſing his whole army to the moſt imminent danger, immediately raiſed the ſiege of Antibes, and repaſſed the Var in the beginning of February, without ſuffering any conſiderable loſs from the enemy.

Belleiſle having thus compelled the imperial general to abandon Provence; and receiving continual reinforcements till his army amounted to ſixty thouſand men, made himſelf maſter of Nice, Montalban, Villa Franca, and Ventimiglia, while the Auſtrians were forced to retire towards Final and Savona, in the dominions of Genoa, which were in the poſſeſſion of his Sardinian majeſty. In the mean time, another large body under count Schuylemberg, who had ſucceeded the marquis de Botta, co-operated with fifteen thouſand Piedmonteſe in an attempt to recover the city of Genoa.

The French miniſtry were too well acquainted with the importance of this republic to their cauſe, to neglect any meaſure that could contribute to its ſecurity. Large ſums of money were remitted to the ſenate: engineers and officers were ſent to diſcipline their troops and repair their fortifications. The duke de Boufflers was appointed by his moſt Chriſtian majeſty his ambaſſador-extraordinary to the republic, the better to animate them to a vigorous reſiſtance; and a large body of troops was detached from Belleiſle's army to co-operate with their forces: but theſe falling in with the Britiſh fleet, were either taken or driven back to France.

The operations of general Schuylemberg were retarded for a conſiderable time, by the ſeverity of the weather and badneſs of the roads; but theſe obſtacles being removed, the Auſtrian general preſented himſelf before Genoa on the thirty-firſt of March, at the head of forty thouſand men. Before he commenced hoſtilities, he uſed all his endeavours to perſuade the Genoeſe to ſubmit to the clemency of her Imperial majeſty; but they rejected his propoſitions with the utmoſt indignation, and declared their unanimous reſolution to be buried in the ruins of their capital rather than aſk for quarter, or ſubmit to the Auſtrian mercy, whoſe effects they had already ſo ſeverely felt. In the beginning of May Genoa was inveſted on all ſides; and Schuylemberg carried on his operations with ſuch ſkill, vigour, and intrepidity, that he ſeemed for ſome time in the faireſt way to ſucceed in the reduction of the place. The duke de Boufflers, beſides his character of ambaſſador to the republic, acted likewiſe as commandant of the troops that were in Genoa; while M. Belleiſle continued at Ventimiglia, with a view to penetrate into Piedmont and Lombardy, and compel the Auſtrians to abandon the ſiege. It was chiefly owing to this latter general that the Genoeſe were delivered from the calamities that threatened them: for though Schuylemberg was ſucceſsful in all his attacks upon the city, and had even made himſelf maſter of the ſuburbs of Biſagno; yet he was obliged to deſiſt from his enterprize, and raiſe the ſiege on the tenth day of June, to return into the Milaneſe, in order to join his Sardinian majeſty and count Brown, to cover Piedmont and Lombardy from the effects of M. Belleiſle. The Genoeſe, immediately on finding themſelves at liberty, with the aſſiſtance of the French and Spaniards in the city, made irruptions into the Parmeſan and Placentia, where, in ſpite of all the precautions of the duke de Boufflers, they committed the greateſt violences and cruelties, in revenge for the miſchiefs they had undergone from the enemy. Soon after, they had the misfortune to loſe the duke de Boufflers, who died at Genoa in the latter end of July, and was ſucceeded in his command by the duke de Richelieu.

Mean while, M. Belleiſle committed the execution of his project of an irruption into Piedmont to the chevalier de Belleiſle his brother, who ſet out on his expedition at the head of thirty-four thouſand French and Spaniards, and arrived on the ſixth day of July at the paſs of Exilles, a ſtrong fortreſs on the frontiers of Dauphiné, ſituate on the north ſide of the river Doria. His Sardinian majeſty, apprized of the enterprize which the chevalier had undertaken, had committed the defence of this important poſt to the count de Briqueras, with ten battalions of Piedmonteſe and four of Auſtrians, who had formed an encampment behind the lines, while divers detachments were poſted along all the paſſages of the Alps.

On the eighth of July the chevalier attacked the Piedmonteſe intrenchments with incredible bravery, but was conſtantly repulſed, with extraordinary loſs, during an engagement that laſted from ten o'clock in the morning till eight in the evening. This valiant general, however, determined not to ſurvive a miſcarriage, made one laſt effort to animate his diſpirited troops by his own glorious example, in which he emulated the braveſt of the ancient Romans. Snatching a pair of colours from the hand of an enſign, he called on thoſe neareſt him to follow his ſteps; and advancing with incredible intrepidity, amidſt a moſt furious diſcharge of muſquetry from the enemy, he planted the colours with his own hand on the intrenchments: at that inſtant he received two muſket-ſhots, one in the head, and the other in the body, which laid him dead on the ſpot. The French immediately gave way, and fled with precipitation, after having four thouſand eight hundred men killed, and ſix hundred wounded. The conſequences of the defeat at Exilles were, the abandoning of Ventimiglia by M. Belleiſle, and fruſtrating all his hopes of penetrating into Piedmont by the way of Ceva. The marſhal now retreated towards the Var to join the troops from Exilles, and prevent any invaſion on Dauphiné by the king of Sardinia. The exceſſive rains, however, prevented the execution of any deſign of importance on either ſide, and about the middle of October the two armies were put into winter-quarters. Thus ended the campaign of 1747 in Italy; and in this manner had the French king the mortification to find all his projects in that country entirely baffled.

Nor was he more fortunate in his naval operations, our ſea commanders having, in the courſe of this year, given the enemy ſeveral remarkable ſpecimens of their ſkill and bravery. The council of Verſailles, ſenſible how much it behoved them to recover to their crown the important ſettlement of Cape Breton, as alſo to put M. de la Bourdonnaye in a condition to improve his ſucceſſes in the Eaſt Indies, diſpatched two ſquadrons of ſhips of war from Breſt harbour, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year would permit, in order to accompliſh this double view. The Britiſh miniſtry did not long remain ſtrangers to the deſtination of this equipment, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions to intercept both ſquadrons. Vice-admiral Anſon and rear-admiral Warren were ordered out with a ſtrong fleet to cruize off Cape Finiſterre on the coaſt of Galicia. On the third of May they fell in with the French ſquadrons, commanded by M. de la Jonquiere and M. de St. George, conſiſting of ſix large ſhips of war, as many frigates, and four armed veſſels, equipped by their Eaſt India company, having under their convoy 29 ſhips laden with merchandize. The Britiſh fleet conſiſted of 12 ſail of the line, 3 frigates, and 2 ſloops. Notwithſtanding this great ſuperiority in their diſfavour, the French commanders did not decline the engagement; but having ſent away the armed veſſels with the merchant ſhips, maintained the battle with their ſix ſhips of war with great ſpirit and conduct, till, overpowered by numbers, they were compelled compelled to ſtrike their colours. About ſeven hundred of the French were ſlain in this action. The Engliſh loſt no leſs, and among them captain Grenville, of the Defiance, a young commander of the moſt promiſing talents. Several of the enemy's merchant ſhips were afterwards picked up by our privateers. By this defeat the deſigns of France againſt our poſſeſſions in North America and the Eaſt Indies were totally fruſtrated. The French loſt a million and an half ſterling, of which a conſiderable ſum was found in bullion on board the prizes, and four thouſand of their prime ſailors were locked up in our priſons. Great rejoicings were made for this important ſucceſs; and ſoon after Mr. Anſon was created a peer, and Mr. Warren was honoured with the ribband of the order of the Bath.

On the twenty-ſixth day of June captain Fox, of the Kent, cruiſing with five other ſhips of war off Cape Ortugal in Galicia, fell in with a fleet of homeward-bound St. Domingo men, conſiſting of one hundred and ſeventy ſail, under the convoy of commodore de la Motte, and four large ſhips of war. On diſcovering the Britiſh ſquadron, La Motte abandoned his convoy, and ſought his ſafety in a precipitate flight, our ſhips being too foul to come up with him. However, forty-ſix of the merchant ſhips fell into our hands, having one thouſand four hundred and twenty-eight ſailors on board, with a very valuable cargo of ſugar, indigo, cotton, &c. which furniſhed rich dividends for our valiant Britiſh tars.

But the French marine ſuffered another more important loſs in the month of October. Our government had received information towards the cloſe of the ſummer, that a very large fleet of merchant ſhips, bound from the ports of France to the Weſt Indies, were collecting together at the Iſle of Aix, and that a ſtrong ſquadron of ſhips of war was to eſcort them. Rear-admiral Hawke was therefore diſpatched to intercept them; and after cruizing ſome time upon the coaſt of Brittany, on the fourteenth of October, being in the latitude of Belleiſle, about eight in the morning, he ſaw a great number of ſhips, but ſo crowded that he could not count them: this was the French fleet, conſiſting of nine ſail of the line, and ſeveral frigates, commanded by M. de l'Eſtanduaire, a chef d'eſcadre, with two hundred and fifty-two merchant ſhips under his convoy. Admiral Hawke had with him twelve ſail of the line, and two frigates of fifty guns each. The French commodore, as ſoon as he could diſtinctly make the Britiſh ſquadron, threw out the ſignal for the trade to make the beſt of their way, with a ſixty gun ſhip and a frigate for their protection; and followed this by another ſignal for his ſhips of war to form the line of battle. Admiral Hawke, on his ſide, finding that he loſt time in forming his line, while the French were ſtanding away, at eleven made the ſignal for a general chace. By twelve both fleets were engaged, and maintainined a very bloody fight till night, when all the French ſhips, except two, ſtruck to the Engliſh flag. The enemy behaved with remarkable bravery; nor did they yield till their ſhips were all diſabled. Their loſs in killed and wounded amounted to eight hundred, and about three thouſand of them were made priſoners. Of the Engliſh there fell about one hundred and fifty, among whom was captain Saumarez, of the Nottingham, a gallant and experienced officer, who had ſerved under lord Anſon in his expedition to the Pacific Ocean. Rear admiral Hawke arrived on the thirty-firſt of October with his ſix prizes at Portſmouth, into which port the whole flower of the French navy had been triumphantly conducted, within the ſpace of five months. Admiral Hawke was created a knight of the Bath for his gallant behaviour; but captain Fox, of the Kent, had the misfortune to incur the cenſure of a court-martial, for ſome inſtance of neglect during the engagement, and was diſmiſſed from his command: however, as he remained perfectly clear from any imputation of cowardice, his majeſty was pleaſed, in about two years afterwards, to promote him to the rank of a rear-admiral.

I have already taken notice, that admiral Medley in the Mediterranean was particularly active and vigilant in his ſtation: he blocked up a Spaniſh ſquadron this ſummer in Carthagena, aſſiſted the Imperialiſts in the operations in Italy, and intercepted ſuccours that the French were ſending to the aſſiſtance of the Genoeſe republic: but death terminating the ſervices of this deſerving commander on the fifth of Auguſt, the conduct of the ſquadron devolved on admiral Byng, who had been ſent to reinforce him, and who proceeded on the ſame plan of operations.

The affairs of the Engliſh in the Eaſt Indies ſtill continued to wear a very indifferent aſpect: the enemy had taken and held from us Madraſs, without Mr. Griffin, who had ſucceeded Peyton, being able to attempt any thing towards its recovery. Nevertheleſs, he blocked up Pondicherry for a conſiderable time, and reduced it to great difficulties, tho' the French ſquadron was ſuperior to his. Our Eaſt India company, ſenſible of the critical ſituation to which their affairs were now reduced, beſtirred themſelves ſo effectually with the miniſtry, that rear-admiral Boſcawen, an officer of approved capacity and valour, was ordered to the Eaſt Indies this year, with a ſquadron of ſix ſhips of the line, beſides ſmaller veſſels, having two thouſand marines on board, to reinforce Mr. Griffin (now made a rear-admiral) and return the French viſit to Madraſs, by an invaſion of Pondicherry: but this ſquadron did not leave England till the month of November; and after making an unſucceſsful attempt againſt the French at the iſland of Martinico, four hundred miles to the eaſt of Madagaſcar, the whole ſquadron arrived ſafe at Fort St. David on the twenty-ninth of July, 1748. Their ſubſequent tranſactions will fall within the narrative of the naval operations of that year.

In the Weſt Indies rear-admiral Knowles, with a ſquadron of eight ſhips and two frigates, attacked Fort Louis, on the ſouth ſide of Hiſpaniola, which, after a ſhort but vigorous defence, was ſurrendered. After this, he made an attempt upon St. Jago de Cuba, in which he was baffled, and obliged to return to Jamaica. The blame of this diſappointment he caſt upon Mr. Dent, one of his captains; but a court-martial, which was afterwards held upon that gentleman in England, acquitted him with honour.

In September, Mr. Knowles being upon a cruize off the Havannah with ſeven ſhips of the line, fell in with a Spaniſh ſquadron of nearly the ſame ſtrength, ſtrength, under the command of the admirals Reggio and Spinola, when an engagement enſued, which was maintained with great warmth on both ſides, and ended in the loſs of two of the enemy's capital ſhips, the reſt of their fleet getting ſafe into the Havannah. Here again Mr. Knowles arraigned ſome of his captains of miſbehaviour, whoſe conduct, on their return to England, was ſtrictly examined by a court-martial. Two of theſe captains were cenſured; nor did the admiral himſelf eſcape without reprimand for ſome neglects he had been guilty of in the courſe of the action. This was made a kind of party quarrel amongſt the gentlemen of the admiral's ſquadron, which ended in the death of captain Clark, who was ſhot by captain Innes in a duel fought between them in Hyde-Park: but it appearing by unqueſtionable evidence that captain Clark had given the challenge, his majeſty was pleaſed to extend his royal clemency towards his antagoniſt. In the courſe of this year the Britiſh cruizers were ſo alert and ſucceſsful, that they took ſix hundred and forty-four prizes from the French and Spaniards; whereas the loſs on our ſide did not exceed five hundred and fifty. In a word, the ſuperiority of the naval arms of Britain was now ſo conſpicuouſly evident, that ſhe had not an enemy to conteſt her ſovereignty of the ocean.

When ſtates and empires make the moſt forcible efforts to diſplay their ſtrength, it is then generally found that they are the moſt in need of, and moſt inclined to a reſpite from their operations. Not one of the belligerant powers at this time could diſſemble his hearty wiſh for a ſpeedy peace.

France, notwithſtanding the rapid conqueſts ſhe had lately made in Germany, languiſhed amidſt her ſucceſſes, and beheld with deep concern the ruin of her commerce, the moſt valuable branch of which had been deſtroyed by the rupture between her and the Dutch. Lewis XV. had by his ambition brought ruin upon his people, and deſolation upon his country. Hemmed in as he was by a train of flatterers and paraſites, the voice of public diſtreſs found a way to his ear; and not a week paſſed without the mortification of receiving the moſt pathetic, and at the ſame time the moſt ſpirited, remonſtrances from his parliament and his trading companies, upon the diſmal effects of thoſe diſputes he had raiſed and kept alive.

The court of Vienna ſaw herſelf diſappointed in the flattering hopes ſhe had formed from the ſucceſs of her arms in Italy: her finances were almoſt exhauſted, her armies ill ſupplied, and moſt of her provinces deſolated, by a long and bloody war. Cogent motives theſe, to be deſirous to ſee an end of it, eſpecially as the houſe of Auſtria had ſucceeded in eſtabliſhing the imperial dignity in the perſon of the archduke, conſort to her Hungarian majeſty.

Spain carried on the war with equal inactivity and ill ſucceſs. The evils it had intended againſt the Britiſh nation were all fallen on its own head; and notwithſtanding its rich poſſeſſions in each hemiſphere, it ſaw itſelf ſtill farther than ever from being in a condition to enforce its ambitious and extravagant claims on the Auſtrian dominions, and had of late adopted the appearance of greater moderation.

England, during this whole war, had ſuſtained by far the greateſt expence of any one of the contending powers; not only to maintain invincible navies and formidable armies, but likewiſe in giving ſubſidies to almoſt all the powers of Europe; and the ſcrupulous fidelity with which her illuſtrious monarch adhered to his engagements with his allies, and to the deſire of maintaining the balance of power in Europe, had occaſioned the ſhedding of torrents of blood both by ſea and land, and drained the national treaſure to ſatisfy the inceſſant cravings of greedy foreign mercenaries: but now ſhe had nothing to hope from the continuance of the war, as the French and Spaniſh marine were in a manner annihilated; and her miniſtry were ſenſible that they could not carry it on another campaign without loading the people with new impoſitions.

The Dutch, who had been in a manner compelled to engage as principals in this war, much againſt their inclination, and were much fonder of negociating than fighting, wiſhed for nothing ſo much as to ſee their barrier freed from the French yoke, and themſelves delivered from thoſe troubleſome friends, who, under the pretence of protecting them, laid waſte their moſt fruitful provinces, and ſtopped up the ſources of their beneficial commerce. The prince of Orange, as ſtadtholder, warmly attached as he was to the common cauſe, had many ſtrong and weighty reaſons to wiſh for an end to the preſent troubles: the unſettled ſtate of his family-affairs; the powerful oppoſition he encountered from the French party in Holland; and the difficulty he found in raiſing money, made him naturally wiſh for an opportunity of eſtabliſhing his authority upon a ſolid foundation. In fine, all the contending powers ſeemed, towards the cloſe of this year, to be inſpired with the ſame pacific views and inclinations; and it required no conſummate ſkill in politics to foreſee that the war could not be of much longer duration.

His moſt Chriſtian majeſty had, immediately after the battle of Val, in a perſonal conference with ſir John Ligonier, given broad intimations of his deſire of a pacification. He had alſo, after the reduction of Bergen-op-Zoom, ordered his miniſter, the abbé de la Ville, to tranſmit from the camp of Hamel, near Tongres, a declaration to the States-general on the ſame ſubject. France alſo repeated her pacific applications at the court of London: in conſequence of which, the contending powers agreed to the holding another congreſs, which was actually opened in March following (1748) at Aix-la-Chapelle, an imperial city in the duchy of Juliers, formerly the capital of Germany, when Charlemagne ſwayed the imperial ſceptre. The earl of Sandwich and ſir Thomas Robinſon were nominated plenipotentiaries on the part of his Britannic majeſty; as was the count de St. Severin de Arragon, for France; with count Bentinck, the baron de Waſſenaer, and M. Haſſelaer, on the part of the United Provinces.

With theſe appearances of a ſpeedy termination of the unſpeakable calamities incident to war, his Britannic majeſty aſſembled his new parliament on the tenth of November, when the commons again choſe Arthur Onſlow, eſq. their ſpeaker, who had preſided in the chair during the two former ſeſſions. His majeſty on the twelfth returned again to the houſe of peers, where the commons waited on him with the ſpeaker; after which his majeſty opened the firſt ſeſſion with a ſpeech, congratulating the two houſes on the ſignal ſucceſſes of the Britiſh navy, and the happy alteration of the government of the United Provinces. His majeſty gave them to underſtand, that a congreſs would ſpeedily be opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, to concert the means for effecting a general pacification; and reminded them that nothing would more conduce to the ſucceſs of this negociation than the vigour and unanimity of their proceedings.

The new elections had gone every-where in favour of the court. The duke of Newcaſtle, and his brother Mr. Pelham, who were abſolutely predominant in the cabinet, found but an immaterial oppoſition in the parliament. Such addreſſes were therefore preſented, in return to his majeſty's ſpeech, from both houſes, as made the government perfectly ſecure of having their moſt ſanguine wiſhes fulfilled, their moſt extenſive demands gratified; and indeed never did parliament make good their profeſſions with greater punctuality than the preſent. They voted forty thouſand ſeamen, forty-nine thouſand land-forces, beſides eleven thouſand nine hundred marines; the ſubſidies to the queen of Hungary, the czarina, the king of Sardinia, the electors of Mentz and Bavaria, the prince of Heſſe, and the duke of Wolfenbuttle; the ſum of two hundred thirty-five thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-nine pounds was granted to the provinces of New England, to reimburſe them for the expence of reducing Cape Breton; five hundred thouſand pounds were given to his majeſty for the vigorous proſecution of the war; and about one hundred and fifty-two thouſand pounds to the Scottiſh claimants in lieu of their juriſdiction. In a word, the ſupplies for the year 1748 fell very little ſhort of nine millions; ſix millions and an half of which were raiſed on a loan by ſubſcription, chargeable on a new ſubſidy of poundage exacted from all merchandize imported into Great Britain, which was ſubſcribed for immediately on opening the books, and above two millions more offered, and rejected; an extraordinary inſtance of public ſpirit and national credit. The reſt was raiſed by continuing the land tax at four ſhillings in the pound, the malt-duty, and one million to be taken out of the ſinking fund.

Some material debates were agitated in parliament this ſeſſion. A bill was brought into the houſe of commons "for a general naturalization of foreign proteſtants." Many ſhrewd arguments were advanced in favour of this meaſure, which would tend, it was ſaid, to ſupply the great waſte of people which the war had occaſioned, and to introduce new manufactures into the kingdom, as many induſtrious individuals in foreign parts would be thereby encouraged to ſettle in England. Nevertheleſs, the city of London viewed this affair in ſo very different a light, that on the 4th of February, 1748, the ſheriffs of that city preſented a petition againſt it to the lower houſe, ſetting forth, "That it would occaſion a decreaſe, if not a total loſs, of the duties of package, ſcavage, portage, and balliage of the goods of foreign merchants: that it was more likely to increaſe the poverty than to add to the wealth of the nation; for that neither rich nor induſtrious foreigners needed ſuch inducement, as the latter never wanted encouragement, nor the former the very privilege in queſtion, when they applied for it to parliament: that a like law had been attempted in the reign of king William, but had been rejected on ſuch national conſiderations as, it was preſumed, would never eſcape the attention, nor loſe the regard of the houſe: that a law having been actually paſſed for that purpoſe in the reign of queen Anne, it was found ſo detrimental to the public intereſt, that it was ſoon afterwards repealed, and not without ſome ſevere reflections on the conduct of thoſe who had promoted it: that, as a naturalization could not convey to foreigners a true knowlege of our happy conſtitution in church and ſtate, or give them ſuch a zeal and affection for it as might be requiſite for maintaining and defending it; and as thoſe who had grown up under arbitrary government might be fitteſt to anſwer arbitrary purpoſes, too much caution could not be uſed in a matter of ſo great importance; and therefore it was hoped that the houſe would not think proper to paſs a bill which was liable to ſuch inſuperable objections." This petition was warmly ſupported; and Mr. Pelham, who was now the acknowleged miniſter, fearing that the bill, if paſſed, might hurt his influence in the city of London, which at that time was very high, agreed to drop it for that time.

The pernicious practice of inſuring French ſhips in England, which prevailed to a ſhameful degree about this period, occaſioned bitter complaints on the part of the fair dealers, and was indeed an abuſe which called aloud for parliamentary redreſs. Though the commerce of France was in a very declining condition, it could have been further decreaſed, even to a ſtate of abſolute ruin, had it not been ſupported by their inſurances in England. In this practice France found a perpetual ſupport amidſt all her mercantile loſſes. On this all the remains of the French trade entirely ſubſiſted. Many of the moſt opulent captures from the French, particularly two exceeding rich prizes from the South Sea, taken by the Royal Family privateer, under the command of captain Talbot, in 1745, were inſured in England, which occaſioned the national gain to be no more than the price of the premium, which was uſually from twenty to twenty-five per cent. and if the inſured ſhips were deſtroyed, there was a clear national loſs to the Engliſh of the whole value, after deducting the premium. Beſides, this practice was the more pernicious, from the very nature of the end for which it was calculated, becauſe the inſurers had ſtrong temptations to contribute to the eſcape of the ſhips which they had inſured. Therefore, while the Britiſh admiralty, and proprietors of private ſhips of war, were exerting the maritime force of the ſtate, totally to ruin the commerce of France, the Britiſh inſurers fruſtrated their endeavours. Theſe, among many other cogent reaſons, convinced the legiſlature of the neceſſity of prohibiting this practice. Accordingly, a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, "to prohibit inſurance on ſhips belonging to France, and merchandize and effects laden therein, during the preſent war with France;" which bill met with univerſal approbation, paſſed quickly through both houſes, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent.

As the parliamentary contentions were very inconſiderable, the buſineſs of the ſenate was diſpatched patched with very little interruption, and ſeveral acts were paſſed, extremely ſalutary to the national intereſt *. On the thirteenth of May the king put an end to the ſeſſion, after having acquainted both houſes in his ſpeech, that the preliminaries of a general peace were actually ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle by the miniſters of Great Britain, France, and the United Provinces; and that the baſis of this accommodation was a general reſtitution of the conqueſts which had been made during the war. Immediately after the prorogation of the parliament, his majeſty ſet out for his German dominions, after having appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his abſence; he was convoyed by a ſquadron commanded by lord Anſon, and arrived at Helvoetſluys on the twenty-ſecond of May. He proceeded directly to Maeſlandſluys, where he was met by her royal highneſs the princeſs of Orange; and after a ſhort conference, his majeſty ſet out for Utrecht, where he had an interview with his ſerene highneſs the ſtadtholder, and prince Frederic of Heſſe, and then proceeded to Hanover.

I ſhall here take notice of ſome tranſactions, as well foreign as domeſtic, particularly relating to Great Britain, which fell out during the ſitting of this ſeſſion of parliament, that I may be more at liberty to purſue uninterrupted the more important events of this year, till the final concluſion of the peace. On the twentieth day of January a pardon paſſed the great-ſeal for lord MacCleod, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Cromartie, who had been drawn by his father into the rebellion. On the twenty-ninth, the priſon of Kinſale in Ireland was conſumed by fire, and fifty-four French priſoners confined therein periſhed in the flames. On February 6, the earl of Cheſterfield reſigned the ſeals of his office as one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and was ſucceeded by the duke of Bedford. On the thirteenth an order of council was publiſhed, directing the condemnation of ſeveral ſhips our Mediterranean cruizers had taken from the Genoeſe; which prizes amounted to two hundred thouſand pounds. On March 25, a moſt dreadful fire broke out in Exchange-alley, Cornhill, which proved more hurtful in its conſequences than any conflagration ſince the fire of London, 1666. The flames ſpread three different ways; and, notwithſtanding every poſſible aſſiſtance, near one hundred houſes in Cornhill, Birchin-lane, Exchange-alley, George-yard, and the courts adjacent, &c. were conſumed: and though many goods, &c. were ſaved by the vigilance of the magiſtrates, yet the loſs was exceſſive great; and the conſternation in the city, during this dreadful calamity, can ſcarcely be expreſſed.

Accounts arrived from New England in the month of April this year, of a great tumult which happened at the cloſe of the laſt year at Boſton, the capital of that province, occaſioned by admiral Knowles impreſſing ſeveral of the inhabitants and ſeamen belonging to the outward-bound ſhips for the ſervice of his fleet; a practice which it ſhould ſeem our American brethren have no very favourable opinion of. But by the vigorous behaviour of the aſſembly, after many acts of violence, this dangerous riot was quelled. It was, however, ſucceeded by a much greater calamity, which befel that capital on the twenty-third of December, when the Court-houſe was conſumed by fire, and the province records, &c. deſtroyed therein, to the almoſt irretrievable detriment of the whole colony.

The ſmugglers in England were become amazingly audacious in their illegal practices at this period, having, amongſt other enormities, broke open the king's warehouſe at Colcheſter, and conveyed away a great quantity of tea: upon which a proclamation was iſſued of pardon, and a reward of a hundred pounds, for the diſcovery of each of the parties concerned in that outrageous tranſaction.

About this time ſeveral promotions were made both in the army and navy, and the rank between the land and ſea officers, whoſe mutual diſguſts ariſing from their continual diſputes about precedency in points of command had done infinite prejudice to the public ſervice, was eſtabliſhed by his majeſty's order in council in the following manner:

Admirals and commanders in chief to rank with field-marſhals.

Admirals with their flag on their main-top-maſt-head with generals of horſe and foot.

Vice-admirals with lieutenant generals.

Rear-admirals with major-generals.

Commodores with broad pendants with brigadier-generals.

Captains of three years ſtanding with colonels.

Younger captains with lieutenant-colonels.

Maſters and commanders with majors.

Lieutenants with captains.

* Amongſt the moſt public was an act 'for granting to his majeſty a ſubſidy of one ſhilling poundage upon all goods and merchandizes to be imported into the kingdom of Great-Britain, and for raiſing a certain ſum of money by annuities and lottery, to be charged on the ſaid ſubſidy, and for repealing ſo much of an act made in the twentieth year of his preſent majeſty's reign, as enacted that prize goods and merchandizes might be exported without paying any duty of cuſtom or exciſe for the ſame.' And this act, than which none could be of greater importance, was carried without a diviſion. The act of parliament for preventing vexatious ſuits and arreſts for ſmall debts, expired on June 1, 1747, and left all the avenues open to private animoſity; but on the eighteenth of February, 1748, an act was paſſed 'to revive and make perpetual two acts of parliament, one made in the twelfth year of king George I. intitled, An act to prevent frivolous and vexatious arreſts; and the other made in the fifth year of his preſent majeſty, to explain, amend, and render more effectual the ſaid act.' The royal aſſent was alſo given to 'an act for permitting tea to be exported to Ireland and the Britiſh plantations in America, without paying the inland duties charged thereupon by an act of the eighteenth year of his preſent majeſty.' Alſo to 'an act for encouraging the making of Indigo in the Britiſh plantations in America', for which commodity the Engliſh paid the French about two hundred thouſand pounds a year: and as the preliminaries for a general peace had been adjuſted, his majeſty paſſed an act 'for the relief of inſolvent debtors;' by which all debtors for five hundred pounds, or under, were diſcharged; all fugitives who were abroad on the firſt of January laſt, were entitled to the benefit of this act, on delivering up all their effects, except wearing apparel and tools, not to exceed ten pounds: but all bankrupts not obtaining their certificates; attornies retaining their clients money; perſons indebted to the crown, and former inſolvents, were excepted; and creditors of thoſe continuing in gaol, were authoriſed to compel them to give an account upon oath of their effects.

An order was alſo iſſued, requiring all his majeſty's ſea-officers, from the admiral down to the midſhipman, to wear an uniformity of cloathing; for which purpoſe pattern-coats for dreſs'd ſuits, and frocks for each rank of officers, were lodged at the navy-office, and the ſeveral yards, for inſpection.

The allies had reſolved to open the campaign in the Netherlands with an army of a hundred and ninety thouſand men, in order to compel the French to abandon the barrier which they had conquered; but the dilatory conduct of the Dutch and Auſtrians prevented the execution of this meaſure. The people of Holland were ſo highly incenſed at the behaviour of their rulers, that they roſe in tumults in all the capital cities. They plundered the farmers of the revenue, aboliſhed the taxes, and inſulted the magiſtrates: ſo that the States General, ſeeing their country at the brink of ruin, committed the government entirely into the hands of the prince of Orange, whom they conſtituted hereditary ſtadtholder and captain-general of Dutch Brabant, Flanders, and the Upper Quarter of Guelderland; and the Eaſt India company choſe him director and governor-general of their commerce and ſettlements in the Indies. Thus inveſted with an authority unknown to his anceſtors, he exerted himſelf with equal induſtry and diſcretion, in new-modelling, augmenting, and aſſembling the troops of the Republic. The adminiſtration of government was now chiefly inveſted in the prince, partly as ſtadtholder, and partly as captain-general and admiral in chief; the ſtates alone had the power of making war or concluding a peace, of entering into foreign alliances, of raiſing taxes, and coining of money; but the prince had the diſpoſal of all military commands both by ſea and land, in time of war by his own commiſſion; in time of peace by that of the ſtates: as ſtadtholder or governor, he repreſented the ſupreme civil magiſtrate; in which capacity he pardoned offenders and nominated magiſtrates, the towns preſenting him the names of three, out of which he choſe one. In him reſided the dignity of the ſtate: he had a palace, a court, his guards, and all the other marks of external grandeur incident to princes: to him foreign miniſters paid their court, as did every one who was inclined to ſerve his country in the fleet or army: in the council of ſtate he had a ſeat and a deciſive voice, but not in the aſſembly of the States General, though nothing could be tranſacted there without his knowledge or againſt his conſent.

The conferences at Aix la Chapelle were opened on the eleventh of March; but as thoſe kind of negociations are frequently rendered fruitleſs by the affected obſtacles and difficulties thrown in by artful diſcontented miniſters, and by the unavoidable delays reſulting from ſending and receiving diſpatches from their reſpective courts, his moſt chriſtian majeſty, in order to accelerate the proceedings, had given poſitive orders to M. Saxe to form the ſiege of Maeſtricht, a ſtrong city and fortreſs on the river Maeſe, and the key of Holland on that ſide. The manœuvres of this great general, to deceive the confederates, as to his real intent, have been juſtly eſteemed a maſterpiece of the kind by all judges of the military art: by his various marches and counter marches he ſo puzzled the allies, that apprehending he deſigned to make an attempt upon Breda, or Luxembourg, they precipitately abandoned the ſtrong poſts they occupied in the neighbourhood of Ruremonde, and marched to cover the places they thought moſt in danger; when, to their no ſmall confuſion, they learned that the French had formed the inveſtiture of Maeſtricht on the third of April.

The garriſon conſiſted of Imperial and Dutch troops, under the conduct of the baron d'Aylva, who defended the place with great ſpirit and reſolution. He annoyed the beſiegers in repeated ſallies; but, determined to overcome all oppoſition, they carried on their approaches with incredible perſeverance and bravery: they attacked the covered way, in which they actually made a lodgment; and Maeſtricht was on the point of falling into their hands, when hoſtilities were ſuddenly interrupted by the arrival of a courier from the duke of Cumberland, who commanded the allied army, with the news that the preliminary articles of peace had been ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle on the nineteenth of April: upon which marſhal Saxe and the governor agreed to a ceſſation of arms for two days. A meſſenger was ſent to the duke of Cumberland, who ſent another to marſhal Saxe; and the world was now informed that, for the glory of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's arms, the pacificators had agreed that the town of Maeſtricht ſhould be ſurrendered to his general, on condition that it ſhould be reſtored, with all the magazines and artillery. Marſhal Saxe accordingly entered the place on the third day of May, when the garriſon marched out with all the honours of war, and a ſuſpenſion of arms immediately enſued.

Several difficulties had been raiſed in the courſe of the negociations at Aix-la-Chapelle, in regard to the different pretenſions of the contending parties; but theſe were ſpeedily adjuſted, and the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, France, and the United Provinces, convinced that, as ſoon as they ſhould be agreed, the other parties would find themſelves under a neceſſity of ſubſcribing to their deciſions, ſigned the preliminary articles for a general peace on the evening of the nineteenth of April, at the houſe of the French plenipotentiary. By theſe articles, the French and the Engliſh conjointly, with their allies, agreed immediately to evacuate the ſeveral places they had conquered from each other during the war; and that Don Philip, Infant of Spain, ſhould be inveſted in the duchies of Parma and Placentia, to enjoy the ſame in full ſovereignty, until the deceaſe of his Catholic majeſty the king of Spain, when he would ſucceed to the throne of the Two Sicilies; in which caſe the aforeſaid duchies were to revert to the houſe of Auſtria.

The courts of Vienna and Madrid were very unwilling to accede to the preliminaries, and even entered proteſtations againſt them, both of theſe powers pretending to be greatly injured thereby; the empreſs queen, in particular, complained heavily, that inſtead of having an equivalent for Sileſia, her dominions had been diſmembered; and that what was reſtored to her was left at the mercy of the firſt invader, by the demolition of the fortifications that ſhould protect them. She complained alſo, that after having, out of an exceſs of complaiſance to the Britiſh nation, refuſed ſome very advantageous terms of peace that had been offered her by the court of France, ſhe was now left to bear all the calamities that would enſue from ſo long and bloody a war.

The Spaniſh government had flattered itſelf that one of the conditions of theſe preliminaries would have been, the obliging the court of Great Britain to reſtore to her Gibraltar; whereas not the leaſt mention was made thereof, either in the preliminaries or the treaty: this therefore was the ſubject of diſcontent to that power.

His Sardinian majeſty was alſo unwilling to give his acceſſion, becauſe he found himſelf diſappointed in the hopes of obtaining the poſſeſſion of Final: but the public benefit getting the better of private intereſt, all parties at length were prevailed upon to accede. Count Kaunitz, the Auſtrian plenipotentiary, on the fourteenth of May, ſigned the act of acceſſion of the empreſs-queen of Hungary to the preliminary articles. The Sardinian miniſter, and the plenipotentiary for the duke of Modena, ſigned their acceſſion on the thirty-firſt of May; and the Genoeſe and Spaniſh plenipotentiaries did the ſame on the ſeventeenth of June.

Thirty-ſeven thouſand Ruſſians, under the command of prince Repnin, granted by the czarina to the aſſiſtance of the confederates, had been advancing ſince the beginning of the year from Livonia; and on their entrance into Germany were met by general Mordaunt and colonel Durand, who were appointed by his Britannic majeſty to conduct them to the Netherlands. After a march of ſeven hundred miles, in the month of June they reached the borders of Franconia, where they were ordered to halt, the French king declaring, that, ſhould they advance farther, he would deſtroy the fortifications of Maeſtricht and Bergen-op-Zoom. The matter was referred to the deciſion of the Britiſh, French, and Dutch plenipotentiaries at the congreſs, who, on the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, concluded a convention, importing, that the Ruſſian troops ſhould march back to their own country, and that the French king ſhould diſband an equal number of his forces. The ſeaſon being far advanced, the Ruſſians were provided with winter-quarters in Bohemia and Moravia, where they remained till the ſpring, when they returned into Livonia. In the mean time, thirty-ſeven thouſand French troops were recalled from Flanders into Picardy, and the two armies continued inactive till the concluſion of the definitive treaty; but the war was open for a longer continuance in Italy.

The French and Spaniards began early to reinforce their troops in the ſtate of Genoa. Several convoys arrived in that port from Antibes and Monaco, and landed their men with little interruption; ſo that the French, Spaniards, and Genoeſe, had an army of thirty thouſand men in the heart of the republic, commanded by the duke de Richelieu, excluſive of independent companies, the militia, and armed peaſants: but general Brown, at the head of forty-eight thouſand Auſtrians, was preparing to enter the eaſtern Riviera, and again lay ſiege to Genoa. M. Belleiſle was extending his army, which conſiſted of fifty thouſand French and Spaniards, for the ſecurity of the weſtern Riviera, which was alſo threatened with an invaſion by general Leutrum, at the head of forty thouſand Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe: but before the commencement of hoſtilities, an inſurrection happened in Sardinia, ſpirited up by the French and Spaniards, which however was happily terminated Count Brown, after ſeveral ſkirmiſhes on the borders of the republic of Genoa, penetrated into the eaſtern Riviera; and general Nadaſti made an attempt to ſurprize Voltri, where he was defeated, with the loſs of four hundred men. During this time, M. Belleiſle and general Leutrum had intelligence of the preliminary treaty; upon which the ceſſation of hoſtilities between the French and Piedmonteſe in the weſtern Riviera was ſettled, and limits ſet to both armies. On the thirtieth of May general Brown received a letter from the duke de Richelieu, with a copy of the act of acceſſion of the empreſs-queen to the preliminaries, which produced ſome conferences between the generals, who, on the fourth of June, agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms, the river Vara, in the eaſtern Riviera, being the limit between the two armies.

The naval war in the Eaſt Indies was ſuſpended by rear-admiral Griffin, till the arrival of rear-admiral Boſcawen, with the reinforcement of ſhips and men for the ſervice of the Britiſh company. The French, in the mean time, were permitted to ſupply their ſettlement at Pondicherry with every thing neceſſary for defending the place againſt the ſiege, which was expected on the coming of Mr Boſcawen into thoſe ſeas. This gentleman arrived at Fort St. David's on the twenty-ninth of July this year, and aſſumed the command, while rear-admiral Griffin was preparing to return to England. Mr. Boſcawen's ſquadron conſiſted of nine ſhips of the line, beſides two frigates, a ſloop and two tenders, having three thouſand five hundred and eighty ſailors on board; ſo that it was determined immediately to undertake the ſiege of Pondicherry. The admiral himſelf marched over land from Fort St. David, with a ſmall army of four thouſand Europeans and about two thouſand natives of the country, while the management of the fleet was left to captain Liſle, of the Vigilant, who had orders to anchor with the whole ſquadron two miles to the ſouthward of Pondicherry, and remain there till farther orders. Thus, by the tenth of Auguſt, the place was inveſted by land, and blocked up by ſea.

The garriſon of Pondicherry conſiſted of two thouſand Europeans and three thouſand Indians. Monſieur Dupleix the French governor, and Mr. Paradis the chief engineer, had taken the moſt ſeaſonable and beſt precautions for the defence and ſecurity of this ſettlement. Having had intelligence of the deſtination of the Britiſh ſquadron, long before the arrival of admiral Boſcawen in the Indian ſea, they had erected ſeveral additional fortifications about the town: they had put the fort of Aria Coupan, ſituate on the ſide of a river from whence it takes its name, at about three miles diſtance from the town, in a defenſible condition; and, in fine, ſeemed to apprehend very little danger from the enterprize carrying on againſt them.

The Britiſh admiral, however, proſecuted his operations with great judgment and ſpirit: he took the fort of Aria Coupan; after which he made his approaches to the place, while it was bombarded and cannonaded by the ſhipping: but the fortifications were ſo ſtrong, the garriſon ſo numerous, and the engineers ſo much more expert in their profeſſion than ours, that he made very little progreſs, and ſuſtained conſiderable damage. At length, his army being reduced by ſickneſs, and the rainy ſeaſon approaching, the admiral ordered the artillery and ſtores to be reimbarked; and raiſing the ſiege on the ninth day of October, returned to Fort St. David, without being moleſted in his march by the enemy. Thus terminated this expedition, with the loſs of ſeven hundred and fifty-ſeven ſoldiers, forty-three artillery-men, and two hundred and ſixty-five ſeamen, to the beſiegers; and about five hundred Europeans among the French. This was the laſt action of importance in this part of the world during this war; for all hoſtilities were ſoon after diſcontinued, by the arrival of intelligence of the ceſſation of arms, and the concluſion of a general peace: but admiral Boſcawen had the mortification to ſee ſeveral ſhips of his ſquadron, and above twelve hundred of his ſailors miſerably periſh in a dreadful hurricane on the coaſt of Coromandel.

Nothing happened this year in the Mediterranean more material than the interception of the French and Genoeſe barks by admiral Byng, who received a letter from the duke of Newcaſtle, dated the eleventh of July, whereby he was informed of the ſigning of the preliminaries, and received orders to put a ſtop to all hoſtilities on that account, and to return to England, leaving only ſeven men of war in the Mediterranean. He accordingly arrived at Spithead on the thirteenth of October, and ſix ſhips of the line were ſent to reinforce the ſquadron he had left behind him on the coaſt of Italy, which was commanded by rear-admiral Forbes.

The Britiſh cruizers and privateers made ſome valuable captures this year, both in the European and American ſeas, having taken in Europe from the French 254 ſhips, amongſt which were three men of war and three Eaſt Indiamen. We alſo took from the French in America two hundred and eighteen ſhips, the chief part of the number being St. Domingo and Martinico ſhips, making the whole of the captures taken from the French during this year amount to four hundred and ſeventy-two.

The prizes taken this year from the Spaniards in the European ſeas amounted to twenty-five, amongſt which were ſeven regular ſhips. Their loſs in America was ſeventy-three, of which three were men of war, and forty-three regiſter ſhips; ſo that the whole number of Spaniſh veſſels taken this year amounted to ninety-eight; and the whole united loſs of the French and Spaniards together for this year amounted to five hundred and ſeventy ſhips.

Both thoſe powers, however, made ſome conſiderable captures from Great Britain this year, the French having taken in Europe one hundred and thirty-one, and in America two hundred and four ſhips; in all, three hundred and thirty-five. The Spaniards alſo took in the European ſeas fifty-two of our ſhips, and in America one hundred and ſix; in all, one hundred and fifty-eight; ſo that the whole number of the prizes taken from the Engliſh this year, by the French and Spaniards together, amounted to four hundred and ninety-three, being ſeventy-ſeven leſs than the prizes taken from them this year by the Engliſh.

To conclude, the Spaniards ſince the commencement of the war had loſt one thouſand two hundred and forty-nine ſhips, and the French two thouſand one hundred and eighty-five, being three thouſand four hundred and thirty-four together: the Engliſh loſt one thouſand three hundred and ſixty ſhips taken by the Spaniards, and one thouſand eight hundred and ſeventy-eight taken by the French, making together three thouſand two hundred and thirty-eight, which was one hundred and ninety-ſix leſs than thoſe taken by the Engliſh during the whole courſe of the war. Several of the Spaniſh prizes were immenſely rich; a great number of the French were of conſiderable value, and ſo were many of the Engliſh; but the balance was almoſt two millions in our favour.

The miniſters at Aix-la-Chapelle were all this time aſſiduouſly employed in adjuſting all the articles of the definitive treaty, in which many difficulties occurred, and great debates happened. In the mean time, however, the prohibition of commerce with Spain was taken off at London by proclamation. This occaſioned ſome murmuring, as Britiſh veſſels were not admitted into the ports of Spain till ſome months after. In like manner, all other prohibitions in trade were taken off; and at laſt, all difficulties being ſurmounted, the definitive treaty was ſigned on the ſeventh of October, by the earl of Sandwich and ſir Thomas Robinſon, on the part of Great Britain; by the count de St. Severin and the marquis de la Porthune Thueil, on the part of France; by the marquis de Soto Major, on the part of Spain; by the count de Kaunitz, on the part of her Imperial majeſty; by Don Joſeph Oſſorio and the count de Chavannes, on the part of Sardinia; and by count Bentinck and the other plenipotentiaries, for the Dutch; by the count de Monzone for the duke of Modena; and by the marquis Doria for the Genoeſe.

As this famous treaty has been the ſubject of much diſſenſion, I ſhall here give the ſubſtance of its contents. The preamble, which is very extenſive, recites the original motives which occaſioned the late war, &c.

Article I. conſiſts of ſolemn promiſes and aſſurances to obſerve religiouſly the peace concluded, &c.

Art. II. Every thing that has paſſed during the war on all ſides to be buried in a general and eternal oblivion.

Art. III. The treaties of Weſtphalia, Madrid, Nimeguen, Ryſwick, Utrecht, Baden, Hague, the quadruple alliance, and the treaty of Vienna, are all confirmed, that they may not be derogated from by the preſent treaty.

Art. IV. The priſoners made, and the hoſtages given, during the war, to be reſtored on all ſides without ranſom, and ſet at liberty in one month after the exchange of the ratification; but to be obliged to pay all debts they have contracted, and all the ſhips of war and merchantmen which have been taken ſince the time ſtipulated by the ceſſation of arms, to be reſtored.

Art. V. All the conqueſts made during the war to be reciprocally reſtored.

Art. VI. The reſtitutions and ceſſions to be made in ſix weeks after the ratification; the artillery found in the conquered places to be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in at the time the towns were taken; nevertheleſs excepting that at Menin, Aeth, Mons, Charleroi, and Oudenard.

Art. VII. The duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guaſtalla, to be ceded to the Infant Don Philip, under an expreſs clauſe, that thoſe ſtates ſhall return turn to the preſent poſſeſſors, in caſe that prince die without male-iſſue, or he, or any of his deſcendants, ſhall ſucceed to the throne of Spain or the Two Sicilies.

Art. VIII. Commiſſaries to be appointed immediately on all ſides, to aſſemble at Nice and Bruſſels, to effectuate the reſpective reſtitutions and ceſſions.

Art. IX. The king of Great Britain ſhall ſend to France two noblemen of the firſt diſtinction, by way of hoſtages, who are to remain there till certain advice is received of the evacuation of Cape Breton, and all the places which may have been taken in the Eaſt Indies.

Art. X. Means as commodious as poſſible for the troops and inhabitants to be taken in the general evacuation.

Art. XI. All the papers and records found in the towns to be reſtored, expreſsly naming the archives of Mechlin.

Art. XII. The king of Sardinia to be maintained in the poſſeſſion of all his eſtates, principally thoſe ceded to him in 1743, excepting that part of the Plaiſantin he poſſeſſes, which he cedes to the infant Don Philip.

Art. XIII. The duke of Modena to be re-eſtabliſhed in all his eſtates, and juſtice done him in reſpect to the allodial effects which he poſſeſſed in the duchy of Guaſtalla.

Art. XIV. The republic of Genoa to be re-eſtabliſhed in all the poſſeſſions ſhe enjoyed before the war; the money they had in the banks of Vienna and Turin, and which was confiſcated, to be reſtored; and the payment of the intereſts to commence from the day of the exchange of the ratifications.

Art. XV. Things to remain in Italy on the ſame footing they were before the war, excepting the ceſſions made to the king of Sardinia and the Infant Don Philip.

Art. XVI. The Aſſiento treaty is confirmed, and permiſſion granted to ſend to the Spaniſh Weſt Indies, for four years, a ſhip extraordinary for the non-enjoyment of that privilege during the war.

Art. XVII. The fortifications of Dunkirk to remain as they now are on the land ſide; but former treaties to be obſerved with regard to the port and the works on the ſea-ſide.

Art. XVIII. The differences on the ſubject of the ſums which the king of Great Britain, as elector of Hanover, declared to be due to him, to be amicably adjuſted, and the affair of the abby of St. Hubert to be regulated at the ſame time.

Art. XIX. The article of the treaty of quadruple alliance, which ſecures the ſucceſſion of the crown of Great Britain to the houſe of Hanover, is confirmed in all its points.

Art. XX. All his Britannic majeſty's German dominions are guarantied by the contracting powers.

Art. XXI. They guaranty likewiſe, in the moſt ſolemn manner, the pragmatic ſanction, that it may not be derogated from by the preſent treaty.

Art. XXII. They guaranty in like manner Sileſia, and the county of Glatz, to his Pruſſian majeſty.

Art. XXIII. As alſo the execution of all the articles of the preſent treaty.

Art. XXIV. The exchange of ratifications to be made at Aix-la-Chapelle, within one month, by the miniſters of the contracting powers, and in ſix weeks by thoſe of the powers which acceded thereto.

There were two other articles alſo in this treaty; the firſt of which imports, That no conſequence is to be drawn from the titles and precedency which the contracting parties may have taken in this treaty; and the ſecond, That no advantage is to be taken from the uſe of the French language.

As the ſixteenth article of this treaty, relating to the Aſſiento contract adjuſted with the court of Spain, may not be perfectly intelligible to ſome part of my readers, it will not, I believe, be unacceptable to give them a juſt idea of that contract; in order to which, it will be neceſſary to trace it from its original, and explain the motives which gave riſe to it.

The neceſſity the Spaniards found themſelves under of having negroes from Africa, to be employed as ſlaves in the mines of the Spaniſh Indies, gave room to the concluſion of a treaty on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, 1701, between the kings of Spain and France, made with the royal company of Guinea, for introducing into the countries, terra firma's, and iſles, belonging to his Catholic majeſty in America, the number of forty-eight thouſand negroes, of both ſexes and all ages, during the ſpace of ten years, at the rate of four thouſand eight hundred each year; which convention ſubſiſted to the end of the term for which it was concluded, viz. the month of May, 1712, when the French Guinea company, not having found the advantages they expected in that traffic, thought proper to diſcontinue it. The Engliſh South Sea company having offered, in 1713, when the negociations for peace were ſet on foot at Utrecht, to undertake the negro contract on the ſame conditions made with the French company, the Aſſiento treaty was concluded on the twenty-ſixth of March in the ſame year, between queen Anne and king Philip V. of Spain, for the term of thirty years, viz. from the firſt of May, 1713, to the ſame day of the year 1743, the conditions and advantages of the treaty being drawn up in forty-two articles, beſides an additional article, by which the king of Spain granted to the Engliſh company the permiſſion of ſending every year, during the ſaid term of thirty years, a ſhip of five hundred tons, with merchandize to diſpoſe of at the fairs in New Spain, on condition that his Catholic majeſty ſhould enjoy a fourth part of the profit ariſing from that annual ſhip, as well as from the negro treaty, and receive five per cent. beſides of the other three parts belonging to England. Now the war with Spain, which begun in 1739, having ceaſed in this year 1748, by the ſignature of the preliminaries of peace, there appears nine years non-enjoyment of the traffic, though but four of the treaty; and therefore an indemnification to the term of its experation only was agreed to, till ſuch time as the reſpective powers ſhould think proper to renew it.

Upon the whole, no peace ever gave leſs ſatisfaction than this of Aix la Chapelle, the principal parties concerned having gained nothing but the experience of each other's ſtrength and reſources. The precipitation with which the preliminary articles had been ſigned, made the Engliſh accuſe their plenipotentiaries of having ſtudied rather to gain a reputation for addreſs and diſpatch, than to render their work firm and laſting; eſpecially when they found that the right of Engliſh ſubjects to navigate in the American ſeas, without being ſubject to ſearch, was not once mentioned in the treaty, though this claim was the original ſource of the differences between Great Britain and Spain. A few ſpecific explanations, touching the limits of the Engliſh and French poſſeſſions in Acadia, would have prevented the unhappy diſputes which afterwards aroſe concerning theſe limits. How our Engliſh plenipotentiaries came to paſs ſo important an article over unprovided for, is not eaſy to aſcertain. The French indeed might purpoſely neglect it, as it furniſhed their nation with an opportunity to renew the war whenever they ſhould find it for their intereſt. It is true, the plenipotentiaries on both ſides referred this, and all other diſputes, to the diſcuſſion of commiſſaries; but we ſhall ſoon have occaſion to ſhew that this reference proved the ſource of continual diſputes and evaſions, by which, in the ſequel, the deſtructive flame of war was again rekindled in Europe.

His Britannic majeſty ſent the earl of Suſſex and lord Cathcart to France, to remain there as hoſtages for the reſtitution of Cape Breton (agreeable to the ninth article of the definitive treaty) who were preſented to the French monarch at Verſailles on the twenty-eighth of November. This ſtep was highly exclaimed againſt here at home, as being a national diſgrace, though it was certain the thing was not without precedent, even in the reign of the great Elizabeth; and later, in that of Lewis XIV. of France, who agreed to ſend hoſtages to the duke of Savoy. The two noblemen above-mentioned were detained in France till the ſurrender of Louiſburg to the French in July 1749, which was returned in a better condition than when it was taken from them: but as for Madraſs, the ſeat of the Britiſh preſidency in the Eaſt Indies, as the French had no hoſtages at the Engliſh court, this important ſettlement was left entirely to their generoſity, of which they gave a ſhining inſtance, by leaving it to the Engliſh in a moſt deſolate and ruinous condition. In ſhort, the national diſguſt againſt this peace diſcovered itſelf every day more and more; and the popular writings againſt it were ſo vehement, that many, even of the warmeſt friends to the government, ſeemed to have very little beſides neceſſity to plead in favour of the treaty.

It would lead me into too minute and circumſtantial a detail to recount all the particulars relating to the recal of the Britiſh forces, and the mutual reſtitution of places: ſuffice it to ſay, that every thing was effected with the utmoſt regularity, and without the intervention of any remarkable incident.

In purſuance of the nineteenth article of the late treaty, the duke de Geſvres, governor of Paris, did, by the French king's orders, declare in form to the young pretender, That however well intentioned his majeſty ſtood towards him, the preſent circumſtances would not permit him to conſent to his longer continuance upon the territories of his kingdom; and that his majeſty would be pleaſed to ſee him conform to ſuch neceſſity, by retiring to any place he ſhould think proper, out of the dominions of France. To which the young adventurer anſwered with great haughtineſs, "Sir, if this meſſage from the king is the reſult of his having contracted with the maritime powers, I muſt give you to underſtand, that his majeſty has alſo contracted with me; and, Pardie! I will not ſtir out of Paris." There appears to have been ſome truth in the young man's allegations: for Lewis, inſtead of contradicting it, wrote him a letter with his own hand, in the moſt ſoothing and perſuaſive terms. Charles, however, continued obſtinate in his reſolution not to depart out of France; and even after the arrival of the earl of Suſſex and lord Cathcart, who were ſent as the Britiſh hoſtages to Paris, he appeared publicly on all occaſions, and affected to be treated in their preſence with all the diſtinctions of a prince. The two noblemen complaining of this conduct, the French king found himſelf under the neceſſity of having recourſe to more ſerious meaſures. Accordingly, in the beginning of December he cauſed him to be arreſted as he was going into the opera-houſe, by twelve ſerjeants of the guards in diſguiſe, and without the leaſt buſtle. He was immediately conducted, with all his retinue preſent, in three coaches, to the caſtle of Vincennes, and from thence to the frontiers of the kingdom. It was ſaid, but upon what authority is uncertain, that as ſoon as the young adventurer was arreſted, one of his ſervants delivered to him a letter from the old pretender his father (which he ſhould have done ſeveral days before) expreſſing his ſurprize and great concern at his behaviour towards the court of France; complaining of his reſervedneſs and undutifulneſs, and of his following the opinions and perſuaſions of bad counſellors; expoſing the folly of his attempt to reſiſt the intentions of his moſt Catholic majeſty; commanding him, upon the duty he owed to his father and to his king, immediately to obey the directions of his beſt friend the king of France; and urging the diſgrace and difficulties a contrary behaviour muſt bring upon him.

This forcible expulſion of the eldeſt ſon of the pretender to the crown of Great Britain from the dominions of France, was conſidered as a great ſacrifice to the glory of England. Reciprocal compliments paſſed between the two courts; the earl of Albemarle was appointed ambaſſador-extraordinary to the French king, and the marquis de Mirepoix arrived at London in the ſame capacity.

In the mean while, his Britannic majeſty was viſiting the moſt remarkable places of his electoral dominions, and was every where received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy and affection. He had lately eſtabliſhed an univerſity at Gottingen, which he had the ſatisfaction to ſee in a flouriſhing condition. It was the twenty-third of November before he arrived in England, after a tedious and dangerous paſſage. On his arrival at London, he was complimented by that city on the peace in a very warm and dutiful addreſs.

On the twenty-ninth of November the parliament was opened by a ſpeech from his majeſty, in which he acquainted the two houſes of the definitive treaty being ſigned by all parties concerned; and "that he had made the moſt effectual proviſion for ſecuring the rights and intereſts of his ſubjects, and for procuring to his allies the beſt terms and conditions that the ſituation of affairs would admit: that he took much ſatisfaction in being able to tell them, that he had found a good diſpoſition in all the parties engaged in the war to bring this negociation to a happy concluſion: that from theſe circumſtances they might promiſe themſelves ſelves a long enjoyment of the bleſſings of a peace, provided they made a right uſe and improvement of it: that as great a progreſs had been made in reducing the public expences as the nature of the caſe would allow; and he only deſired them to grant him ſuch ſupplies as might be requiſite for the current ſervice of the year, for their own ſecurity, and for fulfilling ſuch engagements as had been already contracted and laid before them: that times of tranquillity were the moſt proper for leſſening the national debt, and ſtrengthening themſelves againſt future events; and he muſt recommend to them, as the moſt effectual means for theſe purpoſes, the improving of the public revenue, and the maintaining the naval force of the kingdom in due ſtrength and vigour: that thoſe brave men who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the ſervice of their country, were certainly proper objects of parliamentary favour and protection; and he hoped they would deem it their duty, as well as intereſt, to convert their moſt ſerious attention towards the advancing of commerce and the cultivating the arts of peace."

This ſpeech was anſwered by loyal and affectionate addreſſes from both houſes, though that of the lower was not carried without a violent oppoſition; the members of which bitterly arraigned the conduct of the miniſtry for concluding the peace before the arrival of the Ruſſians: and they even threw out intimations that they ſhould ſet on foot a ſtrict enquiry into the cauſes which had rendered the events of the war ſo little anſwerable to the prodigious expence the nation had been at, and the known bravery of the troops ſhe had employed. The motion for the addreſs, however, was at length carried without a diviſion.

Notwithſtanding the re-eſtabliſhment of peace, and the reduction that had been made, as well in the land as in the ſea forces, it was found impoſſible, at leaſt for ſome time, to diminiſh proportionably the public expences. When the commons proceeded to conſider the ſupply, they examined the ſums that would be abſolutely neceſſary for making good the engagement of the parliament to his majeſty, and the ſervices performed in the proſecution of the war, diſcharging debts, ſupplying deficiencies, and providing for the current ſervice of the year; and found that the whole ſupply of this year would amount to near eight millions ſterling: an immenſe ſum! which gave occaſion to the oppoſition to treat Mr. Pelham with great ſeverity, as the author of all the debts and incumbrances with which the nation was loaded. He was, however, powerfully ſupported by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Murray, his majeſty's ſollicitor-general, now lord Mansfield, and chief-juſtice of the King's Bench, and the ſupply was granted without a diviſion. This point being ſettled, the commons turned their attention to matters of another nature.

A bill was prepared for amending, explaining, and reducing into one act, the laws relating to his majeſty's navy. One intention of the bill was, to render half-pay officers ſubject to martial law, in the ſame manner as if they were upon full pay. The gentlemen of the navy immediately took the alarm. Sir Peter Warren, who was at this time member of parliament for the city and liberty of Weſtminſter, and in great reputation for his integrity as well as courage, preſented a petition to the houſe againſt the bill on the twenty-fourth of February, 1749, which was ſigned by no leſs than three admirals and ſixty-four captains, who were not members of the houſe. Many of theſe repaired to the admiralty, and threatened to throw up their commiſſions, ſhould the clauſe paſs into a law. It was therefore thought adviſable by the miniſtry to drop it. There was another clauſe in this bill which alſo met with vehement oppoſition: this was to oblige the members of a court-martial to take an oath not to diſcloſe at any time, or upon any account, the opinions or tranſactions of ſuch court. Many and plauſible were the objections raiſed to this clauſe. It was in particular obſerved, that it was poſſible for the members of a court-martial, from private or particular conſiderations, to commit the moſt flagrant injuſtice; and that it was impoſſible for parliaments (by this clauſe) to apply redreſs, becauſe it was impoſſible to diſcover the facts, which this oath abſolutely and eternally ſealed up. For theſe and other reaſons, an amendment was propoſed, empowering a member of a court-martial to reveal, if required by either houſe of parliament, the opinion of ſuch court in all caſes, in which the courts of juſtice, as the laws then ſtood, had a right to interfere. This amendment, however, was rejected; and the queſtion being at laſt put, was carried in the affirmative by a conſiderable majority.

But the moſt obſtinate and longeſt debate this ſeſſion was induced by the mutiny-bill, and particularly by the laſt clauſe of it, which was entirely new, importing, "That as it might be otherwiſe doubted, whether the officers and perſons employed in the trains of artillery, or the reduced officers of his majeſty's land forces or marines on the Britiſh or Iriſh eſtabliſhment on half-pay, were within the intent and meaning of this act, for puniſhing officers and ſoldiers who ſhould mutiny or deſert his majeſty's ſervice, and for puniſhing falſe muſters, and for payment of quarters; it was hereby enacted, that the officers or perſons employed, or that ſhould be employed in the ſeveral trains of artillery, or the reduced officers of his majeſty's land forces or marines on the Britiſh and Iriſh eſtabliſhment of half-pay, ſhould be at all times ſubject to all the penalties and puniſhments mentioned in this act, and ſhould, in all reſpects whatſoever, be held to be within the intent and meaning of it during the time of its continuance." "Such a clauſe, it was ſaid, was replete with the moſt alarming danger to the very conſtitution of this land, inaſmuch as it would increaſe the number of officers depending upon the crown, and ſubject to military law, who conſequently would always be the ready and compliant inſtruments of carrying into execution all ſchemes adopted by the miniſtry, however repugnant to the laws, or to the liberties and privileges of the people." The clauſe, however, was ſtrongly ſupported by Mr. Pitt; and the queſtion being put, was carried in the affirmative by a great majority. A bill was afterwards brought in for limiting the time of ſervice in the army; but upon a diviſion, it was put off for two months, which was equal to being rejected; becauſe it was underſtood that the parliament before that time would be prorogued, it being then the latter end of April.

The abuſe of paper-money all over the Britiſh plantations and colonies in America was by this time grown to ſo great an height, that at the motion of Mr. Walpole, auditor of America, a bill was brought in "to regulate and reſtrain paper bills of credit in the Britiſh colonies and plantations in America; to prevent the ſame being legal tenders in payment for money:" but this bill was ſo ſtrongly oppoſed by ſeveral eminent merchants, as well of North America as of London, that it was dropt for this ſeſſion.

The next object that engaged the attention of the commons was a bill for extending and improving the trade to the coaſt of Africa; the preamble of which remarks, "That the trade to and from Africa being very advantageous to Great Britain, and neceſſary for the ſupplying her plantations and colonies with a ſufficient number of negroes at reaſonable rates, ought for that reaſon to be free and open to all his majeſty's ſubjects. It was therefore enacted, that it ſhall be free and lawful for all the king's ſubjects to and from any place in Africa, between the port of Sallee in South Barbary, and the Cape of Good Hope, without any reſtraint whatſoever, except as herein expreſſed; and that all his majeſty's ſubjects ſo trading, &c. ſhould be united under certain regulations into an open company, by the name of "the company of merchants trading to Africa," without any joint ſtock or power to trade as a corporation; and that the forts and ſettlements ſhould be put under proper management and direction," &c. &c.

Thus this very conſiderable branch of the Britiſh commerce again aſſumed a new appearance, after having paſſed through ſeveral other different conſtitutions and various conditions; this bill paſſed the lower houſe, but was ſtopped in the upper till the end of the ſeſſion. Nevertheleſs, it was carried in the courſe of the ſucceeding, and finally confirmed by the royal ſanction. What was by this act eſtabliſhed ſtill remains in being, and with general approbation, though there are not wanting ſome who ſtill think, that ſo important a trade ought to be under a ſtricter government, and even in a joint ſtock corporation, as in former times; of which opinion, time and experience of the traders to that extended coaſt muſt determine the validity.

Several other bills were introduced in the courſe of this ſeſſion; but as none of them were attended with any remarkable debate, nor brought to maturity till the ſucceeding year, they will come to be more properly explained among the tranſactions of that period. On the thirteenth day of June his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he ſaid, That the terms and conditions of the definitive treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle had been carried into execution by the ſeveral contracting parties with great punctuality and good faith, ſo far as the time and diſtance of the places would admit. He hoped, he ſaid, that at the next meeting they would be able to perfect what they had now begun, for advancing the trade and navigation of his kingdoms; particularly, by rendering our naval force the moſt ſerviceable and uſeful. He then expreſſed his ſatisfaction at ſeeing the public credit in ſo flouriſhing a condition, at the end of an expenſive, though neceſſary war. And, laſtly, after returning them thanks for their ſupplies, and recommending unanimity to them, he diſmiſſed them.

As the French were put into the repoſſeſſion of Cape Breton, it was natural for the Britiſh miniſtry to fix their attention on the cultivation and improvement of their long neglected ſettlement of Nova Scotia, where, by a proper colonization of proteſtants in ſo valuable a tract of territory, more than an equal participation of the profits of the French fiſhery would fall to the Engliſh; a potent barrier would be erected for the ſecurity of the Britiſh provinces in North America; and a perpetual ſeminary of ſailors would be eſtabliſhed.

The earl of Halifax, then firſt lord of trade and plantations, was the principal promoter of a ſcheme ſo highly advantageous to the national intereſt, in which he was aſſiſted by many conſiderable perſons; and a plan was propoſed for eſtabliſhing a civil government in Nova Scotia, by granting lands within the ſame, and giving other encouragements to ſuch of the officers and private men lately diſmiſſed from the land and ſea-ſervice as ſhould be willing to ſettle in that part of the world. The king having conſidered the ſaid propoſal with his uſual coolneſs and diſcernment, was pleaſed to honour it with his royal approbation; and the lords of trade and plantations, by the command of his majeſty, gave notice in the Gazette, and other public papers, on the ſeventh of March, 1749, that proper encouragement would be given to ſuch of the officers and private men lately diſmiſſed his majeſty's land and ſea-ſervice, as were willing to accept of grants of land, and to ſettle with or without families in the province of Nova Scotia. A grant of fifty acres of land in fee-ſimple was promiſed to every private ſoldier or ſeaman, free from the payment of quit-rents or taxes for the term of ten years; at the expiration whereof, no perſon was to pay more than one ſhilling a year for every fifty acres ſo granted; and an additional grant of ten acres was promiſed to each private ſoldier or ſeaman having a family, for every perſon, including women and children, of which his family ſhould conſiſt. A grant of eighty acres, upon the like conditions, was offered to every officer under the rank of enſign in the land-ſervice, and that of lieutenant in the ſea-ſervice; and to ſuch as had families, fifteen acres more for every perſon of which their family conſiſted. A grant of two hundred acres, on the like conditions, was offered to every enſign, three hundred to every lieutenant, four hundred to every captain, and ſix hundred to every officer above the rank of captain in the land ſervice; as alſo the like quantity of four hundred acres, and on the ſame conditions, to every lieutenant in the ſea-ſervice, and ſix hundred acres to every captain; and to ſuch of the above-mentioned officers as had families, a further grant of thirty acres was offered, over and above their reſpective quotas, for every perſon of which their families conſiſted: it was alſo promiſed, that the land ſhould be parcelled out to the ſettlers as ſoon as poſſible after their arrival, and a civil government eſtabliſhed; and that proper meaſures ſhould alſo be taken for their ſecurity and protection: that the coloniſts ſhould be ſubſiſted during their paſſage; as alſo for the ſpace of 12 months after their arrival; and that they ſhould be furniſhed with arms and ammunition, as far as would be judged neceſſary for their defence, and a proper quantity of materials and utenſils for huſbandry, clearing and cultivating their lands, erecting habitations, carrying on the fiſhery, and ſuch other purpoſes as ſhould be neceſſary for their ſupport: carpenters, ſhipwrights, and ſuch other artificers as were neceſſary for huſbandry and building, were to be gratified with the ſame quantity of land as private ſoldiers: a civil government was to be eſtabliſhed among them as ſoon as poſſible, by which they were to enjoy all the privileges, liberties, and immunities of his majeſty's other ſubjects in America; and care was to be taken for their ſecurity and protection.

This excellent and patriotic ſcheme met with the ſucceſs it ſo well deſerved. By the beginning of May no leſs than three thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty perſons and families had engaged themſelves to go as ſettlers to this new colony, and were embarked on board tranſports for that purpoſe. The government of this infant colony was beſtowed on the honourable Edward Cornwallis, eſq. who accompanied the coloniſts in their voyage. The whole fleet arrived ſafely at Nova Scotia; and on the twenty-firſt of June anchored in the bay of Chebucto, in the very center of the ſouthern part of the province, having Annapolis on the left, and Canſo on the right. A town was now planned out at the head of Chebucto harbour, which was ſoon built, fortified, and divided into lots, and called HALIFAX, in honour of the noble lord who principally aſſiſted in promoting the eſtabliſhment of this colony, which ſoon wore an auſpicious aſpect, promiſing not only greatly to over-balance the expence of the government, but to exceed all the real and imaginary advantages that might have reſulted from the poſſeſſion of Cape Breton; and it is at this day become a flouriſhing and important ſettlement.

Few affairs of any importance occurred on the continent of Europe this year. Don Philip took poſſeſſion of Parma and Placentia, purſuant to the late treaty. The court of Ruſſia having entertained ſome ſuſpicions that the Swedes intended to change the form of their government after the death of their king, which her intereſt obliged her to preſerve inviolate, marched a body of her troops towards Finland, in order to be ready to act on the firſt warning, in caſe of ſuch an event, which was every day expected. Various declarations were now made on both ſides; and his Pruſſian majeſty, alarmed at the conduct of the czarina, wrote a letter to the king of Great Britain, earneſtly intreating him to co-operate with him and the king of France in preſerving the peace of the North. With this requeſt his Britannic majeſty, little reaſon as he had to be ſatisfied with the court of Stockholm, moſt generouſly complied. It appeared in the ſequel, that her czariſh majeſty's apprehenſions were altogether without foundation, and that the ſenate of Sweden had no intention to alter the form of government.

The French, according to all accounts, were proſecuting with the greateſt vigour a plan for reſtoring and encreaſing their marine, which had been ſo roughly handled in the late war; and, according to a ſcheme of monſieur de Rouillé, they were in the ſpace of eight years to have one hundred and eleven ſhips of the line, twenty-two bomb-ketches, and twenty-five fire-ſhips, ready to put to ſea at the firſt notice. In the mean time, encouraged, as it ſhould appear, by the ſubmiſſion of the Britiſh miniſtry in ſending hoſtages to Paris, they thought they might practiſe their old intrigues in America; and though by the late treaty, and thoſe upon which it was founded, the iſlands in the Weſt Indies, commonly called the Neutral Iſlands, were to remain unſettled and unfortified till the right of ſovereignty was determined; yet ſcarce had the definitive treaty of peace been ratified, when the French miniſtry ſent orders to the marquis de Caylus, their governor of Martinico, to take poſſeſſion of Tobago, one of the neutral iſlands, in the French king's name, though Mr. Grenville, governor of Barbadoes, had given the French inhabitants upon that iſland a regular notice to quit the ſame in thirty days, under pain of military execution. In contradiction to this, the marquis de Caylus, on the twenty-ſixth of November, 1748, publiſhed a proclamation, aſſerting the ſovereignty of France to Tobago and the other neutral iſlands, declaring that he would protect the inhabitants of Tobago, and prohibiting their having any correſpondence with the Britiſh, Dutch, or Daniſh colonies. This proclamation was followed by the ſending two French ſhips of war, with one hundred and fifty ſoldiers, beſides ſettlers, to fortify Tobago, where they arrived and erected ſome batteries. Upon this, governor Grenville diſpatched captain Tyrrel, who commanded a Britiſh ſquadron on the Barbadoes ſtation, with a forty and a twenty gun ſhip, and a ſloop, to obſerve the motions of theſe encroachers: but this commander had only the mortification of perceiving the French fortifying the iſland, and preventing the Engliſh from cutting wood there, while he was unable to impede their operations, being unprovided with proper powers. Intelligence of theſe proceedings of the French being tranſmitted to our miniſtry, a courier was diſpached to Verſailles to colonel York, the Britiſh reſident there, to make remonſtrances on this ſubject; and ſoon after our ambaſſador at the court of France acquainted our court, that the French king diſclaimed all knowlege of ſuch proceedings, and had ſent orders to evacuate that iſland: but this appears to have been a ſhameful evaſion, the marquis de Caylus afterwards declaring, that he had poſitive directions from the French miniſtry concerning his conduct at Tobago.

As to the other powers of Europe, very little intereſting happened among them that could injure Great Britain. The empreſs queen and the czarina made a farther alliance with each other, in order to be the better able to oppoſe the king of Pruſſia, who ſtill kept a numerous army on foot, and of whoſe deſigns thoſe two ſovereigns were become very jealous. In the South, the king of Sardinia, who ſtill continued diſſatisfied with the empreſs-queen, entered into a defenſive treaty with France and Spain, the king of the Two Sicilies, the duke of Modena, the republic of Genoa, and the duke of Parma; by which he was ſecured in the quiet enjoyment of all the eſtates which he at preſent poſſeſſed, or ſhould afterwards acquire; and by which their Catholic and moſt Chriſtian majeſties engaged to furniſh thirty thouſand men to ſuch of the contracting powers as ſhould want their aſſiſtance. But leſt the concluding this treaty ſhould give umbrage to England, his Sardinian majeſty declared, by his miniſter at London, that he was determined punctually to obſerve all his engagements with the king of Great Britain and the empreſs-queen.

In the courſe of this ſummer an accident happened which gave the court of Great Britain ſome uneaſineſs. A corſair of Algiers, one of the piratical ſtates of Barbary, made prize of the Prince Frederic Frederic packet-boat from Liſbon, detained her near a month at Algiers, and confiſcated all the money and jewels found on board her, to the amount of upwards of ninety thouſand pounds, under the pretence of its being the property of the Jews and Portugueſe. Hereupon commodore Keppel was ſent with ſeven ſhips of war before Algiers, to reclaim the ſhip and treaſure; but he was obliged to return without ſucceſs. Soon after an Algerine ambaſſador was ſent with ſome preſents to England, and the affair was compromiſed.

Of the domeſtic tranſactions in Great Britain during the courſe of the year 1749, the following are the moſt deſerving of notice. In the month of January a ſpecial commiſſion was opened at Chicheſter in Suſſex, for the trial of a number of ſmugglers for the barbarous murder of one Galley, a cuſtom-houſe officer, and another perſon, his friend, when ſeven of the villains were convicted, and received ſentence of death; and one dying in gaol, the other ſix were ſoon after executed. In February the declaration of a general peace was proclaimed at the uſual places in London and Weſtminſter; and in April a moſt magnificent fire-work was played off in the Green-Park, in commemoration of that event. It was honoured by the preſence of his majeſty and the royal family, both houſes of parliament, and all the principal perſons of London and Weſtminſter; but it miſcarried in the execution by the ſudden blowing up of a part of the ſtructure; and ſo the great pains, time, and expence beſtowed upon it, were rendered fruitleſs.

Murders and robberies ſtill continuing to be very frequent in and about the cities of London and Weſtminſter, a proclamation was publiſhed, offering a reward of one hundred pounds, over and above all other rewards, to be paid by the lords of the Treaſury, upon the conviction of any murderer or robber in thoſe cities, or within five miles thereof. Violent riots and tumults alſo prevailed throughout the kingdom at this period, evidently owing to the numbers of unprovided perſons diſcharged from the army and navy. The moſt dangerous of theſe happened at Briſtol, where great numbers of people from Glouceſterſhire and Somerſetſhire aſſembled, cut down the turnpikes, and committed various other outrages. Many of them were well armed, and bid defiance for ſome time to the magiſterial power. At length, ſix troops of dragoons being ſent down againſt them, ſoon obliged them to diſperſe, and reſtored quiet to the country.

The attention of the public was likewiſe engaged much about the ſame time, by another diſturbance of a very ſingular nature. Some young Oxonians, of an irregular and diſſolute turn, had for ſome time taken it into their heads, in all companies, and on all occaſions, to be guilty of many idle and inſolent reflections upon the preſent government, and even publicly to toaſt the young pretender's health. The vice-chancellor of the univerſity, and the heads of houſes, had done their utmoſt to check the licentiouſneſs of theſe ſparks, but in vain; therefore, in order to diſculpate themſelves, they publiſhed a declaration, expreſſing their utmoſt abhorrence of ſuch factious and ſeditious practices, and likewiſe their firm reſolution to puniſh, according to the utmoſt ſeverity and rigour of the ſtatutes, all perſons, of what ſtate or quality ſoever, who ſhould be convicted of ſuch offences. Nevertheleſs, as no puniſhment was inflicted on the delinquents by the univerſity, the government ordered three of the moſt audacious of them to be taken into cuſtody; two of whom, Dawes and Whitmore, were tried in the court of King's Bench; and being found guilty, on the cleareſt evidence, were ſentenced to walk through the courts of Weſtminſter, with a paper affixed on their foreheads denoting their crimes, to pay a fine of five nobles each, to be impriſoned for two years, and to find ſecurity for their good behaviour during ſeven years more. Some ſevere cenſures were paſſed upon the univerſity itſelf on this occaſion; the principals of which were ſtrongly ſuſpected of being tinctured with Jacobitiſm.

The univerſity of Cambridge, on the other hand, had recommended herſelf greatly to the government, by the many ſignal inſtances it had given of her attachment to revolution principles and the proteſtant ſucceſſion. The duke of Somerſet, who had been many years chancellor of that univerſity, being lately deceaſed, the heads made choice of the duke of Newcaſtle to ſucceed him, whoſe acceptance thereof is ſaid to have given great umbrage to the prince of Wales, who himſelf had ſome deſire to be made chancellor. The duke, however, at his majeſty's command, was inſtalled, and this was made a handle of to create a breach in the royal family.

On the twenty-ſecond of June prince George (his preſent majeſty) the margrave of Anſpach, the dukes of Bedford and Leeds, and the earls of Granville and Albemarle, were elected knights of the garter; and on the twenty-ſixth, ſir Peter Warren, ſir Edward Hawke, ſir Charles Howard, ſir Charles Amand Poulet, ſir John Mordaunt, and ſir John Sackville, were inſtalled knights of the Bath, in Henry VII's chapel in Weſtminſter-abbey.

This year was diſtinguiſhed by the death of ſeveral very eminent perſonages, viz. Charles Seymour, the great and magnificent duke of Somerſet; that humane and generous nobleman, John duke of Montagu; field-marſhal Richard Temple, viſcount Cobham; John Lindſay, the brave earl of Crawford; admiral ſir John Norris; and ſir Watkyn-Williams Wynn, ſo famous for his oppoſition to the Walpolean adminiſtration.

On the ſixteenth day of November the parliament met, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he ſaid, That it was with particular pleaſure that he now met them, at a time when the re-eſtabliſhment of a general peace had reſtored to his people the bleſſings of quiet and tranquillity: that the good effects reſulting from hence were already apparent in the flouriſhing condition of commerce, and the riſe of public credit, which naturally laid the ſureſt foundation for an increaſe of ſtrength, and of laſting proſperity to his kingdoms: that he had not failed, during the courſe of this ſummer, to avail himſelf of every opportunity to cement and preſerve the peace; and it was his firm reſolution to do every thing in his power to preſerve it inviolable, and religiouſly to adhere to the engagements he had contracted. Very dutiful addreſſes were preſented in anſwer to this ſpeech by both houſes; and theſe addreſſes received as cordial a return.

The reſolutions of the committee of ſupply were in the main the ſame as paſſed laſt ſeſſion, though the total of the ſum granted was not ſo great. They voted one hundred and eighty-three thouſand two hundred and thirty-two pounds for making good the engagements into which his majeſty had entered; one million forty-five thouſand five hundred and ninety pounds towards diſcharging the national debt; four hundred and ſixty-three thouſand fifty-two pounds for ſupplying deficiencies; two hundred forty-nine thouſand nine hundred and thirty pounds for defraying extraordinary expences; one hundred twenty-two thouſand two hundred and forty-ſix pounds for reimburſing the inhabitants of North America the money they had expended in making preparations for an expedition againſt Canada, and for ſupporting the colony of Nova Scotia; thirty-ſix thouſand four hundred and ſeventy-ſix pounds towards maintaining thoſe coloniſts for the ſpace of a twelvemonth; and two millions one hundred ninety-nine thouſand eight hundred fifty-five pounds for the enſuing year. The whole ſupply amounted to upwards of four millions. The land-forces were fixed at eighteen thouſand eight hundred and fifty-ſeven men, and the number of marines at fifteen thouſand.

As the proceedings of this ſeſſion were many of them of a nature that does not admit being particularized here, and others of them of the ſame nature with thoſe that the reader has already ſeen, I ſhall avoid a minute detail of all that paſſed, confining myſelf only to the moſt important.

In the rank of which we may place the act for the reduction of the intereſt upon the national debt, from four per cent. to three and a half, and afterwards to three per cent. by which an addition of near ſix hundred thouſand pounds per annum was begun to be gradually made to the ſinking fund. The public debts, which bore four per cent. ſtood as follows:

	l.	s.	d.
1. The principal ſum payable at the Exchequer, of -	312000	0	0
2. Capital Bank-ſtock -	8486800	0	0
3. Certain annuities transferable at the Bank -	18402472	0	10
4. Capital ſtock of the Eaſt India company - -	3200000	0	0
5. Capital South Sea ſtock, and old and new South Sea annuity-ſtock -	27302203	5	6½
Total	57703475	6	4½

Mr. Pelham, who took upon himſelf the whole ſtreſs of the debate on this important ſubject, ſo clearly demonſtrated the expediency and utility of this ſcheme, and that nothing can ſo effectually contribute to make trade flouriſh, as the leſſening the public debts and incumbrances with juſtice and public faith, that the houſe came to the following reſolutions, which they cauſed to be printed by way of advertiſement, in the London Gazette of November 29, 1749, for public information, and imported, "That all the proprietors of the ſaid public debts incurred before Michaelmas 1749, who ſhall, on or before the twenty-eighth of February, 1750, ſubſcribe their names, or ſignify their conſent to accept of an intereſt of three per cent. per annum, to commence from the 25th of December, 1757, ſhall be entitled to four per cent. till the 25th of December, 1750, and from thence to 3 l. 10s. per cent. until the 25th of December, 1757; and no part of the ſame (except what is due to the Eaſt India company) ſhall be liable to be redeemed, until the ſaid 25th of December, 1757."

This is what was called the firſt ſubſcription, becauſe all the proprietors of the above-named debts did not come into this propoſed ſubſcription within the time limited by this act, although the major part of them did; and although the ſecond ſubſcription to that reduction was enacted till the ſpring of the year 1750; yet, for connection's ſake, I ſhall here give the ſubſtance of an act of this ſame ſeſſion, "for giving further time to ſuch of the proprietors of the before-named annuities to ſubſcribe the ſame upon the terms therein mentioned, and for redeeming (i. e. paying off the principal ſums) of ſuch of the ſaid annuities as ſhall not be ſubſcribed; and for impowering the Eaſt India company to raiſe certain ſums by tranſferable annuities." It recites, "That great part of thoſe before-named annuities had been ſubſcribed on the terms of the firſt named ſtatute: it was therefore hereby enacted, that ſuch proprietors as have not ſo ſubſcribed, and who ſhall, on or before the thirtieth day of May, 1750, accept of an intereſt of three per cent. to commence from the twenty-fifth of December, 1755 (in the mean time to have the ſame terms in other reſpects as the former ſubſcribers have) ſhall not be redeemable till the ſaid twenty-fifth of December, 1755, may ſubſcribe on or before the ſaid thirtieth of May, 1750; and ſuch as ſhall not ſubſcribe on or before that day ſhall be redeemed and paid off." Thus the ſaid ſecond ſubſcribers had a reduction of their intereſt from three and a half per cent. to three per cent. two years ſooner than thoſe of the firſt ſubſcription; and ſuch as remained determined not to ſubſcribe at all, who however were not very many, were paid off their principal ſums out of the ſinking fund. Laſtly, the Eaſt India company were empowered, by conſent of the commiſſioners of the Treaſury (if they ſubſcribed their three millions two hundred thouſand pounds ſtock, and their one million annuities, by the thirtieth of May, 1750) to borrow any ſums not exceeding four millions two hundred thouſand pounds, by ſale of annuities, viz. three millions two hundred thouſand pounds, after the ſeveral rates of intereſt in the terms of this ſecond ſubſcription, and one million more at the rate of three per cent. per annum; with which that company accordingly complied.

In the courſe of this ſeſſion the mutiny act received ſome conſiderable alterations. The members of a court-martial were freed from the oath of ſecrecy, upon their being required by a court of juſtice to give evidence as witneſſes in the due courſe of law, and the ſentence of a court-martial was declared to be reviſable no more than once.

A ſpirit of reſentment had for ſome time been growing up among the people of England againſt the Dutch, who had firſt diſguſted them by their lukewarmneſs and double-dealing in the common cauſe, during the whole of the late war; and the great cry was, to wreſt out of the hands of the Dutch the fiſhery for herring on the Britiſh coaſt, which that people had for many years uſurped, and by which they had acquired immenſe riches. As our miniſtry were deſirous of indulging the public in whatever ſhould be thought for its advantage, a committee had been appointed laſt ſeſſion to conſider the ſtate of the Britiſh fiſhery, when, after ſome time taken up in making the proper enquiries, general Oglethorpe, chairman of the committee, reported, as their reſolution, "That the carrying on the Britiſh herring and cod-fiſheries will be of eminent advantage to the trade and navigation of theſe kingdoms, and is highly worthy the conſideration of parliament, and deſerves proper encouragement." A bill was ordered to be brought in on theſe reſolutions; but on account of the lateneſs of the ſeaſon, it was put off for that time.

Soon after the opening of this ſeſſion, the affair was again revived; and the ſpirit of the nation, as well as the attention of the legiſlature, ſtill farther ſtimulated by a petition to parliament from the inhabitants of Southwold and Leoſtoff, who declared that the Dutch had for about eight years fiſhed ſo near the ſhore, that their nets ſwept the ground, and by that means prevented the inhabitants from fiſhing, as an hundred Dutch fiſhing veſſels had frequently been anchoring at once in their harbour in two or three fathom water; and that when the inhabitants complained of this unwarrantable encroachment, the Dutch had threatened to ſink their boats, or tear their nets in pieces.

The commons having referred this matter to a committee, they came to the following reſolutions, which were reported by general Oglethorpe on the fifteenth of February, 1750, and agreed to by the houſe, viz. "That the carrying on the Britiſh white herring and cod-fiſheries would be of great advantage to the trade and navigation of theſe kingdoms; and that every impediment to ſuch trade ought to be removed with all convenient diſpatch: that, as a further encouragement to all perſons to engage in theſe fiſheries, a bounty of thirty ſhillings per ton ſhould be granted and paid out of the cuſtoms to all new veſſels from twenty to twenty-eight tons burthen, which ſhould be built for that purpoſe, and actually employed in the fiſheries: that in order to induce adventurers to employ their money in theſe fiſheries, a ſociety ſhould be incorporated, under the name of the Free Britiſh Fiſhery, by a charter, though not excluſive, with power to raiſe a capital not exceeding five hundred thouſand pounds; and that three and a half per cent. ſhould be granted and paid out of the cuſtoms to the proprietors for fourteen years, for ſo much of the capital as ſhould be actually employed in ſuch fiſheries."

Upon theſe reſolutions a bill was preſented by general Oglethorpe, by order of the houſe, for the encouragement of the White Herring fiſhery, which paſſed through both houſes, and afterwards received the royal aſſent. The bill was no ſooner paſſed than there was a general meeting of the perſons named in the act, when the prince of Wales was choſen governor; Slingſby Bethell, eſq. preſident; and Stephen-Theodore Janſſen, eſq. vice-preſident, both of them aldermen of London. A council, conſiſting of thirty perſons, was alſo appointed for managing the affairs of the company, to whom his majeſty's charter of incorporation was granted, bearing date the eleventh of October, 1750.

The ſucceſs of this public-ſpirited undertaking has not hitherto indeed fully anſwered the expectations of the worthy promoters of it, whoſe generous zeal deſerves the higheſt commendations: but it is to be conſidered, that it is extremely difficult to beat another nation out of a trade they have ſo long poſſeſſed, even with the above great encouragement from the public; and more eſpecially ſo frugal a people as the Dutch, who can content themſelves with ſmaller gains than other nations, and carry on the fiſhery every one on his own private bottom.

Amongſt other public-ſpirited acts of this ſeſſion, one paſſed for the encouragement of the manufacture of Britiſh ſail-cloth, which, by the Iriſh underſelling us, was fallen into great decay. In order to retrieve it, this act impoſed a duty of four-pence per yard upon all Iriſh ſail-cloth brought into Great Britain. Another act alſo paſſed to encourage the importation of pig and bar iron from his majeſty's colonies in North America; and to prevent the erection of any mill or other engine for ſlitting or rolling of iron, or any plating forge to work with a tilt hammer, or any furnace for making of ſteel, in any of the ſaid colonies. The title of this ſtatute, which is ſufficient for our purpoſe, plainly ſhews how jealous our legiſlature was of our greatly increaſing northern colony people going far into manufactures interfering with thoſe of their mother-country. Nevertheleſs, as our continent colonies are increaſing faſt in people, perhaps it would not be altogether impolitic to allow ſome latitude in that reſpect, as the proportionable increaſe of our people there will undoubtedly occaſion a like or greater increaſe of our general commerce.

The laſt acts of this ſeſſion, of which I ſhall take notice here, are two relating to the ſilk-trade; for promoting the manufacture of which in Great Britain, an act paſſed, whereby the duties payable on raw ſilk imported from China by the Eaſt India company were now reduced to the ſame duty as is payable on raw ſilk from Italy: and upon a petition from the dealers and manufacturers of raw and thrown ſilks, repreſenting the vaſt benefit that would accrue to the kingdom by the growth of that commodity (which of late was become exceſſively dear) in the Britiſh ſouthern colonies of America, an act paſſed to repeal the duties upon American ſilk imported into England. Since this act the culture of ſilk has viſibly, though gradually, increaſed there, and more particularly in Carolina and Georgia; and it ſeems not improbable that, in a reaſonable ſpace of time, thoſe two provinces, provided they will ſteadily purſue the ſaid culture, may hereafter have the new honour of being denominated the Silk Colonies.

On the twelfth of April his majeſty repaired to the houſe of peers; and after thanking the members of the houſe of commons for the ſupplies they had granted, and the attention they had ſhewn to the good of the public in reducing the national intereſt, he ordered the parliament to be prorogued. Soon after this his majeſty ſet out for his German dominions, having firſt appointed a council to govern the kingdom in his abſence.

During theſe tranſactions, the people of England were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation by two ſhocks of an earthquake; the firſt on the eighth of February, between twelve and one at noon, was felt all over the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and and parts adjacent; ſome chimnies were thrown down, and in many places the waters were agitated in a very extraordinary manner.

On the eighth of March, at half an hour after five o'clock in the morning, the town was alarmed a ſecond time, by a more ſevere ſhock than the former, attended with a hollow, ruſtling noiſe, as of wind, and numbers of people were awakened out of their ſleep by its violence: however, providentially no miſchief happened, except the throwing down ſeveral chimnies, and the damaging ſome houſes. In ſome places the ſhock was ſo violent, that the people ran from their beds and houſes almoſt naked, in the greateſt conſternation at this very unuſual viſitation. Preceding the ſhock there was obſerved a continual, tho' confuſed lightning, till within a minute or two of its being felt, which darted very low, and the flaſhes were very ſtrong. It was felt in Eſſex, Surrey, and Kent, as well as in moſt parts of Middleſex; and in all the four counties the panic was univerſal, and was ſtill further encreaſed by the ridiculous prediction of a wild enthuſiaſt, who pretended to foretel a third ſhock to happen in a ſhort time, which would lay all London and Weſtminſter in ruins: the fanatic happened luckily to be miſtaken; but the two ſhocks which had already been felt, had brought a ſerious air upon every face. The pulpits and the preſs were employed in calling a degenerate people to repentance, and in deprecating the wrath of heaven; and vice was for a little time out of countenance. But ſoon this was all forgot; the wicked returned to their vices, and the weak forgot their real as well as their imaginary terrors. On the eighteenth of March, between five and ſix in the evening, a ſhock was alſo felt at Goſport, Portſmouth, and the Iſle of Wight, which greatly ſurpriſed and terrified the inhabitants. Several other places in Europe were viſited with this dreadful calamity, as France, Germany, &c. The iſland of Cerigo, in the Archipelago, was almoſt deſtroyed, and above two thouſand of the inhabitants periſhed.

On the twentieth of April, died ſir Samuel Pennant, lord-mayor of London, whoſe death I mention becauſe it was occaſioned by an infectious diſtemper, ſuppoſed to be the goal fever, which prevailed in Newgate, and was from thence carried to the Seſſions-houſe in the Old-bailey, where it proved fatal to the gentleman above-mentioned; to ſir Daniel Lambert, knight and alderman; to Mr. Clark, a baron of the Exchequer; to ſir Thomas Abney, a judge of the Common-pleas; to many of the lawyers who attended the ſeſſions; to the greateſt part of the jury, and to a vaſt number of the ſpectators.

In the month of July the prince and princeſs of Wales, with the lady Auguſta (now hereditary princeſs of Brunſwic) their eldeſt daughter, made a tour to the weſt of England, and were received every where with the greateſt honour and reſpect; and ſoon after their royal highneſſes viſited Southampton and the iſle of Wight, where their reception was equally reſpectful and affectionate. A little after Midſummer this year, arrived the firſt parcel of herrings caught by the buſſes of the newly incorporated ſociety of the free Britiſh fiſhery off Shetland.

Little happened in the other nations of Europe, of importance to the intereſts of Great-Britain. The king of Portugal dying in the ſummer of this year, was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Joſeph, who renewed all the amicable connexions of his predeceſſor with our court. About the ſame time, a new treaty of ſubſidy between the king of Great-Britain, the empreſs-queen, the States-general, and the elector of Bavaria, was ſigned at Herenhauſen near Hanover, where his majeſty then was, on a viſit to his German dominions: his majeſty afterwards concluded a new treaty with the emperor of Morocco, and an agreement was made for the redemption of ſixty Britiſh captives.

The many difficulties ſtarted by the court of Spain, againſt the carrying on the South Sea company's Aſſiento trade; the oppreſſions of the Spaniſh officers and governors in the Weſt Indies; the frauds too obviouſly committed, on the other hand, by the company's agents in thoſe parts, in ſpite of the regulations and reſtrictions enjoined them by their principals; and the complaint of the Britiſh merchants trading to Cadiz, ſeemed now all to concur, at both courts, for putting a final period to a trade which, without any ſubſtantial benefit to Great-Britain, had given inſuperable umbrage to the court of Madrid: ſo that both crowns were eaſily brought to conclude a treaty at Madrid, on the fifth of October, N. S. 1750, to the following purport: "That the ambaſſadors of both kings, at the treaty of Aix-la-chapelle, anno 1748, having then agreed to regulate, at a proper time and place, the equivalent which Spain ſhould give, in conſideration of the non-enjoyment of the remaining years of the Aſſiento of negroes, and of the annual ſhip granted to Great-Britain; their ſaid Britannic and Catholic majeſties now agree, that the king of Spain ſhould pay to the South Sea company, within the ſpace of three months, the ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, by way of indemnification, as well for non-execution of the Aſſiento contract as to make amends for the four years in which they did not ſend out their annual ſhips: that with regard to the trade and navigation of the Engliſh in the ports of the king of Spain's dominions, all the treaties concluded between the two nations for the laſt eighty-three years ſhould be punctually obſerved and fulfilled: that of conſequence, the Britiſh ſhips that traded in the ports of his moſt Catholic majeſty ſhould pay no other duties for the goods than what they paid in the reign of Charles II. of Spain: that the ſubjects of Great-Britain ſhould, in the places where they come to traffick, pay only the ſame duties as the ſubjects of his Catholic majeſty, who promiſed that the Engliſh ſhould be treated, in his dominions, on the ſame footing as the moſt favoured nations: and finally, that they ſhould continue to enjoy the privilege of taking in ſalt at the iſland of Tortula, which was poſſeſſed by the Spaniards."

This is truly a "definitive treaty" in the ſtricteſt ſenſe of the term, as it relates ſolely to differences between the court of Spain and Great-Britain, without any relation to, or connection with, any other nation. Hereby a period was abſolutely put to all foreign commerce whatever, of the South Sea company. To conclude this ſubject, I ſhall here obſerve, that this company, having propoſed to the government to accept of an intereſt of four per cent. on their capital ſtock of three millions ſix hundred and ſixty-two thouſand ſeven hundred and eighty-four pounds, until Chriſtmas, 1757; and then to ſtand reduced to three per cent. per annum; provided that the manner of the receipt from the Exchequer, and the charges of management upon the preſent old and new South Sea annuities, and on their ſaid capital ſtock, be continued as they now are. An act of parliament, in conſequence thereof, paſſed the following year, for reducing the ſame accordingly, on theſe terms.

The favourite meaſure which his Britannic majeſty had in view while he was abroad, was the election of the archduke Joſeph, eldeſt ſon of the emperor and the empreſs queen, to be king of the Romans. But tho' his majeſty had the election greatly at heart, yet it met with much oppoſition; the king of Pruſſia, and the French party in the empire, having a majority in the diet, thro' which they inſiſted the propoſal muſt paſs before it came to the electors. The king of Spain having ſome intereſt in the German body, was applied to for his good offices in behalf of the archduke, by the Britiſh miniſter at Madrid; but his Catholic majeſty ſeemed not in the leaſt inclined to concern himſelf therein, ſo that the affair at preſent was entirely laid aſide.

His majeſty returned to England from his German dominions on the fourth of November; but it was the ſeventeenth of January, 1751, before the parliament was opened, when his majeſty, in a moſt gracious ſpeech, acquainted both houſes of his having concluded a treaty with the king of Spain, whereby ſuch particular differences as could not be ſettled by a general treaty, had been amicably adjuſted. He alſo took notice of his having, in conjunction with the empreſs-queen and the States general, concluded a treaty with the elector of Bavaria; both which treaties, he ſaid, ſhould be laid before them. He repreſented all the contracting powers in the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle as determined to preſerve the general peace; and then concluded with an exhortation to unanimity, the improving the trade and commerce of the nation, and the putting in force the laws againſt the diſturbers of the domeſtic peace of the kingdom.

Both houſes returned addreſſes upon this ſpeech, full of the moſt loyal profeſſions, which met with the moſt gracious reception and the warmeſt return from the throne.

The attention of the commons was entirely engroſſed at the beginning of this ſeſſion, in conſidering a caſe of a very delicate and intereſting nature. Lord Trentham, eldeſt ſon to earl Gower, and one of the repreſentatives for Weſtminſter, having in the courſe of the former ſeſſion accepted of the place of a lord of the admiralty, his ſeat in parliament became of conſequence vacated; and having again declared himſelf a candidate, he met with a powerful opponent in the perſon of ſir George Vandeput, a private gentleman, who was powerfully ſupported by the anti-miniſterial party, and by all thoſe who aſſumed the name of independent electors.

During the receſs of parliament, matters had been carried on with great acrimony between the two parties. Upon the cloſing of the poll, lord Trentham appeared to have the majority of votes; upon which the other candidate demanded a ſcrutiny, which was immediately granted; and this likewiſe turned out in favour of his lordſhip, who was thereupon returned by the high bailiff of Weſtminſter as duly elected, and took his ſeat accordingly in the houſe at the opening of the ſeſſion. Enraged at their defeat, the other party immediately preſented two petitions to the houſe againſt this return; one from ſir George's friends, the other from himſelf, both complaining of the injuſtice and partiality ſhewn by the high-bailiff in the courſe of the ſcrutiny. In oppoſition to theſe, lord Trentham made complaint of unconſtitutional practices in his opponents, and in particular of their having inſulted and intimidated the high-bailiff in the execution of his office.

The matter was now brought before the houſe, where the high-bailiff made his appearance, and accuſed counſellor Crowle, the honourable Alexander Murray, brother to the lord Elibank, and one Gibſon, an upholder, of having been moſt forward in obſtructing him in the diſcharge of his duty. Theſe three perſons were ſummoned to the bar, when Mr. Crowle was ordered to receive a reprimand from the ſpeaker on his knees, and Gibſon was committed priſoner to Newgate. The charge againſt Mr. Murray was more heavy than againſt the other two, the high bailiff accuſing him of having behaved in the moſt riotous and ſcandalous manner, as well during the time of the ſcrutiny as when it was over, and with threatening him, the high-bailiff, and committing other acts of violence after the return was made; in particular, the having put himſelf at the head of a mob who ſeemed to be for ſir George Vandeput, and exciting and inflaming the ſaid mob to inſult and murder the high-bailiff, by repeatedly crying out, "Will no body knock the dog on the head? Will no body kill the dog?" or words to that effect. Full proof of this charge being made to the houſe, they reſolved that Mr. Murray ſhould be committed cloſe priſoner to Newgate, and that he ſhould be brought to the bar of the houſe to receive ſentence on his knees. To the bar he was accordingly brought; but when he came there he peremptorily refuſed to kneel; a circumſtance that greatly aggravated his former crime, by thus daring to ſet the whole houſe of commons at defiance. It was therefore reſolved, that the honourable Alexander Murray, eſq. having in a moſt inſolent and audacious manner, at the bar of the houſe, refuſed to be upon his knees, in compliance with their former reſolution, had been guilty of a high and moſt dangerous contempt of the authority and privilege of the houſe: that for this offence he ſhould be committed cloſe priſoner to Newgate; and that while he was there, he ſhould not be allowed the uſe of pen, ink, or paper, nor be indulged in the privilege of having any perſon admitted to him, without the leave of the houſe.

Theſe reſolutions were immediately put in execution, and that night (or rather morning, for this affair kept the houſe ſitting till one o'clock) Mr. Murray was conveyed to Newgate, where he continued till the end of the ſeſſion, and the legality of lord Trentham's election was now fully confirmed.

On the fifth of February a proclamation was iſſued, promiſing a reward of one thouſand pounds for apprehending the author, for each of the printers five hundred pounds, and for each of the publiſhers fifty pounds, of a treaſonable piece, entitled, Conſtitutional Queries: which piece was alſo burnt by the common hangman.

The two grand committees appointed to diſcuſs the ſupplies for the year, and the funds upon which they are to be raiſed, proceeded as uſual, under the direction of the miniſtry. Very warm debates however enſued, in conſequence of a motion for reducing the number of ſeamen to 8000, which was oppoſed by Mr. W. Pitt, Mr. Lyttleton, and Mr. G. Grenville, with ſurpriſing force of argument and elocution; but numbers decided for the queſtion. The ſame fate attended the like oppoſition to the number of troops conſtituting the ſtanding army: but the other reſolutions of the grand committee met with little or no oppoſition. On the whole, the proviſions for the ſervice of this year amounted very little ſhort of five millions. The annual meaſure, called the Mutiny-bill, was not paſſed without diſpute and altercation. Some alterations were propoſed, but rejected, and the ſentences of court-martials ſtill ſubjected to one reviſion.

In the midſt of theſe deliberations, this kingdom ſuſtained a terrible blow in the death of Frederic-Lewis, prince of Wales, who expired on the twentieth day of March, about ten in the evening, at Leiceſter-houſe, to the unſpeakable grief of the whole nation. This excellent and amiable prince was born January 20, 1707, and on the twenty-ſeventh of April 1736, married the princeſs Auguſta of Saxe-Gotha, who, by her cloſe and conſtant attendance on her princely conſort, to the laſt moment of his fatal illneſs, kept up the great pattern ſhe had all along exhibited of conjugal affection. By this lady, who was at this time advanced in her pregnancy, his royal highneſs left iſſue five ſons and three daughters, viz. princeſs Auguſta (now married to the hereditary prince of Brunſwic) born July 31, 1737; prince George, now our moſt gracious ſovereign king George III. born May 24, 1738; prince Edward-Auguſtus (now duke of York) born March 14, 1739; princeſs Elizabeth-Caroline (ſince deceaſed) born December 30, 1740; prince William-Henry (now duke of Glouceſter) born November 14, 1743; prince Henry-Frederic (now duke of Cumberland) born October 27, 1745; princeſs Louiſa-Anne, born March 8, 1749; prince Frederic-William, born May 13, 1750 (deceaſed December 31, 1765); beſides the princeſs Caroline-Matilda lately eſpouſed to the king of Denmark, who was born after her father's death, viz. July 11, 1751.

His royal highneſs may juſtly be ſaid to have been the joy and hope of Britain, the merchants friend, the protector of arts and ſciences, the patron of merit, the reliever of diſtreſs, the accompliſhed prince, and the fine gentleman: in all the parts of private life an affectionate huſband, an indulgent, tender parent, a kind maſter, and an affable, good-natured man. He ſeemed in all reſpects formed to rule over a free people; he had made the knowlege of the Engliſh conſtitution his ſtudy and delight, and was a great maſter of geography and the theory of commerce; underſtood its natural operations and effects, and how to apply them for the benefit of the nation, better than was generally imagined.

The public was informed that his royal highneſs's illneſs was firſt occaſioned by catching cold in Kew-gardens, which was increaſed by coming from the houſe of peers, when extremely warm, with the windows of his chair down, and turned to a pleuriſy. No danger, however, was apprehended; and upon the application of proper remedies, he was even thought to be in a fair way of recovery, till the very hour of his death, when he was ſeized with a pain in his breaſt; upon which he expreſſed he had never felt any thing like it before, and complained that he ſmelled an unuſual ſmell, like that of a dead corpſe; and preſently throwing himſelf back in his chair, expired. His body was opened the next day, and there was found a large abſceſs upon his lungs, the burſting of which was ſuppoſed to have been the immediate cauſe of his death. The remains of his royal highneſs were depoſited with great pomp and ceremony in a vault in Henry VII's chapel, the duke of Somerſet being chief mourner.

His royal highneſs was the eighteenth prince of Wales of the Engliſh blood-royal, and the only one, except Edward the Black Prince, who died (at about the ſame age as his royal highneſs) in his father's lifetime, and left a ſon to ſucceed him. It was therefore preſumed that prince George, eldeſt ſon of his late highneſs, ſucceeded to all his father's titles and dignities without any new creation, Edward III. having only declared his grandſon Richard prince of Wales, in the ſimilar caſe above-mentioned, not created him by a new patent. The eldeſt ſon of a king of England, if born while his father is on the throne, is by birth duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter and Flint, but prince of Wales by creation. However, that creation being once made, and the poſſeſſor dying and leaving male-iſſue before he ſucceeds to the throne, it ſhould ſeem probable that the common courſe of ſucceſſion to theſe honours ſhould here take place. In theſe conjectures, however, the public found itſelf miſtaken; for on the twentieth of April letters-patent paſſed the great-ſeal of Great Britain, creating George-William prince of Great Britain, prince of Wales, and earl of Cheſter.

On the twenty-ſixth of the ſame month his majeſty ſent a meſſage to both houſes, ſignifying his royal inclination, that in caſe the imperial crown of theſe realms ſhould deſcend to any of the iſſue of his ſon the late prince of Wales, being under the age of eighteen years, the princeſs-dowager of Wales, their mother, ſhould be guardian to the perſon of ſuch ſucceſſor, and regent of theſe kingdoms, until they ſhould attain that age, with ſuch power and limitation as ſhould appear neceſſary and expedient for theſe purpoſes. This meſſage was anſwered by affectionate addreſſes from both houſes, promiſing their compliance with his majeſty's inclination; and a bill was accordingly prepared by the lords, declaring the princeſs of Wales regent of the realm, on the event of the king's death, during the minority of her eldeſt ſon; and ſhe was to be aſſiſted in the adminiſtration of the government by a council of regency. This was compoſed of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, who was then at the head of the army, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, the lord high-treaſurer of Great Britain, or firſt commiſſioner of the Treaſury, the preſident of the council, the lord privy-ſeal, the lord high-admiral of Great Britain, or firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, the two ſecretaries of ſtate, and the lord chief-juſtice of the King's Bench, all of them for the time being, except his royal highneſs the duke. This bill quickly paſſed through the upper houſe; but it did not make its way through the commons without a violent debate; the council of regency in particular met with fierce oppoſition. The majority, however, paſſed the bill, which in a little time received the royal ſanction.

On Wedneſday the twenty-ſecond of May the royal aſſent was given to the ever-famous act of the Britiſh legiſlature, "for regulating the commencement of the year, and for correcting the calendar now in uſe;" that is, for aboliſhing the OLD, and eſtabliſhing the NEW STILE, already in uſe in moſt other parts of Chriſtendom. This act was modelled with great ſkill and learning by the earl of Macclesfield, and has been productive of many excellent conſequences; in particular, the correſpondence between the Engliſh merchants and thoſe of foreign countries will be greatly facilitated, with reſpect to the dates of letters and accounts. The following conciſe, but clear account of the grounds on which this new regulation proceeds, cannot be unacceptable to our readers:

By the Julian account (ſo called as being framed by Julius Cæſar) the year is ſuppoſed to conſiſt of three hundred and ſixty-five days and ſix hours. The odd hours added together amounting every fourth year to a day, three years ſucceſſively conſiſt each of three hundred and ſixty-five days, and the fourth year of three hundred and ſixty-ſix, which is called Leap Year.

But the true ſolar year conſiſting of only three hundred and ſixty-five days five hours forty-nine minutes and ſixteen ſeconds, there is an over-reckoning of ten minutes and forty-four ſeconds every year, which of conſequence has made a variation of one day in every one hundred and thirty-four years that have paſſed ſince the firſt ſettling this account: by which means the vernal equinox, or ſun's entrance into Aries, is now on the tenth of March, which in Julius Cæſar's time was on the twenty-fourth.

Pope Gregory III. finding the Julian account to be erroneous, reſolved upon a reformation of it, which he finiſhed in the year 1582, and which from him is called the Gregorian account, or New Stile.

The pope in his reformation looked no farther back than the council of Nice, which was held in the year 325; and finding the vernal equinox was then on the twenty-firſt of March, he ordered ten days in the year 1582 to be omitted, which was done by calling the fifth of October (his birth-day) the fifteenth; ſo that the vernal equinox, which otherwiſe would have been on the eleventh, fell on the twenty-firſt of March.

And to prevent errors of the like nature for the future, he ordered the ſubtracting three days from every revolution of four hundred years, which was to be done by omitting the twenty-ninth day of February at the end of the three centuries, and at the end of the fourth century to retain it.

This is the reaſon that, before the twenty-ninth of February 1700, the difference between the old and new ſtile was only ten, whereas ſince that time it has been eleven days.

I ſhall now give a ſhort abſtract of this memorable act, as being of ſufficient importance to claim a place in every hiſtory of this country.

In the firſt place, it is enacted, that the old computation of the year, by which it begins on March 25, is not to be made uſe of, throughout all the Britiſh dominions, after December 31, 1751, but the firſt of January next following is to be reckoned the firſt day of the year 1752, and every year for the future to begin on the firſt of January inſtead of the twenty fifth of March. In the ſecond place, the ſeveral days of each month, after the firſt of January 1752, are to go on in the ſame order as uſual, till the ſecond of September in the ſaid year, incluſive; but the natural day next immediately following the ſaid ſecond of September 1752, inſtead of the third, is to be called the fourteenth of September, omitting only for that time the eleven intermediate nominal days of the preſent calendar. And the ſeveral natural days that ſhall follow the ſaid fourteenth of September are to be reckoned forward in numerical order as uſual, and ſo on continually.

All acts, deeds, notes, &c. after the firſt of January 1752, to be dated according to the new ſupputation. And the fixed terms, Hilary and Michaelmas, and all courts, &c. that are to be held on any certain day of a month, to be kept on the ſame nominal day, after the ſecond of September, 1752, when the eleven days are dropt that they were kept on, according to the old method, i. e. eleven days ſooner than the ſame are now kept.

For keeping the days of the year in the ſame regular courſe as near as may be (to the true motion of the ſun) the years of our Lord 1800, 1900, 2100, 2200, 2300, or any hundredth years in time to come (which, according to the preſent method, would be Leap year, as every fourth year is) except only every fourth hundredth, whereof the year 2000 to be the firſt, are not to be deemed Leap years, but common years, of three hundred and ſixty-five days. And the years 2000, 2400, 2800, and every other fourth hundredth year, to be Leap years, of three hundred and ſixty-ſix days.

New rules are fixed, and a calendar annexed, for keeping Eaſter according to the full moons by which it is regulated, and the other moveable feaſts depending on Eaſter; and the fixed feaſts and faſts to be kept on the ſame nominal days as now. All the moveable feaſts, the moveable terms of Eaſter and Trinity, and moveable fairs, marts, &c. to be governed by Eaſter and the other moveable feaſts, as uſual, but according to the new calendar, and to be held on their reſpective days accordingly.

Fixed fairs or marts, after the ſaid ſecond of September, not to be held on the ſame nominal day, but the ſaid natural day as before, that is, eleven days later than the nominal day by the new computation.

Opening and incloſing of commons of paſture not to be accelerated by the act, but to commence on the ſame natural day they would have happened if the act had not been made, viz. eleven days later than it would have happened by the new computation, to begin on the new 14th of September above-mentioned.

The payment of rents, annuities, or money payable by virtue of any contract already made, or which ſhall be made before the ſaid fourteenth of September 1752, or otherwiſe; the time of the delivery of goods or merchandize, &c. the commencement or expiration of leaſes; the attaining the age of twenty-one years, &c. by any perſon now born, or who ſhall be born before the ſaid fourteenth fourteenth of September; or the expiration of any apprenticeſhip or other ſervice; none of theſe, &c. to be accelerated or anticipated by the act, but to be on the ſame natural days as they ſhould have been if this act had not been made; and the ſum to be paid for the intereſt of money ſhall be according to the true number of natural days, and ſhall not at all be affected by this act.

The mention of the other acts of parliament paſſed this ſeſſion does not fall within the deſign of this hiſtory. I ſhall therefore only obſerve, that the public buſineſs being completed, his majeſty repaired to the houſe of peers on the twenty-fifth of June; and after giving the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills that were prepared for that purpoſe, he concluded the ſeſſion by a moſt gracious ſpeech to both houſes, in which he returned them thanks for the proofs they had given of their zeal and affection for him and his government, and their care and attention for the intereſts of his people: then addreſſing himſelf to the commons, he told them, that the prudence and firmneſs they had ſhewn in completing the reduction of the national debt, was as agreeable to him as that meaſure was eſſential to the ſtrength and welfare of the kingdom; and concluded with recommending to both houſes to encourage and promote a juſt reverence for government and law, and not to ſuffer thoſe good laws which were enacted there to loſe their effect for want of due execution.

Never indeed was admonition of this kind more neceſſary from the throne than at this period; for a greater ſpirit of profligacy and diſſoluteneſs now prevailed than had been known for many years paſt. Numbers of perſons were executed for the moſt ſhocking and atrocious crimes. In the courſe of this year only, one Miſs Blandy was executed for poiſoning her father, an eminent attorney at Henley upon Thames in Oxfordſhire; and Miſs Jefferies, another young gentlewoman, was executed, with Swan her lover, for murdering her uncle, a wealthy tradeſman who had retired from buſineſs, and with whom ſhe had lived for a conſiderable time. A large mob aſſembled at Tring in Hertfordſhire, and ſeizing an old woman and her huſband (each of them upwards of ſeventy years of age) under the notion of their having bewitched ſome of the neighbours, they treated them with ſuch inhumanity, by ducking and beating them, that the woman died on the ſpot, and the man in a very few days after. For this murder one Colley was hanged. Two fellows, Welſh and Jones, were diſcovered this year alſo to have been the authors of a rape and murder, for which one Coleman, a brewer's clerk, had unjuſtly ſuffered upon their falſe evidence. Thoſe wretches were ſo hardened as to be preſent at Coleman's execution, heard his declaration of his innocence, and afterwards aſſiſted in drawing the cart from under him. Both of them were hanged, confeſſing the crime.

The loſs of the prince of Wales was ſucceeded by two other heavy ſtrokes to the royal family of Great-Britain this year; for on the eleventh of October, the prince of Orange, his majeſty's ſon-in-law, paid the debt of nature, in the forty-firſt year of his age; as did likewiſe Louiſa, queen of Denmark, the King's youngeſt daughter, who expired on the nineteenth of December, in the twenty-ſeventh year of her age. The princeſs of Orange was inveſted with the government of the United Provinces, as governante, till her ſon ſhould arrive at the years of majority, and exerciſed the ſame power as her huſband had enjoyed.

Affairs on the continent continued much in the former ſituation: a ſtrong jealouſy however ſtill prevailed between the king of Pruſſia and the czarina, who ordered her miniſter at the court of Berlin, to make an abrupt departure; and his example was followed by the Pruſſian ambaſſador at Peterſburg.

The French king ſtill continued bent upon the proſecution of the ſchemes which he had formed in America; and though his ſubjects did not openly attack or moleſt any of our ſettlements, yet it was not long before they ſhewed the little regard they had to the articles of the late peace. They had been exceeding buſy ever ſince its concluſion, in ſeducing the Indians, our allies, into their intereſt; and the clandeſtine ſucceſs their perfidious dealings met with, was ſoon apparent, for in Auguſt, this year, advice came, that the French were gone from Canada, with an army of ſix hundred men, viz. four hundred French and two hundred Indians, to be augmented to one thouſand on their march, and were proceeding to the ſouth-weſtern parts of North-America, in order to ſtrengthen their own intereſt and ruin ours in thoſe parts; particularly, to deſtroy the nation of the Twightwees, who are friends to the Engliſh, and to kill a certain Virginian trader, who, by honeſt dealings with the Indians, had lately gained the affections of many, and drawn their trade that way: but having intelligence of their deſign, he ſent a belt of wampum to all the Six Nations, to excite them to oppoſe their attempts; while the French, on the other hand, were no leſs aſſiduous to draw over thoſe nations, and engage them in their intereſt. Great ſums of money, and large quantities of ſpirituous liquors were ſent to them as bribes. We alſo learnt, that the French were building forts in all parts of America to the weſtward, in the carrying-places between the lakes and rivers, and in all the moſt important places where they had the beſt proſpect to bring the Indians into dependance, and to drive us out of the fur trade: in the mean while, the better to cover their deſigns, they affected to load the Britiſh ambaſſador at Paris with more than ordinary careſſes.

The court of Spain was alſo remarkably attentive to the improvement of their marine, their commerce, and manufactures. Several Engliſh ſhipwrights who, by a moſt groſs error in political œconomy, had, at the concluſion of the late war, been diſcharged from our dock-yards, and left to ſhift for themſelves, had been allured, by the pretences of great advantages, to tranſport themſelves and families into Spain, where they built ſeveral large ſhips of war upon the Britiſh model. The Spaniſh woollen and other manufactures were alſo, by the ſkill and induſtry of ſome of our countrymen, who had ſettled there, carried to ſuch a degree of perfection, that the exportation of thoſe commodities from Britain was very conſiderably diminiſhed. Mr. Keene, the Britiſh ambaſſador at the court of Madrid, was therefore ordered by our miniſtry, to make a repreſentation, requiring, that no more Britiſh ſubjects ſhould be permitted to ſettle in Spain; and that even thoſe who had already ready ſettled there, ſhould be obliged to quit his Catholic Majeſty's dominions: very little notice however was taken of this remonſtrance.

In the ſpring of this year, his Swediſh majeſty departed this life, in a good old age, and was ſucceeded by Adolphus Frederic, duke of Holſtein Eutin, biſhop of Lubeck. As the ſucceſſion to this kingdom may be an affair of ſome intricacy to many of our readers, the following account of it, and of the family of the deceaſed king, will not poſſibly be diſagreeable.

Frederick, the deceaſed king of Sweden, and landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, eldeſt ſon of Charles landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, was born in 1676; he was firſt married to a daughter of Frederick II. king of Pruſſia: but ſhe dying without iſſue, he eſpouſed the princeſs Eleonora, youngeſt daughter of Charles XI. king of Sweden, who, on her brother Charles XII. being killed before Frederickſhall in Norway in 1718, was elected by the ſtates queen of Sweden, on condition of reſtoring them their ancient rights and liberties; and ſhe reſigning the crown in favour of her conſort, he was elected king of Sweden, and crowned in May 1721, on the like conditions agreed to by the queen, of lodging both the legiſlative and executive power in the ſtates, and leaving the prince little more than the name of a king.

The princeſs Hedwig Sophia, eldeſt ſiſter of Charles XII. married Frederick, duke of Holſtein Gottorp, by whom ſhe had iſſue Charles Frederick, who married Anna Petrowna, eldeſt daughter of czar Peter the Great by his ſecond wife Catherine. By her he had iſſue Charles Peter Ulrick, who conſequently was heir to the crown of Sweden, and ſo declared by the ſtates on his father's death: but the czarina Elizabeth, the late empreſs of Ruſſia, having declared him her ſucceſſor to that crown, he renounced his claim to Sweden, and the ſtates declared his uncle Adolphus Frederick, duke of Holſtein Eutin and biſhop of Lubeck, ſucceſſor to the Swediſh throne. He was born in 1710, and married to the princeſs Ulrica of Pruſſia.

The day after the deceaſed king's death, viz. March 26, O. S. the prince ſucceſſor, Adolphus Frederick, was proclaimed king; and immediately, of his own accord, took an oath in full ſenate, that he would never attempt to introduce a deſpotic authority; but maintain their liberties with his blood, and govern his ſubjects in all reſpects according to the laws, and the form of government eſtabliſhed in Sweden. A ſhort time after his acceſſion, he ſent an envoy to the court of Peterſburg, to intimate his intentions to live upon amicable terms with that crown, with which notice the czarina was ſo well pleaſed, that ſhe expreſſed her ſatisfaction in a public declaration, and the good underſtanding between the two courts was perfectly reſtored.

The parliament of England was opened on the fourteenth day of November, when the king, in his ſpeech from the throne, gave the two houſes to underſtand, "That for the ſame purpoſes which ſuggeſted the treaty with the elector of Bavaria, he had now, in conjunction with the States General, concluded another with the king of Poland, elector of Saxony: he told them, that the unfortunate death of the prince of Orange had made no alteration in the ſtate of affairs in Holland; and that he had received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from the States of their firm reſolution to maintain the intimate union and friendſhip happily ſubſiſting between his majeſty and thoſe ancient and natural allies of his crown. Finally, he exhorted both houſes to conſider ſeriouſly of ſome effectual proviſions to ſuppreſs thoſe audacious crimes of robbery and violence, grown ſo frequent about the capital, proceeding, in a great meaſure, from that profligate ſpirit of irreligion, idleneſs, gaming, and extravagance, which had of late extended itſelf in an uncommon degree, to the diſhonour of the nation, and the great offence and prejudice of the ſober and induſtrious part of the people."

Addreſſes replete with expreſſions of loyalty, affection, and approbation, were returned by both houſes; and ſuch an unanimity now appeared in their proceedings, as afforded the moſt comfortable proſpect to every true lover of his country. The firſt thing the commons went upon was the caſe of Mr. Murray, who, at the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion, had been diſcharged of courſe from his confinement in Newgate; on which occaſion, a great number of his friends, and amongſt others the two ſheriffs of London, accompanied him in a triumphal manner to his own houſe. This behaviour of the ſheriffs was highly reſented by the houſe, and ſome talked of ſummoning them to the bar; but by the prudence and moderation of Mr. Pelham, theſe haſty meaſures were quaſhed. It was, however, reſolved to order Mr. Murray again into cuſtody; but he had wiſely eſcaped the ſtorm, by retiring out of the kingdom; of which, when the houſe was informed, they addreſſed his majeſty to offer a reward for apprehending him, with which his majeſty was moſt graciouſly pleaſed to comply. A proſecution was alſo commenced againſt the author, printer, and publiſher of a pamphlet, entitled, "The caſe of the honourable Alexander Murray, eſq. in an appeal to the people of Great Britain:" and the ſame perſon happening to be both printer and publiſher, he was brought to his trial, but after a long hearing was acquitted by the jury.

The commons then proceeded to ſettle the ſupply. They granted two millions ninety thouſand three hundred and nine pounds for the ſervice of the current year; one million three hundred thouſand pounds towards diſcharging the national debt; three hundred one thouſand and twelve pounds for ſupplying the deficiencies of old funds; fifty-four thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-one pounds for making good the deficiencies of laſt year's grants; forty-nine thouſand two hundred and nineteen pounds for defraying extraordinary expences; and one hundred and twelve thouſand one hundred and forty-two pounds for purchaſing the charter of the African company; the whole amounting nearly to four millions ſterling.

The buſineſs of this ſeſſion was not very important. However, ſome very ſalutary laws were enacted for the encouragement of traffic, and the better regulation of the civil polity. Theſe conſiſted in an act for licenſing pawn-brokers, and for the more effectual preventing the receiving of ſtolen goods. Another for preventing thefts and robberies, and the puniſhment of ſuch perſons who kept diſorderly houſes. The operation of this bill extended to London, and twenty miles round it; and all perſons living within that circuit were required to take out licences from the juſtices of the peace, before they ſhould preſume to open any room or place for public dancing, muſic, or ſuch other entertainment.

For the better cultivating and civilizing the Highlands of Scotland, and preventing of diſorders there for the future, an act of parliament paſſed this ſame ſeſſion, "for annexing certain forfeited eſtates in Scotland (by the rebellions in the years 1715 and 1745) to the crown unalienably, and for making ſatisfaction to the lawful creditors thereupon, and to eſtabliſh a method for managing the ſame." By this bill, his majeſty was empowered to commit the management of theſe eſtates to the care of commiſſioners, who were to have no ſalaries, but were to appoint ſtewards under them, with an allowance not exceeding five per cent. of the rental, and grant leaſes for any term not exceeding 21 years, upon a reſerved rent of three-fourths of the neat annual value, and not to amount above 20 l. a-year to any one perſon. All the ceſſees were to take the oaths to the government, and to reſide upon and cultivate the lands, and not to reſign or let them to any other perſon, nor to pay any gratuity whatſoever to any other perſon for holding them. The king may erect ſchools on the ſaid eſtates, or in the other parts of the Highlands or iſlands of Scotland, for inſtructing young perſons in reading and writing the Engliſh language, and in the ſeveral branches of agriculture and manufactures; and may erect houſes for their reception, and for carrying on ſuch manufactures by them, and for accommodating their maſters; and may apply ſuch parts of the produce of the ſaid eſtates as ſhall be neceſſary for erecting ſuch ſchools, for providing ſalaries for the teachers, for clothing and maintaining ſuch young perſons, and for ſupplying the ſchools with utenſils and materials for agriculture and manufactures, and for the raiſing flax, &c. as his majeſty ſhall direct. And the king may empower the commiſſioners to allot portions of land for the uſe of ſuch ſchools, or to apply ſuch part of the clear rent of the lands as he ſhall direct, in the purchaſe of portions of land to be allotted for ſuch ſchools.

Of this excellent law poſterity will reap the principal benefit, a beginning being already made in ſeveral parts of the Highlands for working ſchools; to which the moſt laudable ſociety in Scotland "for propagating Chriſtian knowlege in the Highlands, &c." have lent an helping hand, by erecting ſeveral ſchools, out of their own income, for the inſtruction of the children. New villages are alſo begun; manufactures, as well as agriculture, are ſet on foot, where none were known before: ſo that it is highly probable, in half a century more, the moſt uncultivated parts of that country will wear a very different aſpect. Another excellent bill was that "for the better preventing the horrid crime of murder;" by which it is enacted, "That all perſons convicted of wilful murder ſhall be executed on the next day but one following that on which the ſentence is pronounced, which it ſhall be immediately on conviction, except it fall on a Sunday, when they ſhall be executed on the Monday following: afterwards their body ſhall be delivered to the company of ſurgeons to be diſſected; or in the country, to ſuch ſurgeon or ſurgeons as the judges of aſſize ſhall direct. After the ſentence ſhall be paſſed, the murderer ſhall be fed on bread and water only, &c. &c." This new proviſion, or ſome other againſt this abominable crime, ſeemed to be greatly wanted, as murders had been ſhockingly frequent of late; and this expedient, how ineffectual ſoever it may appear in theory, hath been found in practice of very ſalutary conſequence.

The multiplicity of public funds had long been conſidered as a national grievance. The different ſtocks of annuities at three per cent. were no fewer than eight, amounting in the whole to upwards of nine millions. Thoſe at three and a half per cent. were ſix, compoſing a ſum of near eighteen millions. In order to remove the perplexity and confuſion which muſt neceſſarily attend ſuch a number of public funds, Mr. Pelham projected a bill, which was eaſily carried through both houſes, for converting the ſeveral annuities into ſo many joint ſtocks, transferable on the Bank of England, and to be charged on the ſinking fund.

On the twentieth day of March 1752, a petition was preſented to the commons by the merchants of London, ſetting forth, That ſeveral foreigners had of late years come over to England, in order to obtain private acts of parliament for their naturalization, with a view to gain ſome advantages to themſelves in point of trade; particularly to avoid the payment of the duties of aliens, on the goods and merchandizes which they imported from foreign parts into this kingdom; and that having obtained ſuch acts, they returned back to their own country, where they conſtantly reſided, and conſequently bore no part of the public taxes, nor in any manner contributed towards the ſupport of the ſtate, or at all anſwered the intention of the legiſlature. They therefore prayed that this abuſe of the favour of parliament might be prevented, by reſtraining for the future the benefit of naturalization to the time during which foreigners ſhould reſide within this realm, in ſuch manner, and under ſuch limitations, as to the houſe ſhould appear fit. This petition appeared ſo reaſonable, that the houſe thought proper immediately to grant it; and a clauſe accordingly to that purpoſe was inſerted in a naturalization bill which was then depending, and has continued ſince to be added to every bill of that nature.

I muſt not omit taking notice here, that the members of the houſe of commons came to a reſolution this ſeſſion to have their Journals printed. This was a work of great utility and neceſſity, as the knowlege of parliamentary tranſactions is ſo neceſſary to every member of either houſe, and as the charge of tranſcribing them could be defrayed by ſo few. The care of this publication was committed to Mr. Hardinge, late clerk of the houſe; and five thouſand pounds were at different times allotted him for the execution of the work, which came out tolerably accurate and correct. It were to be wiſhed, that while the legiſlature were upon this ſubject, they had turned their thoughts to the preſent method of dating acts of parliament from the years of the reigning king, without mentioning the year of our Lord, as in the laws of other nations, whereby much uncertainty and frequent miſtakes, in computing a number of years between a certain year of one king's reign to a certain year of another king's reign, or to the preſent time, are avoided. This is frequently complained of, tho' not yet remedied; and it might eaſily be done in future, by ſuperadding the year of our Lord to the year of the reigning prince.

On the twenty-ſixth of March, his majeſty having given his aſſent to ninety five public and private bills, harangued the two houſes in the uſual ſtrain; after which the parliament was prorogued. As ſoon as the ſeſſion expired, the king appointed a regency, and ſet out for Hanover, in order to concert the proper meaſures for effecting the great ſcheme he had projected for getting the archduke Joſeph choſen king of the Romans. No one event of importance ſufficient to claim a place in hiſtory, happened in Great Britain during his abſence, nor indeed in the whole courſe of this year, except the ratification of two treaties of peace and commerce between his majeſty and the ſtates of Tripoli and Tunis, on the coaſt of Barbary, concluded by the miniſtration of commodore Keppel, brother to the earl of Albemarle; and that the truſtees of Georgia, finding they could not ſupport that colony under its then conſtitution, ſurrendered their charter to his majeſty.

The ſeveral powers of Europe were at this time ſo intent upon their own intereſts, that very few foreign incidents of this year relate to Great Britain. The king of Portugal indeed attempted to check the vaſt exportation of gold coin out of his kingdom by the Britiſh merchants, and inſiſted upon inſpecting the books of the factory at Liſbon; but upon proper remonſtrances being made that ſuch a ſtep would be a direct contravention of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns, he declined any farther proceedings of that kind.

A miſunderſtanding aroſe this ſummer between his Britannic majeſty and the king of Pruſſia, concerning their reſpective pretenſions to the province of Eaſt Frieſland, which was at preſent in the poſſeſſion of the latter of theſe monarchs. It was propoſed by his Britannic majeſty to refer this diſpute to the deciſion of the Aulic Council; but this was rejected by Pruſſia, who at the ſame time ſtopped payment of the Sileſia loan *, which he had hitherto continued punctually to pay, and cauſed a paper to be publiſhed in juſtification of his conduct, in which he declared his motives to be, the unjuſtly ſtopping and ſeizing, by the Engliſh, of eighteen Pruſſian ſhips, and thirty-three neutral veſſels in which the Pruſſians were concerned. At the ſame time, he ordered his miniſter at London to preſent a memorial, with an account of the damages, amounting to a very conſiderable ſum, and demanding, in the moſt peremptory manner, a final diſcuſſion of the affair in three months from the date of his remonſtrance. This memorial was referred by the miniſters to the examination of his majeſty's advocate, attorney, and ſolicitor-general, who, after the ſtricteſt enquiry into, and matureſt reflection on, this matter, refuted every article of the charge in the moſt clear and perſpicuous manner; and moreover ſhewed, beyond contradiction, that after all, there was not the moſt diſtant connection between the capture of thoſe ſhips and the affair of the Sileſia loan, which was altogether a private tranſaction between the emperor and the creditors: and, finally, that by the contract with the late emperor, the whole of the loan ought to have been repaid in the year 1745; but that all the complaints brought by the Pruſſians were founded upon facts that did not happen till 1746. This report was tranſmitted to his Pruſſian majeſty, who was ſo ſenſible of the truths contained therein, that he gave up the point without farther heſitation.

The troubles in Corſica roſe to a very great height this year, there being no leſs than three parties on foot in that iſland; one for the Genoeſe, one for the French, and the third for the independency of the iſland againſt both. France was diſtracted with violent diſputes between the king and the clergy, in relation to the taxation of their revenues; and between the latter and the parliament, about matters of religious faith and practice.

The tranquillity of the North appeared to be now perfectly re-eſtabliſhed. The States-general of the United Provinces applied their whole attention to the interior polity of their dominions; and Spain was earneſtly bent upon the improvement of her commerce and manufactures: and in the autumn of this year a treaty was concluded at Madrid, between the empreſs queen and the kings of France and Spain: to which other powers, particularly the king of Sardinia, afterwards acceded, for preſerving the peace of Italy.

The courts of Vienna and Hanover ſtill continued to proſecute, in the moſt vigorous manner, their ſcheme of electing a king of the Romans: and the elector of Mentz, influenced by the majority of the college, had convoked an electoral diet for that purpoſe: but ſtrong proteſts againſt this convocation were entered by the electors of Cologne and Palatine; the latter of whom was brought over, by granting him the ſatisfaction he demanded of the empreſs-queen and his Britannic majeſty, amounting to one hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, by way of indemnification for the loſſes he had ſuſtained during the war; and by procuring for him ſome other privileges which he inſiſted upon, well underſtanding his own importance on this occaſion. Yet, even after the concurrence of this prince was ſecured, the purpoſed election proved abortive, by the reſiſtance of the other princes of the empire, who thought the liberties of the Germanic body might be endangered, by the election of the ſon in the life-time of the emperor his father, ſince, as they obſerved (and certainly with great reaſon) the reigning emperor might have ſo much influence as to prevent the neceſſary capitulations to be ſigned by the king of the Romans as emperor "in futuro," being inſiſted upon: and thus their liberties by degrees be rendered precarious, and at laſt entirely ſubvered. The king of Pruſſia particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in this oppoſition, perhaps from a ſecret view of obtaining the imperial dignity for himſelf, though a proteſtant, there being no law to confine it to a Roman catholic.

* The affair of the Sileſia loan was as follows: In the year 1735 the emperor Charles VI. ſtraitened for money, had by the permiſſion of the king of England, with whom he was then upon very good terms, borrowed from the ſubjects of Great Britain two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds at ſix per cent. for which he mortgaged the ſilver mines in Sileſia. By the ſeventh article of the treaty of Breſlau, which ceded Sileſia to the king of Pruſſia, that prince charged himſelf wholly with the repayment of what had been lent by the Engliſh merchants on the ſecurity of the revenues of Sileſia.

By this time the French in North America had infuſed ſuch a ſpirit of malice, cruelty, and revenge, into their Indians, that the moſt horrid barbarities were committed on the outſettlers on the frontiers of our colonies, which were all alarmed at the news they received of the proceedings of their treacherous neighbours. The French, tho' determined to carry their ambitious projects into execution, yet perceiving that, by all the aſſiſtance their Indians could afford them, they were not a match for the Engliſh in America, thought it neceſſary to ſend for recruits from France. Accordingly, nine thouſand troops, with their wives and children, were ſent from thence to Canada in the courſe of this year.

In September advice arrived in England from the Eaſt Indies, where war was carried on by the French and Engliſh companies, that colonel Clive, an officer in our company's ſervice, had obliged the French to retire from before Arcot, and had gained many other ſignal advantages over them. Theſe diſturbances in India had been occaſioned by the intrigues of the French company's officers, and by thoſe of both companies engaging too much in the quarrels of the natives.

By other advices which came ſome time after from our Weſt India ſettlements, the government had the mortification to learn, that on the fifteenth of September this year a violent hurricane, at Charles-Town in South Carolina, had driven all the veſſels in the harbour on ſhore, ruined the wharfs and bridges, and blown down a great number of houſes, &c. The damage done by this fatal ſtorm was immenſe, and plantations thirty miles round Charles-Town were ſwept clear, and had all their buildings utterly demoliſhed. Numbers of lives and much cattle were loſt: in ſhort, the devaſtation was to the laſt degree deplorable. On the thirtieth of the ſame month another violent hurricane added greatly to the diſtreſs of this ſuffering colony, though it did more damage in the country than in Charles-Town.

His majeſty being returned from his German dominions, opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the eleventh of January, 1753, with a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne, which was anſwered by loyal addreſſes from both houſes. Then the commons proceeded to conſider the ſupplies, which, ſuch was the oeconomy of the miniſtry, amounted to very little more than two millions. As for the national debt, it now ſtood at the enormous ſum of ſeventy-four millions three hundred and ſixty-eight thouſand four hundred and fifty-one pounds fifteen ſhillings; and to diſcharge this, the ſinking fund produced one million ſeven hundred and thirty-five thouſand five hundred twenty-nine pounds ſix ſhillings.

Several bills of excellent tendency were paſſed in the beginning of this ſeſſion, viz. A bill for the better preſervation of the game, which by the infamous practices of poachers, was threatened with a total extirpation. A bill for the better regulating the performance of quarantine, in order to prevent the plague from being imported from foreign countries into Great Britain. A bill for the more effectual preventing the inhuman practice of plundering ſhips which have the misfortune to ſuffer ſhipwreck; a practice which prevailed upon many different parts of the Britiſh coaſt, to the diſgrace of the nation, and the ſcandal of human nature. A bill allowing the exportation of wool and woollen yarn from Ireland, to any port in Great Britain; and another, preſcribing the breadth of wheels belonging to heavy carriages, that the high roads of the kingdom might be the better preſerved. This is commonly known by the name of the Broad Wheel Act.

But this ſeſſion was chiefly diſtinguiſhed by an act for the naturalization of the Jews, and a bill for the preventing of clandeſtine marriages. The firſt of theſe, which made its way pretty eaſily through the houſe of lords, who ſent it down to the commons, was entitled, An act to permit perſons profeſſing the Jewiſh religion to be naturalized by parliament. It was countenanced by the miniſtry, and ſupported by petitions from ſome woollen manufacturers, and others concerned in ſhipping, who affirmed, that ſuch an act might tend greatly to encourage many perſons of wealth and ſubſtance to remove with their effects from foreign parts into this kingdom; the greateſt part of which, agreeable to the experience of former times, would be employed by them in foreign trade and commerce, in increaſing the ſhipping, and encouraging the exportation of the woollen and other manufactures of England, of which the perſons who profeſſed the Jewiſh religion had for many years laſt paſt exported great quantities.

The ſentiments of the generality of the people, however, were widely different from theſe, and never was more univerſal or violent clamour raiſed againſt miniſterial meaſures than was againſt this: the preſs teemed with the moſt abuſive and ſcurrilous publications againſt the whole Jewiſh tribe, and thoſe who were the advocates for, and ſupporters of this bill, which was repreſented as an axe laid to the root of Chriſtianity; and the whole a private and corrupt buſineſs, managed between the great people in power, and the leading men among the Jews. The lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council aſſembled, preſented a petition to parliament, in which they expreſſed their apprehenſion that the bill, if paſſed into a law, would tend greatly to the diſhonour of the Chriſtian religion, endanger the excellent conſtitution, and be highly prejudicial to the trade of the kingdom in general, and of the city of London in particular. To the ſame purpoſe another petition was alſo preſented by the merchants and traders of the city of London. Counſel was heard, evidence examined, and the bill produced violent debates, in which party prejudice and narrowneſs of opinion ſeemed to take place of real concern for the true intereſt of the nation. The bill however paſſed by a conſiderable majority in both houſes, and at length received the royal aſſent: but the minds of the people had been ſo heated with prejudices, from the miſrepreſentation of the nature and end of this act, that the government thought proper to repeal it to all intents and purpoſes, and this was the very firſt act of the following ſeſſion of parliament; although, as no ill uſe could well be made of this new privilege to the Jews, and as it might gradually have drawn hither many perſons of great ſubſtance to ſettle with their wealth amongſt us, and might conſequently farther promote the national commerce, it is not eaſy to ſee how it ſhould reaſonably have given any juſt offence offence to moderate and reaſonable Chriſtians. But in the act abrogating this ſtatute, the grounds for the repeal were truly aſſigned, viz. "That occaſion had been taken from the firſt law to "raiſe diſcontents," and to diſquiet the minds of many of his majeſty's ſubjects."

The fatal effects of clandeſtine marriages had long been a ſubject of complaint in England. Every day produced hearings in the court of chancery, and left appeals to the houſe of peers, concerning the validity of thoſe marriages, by the irregularity of which the innocent offspring were ſometimes cut off from ſucceſſion to eſtates, though their parents had been married by mutual conſent. Deſigning people of both ſexes, though of the moſt infamous character, had it in their power to ruin the ſons and daughters of the greateſt families in England, by the hourly opportunities of being married at the Fleet, where a band of the moſt profligate wretches, wearing the habit of clergymen, and, to the diſgrace of that order, too many of them being really ſo, plied about the verge of the Fleet-market, like porters to intercept cuſtomers, and performed the ceremony of marriage without a licence, or aſking any queſtions of the two parties. Some ſhocking inſtances of young perſons ruined by theſe infamous practices, having lately been diſcovered, gave riſe to the preſent bill to prevent abuſes, which was framed under the direction of lord Hardwick, at that time lord high chancellor of England, and introduced into the upper houſe; from whence, after undergoing ſome ſlight alterations, it deſcended to the commons. There it occaſioned a moſt vehement conteſt, in which, however, all political motives and party prejudices appeared to be entirely laid aſide, and the ſpeakers for and againſt, to be actuated merely by their own private ſentiments: for many of the principal ſervants of the government differed in opinion from thoſe of the miniſtry who countenanced the bill; while, on the other hand, he was ſtrongly ſupported therein by ſome of the chiefs of the oppoſition: in fine, the diſputes were maintained with great warmth and eagerneſs, and in point of eloquence and argument the two parties were pretty equally matched; but at length, after a long and obſtinate conteſt, it was paſſed by a conſiderable majority, and in the end received the royal aſſent.

As this bill is ſtill in force; has been the ſubject of much popular clamour; and may be of uſe, eſpecially to my young readers, I have thought proper to give the ſubſtance of it here.

It ordains, "That the banns ſhall be publiſhed in the church or chapel where the parties dwell, three Sundays, in the morning, except where morning ſervice is not performed, immediately after the ſecond leſſon: if the parties live in different places, the banns muſt be publiſhed in each: and if in an extraparochial place, or where no divine-ſervice is uſually celebrated, then in the pariſh church or chapel adjoining; and the marriage muſt be ſolemnized where the banns were publiſhed.

"The miniſter is not obliged to publiſh the banns, unleſs the parties give in their chriſtian and ſur-names, the place of their abode, and the time they have dwelt in them, a week before the firſt publication; and when the banns have been thus publiſhed, the miniſter ſhall not incur eccleſiaſtical cenſure for ſolemnizing the marriage, although the parties ſhall appear to have been under age, and not to have obtained the conſent of their parents or guardians, unleſs they had previous notice of ſuch diſſent, and then he is to declare the banns void. No licence ſhall be granted where one of the parties ſhall not have dwelt at leaſt a month, a ſpecial licence by the archbiſhop excepted. If marriages ſhall be ſolemnized in any other place than a church or chapel, without a ſpecial licence; or in a public chapel without firſt having publiſhed the banns, or a licence obtained of ſome perſons properly authorized, the marriage ſhall be void, and the perſon who ſolemnized it tranſported for ſeven years, if proſecuted in three.

"Marriage by licence, when either of the ſaid parties are under age, and conſent of parents or guardians has not been obtained, ſhall be void, provided the party under age be not a widow, and the parent refuſing conſent be not a widow married again. When the conſent of a mother or guardian ſhall be capriciouſly refuſed, or the party non compos mentis, or beyond the ſea, the court of chancery may relieve in a ſummary way. No ſuit ſhall be had to compel a celebration, under pretence of any contract, whether the words of ſuch contract were in the preſent or future tenſe.

"All marriages to be before two witneſſes beſides the miniſter, and an entry ſhall be made in a book kept for that purpoſe, expreſſing whether it was by banns or licence, and either of the parties under age; the conſent of parent or guardian ſhall alſo be entered, to be ſigned by the miniſter, the parties, and the witneſſes. Falſe entry, licence, or certificates, or deſtroying regiſter-books, are felony in principal or acceſſary, and to be puniſhed with death. This act is not to extend to the royal family, quakers or Jews, or to affect any marriage in Scotland or beyond ſea: nor is it neceſſary, in order to ſupport a marriage by banns, to prove the reſidence of the parties, and the place where they were publiſhed; nor when by licence, to prove they had reſided where the marriage was celebrated on oath; nor ſhall any evidence be received to prove the contrary."

I cannot but think, however, that the framers of this bill might have fallen upon means to prevent the great evils and inconveniences ariſing from clandeſtine marriages, leſs harſh and ſevere to the ſubject than thoſe adopted by this act, which, after all, has been rendered in a manner ineffectual; for by a trip over to France, or a jaunt to Scotland, a wiſhing couple may, without the leaſt heſitation or interruption, be as indiſſolubly tied together as if they had been married here in England, in direct conformity to the regulations preſcribed by this act.

This ſeſſion furniſhed little more of importance, either of civil or commercial concern; but the attention of the parliament, which had ſeldom, if ever turned upon literary matters, was now directed to an extraordinary ſubject of that nature. Sir Hans Sloane, the celebrated phyſician and naturaliſt, who died in the beginning of this year, having through the courſe of many years, with great labour and expence, gathered together whatever could be procured either in our own or foreign countries, that was rare and curious in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, as well as of antiquities and maſter-pieces of art, had directed in his laſt will, that this valuable muſæum, together with his numerous library, ſhould be offered to the parliament, for the uſe of the public, on their paying the ſum of twenty thouſand pounds (ſuppoſed not to be one fourth of the real value) in compenſation to his heirs: but if the parliament ſhould not chuſe to purchaſe them, then, on the ſame conditions, they were to be offered to the academy of ſciences at Peterſburgh, and to thoſe of Paris, Berlin, and Madrid ſucceſſively; and if all thoſe ſhould refuſe them upon the above terms, the executors were directed to ſell them in ſuch manner as they ſhould think expedient. The Britiſh houſe of commons however was too jealous of the national honour to ſuffer ſo noble a collection to become the property of any other people; accordingly they readily embraced the terms of Sir Hans Sloane's will, and a bill was propoſed for purchaſing this muſæum, as alſo that valuable collection of manuſcripts, denominated from its founder Robert Harley earl of Oxford, the Harleian Miſcellany, and now offered to the public by his daughter, the dutcheſs of Portland, for ten thouſand pounds; and theſe two being joined to the famous Cottonian Library, and the king's or royal library, which had long lain neglected and expoſed to the injuries of the weather in the old dormitory at Weſtminſter, the whole was depoſited in Montague houſe, now better known by the name of the Muſæum, under the direction of truſtees and governors appointed by the parliament, from amongſt the moſt eminent perſons in the kingdom,* where this monument of national taſte and liberality is open to the inſpection of the public, under certain neceſſary reſtrictions; but without the leaſt fee or gratuity whatever being demanded or accepted.

On the ſeventeenth day of June, his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, which contained nothing that requires recapitulation, farther than that the ſtate of foreign affairs had undergone no alteration ſince their meeting.

The domeſtic tranſactions of this year in England conſiſted chiefly of the great and melancholy effects of ſtorms, tempeſts, and inundations, that happened in different parts; and in the continuance of that immorality and licentiouſneſs among the commonalty, which produced riots, tumults, and diſorders of various kinds, under as various pretences. In the city of Briſtol, in particular, moſt violent outrages were committed by the colliers, who raiſed an inſurrection on account of the exportation of corn, in which ſeveral lives were loſt before the public peace could be reſtored. The like tumults were raiſed in Yorkſhire, on account of the turnpikes, many of which were demoliſhed by the rabble. At Leeds the civil power having called in the aſſiſtance of the military, to ſupport the collectors of theſe tolls, the mob were ſo enraged at this circumſtance, that they broke into the town, and attacked the troops, who being at length obliged to fire in their own defence, killed nine of the rioters outright, and wounded about twenty-four; upon which the reſt fled in the greateſt terror, and the diſturbance was effectually quieted.

In the beginning of this year there happened an incident, which, though in its own nature little worthy of hiſtorical notice, deſerves to be recorded, as it ſerves ſtrongly to mark the genius of the Engliſh people. A young woman, whoſe name was Elizabeth Canning, pretended, that as ſhe was coming home at night, on new-years-day, ſhe was met under Bedlam wall by two fellows, who pulled off her gown, cap, and apron, and having gagged her, threatened her life if ſhe made the leaſt reſiſtance, and afterwards dragged her along between them to the houſe of one Mrs. Wells near Enfield Waſh, where menaces and confinement were made uſe of to induce her to turn proſtitute, which however ſhe had the courage to reſiſt. She ſaid, that an old gipſey, one Mary Squires, ſtripped her of her ſtays in Mrs. Wells's houſe; and ſhe declared, that during her confinement of near a month in that place, ſhe had no other ſubſiſtence but a quartern loaf and a gallon of water: after ſo long durance, ſhe took the opportunity to pull down ſome boards which were nailed before the window of the room ſhe was confined in, made her eſcape, and came, on the twenty-ninth of January, in a very miſerable naked condition, and almoſt deprived of her ſenſes, to her mother, a poor widow woman, who lived in Aldermanbury-poſtern.

Though nothing could be more improbable, and indeed more incredible than this ſtory, yet it operated ſo powerfully on the paſſions of the common people, eſpecially the enthuſiaſts of all denominations, that large ſubſcriptions were raiſed for proſecuting the ſuppoſed delinquents. Warrants accordingly were iſſued for apprehending Mrs. Wells, miſtreſs of the houſe at Enfield Waſh; the maid ſervant, whoſe name was Virtue Hall, and Squires, the old gipſey-woman, whom Canning charged with having robbed her of her ſtays. Virtue Hall, on her examination before Mr. juſtice Fielding, confeſſed her being witneſs to the above ill uſage and confinement: the gipſey and Mrs. Wells were hereupon ſent to priſon, and afterwards tried at the Old Bailey, where the former received ſentence of death, and the latter to be branded as a bawd, and impriſoned ſix months as an acceſſary to the fact.

Some time after, poſitive and reputable evidence being produced, that Mary Squires was at Abbotſbury in Dorſetſhire, at the very time when it was depoſed ſhe had ſtript Canning of her ſtays at Wells's houſe; and Virtue Hall having retracted her evidence before the lord mayor, then Sir Criſpe Gaſcoigne, that magiſtrate, ſurprized at the many impoſſibilities and abſurdities in Canning's ſtory, undertook to diſcuſs it to the bottom, for the ſake of truth and juſtice; in which he diſcharged himſelf with that noble reſolution and impartiality which ought ever to animate the chief magiſtrate of this metropolis. Application was made to the throne for mercy, in behalf of the gipſey Squires, whoſe execution was reſpited; and his majeſty having ordered the whole affair to be laid before his attorney and ſollicitor-general, on their report, after having ſtrictly examined the witneſſes on both ſides, this poor old creature was indulged with a full pardon.

* The truſtees are the archbiſhop of Canterbury; the lord high chancellor, or lord keeper; the lord high treaſurer, or firſt lord commiſſioner of the treaſury; the lord preſident of the council; the lord privy-ſeal; the lord high admiral, or firſt lord commiſſioner of the admiralty; the lord ſteward of his majeſty's houſhold; the lord chamberlain; the biſhop of London; the two ſecretaries of ſtate; the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons; the chancellor of the exchequer; the lord chief juſtice of the king's bench; the maſter of the rolls; the lord chief juſtice of the common pleas; the attorney general; the ſollicitor general; the preſident of the Royal-Society, and the preſident of the college of phyſicians; all of them for the time being. To theſe were added, Charles lord Cardigan; Hans Stanley, eſq. Samuel Burrows, eſq. Thomas Hart, eſq. William duke of Portland, and Edward earl of Oxford and Mortimer. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, and the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, have the nomination of all the officers, aſſiſtants, and ſervants.

By this time the matter was ſwelled up to ſuch a pitch, as to divide the whole kingdom into two parties, who were inflamed againſt each other with the moſt outrageous ſpirit of animoſity, which was continued for almoſt a year. Pamphlets and papers innumerable were publiſhed on each ſide, in which the moſt ſcandalous liberties were taken with the characters of thoſe who were principally concerned for either party. Bills of perjury were mutually preferred; the evidences for Squires were tried and acquitted; Canning abſconded for ſome time, but afterwards ſurrendered to take her trial for wilful and corrupt perjury, at the Old Bailey; and during her trial, which laſted many days, the court adjourning from time to time, there were great mobs and riots about the ſeſſions-houſe, and the lord-mayor was often inſulted and abuſed in his paſſage to and from the court. The jury however brought Canning in guilty, and ſhe was committed to Newgate; but two of the jurymen having made oath, that the verdict they had given was not agreeable to their conſciences (for though they believed her guilty of perjury, they did not believe her guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury) the friends of the priſoner moved for a new trial, which point being argued next ſeſſion, before five of the judges, they gave their opinion, that the verdict was a good one, and perfectly agreeable to the evidence; and therefore in concluſion, Canning was ſentenced to be tranſported to the Britiſh colonies for ſeven years. Her departure however was, through the indiſcreet and bigotted zeal of her protectors, made rather a matter of parade and triumph, than the ſubmiſſion to a legal ſentence denounced againſt her as a culprit and impoſtor: large ſums were collected for her private uſe; a ſhip was hired purpoſely to carry her to the place of her deſtination, in which ſhe was ſupplied with every convenience that a perſon of the moſt comfortable circumſtances could require for a voyage of amuſement; and letters of recommendation accompanied her from perſons of diſtinction here at home, to others reſident in that part of the world ſhe was going to: and it has been ſince reported, that the artful jade has been married abroad, and ſettled in a manner infinitely above the moſt ſanguine expectations her general ſtate of life could ever have warranted.

The next incident that principally diſtinguiſhed this year in England, was the execution of Dr. Archibald Cameron, a native of Scotland, and brother to the famous Lochiel, a ſtaunch friend of the young pretender, and remarkably active in the late rebellion. The doctor had accompanied his brother in all his expeditions, though not in a military capacity, and had been involved in the ſame attainder with him: flattering himſelf, however, that after ſo long time elapſed, he had no danger to apprehend from detection, he ventured over this year to North Britain, in order to reclaim ſome debts due to him in that country: he was, however, diſcovered, apprehended, conducted to London, and confined in the Tower; and being afterwards brought before the court of King's-bench, the identity of his perſon was there ſworn to, in conſequence whereof he received ſentence of death, and ſuffered at Tyburn on the ſeventh of June with great fortitude and decorum; and it was thought by moſt cool and conſiderate people, that the government might have ſpared this unfortunate victim, without impairing its dignity, or derogating from its juſtice.

The Britiſh whale-fiſhery, which had for ſome years been revived and carried on with great national ſpirit, was remarkably ſucceſsful this year, not one ſhip being loſt; and the forty-eight ſail employed, brought home one hundred and forty-four fiſh and a half.

The peace of the continent continued uninterrupted by any new conteſt or diſturbance; yet the breach between the parliament and clergy of France was every day more and more widened, and had arrived to great inveteracy on both ſides; and his Moſt Catholic Majeſty declaring in favour of the prelacy, the members of all the chambers, except the great chamber, were baniſhed, and the uſual adminiſtration of juſtice ceaſed in Paris and its environs, and at length the members of the great chamber were likewiſe ſent into exile.

The internal diſſenſions, however, which prevailed among the French, did not prevent them from continuing their encroachments in America, where matters were faſt ripening to a freſh rupture between them and the Engliſh in that part of the world. Commiſſaries had indeed been appointed here at home, to ſettle with others from the French court, the different limits between the poſſeſſions of the two crowns in Acadia or Nova-Scotia, agreeable to the twelfth article of the treaty of Utrecht; but the French raiſed ſo many difficulties, in the courſe of the conference, and had recourſe to ſo many quirks and quibbles, to ſupport the unjuſt and unwarrantable claims they had thought proper of late to adopt, that our commiſſaries, ſeeing no hopes of bringing the affair to any equitable concluſion, immediately put a ſtop to the negociation, and returned to their own country.

In the mean time, the French in North-America, who had, towards the cloſe of the preceding year, been ſtrongly reinforced from Europe, diſpoſed themſelves for action early in the beginning of the ſpring. They had intelligence, that the Engliſh were building forts and raiſing plantations along the Ohio, which they apprehended to be too near their own ſettlements to be diſregarded. Some merchants in London, with others in Virginia, had obtained a grant of his majeſty of that river, to make ſuch ſettlements in the meadows and places adjacent, as they ſhould judge convenient for a plantation, and carrying on their intended trade. But the French were determined, at all events, to fruſtrate their deſign; and in order thereto, ſet up a prior claim, and inſiſted, that all that coaſt belonged to the crown of France. Accordingly they took all poſſible meaſures to diſturb the new ſettlers, and to erect forts of their own on the bank of the ſaid river: upon which, Robert Dinwiddie, eſq. governor of Virginia, wrote a letter to Mr. Contrecœur, the commandant of the French forces on the Ohio, to demand the reaſon of ſuch proceedings, and ſent it by major Waſhington: he likewiſe diſpatched meſſengers to the governors of the ſeveral Britiſh colonies, repreſenting the dangerous ſtate of affairs, and requeſting them to raiſe forces, and form an expedition againſt the common enemy; and at the ſame time ſummoned the aſſembly of the province of Virginia, to have their advice and aſſiſtance upon this emergency. Major Waſhington having carried the governor's letter to the French commandant, and received his anſwer, returned with it; but it was ſo far from being ſatisfactory, that it convinced the governor, that the French were determined to carry their projected ſcheme into execution.

Convinced therefore that the moſt vigorous meaſures were neceſſary, in order to put a ſtop the farther progreſs of the French, his excellency began to levy troops, and wrote to the neighbouring governments to ſend their reſpective quotas of men or money, with all poſſible expedition, to his aſſiſtance. Theſe preparations took up beſt part of the preſent year; the reſult of them will be related in order of time.

The ambition and intrigues of the French court were not confined to the continent of America only; they had alſo extended themſeves to the Eaſt Indies, where they had endeavoured to embroil the Engliſh company with the Nabobs or viceroys of the Great Mogul in different parts of the peninſula intra Gangem. In order to underſtand the military tranſactions of the Engliſh company in India, the reader muſt be informed, that a Nabob is the governor of a province, or of a ſingle town and its territory, of whom there are a great number in that part of the world. Theſe Nabobs are all tributary to the Mogul emperor; but in every thing elſe they ſeem to be independent, and act as abſolute and arbitrary ſovereigns within their reſpective territories, often carrying on wars againſt one another, and ſometimes attacking the European ſettlements upon their coaſt, without any authority from the Mogul; therefore it is abſolutely neceſſary for the Europeans ſettled upon that coaſt, to court or command a regard from the Nabobs in their neighbourhood.

In theſe circumſtances, immediately after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, monſieur Dupleix, the French governor of Pondicherry, obſerving that Annaverda Khan, nabob of Arcot, had a greater regard for the Engliſh than the French, he reſolved to have him depoſed. For this purpoſe he entered into a plot with Muzephur Jing and Chuenda Saib, two popular men in the neighbourhood, who raiſed an army of their friends; and being joined by a detachment of French from Pondicherry, they marched in July 1749 towards Arcot, on the plains of which city they were met by Annaverda at the head of his army; but as he had truſted entirely to his own ſtrength, without ſolliciting any aſſiſtance from the Engliſh, his army was totally routed, and himſelf ſlain. However, his ſon Mahommed Ally Khan made his eſcape, and took ſhelter in Trichenopoly, a place of great ſtrength to the ſouthward, where, at his application, the Engliſh quickly ſupplied him with men and ammunition.

Strengthened by this reinforcement, Mahommed gained ſome advantages over the enemy, who were obliged to retreat, but no deciſive blow was given. Mahommed being afterwards joined by Nazer Jing, nabob of Golconda, the two armies met, and on the twenty-fourth of March, 1750, engaged in the neighbourhood of Pondicherry, when the French and their allies were defeated; and Mahommed by this victory ſaw himſelf reſtored to the nabobſhip of Arcot: but ſome miſunderſtandings having happened between Nazer Jing and the Engliſh, and alſo between Mahommed and them, they returned to Fort St. David's in Auguſt; and Mahommed being thus left alone, was attacked by the enemy, and compelled to fly for relief to Nazer Jing, who was then with his army at Arcot, and who upon this determined once more to march againſt the French, and drove them back to Gingey, a ſtrong fortreſs in the neighbourhood of Pondicherry, where they were immediately ſurrounded and blockaded. During this blockade, the French found means to ſtir up a conſpiracy againſt Nazer Jing, who was ſuddenly cut off, and Muzephur his nephew was by Dupleix made nabob of Golconda in his ſtead.

As Mahommed Ally was unable to face the French and their new allies, he was obliged once more to take ſhelter in Trichenopoly, and ſollicit the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, which was at laſt promiſed, upon his agreeing to yield them ſome commercial points which had long been in diſpute. In the mean time, Muzephur Jing having taken poſſeſſion of the nabobſhip of Golconda, and appointed Chuenda Saib to be nabob of Arcot, he collected a conſiderable force, and marched to lay ſiege to Trichenopoly, after reducing ſome little forts in his way: but by this time all matters being adjuſted between Mahommed Ally and our company, a body of four hundred men was ſent under the command of captain Gingen, a Swiſs officer, to his aſſiſtance, which were joined by all the forces the young nabob could raiſe at Valconda, about ſeventy miles diſtant from Fort St. David's. Both armies being now partly equal in point of ſtrength, lay encamped in ſight of each other a whole month, during which no action of importance happened.

In order to make a diverſion, and divide the enemy's forces, the company reſolved to invade the province of Arcot with a ſeparate body of troops. On this occaſion it was that Mr. (now lord) Clive diſcovered thoſe talents which have ſince acquired him ſo great a reputation, and ſuch immenſe riches. This gentleman was the ſon of an attorney, and had entered into the ſervice of the Eaſt India company as a writer; but the plodding track of buſineſs being ill ſuited to his active genius, he made but an indifferent figure in his profeſſion; and deſpairing of ſucceeding by the pen, he now offered his ſervice as a volunteer in this expedition, which was accepted; and in the month of Auguſt, 1751, he marched from Fort St. George at the head of two hundred and ten Europeans, croſſed the country, and took poſſeſſion of Arcot without oppoſition, where he behaved with ſo much moderation and generoſity, that he gained the good-will of the natives to a high degree.

The French and their allies had by this time paſſed the river Caldaron, and encamped at Syrringham, near Trichenopoly, but had not yet forces ſufficient to beſiege it in form. The diverſion made by the party under captain Clive had the deſired effect; for Chuenda Saib's ſon was detached with a great part of their army from Trichenopoly; upon on whoſe approach Mr. Clive ſhut himſelf up in Arcot, to which the enemy laid ſiege; and having made two breaches, they at laſt, on the thirteenth of October, made a general aſſault: but our vigilant and gallant countryman having procured intelligence of their deſign, gave them ſo warm a reception, that they were repulſed in every quarter with great loſs, and obliged to abandon the ſiege with the utmoſt precipitation. Whereupon Mr. Clive, leaving captain Kilpatrick (who had lately joined him with two thouſand Marattos from Trichenopoly) in the caſtle of Arcot, ſet out with the reſt of the troops in purſuit of the enemy; and coming up with them on the plains of Arani, gave them a total defeat on the third of December; after which he reduced ſeveral other forts, and then returned to Fort St. David's in triumph.

Here he had ſcarcely reſted a month, when advice came that the enemy had collected a new army, and were approached within nine miles of Madraſs. Upon this captain Clive was again ſent out with a body of Engliſh forces, and on the firſt day of March, 1752, came up with the enemy at Coverupante, about fifteen miles from Arcot, where he gave them another total defeat, and beſides the killed, took a French lieutenant and forty-eight men priſoners, with all the enemy's cannon, and a great quantity of warlike ſtores. The whole province of Arcot being thus cleared of enemies, except thoſe at Syrringham, captain Clive returned with his forces to St. David's, having in his way demoliſhed the new town of Dupleix, which the French governor of Pondicherry had lately cauſed to be built.

By this time major Laurence, a gallant and experienced officer, was arrived from England, to take upon him the command of the troops in the company's ſervice; and having collected all the forces that could be raiſed, he took the field, accompanied by captain Clive, and was joined by captain Gingen at Trichenopoly. The army afterwards marched towards Syrringham; and major Laurence took his meaſures ſo well, that notwithſtanding the infinite diſproportion between his troops and thoſe of the enemy under Chuenda Saib, he entirely intercepted the paſſage of all proviſions to their camp. Thus reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs, and being deſerted by moſt of the Indians, who had gone over to Mahommed Ally, Chuenda Saib in deſpair endeavoured to make his eſcape, but was taken priſoner by the nabob of Tanjore, an ally of the Engliſh company, who, in order to prevent the diſputes about who ſhould have the keeping of him, ordered his head to be ſtruck off. This event was immediately followed by the ſubmiſſion of the pent-up army, who laid down their arms, and ſurrendered priſoners of war. M. Dupleix finding all his ſchemes baffled in every quarter, recalled his regulars from the Indian army, determined for the future to act only on the defenſive.

The French Eaſt India company, diſcouraged by theſe repeated diſaſters, in order to compromiſe matters, ſent over in the beginning of this year (1753) a commiſſary, who concluded a convention with the Engliſh company; by which it was agreed that the two companies ſhould reciprocally reſtore the territories taken by the troops of either ſince the year 1748, except certain diſtricts which the Engliſh retained for the conveniency of their trade; that the nabobs advanced through influence of either party, ſhould be acknowleged by both; and that for the future neither ſhould interfere in the differences between the princes of the country.

Towards the cloſe of this year debates ran very high in Ireland, where a diſpute had occurred between the miniſtry and the parliament of that kingdom, in a caſe where the prerogative was on one ſide concerned, and the liberty of the people and the independency of parliament on the other. This affair was quickly ſwelled into a violent national conteſt, in which Mr. Boyle, the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his oppoſition to the court, which, as uſual, acquired him the denomination of a glorious patriot, &c. &c. The duke of Dorſet, who was at this time lord-lieutenant of Ireland, had indeed an arduous taſk to manage the helm of government during this political hurricane. By his prudence, however, matters were at laſt accommodated: the patriotic ſpeaker of the houſe of commons was gratified with an earldom; and the public tranquillity, which ſeemed for ſome time to have been baniſhed, was again reſtored.

The Britiſh parliament meeting on the fifteenth day of November, his majeſty, in his ſpeech to both houſes, obſerved, that the events of this year had not made it neceſſary for him to offer any thing in particular to their conſideration relating to foreign tranſactions: that the public tranquillity and the ſtate of Europe remained on the ſame footing in which they were at the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion; and they might be aſſured of his ſteadineſs in purſuing the moſt effectual meaſures to preſerve to his people the bleſſings of peace. The addreſs did not paſs in the houſe of commons without ſome ſevere animadverſions on the inconſiſtency of this ſpeech with the real ſtate of affairs in Europe, nor without many ſpirited declarations againſt French perfidy and continental connections.

As no one tranſaction of ſufficient importance for hiſtorical notice occurred during this ſeſſion, I ſhall only obſerve, that after giving the royal aſſent to the land-tax bill of two ſhillings in the pound, to the malt-tax, mutiny, and ſeveral other bills; in particular, that repealing the act of naturalization paſſed in favour of the Jews laſt ſeſſion, his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion on the ſixth of April 1754; and ſoon after the parliament was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs iſſued for a new election.

In the beginning of March this year died the right honourable Henry Pelham, chancellor of the Exchequer, and prime miniſter ſince the reſignation of the earl of Orford, not only ſincerely lamented by his ſovereign, but alſo regretted by the nation in general, to whoſe good-will and affection he had recommended himſelf by his open and ingenuous behaviour, even while he was purſuing meaſures which ſome of them did not entirely approve. He had, a little before his death, concerted the plan of the new parliament, and imparted it to his majeſty, who had thought proper to honour it with his approbation: a reſolution was therefore taken to make as few deviations as poſſible from the ſcheme he had formed. His brother the duke of Newcaſtle was appointed firſt lord-commiſſioner of the Treaſury, and was ſucceeded as ſecretary of ſtate by ſir Thomas Robinſon, who had long reſided as ambaſſador at the court of Vienna. The other department of this office was retained by the earl of Holderneſſe; and the function of chancellor of the Exchequer was performed, as uſual, by the lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench, until a proper perſon could be found to ſupply that important poſt; but in the courſe of the ſummer it was conferred on Mr. Legge, who acquitted himſelf therein with equal honour and ability. Several other alterations were made of importance to the public: lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, was raiſed to the dignity of an earl; the place of lord chief-juſtice of the King's Bench, becoming vacant by the death of ſir William Lee, was beſtowed upon ſir Dudley Rider, who was ſucceeded in his office of attorney-general by Mr. Murray.

The elections for the new parliament went every where in favour of the miniſtry; and the writs being returned, the parliament was opened on the tenth day of May by the duke of Cumberland, and ſome other noblemen, who acted by virtue of a commiſſion from his majeſty. Mr. Onſlow being re-choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, and approved of by the crown, the lord-chancellor made a ſpeech to the parliament, importing, "That his majeſty had given them this early opportunity of coming together, in order to complete, without loſs of time, certain parliamentary proceedings, which he judged would be for the good of his ſubjects; but he did not think proper to lay before them any matters of general buſineſs, reſerving every thing of that nature to the uſual time of aſſembling in the winter." On the fifth of June this ſhort ſeſſion was cloſed, and the parliament prorogued to the eighth day of Auguſt, and from thence by ſucceſſive prorogations to the month of November.

The Engliſh miniſtry having received nothing but evaſive anſwers from the court of France, with regard to the complaints that were made of the encroachments in America, had ſent peremptory orders to their governors in that country to repel force by force, and drive the French from their ſettlements on the river Ohio.

Thus authoriſed, governor Dinwiddie endeavoured, with a true Britiſh ſpirit, to prevail with the Virginians in his neighbouring government to arm in their own defence, and to erect a fort on the forks of the river Monongahelah, to curb the French encroachments, and to defend the Britiſh traders and property. About the ſame time the aſſembly of South Carolina gave three thouſand pounds ſterling to be applied to the defence of his majeſty's limits; and North Carolina paſſed an act for raiſing ſeven hundred men, who were to join the troops of Virginia immediately on their being ready for action: but though the two Carolinas and New York had ſent out their forces, they did not however make a junction ſoon enough to perform any thing of conſequence; and inſtead of deterring the French from their deſigns, it ſerved only as a means to provide them with arguments to make the native Indians jealous of and oppoſe the Engliſh.

Mr. Dinwiddie prevailed at laſt with his province to raiſe ten thouſand pounds and three hundred men to protect their frontiers; and the command of this ſmall regiment was given to colonel Waſhington, a young gentleman of great valour and abilities, who began his march on the firſt day of May, and went and encamped at one of our forts on the Ohio, expecting there to be joined by the troops that were coming from the other colonies. The ſieur de Centrocœur, commander in chief on the Ohio, had ſoon an eye upon him; and having intelligence that ſome waggons were on the road with proviſions for his camp, ſent out a party of forty-five men to intercept them; of which captain Waſhington being appriſed, drew forth a detachment of his men and went in queſt of the enemy, and on the twenty-eighth of May met with and engaged them. Twelve of the French were killed, and M. Jumonçelle their commander, and twenty-one taken priſoners; among whom were M. de la Force and M. Druellon, together with two cadets; with the loſs of only two men killed and one wounded. As this was the firſt ſkirmiſh we had with the French, it was looked upon as a lucky ſtroke that would encourage the Indians to be faithful to us. The French, however, not long after, had their revenge in the engagement we had with them in the meadows of the Ohio, on the third of July this year, when a body of one thouſand French and two hundred Indians advanced, under the command of M. du Villars, to attack and diſlodge him from a little fort he had run up, called Fort Neceſſity, as a temporary defence and cover for his handful of men. The Engliſh were by this time reduced to two hundred; but they ſuſtained the efforts of the enemy's whole force for upwards of three hours, and laid one hundred and fifty of them dead on the field. At length, however, he was obliged to ſurrender the fort upon capitulation; the terms of which were very honourable to him, it being ſtipulated that each ſide ſhould retire without moleſtation, and that the Engliſh ſhould march away with all the honours of war, and with their ſtores, effects, and baggage. In their retreat, however, they were terribly harraſſed by the Indians, who plundered his baggage, and maſſacred his people.

An account of this action being tranſmitted to London, our miniſtry's orders were diſpatched to the earl of Albemarle, the Britiſh ambaſſador at Paris, to complain of it as an open violation of the peace, which did not however meet with the ſame degree of reſpect as on former occaſions of complaint, the time nearly approaching for the French to pull off the maſk of moderation and peace: for, inſtead of diſavowing the conduct of their American commanders, orders were expedited for freſh reinforcements of men and ammunition to perfect their pernicious deſigns in that part of the world; and the miniſtry of England on their part ſent the neceſſary cautions to the governors and provinces in North America, exhorting them to uſe their utmoſt endeavours in reſiſting the encroachments of the enemy, by uniting in a political league or confederacy; and the governor of New York was appointed to confer with the chiefs of the Indians, and by preſents and other means to keep them ſteady to the Britiſh intereſt. This deſirable union, however, was fruſtrated, by a ſpirit of contention which prevailed amongſt the coloniſts and their reſpective governors, the particulars of which would take up too much room to inſert.

In the mean while, the French were no leſs active in New England than in the other colonies, in extending their invaſions and encroachments: their jeſuitical miſſionaries ſpread themſelves among the Indians, with the ſole view of embittering their ſpirits againſt the Engliſh, and encouraged them to commit the moſt horrible cruelties upon the unhappy perſons who fell into their hands, at a time when the people thought they were in perfect amity with them. Upon theſe advices received from ſeveral parts of the province, governor Shirley ſummoned the general-aſſembly of Maſſachuſet's Bay, and delivered himſelf in a very pathetic ſpeech upon the preſent critical ſituation of affairs; in conſequence of which, the aſſembly came to vigorous reſolutions to defend their country to the utmoſt of their power.

In Penſylvania the enemy, in the month of May this year, ſeized upon Log's Town on the river Ohio, ſurpriſed the Block-houſe and Truck-houſe, cut off all our traders but two, and carried off in goods, furs, and ſkins, to the amount of twenty thouſand pounds.

In purſuance of the reſolution of the aſſembly of Maſſachuſet's Bay, Mr. Shirley, in the ſummer of this year, 1754, marched with his troops to the eaſtern frontier, and with the conſent of the Indians built Fort Weſtern and Fort Halifax, on the river Kennebec. He alſo ſent expreſſes to the miniſtry at home, repreſenting the unhappy ſituation of the colonies, and the imminent danger to which Nova Scotia was expoſed, from the encroachments and fortifications of the French, which had been extended to the very neighbourhood of the Engliſh ſettlements, and from any ſudden atttack, which might eaſily be formed againſt that province from St. John's iſland, Cape Breton, and Canada. This remonſtrance carried great weight with it; for governor Shirley received not only the approbation of his majeſty and council for the ſervice he had performed on the river Kennebeck; but the government, in order to prevent the fatal cataſtrophe he had ſet before them, now adopted the moſt vigorous reſolutions. Officers were appointed for two regiments, conſiſting each of two thouſand men, to be raiſed in America; the command of which was given to governor Shirley and ſir William Pepperel, who had orders to concert meaſures with Mr. Lawrence, lieutenant-governor and commander in chief of Nova Scotia, for attacking the French forts in that province: but nothing could be done in this ſervice till the next ſummer, only the raiſing the two thouſand men, and receiving two thouſand ſtands of arms from London. It was alſo reſolved in his majeſty's council, to appoint a generaliſſimo for the ſervice of North America; which command was conferred on major-general Braddock, whoſe courage and military diſcipline ſeemed to point him out as the moſt proper perſon for ſuch ſervice. Orders were alſo iſſued for the embarkation of Halket's and Dunbar's regiments of foot to ſail with all expedition with general Braddock; but they did not get from Ireland till the fourteenth of January of the enſuing year.

The court of Spain changed its miniſtry this year, when the marquis de la Enſenada, a tool of France and of the Spaniſh queen-mother, was forced to reſign his place to Mr. Wall; and his Catholic majeſty ſeemed ſo much inclined to keep up peace and good harmony with England, that the diſputes about our cutting logwood in the Bay of Honduras were amicably adjuſted between the ſaid Mr. Wall, now the Spaniſh prime miniſter, and ſir Benjamin Keene, the Britiſh ambaſſador at Madrid.

No remarkable alteration occurred in the courſe of this year, in the affairs of the northern powers, to affect the intereſt of Great Britain, though the French were indefatigable in their endeavours to ſet the conduct of our court, in relation to the American diſpute, in the moſt diſadvantageous light, and to gain over the powers on the continent to her intereſt, by the means of promiſes, threats, or ſubſidies.

Our intereſt at the court of Liſbon ſeemed rather upon the decline. His Portugueſe majeſty had formed very extenſive projects of trade and commerce, and had even erected an Eaſt India company. In the mean time, he expreſſed a great diſguſt at the great quantities of gold which were annually exported from his dominions, as the balance due from his ſubjects for Engliſh commodities. He even went ſtill farther: for he impoſed ſeveral ſevere reſtrictions upon the Britiſh merchants reſiding at Liſbon, ſome of whom were impriſoned, and others had their property taken from them, under pretence of their being concerned in ſending away Portugueſe gold, for the exportation of which his moſt Faithful majeſty inſiſted on an impoſition of three per cent. an exaction ſo exorbitant, that the profits of the trade could by no means ſuſtain. It happening, however, that there was a ſcarcity of coin in Portugal, which was ſupplied from England; and the people having nothing but gold to give for this neceſſary article, the king was obliged to connive at the exportation of his coin, and the trade reverted to its uſual channel.

On the fourteenth day of November the parliament of Great Britain aſſembled, agreeable to its laſt prorogation, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, informing the two houſes, "That the general ſtate of Europe had undergone very little alteration ſince their laſt meeting: that he had lately received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from his good brother the king of Spain, of friendſhip and confidence: that his principal view ſhould be to ſtrengthen the foundation, and ſecure the duration of a general peace; to improve the preſent advantages of it, for promoting the trade of his good ſubjects, and protecting thoſe poſſeſſions [meaning North America] which conſtituted one great ſource of their wealth and commerce." The reader will readily remark of himſelf, that no mention is made in this ſpeech of the particular encroachments. This was a political omiſſion, in order to deprive the minority of all pretext for oppoſing the addreſſes of thanks, which were carried in both houſes without a debate; and the parliament ſeem to have thought that his majeſty had ſaid enough to evince his reſolution of humbling the inſolence of our perfidious neighbour; a diſpoſition which was ſo generally agreeable, that no expence was thought too great to ſecond ſo laudable a deſign. The commons accordingly unanimouſly granted, for the ſervice of the enſuing year, four millions ſeventy-three thouſand ſeven hundred and twenty-nine pounds, of which one million was expreſsly given for augmenting the forces by ſea and land. They alſo voted thirty-two thouſand pounds as a ſubſidy to the king of Poland, and twenty thouſand pounds to the elector of Bavaria, on a ſuppoſition that France would endeavour to avail herſelf of her ſuperiority of land forces to attack Hanover; and that therefore it might be neceſſary to ſecure the aſſiſtance of ſuch ſubſidiary allies on the continent.

The court of France, alarmed at theſe unanimous and vigorous reſolutions of the great aſſembly of the nation; and apprehending the Engliſh were in good earneſt reſolved to exert themſelves againſt their encroachments in America, were at great pains once more to amuſe the Britiſh court with general declarations, that no hoſtility was intended on their part, nor the leaſt infringement of the treaty: which declarations were communicated to our miniſtry by the marquis de Mirepoix, their own ambaſſador at the court of London. The earl of Albemarle being lately dead at Paris, the French court hoped by theſe cajoling meſſages to lull us into perfect ſecurity, and if poſſible to engage us to delay, or at leaſt ſlacken, our armaments for America, till they had ſufficiently ſtrengthened their uſurpations from Europe. With this view, at the very time they were declaring their pacific intentions, and their deſire to preſerve the public tranquillity, they were buſily employed in fitting out a powerful armament at Breſt for North America, and in taking ſuch other meaſures as muſt convince every one, who would not ſhut his eyes againſt the plaineſt evidence, that they were on the eve of ſtriking ſome important blow that might ſerve as a declaration of war.

The danger that threatened on all ſides at laſt alarmed our miniſtry, and opened their eyes to the artifice of Mirepoix, and the fallacious promiſes of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, and determined them to enter upon ſuch meaſures as ſhould be moſt effectual to prevent the fatal effects of the French armament.

Accordingly, on the twenty-third of January, 1755, a proclamation was iſſued to encourage ſeamen to enter themſelves on board his majeſty's ſhips of war; offering a bounty of thirty ſhillings for every able-bodied ſeaman between twenty and fifty years of age, and twenty ſhillings for every ordinary ſeaman. The ſame night there was a warm preſs below bridge; warrants for the ſame purpoſe were diſpatched to the out-ports; and public notice was given at Greenwich-hoſpital, for all the ſeamen who were willing to go to ſea to give in their names, and that they ſhould not fail of the uſual encouragements. Another proclamation was publiſhed on the eighth of February, for recalling all maſters of ſhips, pilots, mariners, ſeamen, ſhipwrights, and other ſea-faring men, his majeſty's natural-born ſubjects, from the ſervice of all foreign princes and ſtates, and prohibiting ſuch perſons from entering their ſervice: and this proclamation increaſed the bounty for ſeamen from thirty ſhillings to three pounds, and from twenty ſhillings to two pounds, who ſhould voluntarily enter before the tenth day of March next following: and further, promiſed two pounds reward to any perſon diſcovering any able ſeaman, and thirty ſhillings for every ordinary ſeaman, who ſhould ſecrete themſelves.

On the twenty-ſeventh of March his majeſty ſent a meſſage by ſir Thomas Robinſon, then ſecretary of ſtate to the parliament, importing, "That his majeſty finding it requiſite, from the preſent ſituation of affairs, to augment his forces by ſea and land, and to take ſuch other meaſures as might beſt tend to preſerve the general peace of Europe, and to ſecure the juſt rights and poſſeſſions of his crown in America, as well as to repel any attempts whatever which may be formed againſt his majeſty and his kingdoms, doubts not but that his faithful parliament will enable him to make ſuch augmentations as the emergency of affairs in this critical conjuncture may require."

Upon this meſſage, both houſes preſented very loyal addreſſes, expreſſing the utmoſt zeal and affection to his majeſty's perſon and government, aſſuring their ſovereign of their effectual ſupport, and declaring their reſolution to repel every attempt that might be made to deprive him of the juſt rights and poſſeſſions of his crown, or diſturb the tranquillity of his kingdom. It was on this occaſion that the ſum of one million, already mentioned, was appropriated to the purpoſe of augmenting the forces by ſea and land; and indeed it appears that it was high time for the nation to take alarm, if we may judge by the authentic accounts tranſmitted by M. de Coſne, our ſecretary of embaſſy at the court of France, of the formidable ſtate of the French navy at this juncture: for about the latter end of March there were at Breſt one man of war of eighty guns, four of ſeventy-four, ſix of ſixty-four, one of ſixty, one of fifty, one of forty-ſix, four of thirty, and one of twenty-four: at Toulon, one of eighty, five of ſeventy-four, three of ſixty-four, two of thirty-two, and one of twenty-four: at Rochefort, one of eighty, one of ſeventy-four, three of ſixty-four, one of fifty, and one of thirty-two guns; with a large number of land forces, ready to embark on the firſt notice: to which may be added ſeveral that had already ſailed at different times to America.

But however terrible this naval armament might appear in the eyes of the French, it gave but little uneaſineſs to the Engliſh, who with pleaſure ſaw, ready to enter upon action, riding at Portſmouth, Plymouth, Chatham, and Woolwich, one ſhip of one hundred guns, five of ninety, four of ſeventy-four, fifteen of ſeventy, one of ſixty-ſix, nine of ſixty, three of fifty, one of forty, and four of twenty guns, beſides ſloops, &c. Alſo ſhips under orders for fitting, one of one hundred guns, one of ſeventy-two, five of ſeventy, one of ſixty, and three of fifty guns. To which may be added, thoſe already ſtationed in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies, in Africa, and in America. Proviſion was likewiſe made for an augmentation of our forces both by ſea and land, to the amount of thirty-five thouſand men, viz. twenty thouſand ſailors, ten thouſand marines, and five thouſand for land ſervice. The miniſtry alſo, in order to prevent the Breſt fleet from being victualled with beef and pork from Ireland, where ſix thouſand barrels had been contracted for by their agents, and were ready to be ſhipped off, gave orders for ſeizing thoſe ſtores; and an embargo was laid to prevent any from being exported, which was certainly a very prudent meaſure, as it retarded the expedition from Breſt, and obliged their victuallers to take their proviſions out of their merchantmen for the uſe of their men of war.

Mean while, ſuch was the diſpatch made in every part of the marine, that by the middle of

April

April we had a noble fleet at Spithead, well manned, and ready to put to ſea: nor did they ſtay there long; for on the twenty-third Edward Boſcawen, eſq. vice-admiral of the blue, with ten ſhips of the line and ſix frigates, having on board ſix thouſand land forces, ſet ſail to attend the motions of the French. But more certain and particular information being brought with regard to the ſtrength of the French fleet, now ready to depart from Breſt, which conſiſted of twenty-one ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and tranſports, with a great quantity of warlike ſtores, and four thouſand regular troops, under the command of baron Dieſkau, admiral Holborne was ſoon after detached with ſix ſhips of the line and one frigate, to reinforce Mr. Boſcawen.

On the ſixth day of May the French fleet, commanded by Mr. Macnamara, an officer of Iriſh extraction, ſailed from Breſt, directing its courſe for North America; but after having proceeded to a certain latitude, Macnamara returned with nine of the capital ſhips, while the reſt of the ſquadron continued their courſe under the direction of M. Bois de la Mothe and M. de Salvert. Macnamara's ſhips were afterwards victualled for ſix months, and ſailed again in the beginningof June, under the command of M. du Quay, on a cruize near the Streights of Gibraltar, and in ſuch parts of the Atlantic Ocean as might favour the return of La Mothe and Salvert, in caſe of bad news from America.

The civil tranſactions of the Britiſh ſeſſion of parliament were limited to very few objects. Several new regulations were made for encouraging and improving the whale and white herring fiſheries; and an act paſſed at the motion of Mr. Pitt, paymaſter-general of the forces for the relief of the diſabled veterans of Chelſea-hoſpital, who had long been a prey to the extortion of uſurers, from which they were now freed by this act, which ordained, that half a year's penſion ſhould be advanced the penſioners half a year before it was due, which effectually cruſhed the pernicious practice of uſury in that department. On the twenty-fifth day of April his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which, among other things, he informed them, "That he had religiouſly adhered to the ſtipulations of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and made it his care not to injure or offend any power whatſoever; but that he could never entertain the thought of purchaſing the name of peace at the expence of ſuffering encroachments upon, or of yielding up, what juſtly belonged to Great Britain, either by ancient poſſeſſion or by ſolemn treaties: that the vigour and firmneſs of his parliament, on this important occaſion, had enabled him to be prepared for ſuch events as might happen: that if reaſonable and honourable terms of accommodation could be procured, he would be ſatisfied, and in all events rely on the juſtice of his cauſe, the effectual ſupport of his people, and the protection of the Divine Providence." The parliament being prorogued, his majeſty appointed a regency, and ſet out for his German dominions, in order to try every prudent meaſure to obviate the difficulties that might ariſe in the courſe of the war from the French againſt his electoral territories. To cover theſe from any attacks or inſults, and to guard againſt the effects of a ſecret treaty which was carrying on between the courts of Vienna and Verſailles, and of which he thought he had ſome reaſon to be jealous, his majeſty concluded a ſubſidiary treaty on the eighteenth of June with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel; by which his ſerene highneſs engaged to hold in readineſs, during four years, a body of eight thouſand men for his majeſty's ſervice, to be employed, if required, upon the continent, or in Great Britain or Ireland, but not on board the fleets, or beyond the ſeas. At the ſame time, his majeſty propoſed to renew the treaties with Bavaria and Saxony, which thoſe two houſes refuſed, on account of their connections with France. Another treaty was concluded with the empreſs of Ruſſia, who was, on certain conditions, to furniſh fifty-five thouſand horſe and foot, and fifty gallies.

The French had continued their operations on the banks of the Ohio all the winter with great diligence and activity; and had made ſuch rapid progreſs in their encroachments, that in the beginning of this year they had advanced with their camps and forts within two hundred and twenty-five miles of Philadelphia. This account filled every lover of his country with the moſt melancholy forebodings for the ſafety of America, eſpecially as the colonies ſtill continued quarrelling with their governors, and ſhewed very little alacrity to join againſt the common enemy. The nation, however, was ſomewhat relieved of its anxiety, from the diſpatches of admiral Boſcawen, who, by letters dated off Louiſburg on the twenty-ſecond of June 1755, wherein he informed the miniſtry, That on the tenth of that month the Alcide, a French man of war of ſixty-four guns and four hundred and eighty men, commanded by M. Hoquart; and the Lys, commanded by M. Lageril, pierced for ſixty-four guns, but mounted only twenty-two, and having eight companies of land forces on board, being ſeparated from the French ſquadron, fell in with the Engliſh fleet off the Banks of Newfoundland; and that a ſkirmiſh happened between the ſaid French men of war and his majeſty's ſhips the Dunkirk and Defiance, in which the Alcide and Lys were taken. The French ſhip the Dauphin Royal, which had been in company with the two above-mentioned, diſappeared in a fog. Mr. Boſcawen alſo informed, that rear-admiral Holborne, with his ſquadron, joined him on the twenty-firſt off Louiſburg.

By private letters we were further informed, that the two French men of war, taken as above, were ſent to Halifax in Nova Scotia; and that, had it not been for the fog, they had been in with the whole French fleet: that captain Howe, in the Dunkirk, coming cloſe with the Alcide, ordered her to ſtrike, and come into the admiral's fleet. The captain of her aſked, if it was peace or war? but not receiving a ſatisfactory anſwer, he repeated the queſtion, adding, that he ſhould obey no orders but thoſe of his own admiral. Upon which captain Howe, obſerving a great number of land officers, generouſly bid them withdraw, as it was not their duty to defend the ſhip; which he had no ſooner done, but he poured in a broadſide; and being yard-arm and yard-arm, and his guns double ſhotted, did terrible execution: and ſo hot was the fire, that the French officers found it impoſſible to keep their men to their quarters; ſo that in about three quarters of an hour ſhe ſtruck. There were about fifty men killed in the Alcide, and about double the number wounded. In the Dunkirk ſeven were killed, and about fifteen or ſixteen wounded. The Lys was taken by the Defiance and Fougeux, and in both ſhips ſix hundred ſoldiers, with their officers, and fifty thouſand crowns.

Although this action was in itſelf of no great importance, yet it was productive of infinite joy to the Engliſh at home, who now ſaw that the government was determined to keep no farther meaſures with the French. Theſe latter would gladly have choſen to avoid a war, till they had accompliſhed their grand ſcheme of eſtabliſhing a communication from the Miſſiſippi to Canada by a line of forts; many of which they had already erected, and had deſtroyed one of ours on the Ohio: but when they received advice of this engagement, they immediately recalled the marquis (now duke) de Mirepoix from London, and monſieur de Buſſy from Hanover, where he had but a little time before arrived to attend his Britannic majeſty in a public character.

The advice of the ſucceſs of our fleet in the American ſeas was followed by a farther agreeable account of the deſired effect of an expedition againſt the French in Nova Scotia, which by his majeſty's command had been concerted between general Lawrence and governor Shirley, and was carried into execution with the aid of two thouſand New England men. Governor Lawrence, in a letter to ſir Thomas Robinſon, ſecretary of ſtate, dated the twenty-eighth of June, at Halifax in Nova Scotia, gave the following account of this expedition, which was publiſhed by authority.

"On the ſixteenth inſtant (June) the important fort of Beauſejour ſurrendered to lieutenant-colonel Monckton by capitulation, after four days bombardment, before his majeſty's forces had mounted a ſingle cannon upon their batteries, though that fort had twenty-ſix cannon well mounted; and the next day a ſmall fort on the river Gaſpereau, running into the bay Verte, ſurrendered alſo. In this latter fort the enemy had their principal magazine for ſupplying the French inhabitants and the Indians. In theſe forts were found a great quantity of proviſions, with arms and ſtores of all kinds." The governor then proceeds and ſays, "At colonel Monckton's firſt arrival, the French had a large number of inhabitants and Indians, four hundred and fifty of which were poſted at a blockhouſe which they had on their ſide of the river Maſſaguaſh, to defend the paſs of that river. Here they had thrown up a ſtrong breaſt-work of timber for covering their men, and had cannon mounted on the blockhouſe. At this place they made a ſtand for about an hour, but were forced by our troops with ſome loſs, leaving their blockhouſe and the paſs of the river clear for our people, who marched without further interruption to the ground intended for their encampment. As we had not men enough to inveſt the fort entirely, ſeveral got away; and when the fort ſurrendered, there remained one hundred and fifty regulars, and about three hundred inhabitants, ſeveral of whom, with their officers, were wounded. We do not yet exactly know the numbers that were killed in the fort, but we believe their loſs has not been trifling, as ſeveral lay half buried upon the parade. Colonel Monckton has new-named the fort, and called it Fort Cumberland. He gives the troops under his command great praiſe for their good behaviour, and the ſpirit and reſolution with which they acted upon this occaſion."

By this means colonel Monckton diſarmed fifteen thouſand rebel neutrals, or Acadians and Indians; and in the mean time captain Rous, of the Seahorſe, being ordered with two frigates more to attack the fort the French had lately erected at the mouth of St. John's river, the enemy abandoned it at his appearance, having burſted their cannon, blown up their magazines, and all the works they had raiſed, as much as time would permit them to do.

We had not, however, long rejoiced in the ſucceſs of the foregoing expedition, before a ſad diſaſter happened to our troops in that part of the world, which more than balanced the advantages gained by colonel Monckton and his brave New England men, and threw our American affairs into the utmoſt confuſion.

The men of war and tranſports under the command of commodore Keppel, deſtined to carry over general Braddock with his troops to America, that had ſailed from Ireland in the beginning of January this year, arrived ſafe at Virginia in April; when the general, having landed his men, immediately held a conſultation with the governors of that and the neighbouring colonies, in order to demand of them all the aſſiſtance they could give in furtherance of his projected operations. In this convention, after much debating, it was agreed, that for the preſervation of Oſwego, and reduction of Niagara, Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments ſhould march to the lake Ontario, and Mr. Shirley was charged with the execution of that part of the ſervice. General Braddock, for his part, undertook the reduction of Fort du Queſne, a French fortreſs on the river Monongahela, which runs into the Ohio; and general Johnſon was ordered to inveſt Crown Point with the provincial troops. Theſe reſolutions and plans were certainly very judiciouſly concerted; but how far they anſwered in the execution of each will be ſeen by the following account.

On the twelfth of June, 1755, general Braddock ſet out with two thouſand regular troops, paſſed the Allegany mountains, and was within five days march of Du Queſne, when ſir John Sinclair, having advanced to take a view of that fort, and to conſider the adjacent ground, remarked a ſmall eminence that was within cannon-ſhot; and the fort being built of wood, and garriſoned with one thouſand men, it was propoſed to erect a battery on the eminence, and ſet fire to the place, by throwing into it a great number of red-hot balls.

The general, however, met with a great many difficulties and obſtacles in his way: he was detained at Willis' Creek, and greatly diſtreſſed by the want of forage and proviſions. Landing the troops in Virginia was ſaid to be an unfortunate error, as neither forage, proviſions, nor any carriages, were to be had there; whereas, had they landed in Penſylvania, it would have ſaved forty thouſand pounds ſterling, and ſhortened their march ſix weeks. He was, however, promiſed one hundred and fifty waggons and three hundred horſes, with a large ſupply of forage and proviſions, to be furniſhed from the back ſettlements of Penſylvania: but after a tedious and anxious expectancy of these succours, he received, instead of one hundred and fifty waggons, only fifteen; and instead of three hundred horses, only one hundred. This disappointment, however great, was much aggravated when the waggons were unloaded; for the provisions stunk so intolerably as to prevent any possible use being made of them.

While the general was in this distress, he received an unexpected supply of five hundred pounds in provisions and wine from Philadelphia, sent him by the hands of Mr. Franklin. The Pensylvanians also advanced him a farther sum, and sent one hundred and ninety waggons, loaded each with a ton of corn and oats, four waggons with provisions and wine for the officers, and sixty head of fine cattle for the army. Having received these supplies, the general advanced with his army, and all the stores and provisions, to the Little Meadows, about twenty miles beyond Fort Cumberland, where colonel Washington had been defeated the preceding year. Here he found it necessary to leave the greatest part of his waggons, &c. under the care of colonel Dunbar, with a detachment of eight hundred men, ordering him to follow as fast as the nature of the service would admit. The general having by this means lessened the line of march, proceeded with great expedition, his corps then consisting of about twelve hundred men, together with the necessary ammunition, stores, and provisions. On July 8, he encamped within ten miles of Fort du Quesne.

In the mean time, the French who were posted at this fort, and consisted of one thousand regulars and six hundred irregulars, and a considerable number of Indians in their interest, having gained very particular intelligence of general Braddock's designs, the number and condition of his forces, and the route they were to take, no sooner found that he was advancing, after having received his last supply of provisions, than they also advanced to meet him: and having made choice of a very advantageous piece of ground, about six miles south of the fort, they formed a camp, and entrenched themselves in a very masterly manner, having a thick wood on each side of them, which extended along the route which they knew the English general must take.

Major-general Braddock was undoubtedly a man of courage and resolution; but he was haughty, positive, and difficult of access; qualities ill suited to the tempers of the people among whom he was to command. He was now near sixty miles a-head of colonel Dunbar; and his officers, particularly sir Peter Halket, earnestly besought him to proceed with circumspection, and to employ the friendly Indians in his army by way of advanced guard, in case of an ambuscade, for which that country was so well adapted. But, as if courage alone was sufficient to ensure success in all military enterprizes, the general paid no regard to this seasonable advice: he resumed his march the next day (July 9) without so much as endeavouring to procure the least intelligence of the situation and disposition of the enemy, or even taking the necessary precautions to send out scouts to visit the roads and thickets, which lay on both sides of him as well as in his front.

With this supine negligence did he advance within about three miles of the enemy's intrenchments, when they drew out of their lines; placing their irregulars in front as a forlorn hope, and fifteen hundred regulars behind to support them: they also stationed a great number of their Indians in the wood, who effectually concealed themselves behind the bushes and thickets. About noon general Braddock appeared with his troops, when he was saluted with a general discharge upon his front, and all along his left flank: upon which he gave orders to push forwards, as the enemy were in sight, though not within musket-shot; and as soon as they came near enough, the attack was begun by colonels Gage and Burton.

The Indians immediately gave the war whoop; and rising from their ambush in the thickets, discovered themselves on both sides, flanking our men in vollies, among whom they did incredible execution. The advanced guard being now between three fires, immediately gave way; but being rallied with much difficulty by the officers, they gave one fire, and then retreated in the utmost confusion, and threw Dunbar's regiment, which was behind them, into great disorder; they were with unspeakable difficulty once more rallied by the officers, many of whom were killed as they were using their endeavours to inspirit their men, who did indeed stand one more fire from the enemy, but without returning it. The general, who exerted himself as much as man could do, after having five horses killed under him, was shot through the arms and lungs, of which he died the fourth day. As soon as he dropped, both regiments fled with the utmost terror and precipitation, deserting their officers, who, though alone, kept their ground till, of sixty, five only remained who were not either killed or wounded. The provincials, who composed the rear, still stood unbroken, and continued the engagement on very unequal terms for near three hours, but were then compelled to retire. To their noble stand, however, was principally owing the safety of the regulars, who would otherwise have been all cut off in their flight.

The loss of the English in this unfortunate action amounted to seven hundred men, besides the baggage, artillery, &c. The officers suffered most in proportion, the Indians having constantly marked them out to fire at. Sir Peter Halket fell at the first fire at the head of his regiment, and the general's secretary and two of his aids de camp soon after shared the same fate. Colonel Dunbar having collected the shattered remains of his army at Fort Cumberland, continued there till the beginning of August, and then departed with his forces, except two independent companies which he left in garrison, and went to the frontiers of Pensylvania, from whence the troops were ordered away to Albany in New York by general Shirley, who upon the death of general Braddock succeeded to the chief command of the troops in America.

Colonel Dunbar was greatly blamed for not continuing at Fort Cumberland and fortifying himself there, which he might easily have done; and would then have been such a check, during the rest of the summer, upon the French and their scalping Indians, as would have prevented many of those dreadful barbarities that were committed, in the sequel, upon the now defenceless western borderers of Virginia, Pensylvania, and Maryland; who, notwithstanding the imminent danger with which they were threatened, suffered the spirit of of oppoſition to their governors to get the better of their reaſon, and ſo divided their councils, that they could be brought to no effectual reſolutions for the public ſafety. Theſe diſputes prevailed chiefly in Penſylvania, the richeſt of theſe three provinces, between the aſſembly and the governor; and as they were of vaſt detriment to that and the neighbouring colonies in America at the time they ſubſiſted, I ſhall here give a curſory view of them, and in what manner they ſubſided.

The ſubjects of theſe diſputes were various; but the principal one was that about taxing the eſtates of the proprietors in common with thoſe of the inhabitants. The aſſembly prepared a bill in Auguſt for raiſing ſixty thouſand pounds on the preſent emergency, in which the proprietary eſtates were to be taxed with the reſt. The governor pleaded an exemption for thoſe eſtates, and the particular orders he had to refuſe any bill with ſuch a clauſe. The aſſembly and the governor were both poſitive, the one in preſſing, the other in refuſing to paſs the bill ſo circumſtanced. Many angry meſſages paſſed between them; and their animoſities roſe to ſuch a height, that all public buſineſs was at a ſtand; nor could any money be raiſed, or ſoldiers levied, for the defence of the country, as there was no money in the treaſury to pay them.

In the midſt of theſe debates many hundreds of the back ſettlers came down in a body to demand that relief to which, by the laws both of God and nature, they had a manifeſt and undoubted right. Theſe unhappy and deſerted people went firſt to the governor, who told them what he had done to gain from the aſſembly that relief which they ſollicited, ſhewing them at the ſame time an order from the proprietaries for five thouſand pounds as a free gift, to be laid out in defence of the province. They then went to the aſſembly, who were ſo moved by their diſtreſs and importunity, that dropping all their diſputes, they next day (the nineteenth of November) ſent up a bill, granting ſixty thouſand pounds, on the ſame terms the governor would have paſſed it the Auguſt before. They alſo paſſed a militia bill (which had been long in vain ſollicited of them) by which thoſe who could bear arms might be formed into regular bodies ſubject to diſcipline, and rendered more able to ſerve their country, and be a greater terror to their enemies.

Our colonies to the north of Penſylvania were more unanimous, and more diligent in their warlike preparations. The aſſembly of New York in particular voted forty-five thouſand pounds for the better defence of their country, which lay more open than any other to a French invaſion from Crown Point. With this ſupply, and the help of the eaſtern colonies, it was reſolved to adopt offenſive meaſures, and to undertake the two expeditions; one againſt the French fort at Crown Point, the other againſt Niagara, between the lakes Ontario and Erie, as had been before concerted with the late general Braddock.

The execution of the firſt of theſe was committed to the care of colonel (afterwards general) Johnſon, a native of Ireland, who had long reſided upon the Mohock river in the weſtern parts of New York, where he not only acquired a conſiderable eſtate, but was alſo beloved both by the inhabitants and the native Indians, whoſe language he had learnt, and had gained their affections by his faithful and humane behaviour towards them. General Shirley took upon himſelf the direction of the expedition againſt Niagara.

The troops deſtined for both theſe enterprizes were appointed to aſſemble at Albany, where moſt of them arrived before the end of June; but the artillery, battoes, proviſions, and other neceſſaries for the attempt upon Crown Point, could not be got ready till the eighth of Auguſt, when general Johnſon ſet out with them from Albany for the Carrying-place at Lake George (otherwiſe Lake Sacrament) where the troops had already arrived under the command of major-general Lyman, and amounted to between five and ſix thouſand, beſides Indians raiſed by the governments of Boſton, Connecticut, New Hampſhire, Rhode Iſland, and New York.

Every thing was now prepared for the march as ſoon as poſſible; and towards the latter end of the month general Johnſon advanced with his troops about fourteen miles forward, and encamped in a very ſtrong ſituation. Here he propoſed to wait the arrival of his battoes, and afterwards to proceed to Ticonderoga, at the other end of Lake George, and from thence to Crown Point, which is a fort at the ſouth end of the Lake Corlaer or Champlain. The French call it Fort Frederic.

Whilſt the general remained in the above ſituation, he received advice from ſome Indian ſcouts that the enemy, to the number of two thouſand, commanded by the baron de Dieſkau, were on their march from Ticonderoga, by way of the South Bay, towards another of our fortified camps, ſince called Fort Edward, built and garriſoned with upwards of four hundred of the New Hampſhire and New York men, by general Lyman, at the Carrying-place. General Johnſon hereupon gave notice to colonel Blanchard the commander, with orders to call in all his out-parties, and to keep his whole force within the entrenchments. Early the next morning, September 8, it was determined in a council of war, to march one thouſand men, with a number of Indians, in order to intercept the enemy in their return, either as victors, or defeated in their attempt. According to this reſolution, colonel Williams began his march about eight o'clock in the morning, with one thouſand men and two hundred Indians. This detachment in about an hour and an half were beat back by the French, and the general immediately hauled up ſome heavy cannon to a breaſt-work of trees that had been thrown up round the encampment, and made the beſt diſpoſition he could to receive the enemy.

It ſeems that M. de Dieſkau, the French general, truſting to the information of ſome deſerters from general Johnſon's camp, that it was in want of cannon, and in a defenceleſs ſtate, was prevailed upon by the common voice of his troops, when he was within four miles and an half of Fort Edward (the firſt object of his expedition) to proceed to the attack of the Engliſh camp. Though this alteration in the enemy's route ſaved Fort Edward, it had like to have proved the deſtruction of the whole detachment under colonel Williams, who in his march fell into the very mouths of the French. However, the colonel behaved with great gallantry and prudence, and at length effected a retreat to the camp.

About half an hour after eleven the enemy appeared in ſight, marching in very regular order directly directly for our center, when, without any apparent reaſon, inſtead of attacking the breaſt-work directly, they halted about one hundred and fifty yards from the camp, where their regular troops made their grand and center attack, the Canadians and Indians in their ſervice diſperſing themſelves on our flanks. The enemy fired in platoons, but did no great execution, being at too great a diſtance, and our men defended by the breaſt-work. In the mean time our artillery, which was admirably well ſerved by captain Eyre, began to play, and quickly diſperſed the Indians and Canadians on our flanks, who fled for ſhelter to the adjacent woods.

The engagement ſoon after became general on both ſides. The French regulars kept their ground and order for ſome time with great reſolution and good conduct; but the warm and conſtant fire from our artillery and troops put them in ſome diſorder. Their fire became more ſcattered, unequal, and faint: they made ſeveral attempts to penetrate our breaſt-work, firſt on the left and then on the right, but all in vain. At length, our men and the Indians obſerving the enemy's fire to grow continually weaker, and at very conſiderable intervals, without waiting for orders from general Johnſon, jumped over their breaſt-work, attacked the enemy on all ſides, killed between ſeven and eight hundred, took 30 priſoners, whilſt the reſt fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Amongſt their priſoners was the baron Dieſkau, the French general of all the regular forces lately arrived from Europe. The whole engagement and purſuit ended about ſeven o'clock.

Our greateſt loſs, according to general Johnſon, in his letter to governor Wentworth, fell upon the party commanded by colonel Williams in the morning, in which we loſt two hundred men killed. The enemy endeavoured to ſurround the detachment; but the officers, to ſave the troops, retreated and formed with the reſt in the main battle of the day. Colonel Williams, major Aſhley, ſix captains, and many ſubalterns, with forty Indians who fought like lions, and the brave old Kendric, the Mohawk Sachem, or chief captain, were ſlain. In the camp the loſs was very ſmall; and no perſon of diſtinction fell but colonel Titcomb, who was killed. General Johnſon and major Nichols were wounded. The French general, the baron de Dieſkau, was wounded in his leg and through both his hips. He was a man in years, an experienced officer, and a perſon of high conſideration in France. He brought three thouſand one hundred and ſeventy-one regular troops under his command to Quebec, in the fleet with admiral de la Mothe. Theſe troops were partly in garriſon at Crown Point, and encamped at the advantageous places leading to it. The loſs of the French in their engagement with us amounted to near one thouſand men. Their major-general was killed, and the greater part of their chief officers.

In a ſhort time general Johnſon recovered ſo well of his wound as to walk about and regulate his army, in order to purſue the advantage he had gained over the enemy, by attacking Crown Point. This was the general expectation of the country: but whether he was not properly aſſiſted by the provinces, or ſeconded as he expected by governor Shirley, or could not get ſufficient ſupplies for the intended expedition againſt Crown Point, we are at too great a diſtance to be perfectly informed, though perhaps all theſe reaſons might concur in obliging him to delay his farther progreſs. This is certain, that his army ſtood in great want of proviſions, as might be made appear by letters both from him and other officers in his army. A reſolution was therefore taken to defer the attempt till the next year, and to return to Albany with the whole army: but although the expedition had failed in its main object, the conduct of general Johnſon was ſo well approved of here, that his majeſty was pleaſed to create him a baronet, and the parliament gratified him with a preſent of five thouſand pounds.

Governor Shirley, who had taken upon him the expedition againſt Niagara, had not the good fortune to meet with the ſame approbation. The preparations for his expedition were not only deficient, but extremely ſlow; inſomuch, that altho' his ſucceſs was manifeſtly to depend upon his beginning his operations early in the ſpring, inſtead of that, it was the end of July before he was ready to ſet out for Albany; and being alſo obliged to wait for proviſions by the way, it was the twenty-ſixth of September before he was in readineſs to croſs the Lake Ontario. In this interval a great number of Indians who accompanied him from Albany returned home; and the few that remained with him declared that it was impoſſible to croſs the lake at that ſeaſon, or at any time before the following ſummer. All his meaſures being thus diſconcerted, Mr. Shirley, after employing his troops for ſome time in building barracks, and beginning to erect two new forts, returned with the greateſt part of the troops under his command to Albany, leaving colonel Mercer with a garriſon of about ſeven hundred men at Oſwego. A miſunderſtanding likewiſe aroſe between him and ſir William Johnſon, which was carried to ſuch a height that nothing could extinguiſh their animoſities but the interpoſition of royal authority; by which Shirley was recalled from his government, and obliged to return to England to anſwer for ſuch parts of his conduct as ſhould be judged exceptionable.

In the mean time the French, exaſperated at their late defeat under the baron de Dieſkau, ſet no bounds to their rage; and, in conjunction with their ſavage Indians, redoubled their fury againſt our defenceleſs planters; and wherever we had no forts or garriſons to defend our people, there theſe monſters made their ravages and committed their barbarities, butchering men, women, and children, and whole families, in the moſt cruel manner; though it muſt be allowed, that by the victory at Lake George ſome of the Indian tribes were attached more firmly to us, particularly the Cherokees, a nation bordering on South Carolina, who concluded a treaty with the governor of that province in the courſe of this year.

Having taken this view of the proceedings of our governors of the ſeveral provinces of America to drive the French from their encroachments there, let us now return to England to behold the vigorous meaſures purſued by the government, in reſentment of the perfidious dealings of the French in regard to this nation.

The unprovoked hoſtilities committed by them in America ſo exaſperated the nation, that our miniſtry thought it a juſtice due to the honour of his majeſty's crown and kingdom, to repay the French in their own coin: and while they leaſt ſuſpected any thing of the kind, to ſtrike ſuch a blow as would deprive them at once of the means to mann their fleets. Accordingly, in the month of September a reſolution was taken in council, and the lords of the admiralty were ordered to authoriſe and command the ſeveral captains and commanders in the royal navy, to ſeize and bring into port all manner of French ſhips, whether men of war or merchantmen: and, in order more effectually to animate the workmen in the dock-yards to proceed with alacrity in the building and repairing the many ſhips ordered to be put into commiſſion, his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland went this ſummer to Portſmouth, where he was received with the greateſt honours; and lord Anſon, with other lords of the admiralty, viſited that place, and ſeveral other ports in the kingdom, in order to forward the maritime preparations, which were carried on with ſuch diligence and alacrity, that before the end of this year the Engliſh navy amounted to one ſhip of an hundred and ten guns, five of an hundred guns each, thirteen of ninety, eight of eighty, five of ſeventy-four, twenty-nine of ſeventy, four of ſixty-ſix, one of ſixty-four, thirty-three of ſixty, three of fifty-four, twenty eight of fifty, four of forty-four, thirty-five of forty, and forty two of twenty; four ſloops of war of fourteen guns each, two of ſixteen, eleven of fourteen, thirteen of twelve, and one of ten; beſides a great number of bomb-ketches, fire-ſhips, and tenders; a force ſufficient to oppoſe the united maritime ſtrength of all the powers in Europe: whilſt that of the French, even at the end of this year, and including the ſhips then upon the ſtocks, conſiſted only of ſix ſhips of eighty guns, twenty-one of ſeventy-four, one of ſeventy-two, four of ſeventy, thirty one of ſixty-four, two of ſixty, ſix of fifty, and thirty-two frigates.

Mean while, in conſequence of the orders for repriſals, our cruizers exerted themſelves ſo effectually, that before the cloſe of the year they had taken three hundred of the French merchant ſhips, and about eight thouſand of their ſailors. By theſe captures the French found themſelves on a ſudden deprived of a great body of ſeamen, and a very large property in trade; the with-holding of which diſtreſſed their people, and ruined many of their merchants. The outward-bound merchant ſhips were inſured at the rate of thirty, and their homeward-bound at the rate of fifty per cent. while the Engliſh paid no more than the common inſurance. This intolerable burden was ſeverely felt by all ranks of people. Amongſt them their miniſtry was publicly reviled even by their parliaments; and the French name, not long ſince the terror of Europe, was now become its contempt. But this violent proceeding, without a formal declaration of war on the part of Great Britain, was loudly impeached of injuſtice by the French court, and not greatly approved by many candid and thinking people at home.

However, to keep up the ſpirit of the nation, and conciliate the affections of the people, a reſolution was taken to employ thoſe admirals who had rendered themſelves ſo popular by their courage and ſucceſs towards the concluſion of the late war. Accordingly, ſir Edward Hawke was ſent with eighteen ſail of men of war on a cruize to the weſtward, to wait for the French fleet under the command of M. du Guay, who had put into Cadiz, and was expected ſhortly to return to Breſt. Sir Edward, however, miſſed of the French fleet, which got ſafe into that harbour on the third day of September; upon advice whereof he was called home. In the October following another fleet of twenty-two ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and ſloops, was ſent upon another cruize under admiral Byng, with a view, as was ſaid, to intercept the ſquadron commanded by La Mothe, in its return from America, after landing M. de Dieſkau with his troops there: but this fleet likewiſe returned to Spithead about the latter end of November, without having been able to effect any thing, to the no ſmall diſguſt of the nation. Commodore Frankland was ſent this ſummer with a ſquadron to the Weſt Indies.

As to our affairs in the Eaſt Indies, the miniſtry had in the preceding year diſpatched rear-admiral Watſon and rear-admiral Pocock with a ſquadron of capital ſhips, and colonel Aldercorn's regiment on board, to ſupport our intereſts beyond the Line, which was no ſooner known to the court of France, who dreaded the conſequences of a war with the Engliſh on that trading coaſt, and were beſides grown jealous of Dupleix's aiming to raiſe himſelf to the dignity of an independent eaſtern prince, and to eſtabliſh his government at their expence, than they reſolved to clear themſelves of this powerful commander, and to eſtabliſh a good harmony between the two companies in that part of the world: with this view they diſpatched M. Godeheu, with a commiſſion of commiſſary-general and governor-general of all their ſettlements, with inſtructions to ſuperſede M. Dupleix in his government, and to do his endeavours to conclude a pacific treaty with the governor of Madraſs, and with the other Engliſh ſettlements on the coaſt of Coromandel. M. Godeheu executed his commiſſion with dexterity and honour. His propoſals were highly acceptable to the Engliſh; and on the twenty-ſixth of December, 1754, articles of a proviſional treaty, and articles and ſtipulations of a truce were ſigned between governor Saunders, preſident for the honourable Eaſt India company on the coaſt of Coromandel, and the ſieur de Godeheu, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's commiſſary. But this gentleman returning home ſoon after, M. de Leyrit his ſucceſſor acted in ſuch a manner as to convince the Engliſh that the tranquillity was not founded on ſo ſolid a baſis as they expected; for early in this year (1755) it appeared that the French, in direct contravention to the proviſional treaty, were endeavouring to acquire the dominion of all the Decan, or province of the hither peninſula of India. They alſo took poſſeſſion of the fort of Golconda; and Leyrit ſupported the Polygor of Velloure, the ſtrongeſt fort of the province, againſt his ſovereign the nabob Mahommed Ally Khan, our ally, threatening, by a letter to the governor of Madraſs, and by marching three hundred French and as many ſeapoys from Pondicherry, to oppoſe the Engliſh employed by the nabob to collect his revenues from the tributary princes that held under him. Our fleet under Watſon and Pocock was then ſailed upon an expedition to reduce the ſtrong places of the famous pirate Angria, on the Malabar coaſt, from whence he had for many years infeſted our trade in the Eaſt Indies, and greatly endangered borh our navigation tion and that of the Dutch, and other European nations, to that part of the world.

I ſhall now reſume the account of the ſtate of affairs in Europe. The French court, as ſoon as they heard of admiral Boſcawen's taking their two men of war, complained loudly at the court of Madrid of this tranſaction as a moſt unjuſtifiable proceeding, which threatened a diſſolution of all faith amongſt nations. This produced a ſpirited memorial from ſir Benjamin Keene, our miniſter at that court, importing, that it was well known that the French fleet carried troops, ammunition, and every thing neceſſary for defending the countries which the French had unjuſtly ſeized in America, and of which the Engliſh claimed the property: that the rules of ſelf-defence authoriſe every nation to defeat any attempt that may tend to its prejudice: that this right had been made uſe of only in taking the two French men of war: and that the diſtinction of place might be interpreted in favour of the Engliſh, ſeeing the two ſhips were taken on the coaſts of the countries where the conteſt aroſe.

The diſpoſition or the policy of the Spaniſh court happened to be ſuch at this time, that they turned a deaf ear to all the remonſtrances of France, and gave our ſovereign the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of its friendſhip, and of its intention to concern itſelf no farther in the differences between him and his moſt Chriſtian majeſty than as a mediator, if required, to accommodate matters. The French, however, ſtill kept up an appearance of moderation: and although our cruizers continued to diſtreſs their trade, not only in the ſeas of America, but alſo in thoſe of Europe, by taking every ſhip they could meet with; yet the politic adverſary, to have a fair pretext to repreſent England as the aggreſſor, were ſo far from retorting theſe hoſtile proceedings, that their miniſtry, hearing that one of their ſhips of war had taken the Blandford, of twenty guns, with Mr. Littleton on board, going to his government of Carolina, and carried her into Nants, ordered the governor to be immediately ſet at liberty, and ſhortly after releaſed both the ſhip and crew: but notwithſtanding this ſhew of moderation, and that they were ſolliciting every court in Europe to interpoſe their mediation to prevail with his Britannic majeſty to compromiſe the differences between France and England; yet they did not neglect the neceſſary preparations for war, but uſed double diligence in getting their ſquadrons ready for ſea, lined their coaſts oppoſite to England with troops, and prepared ſeveral flat-bottomed boats at Calais, Dunkirk, and ſeveral other ports, as if they really deſigned an invaſion of England. They alſo made ſure of our old ally the empreſs-queen, by means of the count d'Aubeterre, envoy-extraordinary from their court to that of Vienna, who entered into a ſecret negociation with the imperial miniſter, and promiſed, in the name of his maſter, that if the empreſs-queen would ſecond the views of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, ſhe might command all that was in his power againſt the king of Pruſſia, of whom ſhe, at this time, affected to be more than commonly jealous.

In the midſt of this hurry his majeſty returned from his electorate, which he left on the eighth of September, and he arrived at his palace of Kenſington on the fifteenth of the ſame month.

By this time the public received ſome intimation of the negociations of France with the empreſs of Germany: whereupon his Britannic majeſty, to put the matter out of all doubt, ordered his miniſter at the court of Vienna to demand the auxiliaries which he had a right unto by treaties from her Imperial majeſty: but that princeſs not only refuſed to perform thoſe engagements, under the pretence, that as the conteſt between us and France was not a caſus fœderis, or clauſe in our alliance with her; but afterwards, when required by England to defend her barrier towns in the Low Countries, ſhe excuſed herſelf from the ſervice, under a pretence of her fears from the king of Pruſſia.

On the thirteenth of November his majeſty met his parliament, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he informed the lords and commons, "That the moſt proper meaſures had been taken to protect our poſſeſſions in America, and to recover ſuch parts of them as had been uſurped or invaded: that to preſerve his people from the calamities of war, as well as to prevent a general flame from being lighted up in Europe, he had always been ready to accept of reaſonable and honourable terms of accommodation; but that none ſuch had been offered by France: that he had alſo confined his views and operations to hinder France from making new encroachments, or ſupporting thoſe already made; to exert his people's right to a ſatisfaction for hoſtilities committed in time of profound peace; and to diſappoint ſuch deſigns as, from various appearances and preparations, there was reaſon to think had been formed againſt his kingdoms and dominions: that he believed no impartial power could object to proceedings ſo abſolutely neceſſary for the defence and ſecurity of his people: that his good brother the king of Spain beheld with concern theſe differences; and the part which he had taken in the common welfare of Europe, made him earneſtly wiſh the preſervation of the public tranquillity, and had induced him to give the moſt ſolemn aſſurances of his firm reſolution to continue in the ſame pacific ſentiments: that he himſelf had greatly increaſed his naval force, and augmented his army in ſuch a manner as might be leaſt burthenſome to his ſubjects: and finally, that he had concluded a treaty with the empreſs of Ruſſia, and another with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, which ſhould be ſubmitted to their peruſal."

In the houſe of lords, the duke of Marlborough preſented the form of a very long and explicit addreſs of thanks for the approbation of the houſe, which was ſeconded by the earl of Marchmont. It occaſioned violent debates, and was thought to have been one of the moſt extraordinary ever preſented by that houſe. It was in ſubſtance as follows: "They thank him for his royal firmneſs, in not yielding to any terms of accommodation with France that were not reaſonable and honourable, and for exerting his royal care ſo powerfully in the protection of his colonies: they acknowlege his majeſty's wiſdom and goodneſs in increaſing his naval armaments, in augmenting his land forces, with ſo much regard to the eaſe of his people, and in generouſly giving encouragement to that great body of his brave and faithful ſubjects, with which his American provinces happily abound, to exert their ſtrength on this important occaſion: they obſerve, with pleaſure, the pacific declarations of his Catholic majeſty; promiſe their moſt zealous and vigorous aid and concurrence in this juſt and national cauſe, and to aſſiſt him in diſappointing or repelling all ſuch enterprizes as may be formed not only againſt his kingdoms, but alſo againſt any other of his dominions, although not belonging to the crown of Great Britain, in caſe they ſhould be attacked on account of the part which his majeſty has taken for maintaining the eſſential intereſts of his kingdoms."

The terms in which this addreſs was couched gave infinite offence to, and was vehemently combated by, the lords in the oppoſition, headed by earl Temple, who inſiſted that in the firſt part of it the wiſdom of the houſe was proſtituted, by engaging to approve of the treaties of Ruſſia and Heſſe-Caſſel, which they had not ſeen, and which they apprehended could be of no uſe to Great Britain: and in the ſecond part, they ſaid the houſe would be guilty of the greateſt indiſcretion, by conſenting to meaſures which manifeſtly engaged this nation in a continental connection, for the defence of Hanover, that could not be ſupported by Great Britain; and would be ſo far from being of advantage to us at ſea or in America, that it was to be feared it might in the end diſable the nation from defending itſelf in other parts of the world. But the court party, upon putting the queſtion, carried their addreſs by a great majority of voices, and it was accordingly preſented, and met with a moſt gracious anſwer from his majeſty.

The addreſs in the houſe of commons was replete with the ſame expreſſions of zeal, gratitude, and warm aſſurances to ſupport his majeſty. Nay the ſame, or nearly the ſame words, relating to the defence of his majeſty's foreign dominions, were propoſed to be inſerted in this addreſs, which was oppoſed ſtrenuouſly by ſeveral gentlemen in high poſts under the government, particularly by Mr. Legge, the chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. William Pitt, pay-maſter of the forces: but after a long debate, the form was approved by a conſiderable majority, and the addreſs was preſented, which met with a like gracious return from the throne with that of the upper houſe.

It was ſomewhat ſtrange to ſee two perſons who held ſuch conſiderable places under the government, oppoſe, as they did upon almoſt every occaſion, the ſecretary of ſtate, who was ſuppoſed to know and ſpeak the ſentiments of his maſter: but the truth is, that there was a very ſtrange jumble of parties in both houſes; and it ſoon appeared that the public buſineſs could not go on unleſs another ſecretary of ſtate was appointed in the room of ſir Thomas Robinſon, who, though a man of integrity and virtue, and a favourite with his ſovereign, was not poſſeſſed of talents equal to the duties of his office, eſpecially at ſo critical a juncture as that in which the nation now found itſelf. Mr. Pitt and Mr. Henry Fox, ſecretary at war, though they ſcarce ever agreed in any other point, united in oppoſing his meaſures; and their intereſt was ſo great in the houſe, and their abilities ſo univerſally acknowleged, though of very different kinds, that they were always ſure of forming a party ſufficient to clog the wheels of government, when matters went contrary to their inclinations. Mr. Pitt had, beſides the advantage of his high poſt under the government, the additional weight of having in both houſes many able men who were his friends or relations, particularly Mr. Legge, chancellor of the Exchequer, above-mentioned, the earl Temple, and the Grenville family, and almoſt all of them enjoying places under the government likewiſe. Sir Thomas himſelf therefore very wiſely and dutifully reſolved to take off ſome part of the oppoſition; and of his own accord, the very ſecond day of the ſeſſion, reſigned the ſeals of ſecretary of ſtate into his royal maſter's hands, who delivered them to Mr. Fox. About the ſame time Mr. Legge, diſguſted with the new ſyſtem of foreign meaſures, threw up his poſt of chancellor of the Exchequer, which was conferred on ſir George Lyttleton, and lord Barrington ſucceeded Mr. Fox as ſecretary at war. Mr. Pitt was ſoon after diſmiſſed from his employment, and the earl of Darlington and Mr. Hay appointed joint paymaſters-general in his ſtead. Earl Gower was made keeper of the privy-ſeal, and the duke of Marlborough maſter-general of the ordnance. This was called the miniſtry with Mr. Fox at the head; but few of them were conſulted in the adminiſtration of the more important affairs.

When the treaties with Ruſſia and Heſſe-Caſſel came to be conſidered in the houſe of commons, ſome of the members propoſed referring them to the examination of a committee; but this motion was rejected, in conſideration of his majeſty's having contracted them with a view to avert the ſtorm that threatened his electoral dominions, on account of our quarrel with the French. The new miniſtry alſo, in order to reconcile the nation the better to theſe treaties, took advantage of the march of a large body of French troops down to their coaſts, to inſinuate, that the ſubſidiary troops might ſoon be found neceſſary to be brought over hither for the defence of our iſland againſt the French invaſion. In fine, the queſtion being put upon each of theſe treaties, they were approved by a majority of three hundred and eighteen againſt one hundred and twenty-ſix in the lower houſe, and by eighty-four againſt eleven in the upper. After this the commons proceeded to adjuſt the ſupplies for the enſuing year, when they voted fifty thouſand ſeamen, including nine thouſand one hundred and thirty-eight marines, together with two millions ſix hundred thouſand pounds for their maintenance, and thirty-four thouſand two hundred and ſixty-three land forces, with 930,600 l. for their ſupport. One hundred thouſand pounds were voted as a ſubſidy to the empreſs of Ruſſia, fifty-four thouſand one hundred and forty pounds to the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel *, and ten thouſand pounds to the elector of Bavaria.

* In the courſe of this year the proteſtant intereſt received a ſevere blow, by the defection of prince Frederic of Heſſe-Caſſel (ſon to this landgrave, and ſon-in-law to his Britannic majeſty, whoſe daughter, the princeſs Mary, he had eſpouſed) who on the ſeventh of March abjured the proteſtant faith, and turned Roman catholic: whereupon the king of Great Britain and the States-general, at the requiſition of the old landgrave and the ſtates of Heſſe-Caſſel, guarantied the proteſtant religion and ſucceſſion in that landgraviate.

I muſt

I muſt here ſtop to commemorate a moſt awful event which happened in this month of November, and proved fatal to many places, occaſioned by an almoſt univerſal convulſion throughout the known world, which was far from being unnoticed even in theſe kingdoms, where the waters in many places were agitated in a moſt ſurpriſing manner: but in Spain and Portugal the greateſt miſchief was ſuſtained by this tremenduous earthquake; and the proud city of Liſbon, capital of Portugal, was almoſt totally deſtroyed, with near ſeventy thouſand inhabitants of all countries, though happily not above ten or twelve Engliſh were amongſt the number. This fortunate circumſtance, with reſpect to thoſe of our nation, ſeems to have been owing to the day on which this fearful viſitation happened, viz. the firſt of November, which is the feſtival of All-Saints, and is appointed at Liſbon for the celebration of the Auto da Fé *; and as in that day inſults are frequently offered to proteſtants if met in the ſtreets, moſt of the gentlemen of the Engliſh factory go the night before to their country houſes, and do not return till the next day, when every thing is quiet. To this unhappy bigotry, which brings many of the country inhabitants to Liſbon to ſee the ſhew, the great loſs of the Portugueſe, and the preſervation of the Engliſh, may therefore be reaſonably attributed: but though the Engliſh were thus ſafe in their perſons, almoſt all the houſes they occupied were deſtroyed by the dreadful conflagration which accompanied the earthquake; and the greater part ſaved nothing but a little caſh and ſome of their books.

When this dreadful convulſion began, which was between nine and ten in the morning, the weather was ſerene, and the ſky without a cloud in it. The two firſt and moſt dreadful ſhocks continued for the ſpace of a quarter of an hour; after which the water of the river Tagus, which runs along by the city, roſe perpendicularly above twenty feet, and ſubſided to its natural bed again in leſs than a minute. It is agreed on all hands, that the fire which ſucceeded the earthquake was the principal cauſe of the total ruin of the city. It was occaſioned by the vaſt quantities of fires lighted on that particular day on the altars of every church, chapel, and in every convent and private houſe; and many villains alſo confeſſed, on their executions for pillaging the ruins, that they had ſet fire to many places in the city to facilitate their depredations. The waverings of the earth were from eaſt to weſt, which is the courſe of the Tagus from Liſbon to the ocean; the whole bed of which river is in all probability altered; for the principal quay of the city, built extremely ſtrong of marble, cramped with irons, and jointed, ſunk at once fifty fathoms below the ſurface of the water. The earth opened in abundance of other places in the kingdom, as at Alcantara, Sacavem, and Setuval, or St. Ubes: out of ſome of the chaſms iſſued water, from others a ſulphureous vapour, and from others proceeded nothing but air. Of three hundred and fifty thouſand inhabitants, which Liſbon was ſuppoſed to contain at the time of the earthquake, about ſeven thouſand (ſome accounts made them nearer ten thouſand) periſhed by this calamity, and the ſurvivors, deprived of their habitations, and deſtitute even of the neceſſaries of life, were obliged to ſeek for ſhelter in the open fields.

His majeſty had no ſooner received intelligence of this melancholy event from his miniſter at the court of Madrid, than he ſent a meſſage to the houſe of lords, acquainting them with the ſame, and deſiring their concurrence and aſſiſtance in relieving the unhappy ſufferers. To which the lords returned a dutiful addreſs, expreſſing their juſt ſenſe of his majeſty's royal concern for the great misfortune that had befallen the kingdom of Portugal, and for his generous compaſſion of the unhappy ſufferers; and aſſuring his majeſty of their hearty concurrence and aſſiſtance in ſending ſuch ſpeedy and effectual relief as might be ſuitable to ſo afflicting and preſſing an exigency. Accordingly the parliament, to the honour of Britiſh humanity, ſoon after voted a gift of one hundred thouſand pounds; and likewiſe ſent twenty thouſand barrels of rice, a great quantity of corn and flour, and a large cargo of beef from Ireland, and many other neceſſaries for the relief of the diſtreſſed people of Portugal, to be at the diſpoſal of his Portugueſe majeſty; who was ſo ſenſibly affected with this inſtance of Britiſh generoſity, that, as a proof of his gratitude, he ordered M. de Caſtres, the Engliſh reſident at his court, to give the preference in thoſe ſupplies to the Britiſh ſubjects who had ſuffered by the earthquake. Accordingly, about a thirtieth part of the proviſions, and two thouſand pounds in money, were ſet apart for that purpoſe; and his Portugueſe majeſty returned his thanks in the warmeſt terms to the Britiſh crown and nation.

About this time the Eſperance man of war, of eighty guns, belonging to the French, ſailing from Rochefort to Breſt to be completely manned, was taken with three hundred men on board, by the Orford, of ſeventy guns, captain Stevens, after three hours engagement, and brought by him into Plymouth. In ſhort, matters were come to ſuch a length between us and France, that it was daily expected war would be declared either by the one ſide or the other. The French court, however, did not chuſe to do it firſt, for fear they ſhould drive their own people, already oppreſſed almoſt beyond human ſufferance, into mutiny and rebellion: and we had our reaſons for not being the firſt to proclaim war, leſt we might be deemed the aggreſſors, and conſequently have given our allies a pretence to refuſe their ſuccours, in caſe they ſhould be demanded in the courſe of the war. On theſe or the like principles both courts ſeemed to act. At laſt the French bethought themſelves of an expedient to oblige our miniſtry to give ſuch an eclairciſſement concerning their intentions as ſhould amount to a preciſe declaration, which was, by ordering Mr. Rouillé, ſecretary of ſtate for foreign affairs in France, to write the following letter or memorial to Mr. Fox, ſecretary of ſtate to his Britannic majeſty.

* Or, Act of Faith; in which the convicts of the inquiſition go in proceſſion through the city; and frequently proteſtants and others are burnt alive by the ſentence of this infernal tribunal.

" SIR,

" By order of the king my maſter, I have the honour to ſend you the following memorial, &c.

" The king is able to demonſtrate to the whole univerſe, by authentic proofs, that it is not owing to his majeſty that the differences relating to America have not been amicably accommodated.

" The king being moſt ſincerely deſirous to maintain the public peace, and a good underſtanding with his Britannic majeſty, carried on the negociation relative to that ſubject with the moſt unreſerved confidence and good faith.

" The aſſurances of the king of Great Britain's diſpoſition to peace, which his Britannic majeſty and his miniſtry were conſtantly repeating, both by word of mouth and in writing, were ſo formal and preciſe, that the king could not, without reproaching himſelf, entertain the leaſt ſuſpicion of the ſincerity of the court of London's intentions.

" It is ſcarce poſſible to conceive how theſe aſſurances can be reconciled with the orders for hoſtilities given in November 1754, to general Braddock, and in April 1755 to admiral Boſcawen.

" The attack and capture, in July laſt, of two of the king's ſhips in the open ſeas, and without a declaration of war, was a public inſult to his majeſty's flag; and his majeſty would have manifeſted his juſt reſentment of ſuch an irregular and violent proceeding, if he could have imagined that admiral Boſcawen acted by the orders of his court.

" For the ſame reaſon the king ſuſpended at firſt his judgment of the piracies that have been committed for ſeveral months, by the Engliſh men of war, on the navigation and commerce of his majeſty's ſubjects, in contempt of the law of nations, and the regard they reciprocally owe to each other.

" The ſentiments of his Britannic majeſty gave the king room to expect, that at his return to London he would diſavow the conduct of his admirals and naval officers, and give his majeſty a ſatisfaction proportioned to the injury and the damage.

" But ſeeing that the king of England, inſtead of puniſhing the robberies committed by the Engliſh navy, on the contrary encourages them, by demanding from his ſubjects freſh ſupplies againſt France; his majeſty would fall ſhort in what he owes to his own glory, the dignity of his crown, and the defence of his people, if he deferred any longer the demanding of a ſignal reparation for the outrage done to the French flag, and the damage done to the king's ſubjects.

" His majeſty therefore thinks proper to apply directly to his Britannic majeſty, and to demand from him immediate and full reſtitution of all the French ſhips, as well men of war as merchant men, which, contrary to all law and all decorum, have been taken by the Engliſh navy, and of all the officers, ſoldiers, mariners, guns, ſtores, merchandizes, and in general of every thing belonging to theſe veſſels.

" The king will always chuſe to owe to the king of England's equity, rather than to any thing elſe, that ſatisfaction which he hath a right to demand; and all the powers in Europe will undoubtedly ſee in this ſtep which he hath determined to take, a new and ſtriking proof of that invariable love of peace which directs all his counſels and reſolutions.

" If his Britannic majeſty orders reſtitution of the veſſels in queſtion, the king will be diſpoſed to enter into a negociation for that farther ſatisfaction which is legally due to him, and will continue deſirous, as he hath always been, to have the diſcuſſions relating to America, determined by an equitable and ſolid accommodation.

" But if, contrary to all hopes, the king of England refuſe what the king demands, his majeſty will regard this denial of juſtice as the moſt authentic declaration of war, and as a formed deſign in the court of London to diſturb the peace of Europe."

Verſailles, Dec. 21, 1755.

The haughty terms in which this memorial was conceived, and the apparent incongruity of this correſpondence between two nations ſo far engaged in hoſtilities as Great Britain and France were at this time, would not permit his Britannic majeſty to anſwer this memorial otherwiſe than by his ſecretary of ſtate. Mr. Fox therefore, by the royal command, ſent to Mr. Rouillé the following anſwer, dated at Whitehall, January 13, 1756.

" SIR,

" I received on the third inſtant the letter, dated the twenty-firſt paſt, with which your Excellency honoured me, together with the memorial ſubjoined to it. I immediately laid them before the king my maſter; and by his command have the honour to inform your Excellency, that his majeſty continues deſirous of preſerving the public tranquillity: but though the king will conſent to an equitable and ſolid accommodation, his majeſty cannot grant the demand that is made of immediate and full reſtitution of all the French veſſels, and whatever belongs to them, as the preliminary condition of any negociation; his majeſty having taken no ſtep but what the hoſtilities begun by France, in a time of profound peace (of which he has the moſt authentic proofs) and what his majeſty owes to his own honour, to the defence of the rights and poſſeſſions of his crown, and the ſecurity of his kingdoms, rendered juſt and indiſpenſible.

" I have the honour to be, &c."

At the ſame time, a refutation was drawn up of the charges brought in the French memorial againſt the Engliſh nation, and was tranſmitted to the Britiſh ambaſſador at each of the ſeveral courts of Europe, in order to be publiſhed for the ſatisfaction of the world, but is too long to be inſerted here.

However, in conſequence of theſe memorials and Mr. Fox's anſwer, the French king's orders were publiſhed at Dunkirk, for all Britiſh ſubjects to leave his dominions before the firſt of March, except ſuch as might obtain his permiſſion to remain. Another edict was publiſhed at the ſame time, inviting the French ſubjects to fit out privateers, offering a premium of forty livres (about thirty-ſix ſhillings Engliſh) for every gun, and as much for every man they ſhould take from the enemy; and promiſing, that in caſe a peace ſhould be ſpeedily concluded, the king would purchaſe all the ſaid privateers at prime coſt. Purſuant to the above orders, the Engliſh veſſels in the ſeveral ports of France were ſeized, and their crews ſent to priſon.

The fortifications at Dunkirk had already begun to be repaired, and a great number of artificers and ſeamen were employed in equipping a formidable ſquadron at Breſt; and a ſtrong body of forces were collected, as well as a conſiderable number of tranſports, in order to infuſe into the people of this kingdom a belief of an intended invaſion. It has been too much the foible of this nation to be terrified with every motion our neighbours the French make on the coaſt of the Channel. They took us therefore on our weak ſide: nor did they forget on this occaſion to play off their old ſcarecrow the pretender againſt us; for in an article from Paris in the public papers of the beginning of September, we were told that the chevalier de St. George's eldeſt ſon had been two months in that city; that he had ſeen the king and the miniſtry, and had offered to hazard his perſon again to ſecond the reſentments of that court. It was added, that an embarkation was talked of for Scotland. This and a thouſand other vague reports of the like nature, were the pure effects of French policy, to confound our intelligence, and keep us upon a wrong ſcent till they ſhould be ready to ſtrike the grand blow they really meditated, the reduction of Minorca; of which more in its place.

Our miniſtry, however, appear to have been ſo prepoſſeſſed with the belief that the French intended an invaſion of theſe kingdoms, that when the parliament reaſſembled after Chriſtmas receſs, lord Barrington, as ſecretary at war, on the twenty-ſecond day of January 1756, laid before the houſe an eſtimate for defraying the charge of ten new regiments of foot, over and above the thirty-four thouſand two hundred and ſixty-three land ſoldiers already ordered to be raiſed; and the ſum of ninety-one thouſand nine hundred and nineteen pounds ten ſhillings was voted for this purpoſe: and upon another eſtimate preſented by the ſame noble lord, and founded on the ſame ſuppoſed neceſſity of augmenting the army, the farther ſum of forty-nine thouſand ſix hundred and twenty-eight pounds was voted for defraying the charges of eleven troops of light dragoons, and eighty-one thouſand one hundred and ſeventy-eight pounds were voted for the charge of a regiment of foot to be raiſed in America for the year 1756, two hundred and ninety-eight thouſand five hundred and thirty pounds for the maintenance of our forces already eſtabliſhed in our American colonies, and ſeventy-nine thouſand nine hundred and fifteen pounds for ſix regiments of foot from Ireland, to ſerve in North America and the Eaſt Indies. In a word, including ſeveral other ſums, as well for defraying the expence of the army and navy as for other purpoſes, the whole of the ſupplies granted by parliament in this ſeſſion amounted to ſeven millions two hundred twenty-nine thouſand one hundred and ſeventeen pounds four ſhillings and ſix-pence. For raiſing this ſum, beſides the malt-tax and the land-tax at four ſhillings, the whole produce of the ſinking fund, from the fifth of January 1756, until it ſhould amount to one million five hundred fifty-five thouſand nine hundred fifty-five pounds eleven ſhillings, was ordered to be applied, together with a million to be raiſed by loans on Exchequer bills at three per cent. one million five hundred thouſand pounds to be raiſed by the ſale of redeemable annuities at three and a half per cent. and five hundred thouſand by a lottery at three per cent.

Sundry very good laws were enacted this ſeſſion for the better ſupporting ourſelves againſt the deſigns of the enemy, and for the encouragement and regulation of Britiſh commerce and navigation in general; ſuch as, an act "to enable foreigners to ſerve as military officers in America;" an act "for ſupplying mariners on board of ſhips of war and merchantmen;" an act "for granting bounties on Britiſh and Iriſh linen exported;" an act "for the encouragement of fiſheries in Scotland;" an act "for ſecuring and encouraging the trade of his majeſty's ſugar colonies in America;" an act "for regulating workmens wages employed in the woollen manufacture;" and an act "for the encouragement of ſeamen, and the more ſpeedy manning the royal navy."

While the parliament of Great Britain was thus proceeding with the public buſineſs, the whole ſyſtem of affairs in Europe took a new and ſudden turn. His Pruſſian majeſty having got intelligence that a ſecret negociation was carrying on between the courts of Peterſburg, Vienna, and Verſailles, which had for its object the partition of a part of his dominions; and fearful that if the Ruſſians, taken by the late treaty into the pay of Great Britain, ſhould get footing in Germany, he muſt be reduced to a very precarious ſituation; he therefore emitted a public declaration by his miniſters in all the courts of Europe, "That he would oppoſe with his utmoſt force the entrance of any foreign troops into the empire, under any pretence whatſoever."

This ſpirited declaration of his Pruſſian majeſty, and the favourable reception which that prince had given the duke de Nivernois, who had been lately ſent from France to Berlin to propoſe a new alliance between the two courts, gave his Britannic majeſty the moſt uneaſy apprehenſions for his electoral dominions, in caſe ſuch an alliance ſhould take place: and as nothing but neceſſity had induced the king to apply for Ruſſian auxiliaries, he thought it moſt adviſable to fall in with the views of his nephew, eſpecially as they had now but one common intereſt, the preventing of foreign troops being introduced into Germany.

Advances were accordingly made on the part of our court to the king of Pruſſia, with ſuch advantageous propoſals as made him entirely relinquiſh all thoughts of a further negociation with the Grand Monarch; and a convention was concluded in the month of January between their Britannic and Pruſſian majeſties, importing, "That having maturely conſidered, that the differences which had lately ariſen in America might eaſily extend much farther, and even reach Europe; having, moreover, always the welfare and ſafety of Germany, their common country, much at heart; and being extremely deſirous to maintain its peace and tranquillity, they had, as the moſt effectual means of obtaining this ſalutary end, agreed upon a convention of neutrality, by which they reciprocally bound themſelves not to ſuffer foreign troops, of any nation whatſoever, to enter into Germany or paſs through it during the troubles aforeſaid, and the conſequences that might reſult from them; but to oppoſe the ſame with their utmoſt might, in order to ſecure Germany from the calamities of war, defend her fundamental laws and conſtitutions, and preſerve her peace uninterrupted."

The belief of an intended French invaſion began now to prevail more and more. It was currently rently reported from the Hague that the troops, to the amount of one hundred and forty battalions, were to be tranſported in flat-bottomed boats: that M. de Belleiſle was to command the expedition, who was already, with the prince de Soubiſe, making their circuit along the French coaſt: that eighty thouſand men were marching to Dunkirk; and that a large fleet of men of war were actually in Breſt road, ready to put to ſea, under the command of M. du Perrier. About the ſame time advices were received, that great preparations had been making at Toulon for ſome months for the execution of an important expedition, calculated to deprive the Britiſh marine of its preſent opportunities of carrying on hoſtilities againſt the French in the Mediterranean. This enterprize was ſaid to be a deſcent upon the iſland of Minorca, to be made with twenty-five thouſand men, a great train of artillery, and ſupported by a fleet of eight ſail of capital ſhips; and that the whole would be ready to put to ſea by the beginning of April at fartheſt. The ſame advice was confirmed by ſir Benjamin Keene, our ambaſſador at the court of Madrid, by ſundry well-authenticated letters from the Hague, and at laſt from the governor of Minorca, general Blakeney, himſelf, who, in a letter to Mr. Fox, dated February 7, and received March 6, 1756, expreſſes himſelf thus: "I cannot be too early in acquainting you, ſir, that by different informations from France and Spain, there is great reaſon to believe the French intend very ſhortly to make an attack upon this iſland. In conſequence, I have called a council of war; and we were unanimouſly of opinion, that conſidering who theſe informations came from, and the reports every-where about, which ſeemed to tally with them, this iſland ought with the greateſt ſpeed to be put in the beſt ſtate of defence it can."

All theſe informations, however, were totally diſregarded by our miniſtry, who ſtill affected to interpret all the motions of the French, in every part of their kingdom, to be deſtined either againſt the Britiſh iſles, our plantations in America, or againſt Hanover; and they prevailed on his majeſty to ſend a meſſage to the houſe of lords on the twenty-third of March, ſignifying, "That he had received repeated advices from different places and perſons, that a deſign had been formed by the French court to make an hoſtile invaſion upon Great Britain or Ireland; and that the great preparations of land forces, ſhips, artillery, and warlike ſtores, then notoriouſly making in the ports of France oppoſite to the Britiſh coaſts, left little room to doubt of the reality of ſuch a deſign: that he had not only augmented his forces by ſea and land to put his kingdom in a poſture of defence; but that he had alſo, in order farther to ſtrengthen himſelf, ordered tranſports to bring over hither a body of Heſſian troops; and doubted not that he ſhould be ſupported by his parliament in all ſuch further meaſures as ſhould be conducive to an end ſo eſſential to the honour of the crown, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of theſe kingdoms."

It muſt, I am perſuaded, give the reader ſome ſurprize, not to find the leaſt notice taken in this meſſage of the advices concerning the hoſtile preparations in the ſouth of France for invading Minorca, or of any meaſures taken or intended by the miniſtry for its defence. This meſſage was indeed pretty ſeverely animadverted upon by ſeveral members of both houſes, who violently oppoſed the bringing ſuch a diſgrace upon this nation as the tranſporting hither a body of foreign mercenaries to defend her and fight her battles. However, the miniſterial influence prevailed; and both houſes preſented their addreſſes, expreſſing their indignation at ſo daring an attempt as the invaſion of theſe kingdoms; and aſſuring his majeſty that they would with unſhaken zeal, vigour, and unanimity, ſtand by him againſt all his enemies, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes.

The miniſtry did not ſtop here; for in a very few days after Mr. Fox made a motion in the lower houſe, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, beſeeching him, that for the more effectual defence of this iſland againſt the threatened attack by a foreign enemy, he would be graciouſly pleaſed to order twelve battalions of his electoral troops, together with the uſual detachment of artillery, to be immediately brought into this kingdom. This motion was agreed to by the majority, the addreſs preſented, his majeſty's compliance obtained, and ſuch expedition was uſed, that in the courſe of the next month both Hanoverians and Heſſians arrived in England, and were diſtributed in camps in different parts of the kingdom. Unſpeakable, however, was the indignation which the greater part of the nation expreſſed againſt the miniſtry, who, by neglecting the eſtabliſhment of a regular militia (for which a bill had been prepared and offered by the honourable Charles Townſhend in the courſe of this ſeſſion, but rejected) had reduced Great Britain to ſo low an ebb of diſtreſs, as to oblige her to have recourſe for ſafety and protection to the aſſiſtance of foreign auxiliaries. The rabble, who are ever in extremes, were inflamed to ſuch a degree of animoſity againſt theſe foreigners, that nothing could have reſtrained them from violent acts of outrage but the exemplary modeſt and inoffenſive conduct by which the Germans, as well private men as officers, diſtinguiſhed themſelves.

While theſe meaſures were purſuing to guard againſt the impending danger, colonel Yorke, our ambaſſador in Holland, had orders to demand of the States-general the ſix thouſand troops which, by treaty, they were obliged to furniſh to England, when attacked or threatened by any of her enemies. Accordingly, on the thirteenth of February, he delivered a memorial for that purpoſe, but too long to have a place here. M. d'Affry, the French ambaſſador, preſented to their High Mightineſſes a counter-memorial, in which he inſiſted, that the Engliſh had no right to claim the aſſiſtance of their allies, as they were inconteſtably the aggreſſors; and deſired their High Mightineſſes would explain themſelves categorically on the part they intended to take in the preſent diſpute. The States-general, in anſwer to this demand, obſerved, that conſidering their ſituation, the bad ſtate of their finances, and the decay of their commerce, nothing could be more agreeable to them than a neutrality, which they were determined to preſerve until obliged to depart from it by good faith, and the religion of inviolable engagements they lay under by treaties to ſeveral powers. This anſwer was by no means ſatisfactory to the court of Verſailles; and therefore M. d'Affry was ordered to deſire their High Mightineſſes to explain themſelves with greater preciſion, intimating, that although his moſt Chriſtian majeſty deſired not to multiply the calamities of war, yet he could no longer reckon among the number of his friends thoſe powers who, far from fulfilling the defenſive engagements they have contracted with him, would make a common cauſe with, and furniſh ſuccours to, his enemies.

Mean while, the Engliſh tranſports arrived in the Maeſe, and Mr. Yorke continued to inſiſt on the embarkation of the ſix thouſand men demanded. The States upon this were prodigiouſly embarraſſed. They ſaw themſelves reduced to this unavoidable dilemma: if the republic granted the ſuccours demanded, ſhe would thereby declare France the aggreſſor; if ſhe refuſed them, then the French would gain their point, and the court of England be diſobliged, which might prove of as bad conſequence on the other ſide, with regard to their commerce. While their High Mightineſſes were in this perplexity, his Britannic majeſty foreſeeing that, ſhould they comply with his demands, they would expoſe themſelves to the reſentment of the French king, which they were in no condition to oppoſe; and probably willing, at the ſame time, to obviate the affront of a refuſal, generouſly releaſed them from their obligation, and conſented to their neutrality.

By this time the Britiſh court were convinced, that the French ſquadron which had been ſo long preparing at Toulon, was deſigned for the reduction of Minorca: upon certain intelligence of which, they ſeemed to rouſe as from a deep lethargy. Hitherto, by a moſt ſhameful neglect, they had been ſo far from ſupplying that important garriſon with a proper reinforcement, that they had not even ſent thither the officers belonging to it, who, to a conſiderable number, were in England upon leave of abſence; nor were any directions given for the tranſporting of them until the French armament was ready to make a deſcent upon the iſland. And now, like perſons ſuddenly awakened from a ſound ſleep, they did every thing with hurry, precipitation, and confuſion. The notion of an invaſion had taken ſuch deep hold of their minds, that even at this critical juncture, when it ſo much behoved us to ſend a ſquadron which in all reſpects ſhould be ſuperior to the French fleet in the Mediterranean, they declared they could ſpare only ten ſhips; and even theſe were but in a very indifferent condition, and unprovided with either hoſpital or ſtore-ſhips. They alleged afterwards, indeed, in their excuſe, that they had been informed that the French would not be able to equip at Toulon above ſix or eight ſhips of the line, otherwiſe they ſhould have made the ſquadron ſtronger.

The command of this important ſervice was given to admiral George Byng. He was ſon of ſir George Byng, afterwards viſcount Torrington, one of the beſt ſeamen England ever produced; and the admiral himſelf had long experience in the navy. His abilities were unqueſtionable, and he had riſen to the rank he then held without any reproach. Mr. Weſt, a gentleman univerſally reſpected for his knowlege, ability, and reſolution, and lately made an admiral, was ſent with him as ſecond in command. The orders Mr. Byng received, previous to his ſailing, ſufficiently diſcover how ignorant our miniſtry were of the force or deſtination of the Toulon ſquadron: for the admiral was therein directed, among other things, to endeavour to learn, on his arrival at Gibraltar, whether any French ſquadron had paſſed through the Streights; and that, being certified in the affirmative, as it was probably intended for North America, he ſhould immediately detach rear-admiral Weſt to Louiſbourg or the iſland of Cape Breton, with ſuch a number of ſhips as, when reinforced by thoſe at Halifax, might conſtitute a force ſuperior to that of the enemy.

On the ſeventh day of April the two admirals ſailed from Spithead for the Mediterranean with the ten following ſhips; the Ramillies (admiral Byng's own ſhip) of ninety guns; the Buckingham (on board of which Mr. Weſt had his flag) of ſeventy; the Culloden, of ſeventy-four; the Trident, Captain, Lancaſter, Revenge, Intrepid, Defiance, and Kingſton, from ſixty to ſixty-ſix guns each, having on board a regiment of ſoldiers to be landed at Gibraltar, with major-general Stuart, the lord Effingham, and colonel Cornwallis, whoſe regiments were in garriſon at Minorca, about forty inferior officers, and near one hundred recruits, as a reinforcement to St. Philip's fortreſs. Admiral Byng, after a tedious voyage, occaſioned by calms and contrary winds, did not arrive at Gibraltar till the ſecond of May. There he found captain Edgcumbe, with the Princeſs Louiſa, a ſixty gun ſhip, and a ſloop; and from his account ſoon perceived that things wore a very different aſpect from that which had been given them in England: for Mr. Edgcumbe, who had, by a fortunate neglect of the French, eſcaped out of the harbour of Mahon with three ſhips while they were landing on the other ſide, informed the admiral, that inſtead of ſix or eight ſhips of the line, which it was pretended were the moſt the enemy could ſend to ſea from Toulon, their ſquadron from that port really conſiſted of 12 ſhips, from ſixty-four to eighty-four guns; four frigates, from twenty-four to twenty-ſix; beſides ſloops, and five bomb-veſſels, under the command of M. de la Galiſſoniere, with a great number of tranſports, carrying a body of fifteen thouſand land forces, which had ſailed from Toulon the tenth day of April, juſt three days after Mr. Byng ſailed from St. Helen's; and that his armament had already got poſſeſſion of all Minorca, except St. Philip's caſtle. The difference in the real ſtate, as well as the aſpect of things, will in ſome meaſure account for part of that conduct for which admiral Byng was ſeverely treated afterwards.

But before I proceed to relate the particulars of this unhappy expedition, I ſhall juſt take notice, that on the twenty-ſeventh of May his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament in England with a ſpeech, in which he thanked his parliament for the vigorous and effectual ſupport they had given him; and acquainted them, that the injuries and hoſtilities which had been for ſome time committed by the French againſt his dominions and ſubjects, were then followed by the actual invaſion of Minorca, though guarantied to him by all the great powers of Europe, and particularly by the French king: that he therefore found himſelf obliged, in vindication of the honour of his crown, and of the rights of his people, to declare war in form againſt France: that he relied on the Divine Protection, and the vigorous aſſiſtance of his faithful ſubjects, in ſo juſt a cauſe.

Admiral Byng having, on his arrival at Gibraltar, received the above information of the enemy's operations and ſtrength on the iſland of Minorca and its coaſt, ſo very different from what he had been made to expect, iſſued orders, on the very day of his arrival, for all the ſhips of his ſquadron to complete their proviſions and water with the utmoſt expedition. On the third the admiral went on ſhore, to communicate to the governor of Gibraltar his orders relative to a battalion of troops to be ſent on board his fleet from the garriſon, in order to reinforce the caſtle of St. Philip's. Major-general Fowke, the governor of Gibraltar, had alſo received inſtructions upon this head from the ſecretary at war, in three different letters: but either from ſome obſcurity in thoſe orders, or imagining that by ſending away ſuch a detachment he ſhould too much weaken his own garriſon, he did not think proper to part with any of his troops to the admiral, who thereupon ſailed without them on the eighth of May, with thirteen ſhips of the line and three frigates, including commodore Edgcumbe's ſmall ſquadron that he had found at Gibraltar, and ſome cruizers that joined him while there.

It has been already intimated, that the French fleet ſailed from Toulon on the tenth of April with twelve ſail of ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and other armed veſſels and tranſports, carrying fifteen thouſand men, under the orders of the marſhal duke de Richelieu, who was to command in chief by land on this expedition, while the count de la Galiſſoniere with his fleet was to prevent any ſuccours being thrown into the fort from ſeaward, and to give battle to the fleet ſent from England for its relief. On the eighteenth of April this armament arrived before Ciudadella, a caſtle ſituate in a port at the weſt end of the iſland of Minorca, about thirty miles from Port Mahon, where the troops were landed without the leaſt oppoſition from the Engliſh, who had evacuated that place on the firſt appearance of the enemy, as altogether untenable againſt ſuch a force.

Major-general Blakeney, governor of Minorca, on certain notice of the approach of the French fleet, took every precaution neceſſary for the defence of Port Mahon and Fort St. Philip; and as he had but about two thouſand five hundred regular troops, he judged it better to collect them all into one body, than to let them be diſperſed in ſmall corps to garriſon the leſſer forts on the iſland, which he well knew muſt all ſubmit one after another to the ſuperior force of the enemy. He therefore withdrew them all, and ordered that they ſhould ſpoil the roads, fell trees, and lay every obſtruction in the way by which the French muſt paſs on their march to Mahon, in order to render their acceſs as difficult as poſſible thereto. At the ſame time, he directed all the cattle upon the iſland to be driven within the walls of Fort St. Philip; and his orders were ſo punctually executed, that after Richelieu had landed his troops and all his cannon, he found the road, which lay the whole length of the iſland (and no other practicable) ſo totally ruined, that it was impoſſible to draw them along. Beſides, he was quite unprovided with beaſts of draught, having brought none with him, and thoſe upon the iſland being all ſecured. Under this diſappointment, he was neceſſitated to reimbark his heavy artillery, and ſend it by ſea to Cape Mola, at the entrance of the harbour of Mahon, the place where he intended to erect his batteries.

On the arrival of the French in the iſland, the governor ſent a trumpet with a letter to marſhal Richelieu, to demand the reaſon of this hoſtile invaſion, as there was no declaration of war between the two crowns? To which he received for anſwer, that the French modelled their behaviour by that of the Engliſh, who had taught them a new way of making war without a declaration, by taking two of the king's ſhips in America the preceding year, and ſtill continuing to make prizes of ſeveral of the French merchant ſhips, ſailing in ſecurity upon the ocean under the faith of treaties.

The French marſhal met with ſo many obſtacles in forming the ſiege of Fort St. Philip, that he could not open the trenches before the night between the tenth and eleventh of May, which was upwards of three weeks from his landing. The reaſon of this ſlow progreſs appears to have ariſen from the vanity of the French miniſtry, or that of their general, who had neglected to provide ſuch a number of engineers as the ſervice afterwards required, imagining that the bare ſight of the French army would ſtrike terror into the handful of men immured with their governor in Fort St. Philip. The marſhal had erected his batteries firſt at Cape Mola, at ſuch a diſtance on the other ſide of the harbour, that they could do no execution. He was therefore neceſſitated to change his plan of attack, and to make his approaches on the ſide of St. Philip's-town. Having planted his new batteries, and inveſted the place, Richelieu ſent his compliments to general Blakeney, offering him his own terms if he would capitulate. The brave general returned his compliments, and ſaid, it would be time enough to talk of that when they ſhould be near enough to ſhake hands together; and immediately ordered his ſtandard to be fixed on the moſt conſpicuous part of the caſtle, and to be nailed as faſt as poſſible, declaring it ſhould not be taken down while he and five men remained alive. But we muſt ſuſpend for the preſent our account of the farther progreſs of this memorable ſiege, till we have related the ſucceſs of admiral Byng's expedition for its relief.

Mr. Byng, before he left Gibraltar, tranſmitted to the lords of the admiralty an account of the ſituation in which he had found affairs in the Mediterranean; and in his letter made uſe of ſome impolitic expreſſions, which were afterwards exaggerated, and conſtrued to his ruin. This letter conſiſted of two parts; the former contained a poſitive impeachment of the miniſtry, for their not ſending a fleet to the aſſiſtance of Minorca ſooner; for (as he expreſſes himſelf) had he arrived at that iſland before the French had landed, he ſhould in all probability have been able to have prevented their getting footing there. He complains of having been ſent out from England not fully provided; and that when he arrived at Gibraltar, the place was wholly unprovided with magazines for ſupplying the neceſſities of his fleet: that the careening wharfs and ſtorehouſes had been ſuffered to run to decay and ruin, although this was the only place for the king's ſhips to careen at, and to be ſupplied with neceſſaries, when Mahon was inveſted. The latter part does as good as tell them, that they had ſent him upon an impracticable ſervice; and that if it miſcarried, as in all probability it would, it muſt be laid to their charge, who had not ſent a land force ſufficient to raiſe the ſiege, as well as a fleet that was inferior to the enemy's.

Few miniſters can bear to be ſchooled by their officers, whom they have in general been accuſtomed to conſider as mere tools of the ſtate, to do its buſineſs without preſuming to judge of the propriety or impropriety of the ſervice they may be ordered upon, or the counſels that have planned it. It muſt be ſuppoſed then, that Mr. Byng's letter to the admiralty was by no means pleaſing to thoſe at the helm. It was ſome time before they could rightly determine what they ſhould do with it; ſuppreſs it altogether they could not; and the publiſhing it, they feared, would ſet their conduct in a very arraignable light. However, as they ſaw that Minorca muſt fall, they endeavoured to ſhift the blame upon Byng alone, for which purpoſe he himſelf had furniſhed ample matter in his letter, where he very impoliticly declared, that he thought the ſucceſs of his expedition very doubtful. This was interpreted, and induſtriouſly propagated, as a certain prognoſtic that Mr. Byng had no deſire to fight or hazard any thing to relieve Fort St. Philip. As the populace are ever ready to embrace the invidious ſide of a report, this conſtruction was univerſally adopted; and the nation was leſs ſurpriſed than incenſed when the news arrived of Mr. Byng's ill ſucceſs. But to reſume his hiſtory.

The wind continuing eaſterly after the Engliſh fleet left Gibraltar, it did not arrive on the coaſt of Minorca till the nineteenth of May, at break of day, when the admiral, about five in the morning, diſpatched captain Hervey in the Phœnix, with two other frigates, a-head of his fleet, to take as cloſe a view as poſſible of the harbour's mouth, and to obſerve in what place it was practicable to throw any ſuccours into the caſtle. Captain Hervey was alſo charged with a letter to general Blakeney, acquainting him that the fleet was arrived to his aſſiſtance; and deſiring to know, by the return of the officer, what place the general would think proper to have the officers and recruits landed at; as alſo, in what other manner he could be of moſt effectual ſervice to the garriſon. Captain Hervey had not been diſpatched above four hours, and there being only light breezes of wind, was not yet out of ſight, when the French ſquadron appearing in the ſouth-eaſt quarter, the admiral thought it adviſeable to call in the Phœnix and the other frigates, and then bore away for the enemy, and made the general ſignal to chace. For want of ſufficient wind, however, the line of battle could not be formed ſo properly as otherwiſe it might have been. About ſix in the evening the enemy, to the number of ſeventeen ſhips, thirteen of which appeared to be very large, advanced in order, but tacked at ſeven, in order to gain the weather-gage. Mr. Byng, in order to preſerve that advantage, as well as to make ſure of the land-wind, in the morning tacked alſo, being then about four leagues off Cape Mola.

The twentieth in the morning, the weather proving hazy, the enemy's fleet was not to be ſeen at day-break; but about noon it came in ſight, and each ſide prepared for action. The line of battle being formed on both ſides, and our fleet being ranged oppoſite to that of the French, the admiral made the ſignal for engaging: upon which the van under rear-admiral Weſt bore down; and cloſing upon the enemy, attacked them with ſuch fury, that the five headmoſt ſhips of the enemy which were oppoſed to him broke their line, and ran away to leeward, out of gun-ſhot. Had the van been properly ſeconded, there ſeems the greateſt probability that the Britiſh fleet would have gained a complete victory, and Minorca would have been relieved: but the reverſe happened; and the conduct of Mr. Byng on this occaſion, though perhaps not ſo very bad as his enemies endeavoured to repreſent it, was ſtill very exceptionable, and ſuch as furniſhed matter for his ſubſequent ruin; for though he had under him a fine ninety gun ſhip, through a too rigid obſervance of diſcipline, or elſe through timidity, he forbore to bear down with his diviſion to the ſupport of the van; and the enemy's center keeping their ſtation, rear-admiral Weſt could not improve his advantage, without expoſing himſelf to the danger of ſeeing his communication with the reſt of the line entirely cut off. In the beginning of the action the Intrepid, in Mr. Byng's diviſion, ſuffered ſo much in her rigging and hull that ſhe could not be managed, and drove on the ſhip that was next in poſition: upon which the admiral made the ſignal for his diviſion to throw all a-back, in order to avoid confuſion; by which the rear was ſtill farther ſeparated from the van, and retarded from cloſing with and engaging the enemy. Mr. Byng alſo, when preſſed by the captain of his own ſhip to bear down, declared that he would not act but with his line entire; and was never properly engaged, though he received ſome few ſhots in his hull. This heſitation of his, though proceeding from a care of his majeſty's ſhips, and, as he declared, to avoid the error Matthews had fallen into in the Mediterranean fight, by breaking the line of battle, and expoſing his own and other ſhips of his fleet to a fire they could not ſuſtain, was certainly ill timed, and gave the French admiral, who was very deſirous to put an end to the engagement, an opportunity to edge away with an eaſy ſail to join his van, which had been defeated, and made the beſt of its way off; and though, towards the end of the action, when the French were manifeſtly flying, the admiral bore down with his diviſion, yet the French ſhips, which were quite clean, were ſoon out of reach of ours, which were very foul, and altogether unfit for the purſuit of ſo nimble an enemy.

The Engliſh fleet continued four days on the place of battle, to repair their damaged ſhips and make them fit for action, in caſe the French ſhould think proper to renew their attack: but no enemy appearing, a council of war was held to conſult on the meaſures moſt proper to be purſued, when it was unanimouſly reſolved, that as they had not land forces on board ſufficient for the relief of Fort St. Philip; and as the French fleet might poſſibly be ſailed to Gibraltar to attack that important fortreſs, it was more expedient to return thither to prevent the execution of ſuch a deſign, than to ſtay where they were ſure it was out of their power to aſſiſt the garriſon at Minorca. This reſolution was likewiſe taken in an unfortunate hour; for if they had remained on their ſtation but one day longer, they might have intercepted a large convoy of proviſions and heavy artillery which Richelieu had ſent for from France, and without which, in all probability, he would never have been able to reduce the place.

The admiral was about a month in his paſſage back to Gibraltar, where he found commodore Broderick, who had been ſent from England with five ſhips of the line to reinforce him; and it was intended, after having ſupplied the fleet with proper neceſſaries, to go and face the enemy once more: but before the admiral was ready for ſailing, the Antelope, a fifty gun ſhip, arrived in the bay, with ſir Edward Hawke, admiral Saunders, and ſeveral navy captains; alſo the earl of Panmure and lord Tyrawley. The two admirals had orders to ſuperſede, to put under arreſt, and to ſend home the admirals Byng and Weſt, and ſeveral other officers of the fleet; and lord Tyrawley had the like orders in regard to general Fowke, and thoſe land officers who had ſigned the council of war for returning with the fleet to Gibraltar. Admiral Hawke obeyed his orders, and on the ninth of July ſent the ſtate priſoners on board the Antelope, who brought them home to England, where we ſhall leave them to their deſtiny, and return to the ſiege of Fort St. Philip.

On the twelfth day of May, about eight at night, the enemy opened two bomb batteries, with which they began to play againſt the caſtle; and from this time to the fourteenth an inceſſant fire was kept up on both ſides from mortar and cannon, the French continuing to erect new batteries in every ſituation whence they could annoy the enemy. On the nineteenth of this month the garriſon were elated with joy at the ſight of the Britiſh ſquadron; and Mr. Boyd, commiſſary of the ſtores, ventured to paſs in a ſmall bark with ſix oars from St. Stephen's Cave, through a ſhower of cannon and muſket-balls, into the open ſea, in order, if poſſible, to get on board the ſquadron, to give Mr. Byng intelligence of affairs in the iſland; but was obliged to return, on being chaced by two of the enemy's tartans, and got ſafe back by the ſame route he had paſſed. Short-lived was the joy with which the ſight of our fleet had inſpired the brave, but unfortunate garriſon; for, to their inexpreſſible ſurpriſe and diſappointment, in two days after they beheld the French ſquadron return quietly to their ſtation off Cape Mola, and no Engliſh ſhips were to be ſeen. This, added to a general diſcharge or feu de joye in the French camp, perſuaded them that Mr Byng had been worſted, and obliged to retire, by the French fleet under La Galiſſoniere.

Diſcouraging as ſuch an event muſt have been to people under the circumſtances of the beſieged, it in no wiſe damped their courage and vigour, which rather increaſed with their labour and danger. By this time they were inveſted with an army of twenty thouſand men, and plied inceſſantly from ſixty-two battering cannon, twenty-one mortars, and four howitzers, beſides the ſmall arms which fired upon them continually from the windows of the houſes in the town of St. Philip. Nevertheleſs, the loſs of men within the fortreſs was very inconſiderable, the garriſon being moſtly ſecured in the ſubterranean works, which were impenetrable to ſhells or ſhot. From the ſeventh of June to the fourteenth the fire from the fort was weak; but on the fifteenth the beſieged made a greater fire on the enemy than ever they had done ſince the ſiege began, ſo that they were obliged to draw back. In ſhort, they managed their cannon and ammunition ſo judiciouſly, that they fired none till they were ſure, and ſeemed to let the French erect their batteries only to have the pleaſure of demoliſhing them. The French miners likewiſe deſiſted from their attempts of undermining the works, the difficulty of piercing the rock having at length ſubdued their patience, and fruſtrated their hopes of ſucceſs in this point. The garriſon, however, by this time were reduced to two thouſand five hundred men, while, on the contrary, the enemy's army, which had been conſtantly reinforced by troops, ammunition, &c. was ſtronger than at the beginning of the ſiege; and the duke de Richelieu, fearing that the prolongation of the ſiege ſo far beyond the time his court was taught to expect being maſters of Minorca, might give his enemies a handle to leſſen his abilities in his ſovereign's eſteem, thought he had nothing left but to puſh matters with the utmoſt vigour; and having, by dint of an unremitting fire, made a practicable breach in one of the ravelins, and demoliſhed moſt of the ſtrong forts and defences round the place, on the twenty-ſeventh day of June it was reſolved to try the effects of a general aſſault that very night. Every thing being diſpoſed for this purpoſe, the artillery continued to batter the forts till ten o'clock in the evening, when ceaſing all on a ſudden, one cannon-ſhot, and four bombs thrown into the caſtle, announced the ſignal for beginning the aſſault. The enemy advanced with great intrepidity, and their commander the duke de Richelieu is ſaid to have led them up to the works in perſon.

The beſieged behaved like heroes, diſputing the ground inch by inch. The aſſailants were mowed down as they approached with grape-ſhot and muſquetry, and ſeveral mines were ſprung with great effect, ſo that the glacis was almoſt covered with the dead and wounded. The French nevertheleſs perſevered in the attack with uncommon reſolution; and though repulſed on every other ſide, at length made a lodgment on the Queen's Redoubt, which had been greatly damaged by their cannon. Anſtruther's Redoubt was alſo taken by aſſault, and the Argyll Redoubt by eſcalade. Lieutenant colonel Jefferies, the ſecond in command, and indeed the principal acting man in the fort, was ſuddenly ſurrounded and made priſoner, as he was hurrying with a hundred men to the relief of the redoubts. Major Cunningham alſo, who had particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf during the ſiege by his courage, ſkill, and activity, though he had the good fortune to preſerve his liberty, was ſo much wounded that he was not able to continue on duty.

Thus the governor was deprived of his two principal aſſiſtants, one being taken, and the other diſabled. However, the enemy might have been perhaps diſlodged from the poſts they had ſeized, had a vigorous effort been made for that purpoſe, before they had leiſure to ſecure themſelves; but Richelieu, like a true Frenchman, had recourſe to ſtratagem to effect what he could not accompliſh by force, and ordered a parley to be beat, in order to obtain permiſſion to bury the dead and relieve the wounded, which lay in heaps about the place of action. This was impoliticly granted; and the uſe the enemy made of this humane indulgence was to

to ſecure the lodgments they had made, by introducing into them a conſiderable number of troops, through a ſubterranean paſſage which had been opened by a ſhell, and not diſcovered by the beſieged till the day cleared up; and then it was too late to diſpute the poſſeſſion with the ſucceſsful enemy, who by this paſſage had now opened to them a communication with all the other ſubterranean places, and by them with all the out-works. Upon this diſcovery the governor, while the ceſſation of hoſtilities yet continued, ſummoned a council of war, who having duly conſidered the impracticability of maintaining a fortreſs of ſuch an extent by ſuch a thin garriſon, againſt ſuch numerous forces, in poſſeſſion of ſuch advantageous poſts, and the little proſpect there was of receiving any aſſiſtance from the Engliſh fleet; and the officers of the artillery all declaring that the works were in a ſhattered ruinous condition, and irrepairable in the preſent ſtate of the garriſon, the majority, upon all theſe conſiderations, declared for a capitulation, as the only means to preſerve the remains of ſo brave a garriſon, and the lives of a conſiderable number of his majeſty's ſubjects. This reſolution being taken, the chamade was beat; a conference enſued, and very honourable conditions were granted to the garriſon, in which a very high encomium was paid to the bravery of the governor; marſhal Richelieu declaring therein, that he had been induced, by the noble defence made by the governor and the garriſon, to grant them ſuch generous terms, which intitled them to march out with all the honours of war, and to be conveyed by ſea to Gibraltar. The articles of capitulation being ſigned, and the hoſtages given, the French were put in poſſeſſion of the gate, as well as two of the forts; but the garriſon remained in the other works till the ſeventh day of July, when they embarked.

Thus ended this famous ſiege, which will ever ſtand in the records of hiſtory as a perpetual monument of Britiſh bravery and Britiſh negligence: for, had the garriſon been properly reinforced in time, or had a ſufficiently powerful fleet been ſent out at firſt with Mr. Byng, there is great probability the French would never have been maſters of it.

Immediately after the execution of the articles of capitulation, M. de la Galiſſoniere ſailed back to Toulon, and in a lucky hour he made his retreat; for in a few days after the ſurrender of the fort, ſir Edward Hawke's fleet, amounting to twenty-three ſhips of the line, made its appearance off the iſland: but Galiſſoniere was gone, and the Britiſh admiral had the mortification to ſee the French colours flying upon St. Philip's caſtle. But although thus diſappointed in his hopes of encountering the enemy's fleet and relieving our own garriſon, he at leaſt aſſerted the empire of Great Britain in the Mediterranean, by annoying the commerce of the enemy, and blocking up their ſquadron in the harbour of Toulon. Having continued for ſome time on this ſervice, he returned with the homeward-bound fleet to Gibraltar, from whence, about the latter end of the year, he ſet ſail for England with part of his ſquadron, leaving the reſt to protect our trade in thoſe ſeas, which ſuffered greatly from the French privateers, which now began to ſwarm there. General Blakeney did not go to Gibraltar with the firſt diviſion of the garriſon, that he might have the more time to reſt himſelf after the incredible fatigue and anguiſh of mind he had undergone. He arrived in England in the month of November; and tho' it has been generally thought that his merit was, by the partiality of the times, over-rated, in the ſame proportion that the miſconduct of the unhappy Byng was exaggerated; yet his late majeſty, who doubtleſs was perfectly well informed of every part of the attack and defence of Fort St. Philip, looked upon his conduct in ſo favourable a light, that, among other diſtinguiſhed marks of his regard and favour, he was pleaſed to honour him with the dignity of a peer of Ireland, by the title of Lord Blakeney, of Mount Blakeney in the county of Limerick, of which place the general was a native.

I ſhall now proceed to a conciſe repreſentation of the operations and tranſactions of our arms in diſtant parts of the world; and firſt, of the ſtate of our affairs in America, which we broke off at the end of the year 1755.

The plantations, during the whole winter, were in the utmoſt diſorder. The ſavage Indians ranged uncontrouled among the unguarded planters on the exterior parts of the colonies, whom they plundered, murdered, ſcalped, and uſed with the moſt inhuman cruelties. The parties that were ſent out againſt them were often worſted, or fell into their ambuſhes. The cries and miſeries of thoſe who eſcaped were for ſome time ineffectual to procure them relief, although the governors of the ſeveral colonies were not inſenſible of the cruel uſage of the people, and endeavoured with all their power to apply a remedy. With this view they were, during the winter, very intent in making due preparations for a vigorous campaign in the ſummer; and yet we ſhall find the enemy was very little annoyed, or any memorable exploits or expeditions performed by our forces, though numerous enough; nor our back ſettlements much better ſecured than they were before, ſave that a few forts were built, and that the Delawar and Shawaneſe Indians were pacified, and prevailed upon to lay down the hatchet, with which they had done ſo much miſchief. General Shirley being recalled from his government of Virginia, his majeſty was pleaſed, early in the ſpring of this year, to appoint John earl of Loudon (a Scots peer) general and governor in chief of that colony, and general and commander in chief of all his forces in North America. We ſhall leave his lordſhip in his voyage thither, to take a view of affairs in Nova Scotia, where the enemy met with ſeveral rebuffs.

General Lawrence, who had been remarkably ſucceſsful in his attempts to humble the French, who had made prodigious encroachments on this infant colony, purſued his advantage, and ſet about extirpating the French neutrals and Indians there, who refuſed to conform to the laws of Great Britain, or to ſwear allegiance to king George, and had actually engaged to join, in the ſpring of this year, the French troops that were expected to arrive from Old France as early as poſſible, on that coaſt or at Louiſbourg. General Lawrence did not only purſue theſe dangerous inhabitants with fire and ſword, laying the country waſte, burning their dwellings, and driving off their ſtock; but he thought it expedient, for his majeſty's ſervice, to transport the French neutrals, so as entirely to extirpate a people that only waited an opportunity to join the enemy. He accordingly distributed about seven thousand of them among the British colonies; in which distribution too many were transported to those colonies where they might, with great ease, get to the French forts on the back of our provinces on the south of the bay of St. Lawrence.

It was in the most rigorous season of the year that these poor wretches were thus transported, without money or effects to help themselves; so that each government into which those neutrals were sent, found itself loaded with a very great expence for their maintenance. This occasioned some very warm altercations between the general and the aggrieved governments, who accused him of having acted in an arbitrary manner, by thus imposing upon them a charge they were so little able to defray. As one expedient to maintain them, therefore, it was proposed to sell them with their own consent; but when this was mentioned to them, they unanimously rejected it with the utmost indignation. They alleged, that they were prisoners, and expected to be maintained as such, and not forced to labour. They said, they had not violated their oath of fidelity which by the treaty of Utrecht they were obliged to take: that they were ready to renew that oath; but that an oath of obedience was required of them, which was a new thing, and by which, they apprehended, they should be obliged to bear arms against the French, which they thought they could not be compelled to do. Thus general Lawrence cleared the country of the French neutrals; and the Indians in their interest, who had been very troublesome, being most of them Roman catholics, retired to Canada for protection, which established peace in Nova Scotia for a time.

The departure of lord Loudon from England was attended with such delays, that before he reached the army in North America (which was in the latter end of July) the marquis de Montcalm, who had been appointed to succeed the baron de Dieskau in the command of the French forces in that country, had time to arrive at Canada from France with three thousand men, and to take the field before us, notwithstanding the navigation of the river St. Lawrence being shut up with ice till the month of May. To this delay was principally owing the capture of Oswego, the key of the Lake Ontario, which was the most disastrous event that could have befallen our American affairs at this juncture. General Abercrombie had been dispatched in the beginning of March this year from England with two regiments, and with orders to supersede general Shirley; but it was so long before he arrived in America, that notwithstanding the preparations which had been made by the provincials under Mr. Shirley to open the campaign early this year, in order to reduce the fort of Niagara, to cover the borders of New York, and to secure the navigation of the Lake Champlain, by the conquest of Ticonderoga and Crown Point, they were obliged to halt at Albany for the arrival of a commander in chief, and of the regular forces from England, till the latter end of June, when general Abercrombie arrived and took the command: but even then, though he approved of Mr. Shirley's plan, yet he thought the season too far advanced to promise success, in so extensive an operation, with what forces he had under his command. He therefore waited the arrival of lord Loudon; and by that determination this year was lost, and the French left to strengthen their posts, and to distress our settlements unmolested.

Nor did they fail to improve the opportunity; they formed a camp at Ticonderoga, where, and at Crown Point, they had three thousand troops, and were daily increasing their numbers; and as they were well apprised that the English army could not undertake any expedition till the arrival of lord Loudon, which they knew could not happen till too late in the season for us to attempt Crown Point, or take any measures to prevent their progress, M. Montcalm resolved upon the siege of Oswego.

Oswego is a town of the Iroquois or Five Nations, in Canada, situate on the west side of the Lake Ontario, or Frontenac, three hundred and twenty-one miles west of Albany. Hither the English use to resort, to purchase of the distant Indians their skins and furs. It was a place of the greatest importance to us, not only for intercepting the commerce of the enemy, but also for impeding their hostile movements; and was, moreover, the only place on which we could build vessels for the navigation upon that great lake or inland sea, to preserve our interest and correspondence with the Indians that had not declared against us. Yet, notwithstanding the consequence this place was of to us, and the great advantage the possession of it would give the enemy in all their future operations, it had been so shamefully neglected, that the French might have made themselves masters of it the preceding year, but for some reasons of policy which then with-held them.

No sooner, however, did general Abercrombie receive certain advice that the French had determined upon the siege of this place, and that a large body of them were occupied on the eastern shore of the Lake Ontario, than he ordered a regiment of regulars, under the command of major-general Webb, to march to its relief. In the interim, lord Loudon arrived at Albany on the twenty-third of July; and although he greatly approved of Mr. Abercrombie's orders, yet the people of New England, New York, and the adjacent provinces, who had assembled an army of seven thousand men in order to attack Crown Point, insisted so peremptorily and obstinately on the executing of that measure, previous to all other operations, that altho' they were at last prevailed with to consent to the march of general Webb, the altercation on this matter took up so much time, that it was the middle of August before the regiment could set out from Albany. This period of inactivity on our side gave the enemy such an unlooked-for opportunity to complete their plan, that by the time general Webb got to the Carrying-place, between the Mohawk's River and Wood's Creek, he had the mortification to receive certain advice of the French having made themselves masters of Oswego and of Fort Ontario on the fourteenth of August, in four days after opening the trenches before them; and had made the garrison, and three hundred workmen and sailors employed to defend the passes to these forts, prisoners of war, who were sent to Montreal. The taking of Oswego struck a damp upon all the Britiſh colonies, as that was the place of ſtrength they could depend upon to prevent the invaſions of the French and Indians into their territories.

Monſieur de Montcalm, after his ſucceſs at Oſwego, took the route to Crown Point, with a deſign of forcing his way through the New England army, under the command of general Winſlow at Fort William-Henry, in which ſickneſs had made great havock, in order to ſeize on Albany. He knew our forces were much divided, and that general Webb was on his way to Oſwego with his regiment. But lord Loudon, appriſed of the deſign of the foe, ordered the ſeveral poſts that way to be abandoned, and with all the regulars proceeded to ſupport the New England men. He alſo ordered up the recruits of the Royal American regiment, being upwards of fifteen hundred men, and received a reinforcement from New England, which increaſed his army to the number of about eleven thouſand; ſo that M. Montcalm could not reap all the advantages he promiſed himſelf from the reduction of Oſwego. Soon afterwards the army went into winter-quarters.

About the ſame time that Oſwego fell into the hands of the French, Fort Granville, on the Juncata river (one hundred and fifty miles weſt of Philadelphia) was taken by ſurprize by the French and Indians, in the abſence of the garriſon, which had marched out a day or two before on an expedition, having left but twenty-four men in it for its defence.

In the Eaſt Indies the Britiſh fleet under admiral Watſon was employed with ſucceſs this year, in an expedition againſt the famous pirate Tulgaee Angria, the ſcourge of thoſe ſeas, whoſe territories, from a neſt of pirates, was become a ſort of empire, ſubſiſting much in the ſame manner on that coaſt as the ſtates of Barbary, which ſprang from a like original, have made themſelves formidable to ſeveral of the European powers. His piracies, which had continued for a long time, he now carried to ſo audacious a length, that it became an intereſting concern to humble this common enemy. Accordingly admiral Watſon, with four capital ſhips of war, beſides bomb-ketches, and ſeven or eight of the Eaſt India company's ſhips, ſailed in the beginning of March from Bombay to attack Angria in his ſtrong fort of Geriah, who, ſtruck with terror at the appearance of ſuch a formidable fleet, ſo far beyond his apprehenſions, ſoon ſurrendered, and gave up his caſtle, with one hundred and thirty thouſand pounds of treaſure in it, as alſo all his fleet, which lay in the harbour, and with which he had for ſo many years reigned a terror to the maritime powers of Europe frequenting thoſe ſeas, as well as to his neighbouring ſtates on the Malabar coaſt.

Our ſucceſs on this coaſt, however, was greatly counter-balanced by our loſſes in other parts of the Eaſt Indies. The reader may remember, that we left the French commandants, at the cloſe of the laſt year, ſeeking for a pretence for rekindling the war on the coaſt of Coromandel. Accordingly, Monſieur de Buſſy having received a reinforcement of five hundred Europeans under Mr. Law, began the year (1756) by falling upon and making a conqueſt of Ingeram, Baudermalauka, and Vizigapatam factories, belonging to the Engliſh. This having been foreſeen, the greateſt part of the company's effects were ſhipped off from the two former places immediately upon the freſh alarm of hoſtilities; and Vizigapatam being in no condition to withſtand an army of ten thouſand men, Europeans and Indians, with thirty pieces of cannon, which M. de Buſſy brought againſt it, it ſurrendered by capitulation. By the capture of this place the French obtained entire poſſeſſion of the coaſt, from Ganjam to Maſſulipatam. Nor did this misfortune come alone; for this ſame year Calcutta, and all the ſubordinate ſettlements or factories of our Indian company in Bengal, were taken and deſtroyed by Surajah Dowla, a new nabob of that province, who had been ſpirited up by our enemies to extirpate the Engliſh factories within his dominions, under various ſlight pretences of being treated with diſreſpect by governor Drake, of a right to certain duties which were refuſed by the company, and of their having given protection to certain perſons who had fled from his tyranny.

About the end of May, 1756, this Surajah Dowla took the field with an army of thirty thouſand horſe, thirty thouſand foot, and between three and four hundred elephants. His firſt operation was againſt Caſſumbazar, a large town, ſituate in a very healthy and fruitful iſland of the Ganges, about one hundred miles above Huguely. He ſummoned the fort to ſurrender; but his demand not meeting with a compliance, and expecting a reſolute and powerful oppoſition, the cunning nabob had recourſe to ſtratagem to facilitate his intentions; and by propoſing a truce for an amicable determination of the ſubject of complaint, he inveigled Mr. Watts, the chief of the factory, to his tent, under pretence of a conference, with a ſafe-conduct, as alſo two other gentlemen of the council; and having got them in his power, he treated them with the utmoſt indignity, and hurried them away to Muxadabad, and threatened to put them to death if the factory did not inſtantly ſurrender. Theſe menaces had the deſired effect: the fort was put into his hands on the fourth of June, the people of which he treated extremely ill, ſending them alſo to Muxadabad, the capital of Bengal, to be confined in different priſons and dungeons.

Fluſhed with this ſucceſs, the haughty eaſtern prince determined to proceed immediately with all his force againſt our principal ſettlement of Calcutta; before which place he appeared on the ſeventeenth of June, having driven the advanced guards from the paſſes into the fort. Mr. Drake, the governor, who was a quaker, reſigned the buſineſs of fighting to Mr. Holwell his ſecond; and taking with him all the treaſure he could collect from the merchants, and the company's books, he retired with the ladies, and ſeveral other perſons, on board the ſhips which laid off in the Ganges. Mr. Holwell reſolutely kept within the place, which he declared he would defend to the laſt extremity, though the party that fled on board had carried one hundred ſoldiers from the garriſon with them. The attack of the enemy, however, was ſo briſk, and their numbers ſo infinitely ſuperior, that reſiſtance ſeemed a madneſs; and the ſecond day Mr. Holwell would gladly have made an honourable and ſafe retreat on board the ſhips; for for which purpoſe he intended to have demanded a capitulation: but the ſhips were now fallen ſeveral miles below the fort, and no boat was left in which the beſieged could attempt an eſcape. This the nabob knew, and therefore would not hearken to any terms for the ſurrender of the place, the gates of which were opened to him on the evening of the nineteenth, when the Moors ruſhing in, killed all whom they firſt met with, ſtripped the reſt naked, and, by their brutal ſovereign's order, crammed one hundred and forty-ſix into a dungeon, called the Black-hole, only eighteen feet ſquare, and with but two windows in it, where one hundred and twenty-three of them died before morning, being ſmothered by the exceſſive heat. Mr. Holwell was in the number of thoſe who ſurvived, and with his companions was ſent priſoner to Muxadabad, with circumſtances of ſuch inhuman treatment as would be too ſhocking to repeat. After ſome time, however, they were releaſed, as was likewiſe Mr. Watts, and the reſt of the gentlemen who had been carried by the tyrant from Caſſumbazar, who afterwards ſent pioneers to raze Calcutta to the ground; and wrote to the governor of Madraſs, that no Engliſh ſubject ſhould for the future preſume to ſettle within his territory of Bengal.

Let us hence return to take a ſurvey of the tranſactions in Europe.

The two nations of England and France had hitherto been committing hoſtilities upon one another without any formal declaration of war, the French fleet in America, and the Engliſh afterwards by way of repriſals in the open ſeas: but the Engliſh miniſtry finding many inconveniencies attending this method of proceeding, adviſed his majeſty to declare war, without any further delay, which was done accordingly on the eighteenth of May, in the uſual form. This was anſwered by a like declaration of the French court, dated at Verſailles, June 9; either of which would take up too much room to inſert here.

It was generally hoped that the war, thus kindled between France and England, would have been confined to the two nations at variance: but ambition knows no bounds. France no ſooner underſtood that a treaty was concluded between his Britannic majeſty and the king of Pruſſia, than ſhe ſtruck up an alliance with empreſs-queen of Hungary, under the name of a treaty of friendſhip and neutrality, by which the contracting parties reciprocally obliged themſelves to the guaranty of all their dominions in Europe, and to furniſh each other with eighteen thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe, or with a proportionable ſum of money, in caſe of any attack from any power whatever. To this treaty the neighbouring powers were invited to accede, with the moſt ſolemn aſſurances that the contracting parties had no other view than to preſerve the general tranquillity of Europe. But an alliance between the houſes of Bourbon and Auſtria was deemed ſo unnatural, and their intereſts ſo incompatible, that notwithſtanding theſe pacific declarations, it was eaſy to ſee that France could have no other view in it than to prevent the Pruſſian monarch from defeating any attempt that ſhe might be inclined to make againſt his Britannic majeſty's electoral dominions. As to the queen of Hungary, ſhe had long regretted the loſs of Sileſia, and only waited a convenient opportunity to diſpoſſeſs the king of Pruſſia of this province. For this purpoſe, as I have elſewhere obſerved, ſhe had entered into a ſecret treaty with the empreſs of Ruſſia ever ſince the concluſion of the peace in 1748, whereby the latter engaged to aſſiſt her Hungarian majeſty with one hundred thouſand men, whenever required; who for the ſame reaſon gladly laid hold of this opportunity, by ſtriking up an alliance with France, of increaſing her forces by ſuccours from that court, not doubting that, by ſuch powerful aſſiſtance, ſhe ſhould be enabled not only to recover Sileſia, but even to ſtrip the king of Pruſſia of part of his dominions. The king of Poland, elector of Saxony, is ſaid to have been likewiſe partly concerned in the ſame ſcheme, for which he ſeverely ſuffered in the ſequel.

His Pruſſian majeſty foreſaw the ſtorm that threatened him. It is even ſaid, that early in the ſpring of this year he received certain intelligence that the two imperial powers intended to unite their forces in order to attack his dominions: he therefore determined to uſe every method in his power to prevent it. In what manner he effected this will ſoon appear in the courſe of this hiſtory. At preſent, the domeſtic affairs of Great Britain demand ſome portion of our attention.

It has been already mentioned that admiral Byng, on his arrival at Gibraltar, was ſuperſeded in his command by ſir Edward Hawke, and ſent home priſoner; as was alſo his ſecond in command rear-admiral Weſt, ſeveral of the captains of the fleet, and general Fowke, with ſome of the land officers belonging to the garriſon of Gibraltar. The priſoners all arrived on the third day of July at Portſmouth, where Mr. Byng was immediately put under arreſt, and ſoon afterwards conveyed to Greenwich, and committed to the cuſtody of the governor of the hoſpital, by whom he was kept ſtrictly confined till the time of his trial by a court-martial, which was delayed by the abſence of many evidences in the Mediterranean, required both in his favour and againſt him. Admiral Weſt and lieutenant-general Fowke were ordered up to London, where the admiral met with a moſt gracious reception from his royal maſter; but general Fowke was ordered to take his trial for diſobeying his majeſty's orders, tranſmitted to him by the ſecretary of war, relating to the embarkation of a battalion of troops to be ſent in the fleet with Mr. Byng to reinforce Fort St. Philip.

The court-martial commiſſioned to try the general conſiſted of two generals, eleven lieutenant-generals, and three major generals, general ſir Robert Rich being preſident. Mr. Fowke, in his defence againſt the above charge, urged, that his orders were not abſolute, but diſcretionary; and that the execution of them was left to his and Mr. Byng's diſcernment and judgment, for which he particularly referred to a letter from the ſecretary of war to him, as commander in chief of Gibraltar; the whole tenor of which imported a diſcretionary power remaining in him as to the execution of thoſe orders. He moreover defended the ſteps he had taken in with-holding the forces, by ſhewing, that if he had made the detachment of a battalion, and put it on board the fleet, he ſhould not then have had much more than two reliefs of men (ſo wretchedly was this important garriſon garriſon provided with defence) and this at a time when there was the greateſt reaſon to believe that the place was in danger of being attacked. Notwithſtanding this defence, and that the three letters from the ſecretary at war produced in court appeared to contain inſtructions that were very confuſed, at leaſt, if not contradictory, his judges found him guilty of the charge; and he was ſentenced to be ſuſpended for the ſpace of one year; a ſentence which was not only confirmed by his majeſty, but alſo accompanied with a diſmiſſion from his ſervice: nor was he reſtored during the courſe of this reign, though his caſe was generally thought to have been very hard.

In reſpect to the unhappy admiral Byng, no method had been left untried to inflame the nation to a degree of frenzy againſt him, by repreſenting him as the ſole cauſe of the diſgrace in the Mediterranean, and the loſs of Minorca; the importance of which (however little it ſeems to have claimed the attention of our miniſtry in the beginning) was now repreſented in the moſt ſtriking colours. Admiral Byng had, before his return to Gibraltar, diſpatched a letter to the admiralty, containing the particulars of the action off Minorca, and of the reſolutions of the council of war he had ſummoned. This letter, however, was not made public till ſome days after ſir Edward Hawke was ſent out to ſuperſede him; and even then it was curtailed, and mutilated in an extraordinary manner, ſeveral paſſages being ſuppreſſed which tended to his own juſtification, or contained any reflection upon the negligence or inattention of the miniſtry. This proceeding was certainly very unfair. Accordingly, the admiral's friends did not fail to publiſh his letter entire, with ſome remarks not very favourable to thoſe who had thus garbled it.

His adverſaries, however, had got the populace on their ſide; and there was not a ſpecies of libelling, in proſe or verſe, that was not exhauſted to render him odious. They ridiculed and refuted the reaſons he had given for returning to Gibraltar after his ſhameful rencounter with the French ſquadron: they inveighed againſt his inſolence, his folly, his cowardice, and his miſconduct: they even ſtuck not at making royalty itſelf an inſtrument of their artifice, by inſinuating that his majeſty had prognoſticated Byng would not fight, from the contents of his firſt letter from Gibraltar. In a word, they exerted themſelves ſo ſtrenuouſly in maintaining and increaſing the popular deluſion, that no notice was taken of the miſconduct of the miniſtry, while Byng was pointed out as the object of univerſal deteſtation. Addreſſes upon addreſſes were tranſmitted from all parts of the kingdom to the throne, particularly from the city of London, calling aloud for an examination into the cauſe of the infamy that had befallen the Britiſh arms by ſea, and of the loſs of the important iſland of Minorca, which by its ſituation drew to Great Britain the reſpect of Spain, the confidence of Italy, and the ſubmiſſion of the piratical ſtates of Barbary.

His majeſty, ever attentive to his faithful ſubjects, commanded an immediate examination into the cauſes of the loſs of Minorca. We have already ſeen the puniſhment inflicted on Mr. Fowke; and now the whole magazine of political arts having been exhauſted to fix the charge of cowardice, treachery, and treaſon, againſt the devoted admiral, he was at length ordered to prepare for his trial; the place appointed for which was on board his majeſty's ſhip the St. George, in Portſmouth harbour; and the court was compoſed of four admirals and nine captains, whoſe names the reader will find at the foot of the page *. They ſat thirty one days, Sundays excepted, (viz. from the twenty-eighth of December to the twenty-ſeventh of January) examining witneſſes, and hearing the priſoner's defence. As this trial is in almoſt every one's hands, it would be needleſs to enter into a minute detail of particulars. Let it ſuffice then to ſay, that the court, upon ſumming up the evidence, were of opinion, "That admiral Byng did not do his utmoſt to relieve St. Philip's Caſtle, in the iſland of Minorca, then beſieged by the forces of the French king;" and then came to the following reſolution, That the admiral appears to fall under the following part of the twelfth article of the Articles of War, to wit, "Or ſhall not do his utmoſt to take or deſtroy every ſhip which it ſhall be his duty to engage; and to aſſiſt and relieve all and every of his majeſty's ſhips which it ſhall be his duty to aſſiſt and relieve:" and as that article poſitively denounces the puniſhment of death on the delinquent, without any alternative left to the diſcretion of the court, under any variation of circumſtances, they adjudged him to be ſhot to death. But it having fully appeared, by the evidence of lord Robert Bertie, lieutenant-colonel Smith, captain Gardiner (captain of the admiral's own ſhip the Ramillies) and other officers of the ſhip who were near the perſon of the admiral, that they did not perceive any backwardneſs in him during the action, or any marks of fear or confuſion, either from his countenance or behaviour; but that he ſeemed to give his orders coolly and diſtinctly, and did not ſeem wanting in perſonal courage: from theſe and other circumſtances, the court being induced to believe that his miſconduct aroſe neither from cowardice nor diſaffection, did therefore unanimouſly think it their duty to recommend the ſaid admiral John Byng to his majeſty, as a proper object of mercy †. Alſo, when they made a report of the ſentence of death they had paſſed on the admiral, they added thereto the following remonſtrance to the lords of the admiralty in his favour:

"We the underwritten, the preſident and members of the court-martial, aſſembled for the trial of admiral Byng, believe it unneceſſary to inform your lordſhips, that in the whole courſe of this long trial, we have done our utmoſt endeavours to come at truths, and to do the ſtricteſt juſtice to our country and the priſoner; but we cannot help laying the diſtreſſes of our minds before your lordſhips on this occaſion, in finding ourſelves ſelves under the neceſſity of condemning a man to death, from the great ſeverity of the twelfth article of war *, part of which he falls under, and which admits of no mitigation, even if the crime ſhould be committed by an error in judgment only; and therefore, for our own conſciences ſakes, as well as in juſtice to the priſoner, we pray your lordſhips, in the moſt earneſt manner, to recommend him to his majeſty's clemency."

In conſequence of this recommendatory remonſtrance from the court-martial, and the petitions of lord Torrington, nephew to the unhappy admiral, and other perſons of high diſtinction allied to his family, the lords of the admiralty applied to his majeſty that the opinion of the twelve judges might be taken, whether the ſentence of the court-martial was legal? The ſentence was accordingly referred by the king to the judges, who declared it legal; in conſequence of which, a warrant was ſigned by the lords of the admiralty for carrying it into execution: but it was again ſuſpended, at the requeſt of ſeveral members of the court-martial, who alleged, that they had ſomething to diſcloſe relative to the ſaid ſentence which greatly affected their own conſciences; and application was made to the houſe of commons by one of the members, praying the aid of parliament to be releaſed from his oath of ſecrecy, in order to diſcloſe the grounds why ſentence of death had paſſed upon the ſaid admiral. Upon this, a bill for releaſing the members from their oath of ſecrecy was ordered into the houſe of commons, and paſſed that houſe; and a reſpite was ſent to admiral Byng for a fortnight: but when the bill came into the houſe of lords, and when the members were examined there, the ſame was rejected; ſo that this and every other tentative to get the admiral reprieved from his ſad fate all proving ineffectual, he was, purſuant to his ſentence, executed on the fourteenth of March, 1757, on board his majeſty's ſhip Monarque, in Portſmouth harbour. A few minutes before he was called out of the cabin to die, he gave a paper to Mr. Brough, the marſhal of the admiralty, who attended him, in which he declared himſelf "a victim, deſtined to divert the indignation and reſentment of an injured and deluded people from the proper objects." In his laſt moments, he behaved with a dignity and fortitude that never yet inſpired a breaſt conſcious of guilt or infected with cowardice.

Thus ended the enquiry into the conduct of general Fowke and admiral Byng; the one of whom was broke and diſmiſſed his majeſty's ſervice, for not following inſtructions which contradicted themſelves; and the other ſuffered an ignominious death for following the advice and opinion of a council of war, and for not having done every thing that was perhaps poſſible to have been done for diſtreſſing the enemy, and relieving the fortreſs they had beſieged. I have collected the proceedings of this remarkable affair together into one point of view, though they were, by ſeveral incidents, protracted nine months or thereabouts; as well that the reader might have a more diſtinct and clear idea of them, as to prevent any unneceſſary digreſſions that would break in upon the chain of other events †.

As the ſucceſs of the war now begun ſeemed to depend chiefly on a naval force, it will not be improper to give the ſtate of the royal navy of Great Britain at the time it was declared, which was as follows:

The zeal of the people of England for their ſovereign's ſervice and the honour of their country was never more warmly expreſſed than on the occaſion of declaring war againſt France. Addreſſes

* By the twelfth article of war, 22 Geo. II. "Every perſon in the fleet who, through cowardice, negligence, or diſaffection, ſhall, in time of action, withdraw or keep back, or not come into the fight or engagement, or ſhall not do his utmoſt to take or deſtroy every ſhip which it ſhall be his duty to engage, and to aſſiſt and relieve all and every of his majeſty's ſhips, or thoſe of his allies, which it ſhall be his duty to aſſiſt and relieve, every ſuch perſon ſo offending, and being convicted thereof by the ſentence of a court-martial, ſhall ſuffer DEATH."

were preſented to the king from the city of London, the merchants, and by moſt of the trading towns and corporations in the kingdom. All ranks and degrees of men ſeemed unanimous in their reſolution to aſſiſt his majeſty in any meaſures he ſhould judge proper to be taken to annoy the enemy, and defend the kingdom. The landholders and corporations not only ſubmitted with chearfulneſs to the great ſupplies appointed by parliament, but alſo raiſed great numbers of men for the ſervice of their country, by voluntary contributions and large premiums. Nay, a number of public-ſpirited merchants of the city of London taking into conſideration the great utility that would ariſe to the naval ſervice by training up a young nurſery of ſeamen, from whence the government might, on any ſudden emergency, always draw an immediate ſupply of hands to man their ſhips, formed themſelves into that laudable aſſociation, known by the name of the Marine Society; and contributed conſiderable ſums of money for equipping ſuch orphans, friendleſs and forlorn boys, as were willing to engage in the ſervice of the navy. In conſequence of this truly patriotic plan, many thouſands of wretched vagrants were reſcued from miſery, and rendered uſeful members of ſociety, of which they muſt have proved the peſt and reproach but for this humane interpoſition.

The firſt home expedition againſt the enemy, after the declaration of war, was that againſt the iſland of Chauſe, about two or three leagues diſtant from Granville in Lower Normandy, conducted by captain Howe in the Dunkirk, with three frigates, who on the fourteenth of July came to an anchor before the fort which defended the iſland, and was garriſoned by one hundred men, who did not give the Engliſh much trouble; for juſt as captain Howe had cleared his ſhip for action, the governor came on board and ſurrendered, without firing a gun. The iſland of Chauſe belonged to the farmers-general, but is inhabited only by tradeſmen, and produces ſcarce any thing but wine. We kept the iſland ſome few days, then demoliſhed the fort and other buildings, nailed up the cannon, and carried off all the live cattle, wine, and other effects of any value. After which the ſhips threw a few bombs into Granville, which did ſome execution; but not having a ſufficient ſupply to do all the miſchief they might have done, they returned to Spithead.

All this time, however, our trade ſuffered heavily from the enemy's cruizers, who were ſo numerous, and ſo properly ſtationed for intercepting our homeward bound merchantmen, that by Michaelmas this year the French had taken two hundred and thirty of our ſhips; amongſt which was the Warwick man of war and four privateers; one ſhip with eight hundred ſoldiers for New York, and another with eighty-eight people on board for Newfoundland. We had indeed, in the ſame ſpace of time, taken from the French two hundred and fifty-one ſhips, amongſt which were the Arc-en-Ciel, a man of war of fifty guns, a rich Martinico man, four ſhips with about three hundred ſoldiers and proviſions on board for North America; but allowing the difference of value between the Engliſh and French cargoes, we had at this time little to boaſt of, and our trade was notoriouſly neglected.

Our adverſaries the French, on the contrary, left no method untried to ſecure their navigation and commerce, by endeavouring to engage neutral ſhips in their ſervice, when the circumſtances of war might make it dangerous or impracticable to carry on a communication with their colonies. With this view his moſt Chriſtian majeſty licenſed Dutch ſhips to trade with, or to carry the produce of their iſlands, from which, in common with other natives, he had excluded them in times of peace; and the Dutch on their ſide aſſumed a right which they pretended to claim on the faith of treaties, to carry the goods of our enemies, though at the ſame time the French king, by an ordinance, dated July 8, 1756, laid them and all other neutral nations under the ſevereſt prohibition not to carry Britiſh property. The Britiſh court, however, ſhewed a becoming ſpirit on this occaſion; for his majeſty's ſhips of war had orders to keep a ſharp look-out for Dutch ſhips that ſhould be found tranſporting either ſoldiers, arms, ammunition, or contraband goods, to any of the territories or plantations of the French king. Accordingly, a great number of them were brought into the Downs in the courſe of this year, laden with maſts, yards, &c. for the uſe of the enemy, of which the Dutch complained as a very great hardſhip; but we ſhall have occaſion to treat of this affair between us and their High Mightineſſes more at large hereafter. Events of a more ſtriking nature now claim our attention.

The empreſs of Ruſſia, highly diſcontented with the treaty his Britannic majeſty had made in the beginning of this year with the king of Pruſſia, without communicating the ſame either to herſelf or her miniſters, carried her reſentment of this proceeding ſo far as to renounce the late treaty ſhe had concluded with Great Britain, and to reject the tender of the firſt payment of the ſtipulated ſubſidies. Not only ſo, but ſhe acceded publicly to the treaty of Verſailles, and ſoon after put thoſe very troops in motion againſt the king of Pruſſia which Great Britain had agreed to take into her ſervice, in order to prevent foreign troops from entering into Germany. The empreſs-queen, on her ſide, alarmed at the very extraordinary military preparations which his Pruſſian majeſty had been for ſome time making throughout his dominions, aſſembled a conſiderable body of troops to guard againſt a ſurprize. At the ſame time, ſhe ordered her miniſter at foreign courts to preſent a reſcript in her name, in which ſhe diſclaimed all hoſtile intentions in the augmentation of her forces, declaring that it was intended only for a ſecurity to her own dominions, which ſhe ſaw threatened with an approaching invaſion: that in the late treaty ſhe had concluded with the court of France, the maintaining the treaty of Weſtphalia in full force was abſolutely and clearly ſtipulated: and that, notwithſtanding certain reports had been induſtriouſly propagated that her alliance with the court of France contained ſecret articles, calculated for the total ſuppreſſion of the proteſtant religion, ſhe ſolemnly declared that ſhe had contracted no engagements with that court which could in the leaſt affect the proteſtant intereſt, or infringe the liberties of the Germanic body. In the ſame piece, which was dated the thirteenth of July, 1756, ſome reflections were thrown out againſt the king of England (as elector of Hanover) and his Pruſſian majeſty, as having entered into a league on theſe groundleſs ſuggeſtions againſt the houſe of Auſtria. The courts of London and Berlin did not ſuffer this reſcript to go long unanſwered. His Britannic majeſty gave orders to his miniſter at the diet of Ratiſbon to preſent a memorial in his name, as elector of Hanover, juſtifying his treaty with the king of Pruſſia, which he declared to have been entered into in conſequence of the empreſs-queen's refuſal of the ſuccours ſtipulated by treaties when demanded, to guard againſt the deſigns of France upon his electoral dominions, which for ſome time had been too glaringly diſplayed for any one to be miſtaken therein; and that neither himſelf nor his Pruſſian majeſty had any farther views in the treaty in queſtion than to form an alliance for the ſecuring their reſpective dominions, and preſerving peace and tranquillity in the empire.

His Pruſſian majeſty in his memorial retorted upon the empreſs-queen the charge of being the aggreſſor, declaring that the military preparations he had made had been only in conſequence of the great armaments which ſhe herſelf had ſet on foot for ſome time paſt all over her dominions: that he had greater reaſon to be attentive to theſe diſpoſitions, as he had received undoubted intelligence at the ſame time of the march of a conſiderable body of Ruſſians towards Courland; and that theſe military motions, on the part of the two imperial crowns, having obliged him to demand of the empreſs-queen a categorical anſwer, whether they were deſigned againſt him or not? her imperial majeſty had thought proper to return thereto a very ambiguous, dry, and unſatisfactory anſwer, which ſerved only to confirm his majeſty in his ſuſpicion of a deſign being formed againſt his dominions; and that therefore it became his indiſpenſible duty to take every meaſure which ſhould appear moſt proper to guard againſt ſuch an inſult. Soon after delivering this memorial to the imperial diet, his Pruſſian majeſty ordered M. Klingraaf, his miniſter at the court of Vienna, to aſſure the empreſs-queen that he would inſtantly put a ſtop to all his military preparations, provided ſhe would promiſe that his dominions ſhould not be invaded either this year or the next. This requeſt, not to be moleſted for two years by one who had a right to claim the ſecurity of peace by the faith of treaties, was far from being impertinent or imperious. Nevertheleſs, her Imperial majeſty diſdaining, as ſhe ſaid, to be thus challenged and dictated to by a prince of the empire, returned a more haughty and leſs ſatisfactory anſwer to this demand than ſhe had done to the former.

The moment his Pruſſian majeſty was adviſed of this conduct of the court of Vienna, which he ſeems to have all along ſuſpected, and therefore had held himſelf in readineſs to take the field at all events; he loſt no longer time in fruitleſs negociations, but immediately put his troops in motion, and ordered his miniſter at Dreſden to demand of the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, a paſſage for his army through Saxony: to which the latter forbore giving any determinate anſwer; and dreading, as he had reaſon to do, the conſequences of admitting the army of a doubtful friend, and of a prince who had already given ſufficient intimations of his being well acquainted with the private engagements ſubſiſting between the Saxon cabinet and the two empreſſes againſt him, collected his whole forces with all poſſible diligence, and ordered them to fortify themſelves in the ſtrong fortreſs of Pirna, till he could receive ſuch relief from his confederates as the nature of his diſtreſs, and of their common cauſe, required. He then ordered a written anſwer to be delivered to M. de Malzahn, the Pruſſian miniſter, in which, among other things, he ſaid, that he flattered himſelf the king of Pruſſia would reſt ſatisfied of his intention not to take any part in the differences that have ariſen between his Pruſſian majeſty and the empreſs queen, and not require any thing of his Poliſh majeſty or his ſubjects, contrary to the liberty of a prince of the empire, or that ſhould oblige him to have recourſe to the Germanic body and the guarantees of the treaties of peace for the due execution of thoſe treaties. This declaration was ſent to the king of Pruſſia by lord Stormont, the Britiſh miniſter, accompanied by the count of Salmont, one of the Saxon miniſters: but his Pruſſian majeſty, who was already determined in the conduct he was to purſue, would admit of no other alternative than that of his Poliſh majeſty ſeparating the army he had aſſembled, and ſending the troops encamped at Pirna back into quarters.

The truth ſeems to be, that the fate of Saxony was at all events to anſwer the deſigns of Pruſſia; for upon the king of Poland's refuſing (as it was very natural to think any one in his circumſtances would) to diſband all his forces, the Pruſſian monarch immediately marched two armies into Saxony, one directing its route to Leipſic, under prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, and the other to Dreſden; which latter place, as the leaſt tenable, was abandoned by the king of Poland, who taking with him his two ſons, Xaverius and Charles, fled before his invader to his ſtrong camp at Pirna, the queen of Poland and the reſt of the royal family remaining in Dreſden.

Beſides the two armies that marched into Saxony, the king of Pruſſia at the ſame time aſſembled two others in Upper and Lower Sileſia, which poſſeſſed themſelves of the paſſes communicating with the circles of Buntzlaw and Konighen-Gratz, beſides a large body of troops aſſembled at Glatz, and another kept in Pruſſia to oppoſe the Ruſſians. His Pruſſian majeſty, on entering the Saxon territories, publiſhed a manifeſto to juſtify his conduct. No ſooner had he ſeized upon Dreſden, the capital of the electorate, than he ſent an officer to the queen of Poland, to demand the keys of the archives, the cabinets, and the treaſures of her huſband. The queen was forced to ſubmit to this demand; but at the ſame time, having aſſembled all the foreign miniſters, ſhe begged of them, with tears in her eyes, to repreſent to their reſpective courts how rigorouſly the court of Saxony was treated by the king of Pruſſia. Deaf, however, to all her complaints, that monarch gave orders for blowing up and demoliſhing the fortifications of Wirtemberg, and Torgau to be fortified; at which place he eſtabliſhed the government under a Pruſſian miniſtry, after turning out all the Saxon miniſters of ſtate and members of the council. He appointed baron Wyllech governor of Dreſden, who ſeizing upon all the Saxon officers found in that city, obliged them to ſwear not to ſerve againſt the Pruſſians, before he would grant them their liberty; liberty; and ſtripping the city of all the artillery, arms, and ammunition found therein, he ſent them down the Elbe to Magdebourg. Such a conduct ſufficiently ſhewed that his Pruſſian majeſty was determined to treat this wretched electorate in the ſame manner as the dominions of an open enemy.

Nor did the city of Leipſic, of which prince Ferdinand had taken poſſeſſion, experience any milder treatment. The inhabitants were obliged to provide the Pruſſian army with proviſions at a ſtated price (far ſhort of their coſt) on pain of military execution; and an order was iſſued for the payment of all taxes and cuſtoms to the king of Pruſſia. In this extreme diſtreſs his Poliſh majeſty filled all the courts of Europe, in amity with Saxony, with the moſt pathetic memorials againſt theſe proceedings; proceedings indeed which ſtruck moſt of them with aſtoniſhment; but none more ſo than his Britannic majeſty, the faithful ally of Pruſſia, who was ſo far from being in the ſecret of this invaſion, that he publicly avowed, and in ſome ſenſe proteſted againſt it. His Pruſſian majeſty, aware of the difficulties in which his conduct towards Saxony would embroil him, immediately circulated a memorial through Europe, in which it was declared, "That the ſteps he had taken were the pure effects of neceſſity, and of that regard which every one owes to his own ſafety; and that among the papers belonging to his Poliſh majeſty of which he had poſſeſſed himſelf, he had found the original treaties, letters, &c. which had paſſed between the courts of Peterſburg, Vienna, and Dreſden, which would enable him to prove unanſwerably the plot which had been formed by thoſe powers to ſtrip him of a great part of his dominions; but that, by the vigorous meaſures he had taken, the iniquitous ſchemes of an ungrateful and ambitious court (meaning that of Saxony) had been happily diſcovered, and their taking effect prevented."

The Saxon army continued ſtill encamped near Pirna, in a place almoſt inacceſſible, and very ſtrongly fortified. The king of Pruſſia being joined by prince Ferdinand's army from Leipſic, cloſely inveſted the Saxon camp, and at the ſame time meaſures were taken to engage the Auſtrians who were coming to their aſſiſtance. The paſſes into Bohemia were all occupied by advanced guards of Pruſſians, and a detachment from the army was encamped at Auſig, on the ſouth ſide of the Elbe, under field-marſhal Keith. By this means the Saxon camp was hemmed in, in the manner of a blockade, and thoſe troops reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of proviſions, while the Pruſſians were plentifully ſupplied with every neceſſary. This haſtened the march of an Auſtrian army under the command of count Brown, a general in whom the court of Vienna placed the greateſt confidence. The king of Pruſſia, whoſe vigilance nothing could eſcape, had early notice of their intended march, and determined to diſconcert their meaſures. Accordingly, his majeſty ſet out from his camp at Seidlitz on the twenty-eighth of September, and took upon himſelf the future conduct of the forces encamped at Auſig, which conſiſted only of twenty-five thouſand men, the king having been obliged to leave the main body of his troops in the neighbourhood of Pirna, in order to keep the Saxons blocked up.

His Pruſſian majeſty being arrived in marſhal Keith's camp, put his army in motion without delay, being reſolved to march in queſt of count Brown. He formed a van-guard of eight battalions, ten ſquadrons of dragoons, and eight ſquadrons of huſſars. He put himſelf at the head of this body, and marched to Tournitz, leaving orders for the reſt of his army to follow in two columns, the one by the way of Preſcobot, and the other the ſame way the van-guard had taken. From Tournitz he marched with his van towards Welhmina, where he arrived that evening (the 30th) an hour before ſun-ſet. From thence he could deſcry the Auſtrian army, with its right wing at Lowoſchutz, and its left extended towards Egra. That very evening the king himſelf occupied with ſix battalions a hollow and ſome riſing ground which commanded Lowoſchutz, and which the Auſtrian general had by a great overſight neglected to ſecure, but which his Pruſſian majeſty reſolved to make uſe of the next day, in order to march and attack the enemy. His army arrived in the night at Welhmina, where the king only formed his battalions behind one another, and his ſquadrons in the ſame manner, which remained all night in this poſture, the king himſelf not going to reſt, but keeping watch (covered only with his cloak) before a little fire at the head of his troops.

On the firſt of October at day-break his majeſty took with him his general officers, and ſhewed them the ground which he intended to occupy with his army, viz. the infantry, forming the firſt line, to occupy two high hills and the bottom between them, ſome battalions to form the ſecond line, and the third to be compoſed of the whole cavalry. The Auſtrians, however, who had by this time diſcovered their error in neglecting thoſe advantageous poſts, now prepared to diſpute the poſſeſſion of them; and notwithſtanding the king made all poſſible diſpatch in ſtrengthening the wings of his army upon theſe hills, and that the infantry were no leſs diligent in ſecuring their poſt at the right, yet the enemy's Pandours, Croatians, and grenadiers, who were poſted in vineyards incloſed with ſtone walls, ſo harraſſed the left wing as it was forming, that it was obliged immediately to come to engagement.

The Pruſſians, however, continued advancing with great firmneſs, till they came to the declivity of the hills towards the enemy, from whence they ſaw the town of Lowoſchutz filled with a great body of infantry, and a large battery of twelve pieces of cannon in front; their cavalry were formed chequer-wiſe, and in a line between Lowoſchutz and the village of Sanſchitz. His majeſty having ſpent ſome time in reconnoitring the diſpoſition of the enemy, gave orders to his cavalry to begin the attack by falling upon the enemy's horſe, which were drawn up in their front. This attack was made with ſuch vigour, that the Auſtrian cavalry preſently gave way; but the enemy keeping up a terrible fire from ſeveral pieces of cannon, and from a great body of infantry which they had poſted in ſome hollow places behind their horſe, the Pruſſians could not purſue their advantage without running into needleſs danger; and therefore returned and formed again behind their line of infantry. They ſoon returned to the charge, however, which they maintained with ſuch ſpirit and a reſolution, that in ſpite of the fire of above ſixty pieces of cannon, which played upon them from the hollow ways and ditches, they totally defeated the whole Auſtrian cavalry, and even drove the infantry from the ditches in which they were poſted. At the ſame time, by a maſterpiece of generalſhip, the king ordered the whole infantry to march on gradually, and then on a ſudden to wheel about and attack the town of Lowoſchutz in flank. This ſervice was performed with equal courage, conduct, and ſucceſs, as the former, amidſt a moſt terrible fire of cannon, and the reſiſtance of a body of infantry prodigiouſly ſuperior to themſelves. The Pruſſians ſet fire to the ſuburbs of the town, carried the poſt, and put the whole Auſtrian army to flight.

Count Brown finding the battle irreparably loſt, retired to the other ſide of the Egra, and pitched his camp at Budin, while his Pruſſian majeſty kept the field of battle, and eſtabliſhed his head quarters at Lowoſchutz. The army of the Auſtrians was ſixty thouſand ſtrong; that of the king of Pruſſia, as I have already obſerved, did not exceed twenty-five thouſand. The battle laſted from ſeven in the morning till three in the afternoon. The loſs of the Pruſſians was two thouſand killed and wounded; among the former were one general of infantry, two major-generals of cavalry, and one colonel of the grenadiers. The loſs of the enemy was computed to amount to between ſix and ſeven thouſand killed and wounded, and five hundred taken priſoners; amongſt whom was prince Lobkowitz; five pieces of cannon and three pair of colours fell alſo into the hands of the victors *.

The king, after gaining his point by diſabling count Brown from marching to the relief of the Saxons under his blockade, ordered his victorious troops to return into that electorate, and join that body of his forces employed in this ſervice. The wretched Saxons, on their part, ſeeing all hopes of relief by the way of Bohemia totally cut off, their proviſions being alſo exhauſted, and famine ſtaring them in the face, were reduced either to attempt an eſcape by ſtratagem, or to lay down their arms and ſurrender themſelves to the king of Pruſſia.

An eſcape was moſt eligible, and they attempted it in the following manner: on the twelfth day of October, as ſoon as the day was ſhut in, they ſecretly threw a bridge of boats over the Elbe, near Konigſtein. At nine o'clock, having removed almoſt all their artillery to the laſt mentioned place, they ſtruck their tents, and by ſeven next morning his Poliſh majeſty and the whole Saxon army paſſed the river undiſcovered, or at leaſt unmoleſted. This plan was concerted with count Brown, who, to facilitate the execution, ſecretly left his camp at Budin; and with a conſiderable body of horſe, having marched ſixteen German miles, he arrived in the neighbourhood of Konigſtein the ſame day; and the day before general Nadaſti arrived with about ſix thouſand irregulars, which he poſted in ſuch a manner as to prevent the eight Pruſſian battalions that were encamped on that ſide the Elbe, at Lemon, from being joined by the Pruſſians that were at Scandau.

This diſpoſition greatly facilitated the paſſage of the Saxons, which was likewiſe concealed by the darkneſs of the night, and a thick fog on the ſucceeding morning; ſo that it was near nine o'clock before the Pruſſians at Seidlitz knew that the Saxons had left their camp. The Auſtrian general, however, was again guilty of an overſight on this occaſion, in neglecting to reconnoitre the country through which he was to eſcort the Saxon army. This neglect ruined the whole plan; for as ſoon as the Saxon advanced-guard had, with great difficulty, got about half way up a ſteep mountain over-againſt Konigſtein, they found that the Pruſſians had already made themſelves maſters of all the defiles, and that it was impoſſible for them to force their way. The Saxon army now finding themſelves ſurrounded on every ſide, and that their crafty enemy having foreſeen their deſign, had ſuffered them to march into this toil, that he might the more eaſily ſecure them, they offered to capitulate, which was accordingly agreed to, and they ſurrendered themſelves priſoners to his Pruſſian majeſty. A propoſal was then made to them to enliſt under the Pruſſian banner, which the greateſt part of them accepted, took the oath of fidelity to the conqueror, and were incorporated amongſt his troops.

Thus deprived of all his military ſtrength, the unfortunate king of Poland found it in vain longer to ſtruggle with his fate: he therefore ſubmitted to be ſent, with the queen his conſort, to Warſaw in Poland; thus in a manner abdicating the electorate of Saxony, which fell under the government of the king of Pruſſia.

While the Auſtrian and Pruſſian armies were in the field, the emperor was engaged by his conſort

* It is worthy of remark, that in this battle, which opened the firſt campaign of a moſt bloody war, the two commanders in chief who fought againſt each other were originally ſubjects of the Britiſh crown.

Count Brown, who was at the head of the Auſtrians, was a native of Ireland, and had riſen to the high rank he held in the imperial army entirely by his great military abilities, which he had diſplayed on ſeveral occaſions, but more particularly in the laſt war the court of Vienna had waged againſt the king of Pruſſia.

Field-marſhal Keith, who commanded under the king of Pruſſia, was younger ſon of George Keith, earl Mariſchal of Scotland, and born in that kingdom in 1698. When he was only ſeventeen years of age, he entered with his brother lord Mariſchal into the rebellion of 1715. The defeat of his party obliged him to ſeek his fortune abroad; and he obtained a commiſſion in the Iriſh brigade, commanded by the duke of Ormond in Spain. Here he continued about ten years; but being recommended to Catherine I. the empreſs of Ruſſia, then reigning, ſhe received him in a moſt diſtinguiſhed manner, and in a little time advanced him to the rank of lieutenant general. In the war that broke out between Ruſſia and Turky in that reign, he gave ſuch proofs of his courage and military ſkill, that his reputation at the court of Peterſburg greatly increaſed, inſomuch that the czarina ſent him to the court of London, upon the return of the peace, in quality of her ambaſſador-extraordinary. His embaſſy being finiſhed, he was ſent into Finland againſt the Swedes, over whom he gained the famous victory of Wilmanſtrandt.

After the peace of Abo in 1743, he was appointed ambaſſador-extraordinary to compliment the king of Sweden on the election of a ſucceſſor to the crown; but the expences he incurred while in this high ſtation ſo far impaired his fortune, that finding he could not ſupport the dignity of a marſhal with the Ruſſian pay, he accepted of an invitation from the king of Pruſſia, who gave him a penſion over and above his pay, and admitted him his companion in a private tour through Germany, Poland, Hungary, and other places, in diſguiſe, and placed the greateſt confidence in his abilities and integrity.

to iſſue three imperial decrees in full diet at Ratiſbon againſt his Pruſſian majeſty: the firſt, ſummoning him to withdraw his troops from the electorate of Saxony; the ſecond, commanding all the vaſſals of the empire employed by the king of Pruſſia to quit that ſervice immediately; and the third, forbidding the members of the empire to ſuffer any levies of ſoldiers for the Pruſſian ſervice to be made within their reſpective juriſdictions. The French king's miniſter at the diet declared, that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, conſidering the proceedings of the king of Pruſſia as a direct breach of the rights and liberties of the empire, was determined to ſuccour, in the moſt effectual manner, the empreſs-queen, and other princes of the empire who had been inſulted and injured by him, and for that purpoſe would forthwith ſend ſuch a number of troops to their aid as might be thought ſufficient to maintain the liberty of the Germanic body. The like declaration was alſo made on the part of the czarina of Ruſſia. The miniſters of the empreſs-queen, both at London and at the Hague, demanded in her name the ſuccours thoſe two powers were bound, by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, to afford the houſe of Auſtria, which was peremptorily refuſed by both nations. The French were all this time labouring hard to throw the whole blame of the war, on the eve of breaking out in Germany, upon the treaty ſigned between Great Britain and Pruſſia at the beginning of this year, and to perſuade the catholic princes that their alliance was formed with a particular intention to deſtroy the Romiſh intereſt and religion in Germany: and upon this aſſertion, which the court of France gave the authority of an inconteſtible fact, a convention was now concluded with the emperor, which regulated the number and ſervice of the forces to be ſent from France into Germany.

The ſeaſon being now ſo far advanced, his Pruſſian majeſty cantoned his forces in the neighbourhood of Seidlitz, and along the Elbe towards Dreſden. His other army, which had entered Bohemia under the command of the count de Schwerin, retired to the confines of the county of Glatz, where they were alſo diſtributed into winter-quarters; and thus this ſhort, but moſt active campaign, was finiſhed by the beginning of November.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent, our loſſes and diſgraces both in the Mediterranean and North America, and the advantages gained upon us both by ſea and land, occaſioned great murmurings and heart-burnings among the people in England, who imagined they ſaw a great deal of miſmanagement, as well in the directive as in the executive part of the government. Their diſcontents appeared not only in their addreſſes to the throne, but likewiſe in the inſtructions which the members of a great number of corporations gave to their repreſentatives in parliament; the general purport of which was, to make a ſtrict enquiry into the cauſes of our miſcarriages; how the large ſums that were granted in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament had been applied; and to paſs a militia-bill, whereby the hiring of ſubſidiary forces for the defence of the kingdom, on any future emergency, might no longer ſubſiſt. Some complained of the weak and ill-concerted meaſures of the miniſtry; others, of the treachery, ignorance, and cowardice of our commanders, both at ſea and land; that no wiſdom or policy could be ſeen in our counſels; and, in ſhort, that the nation was on the very brink of deſtruction, into which it muſt inevitably fall, if the conduct of affairs was ſtill continued in the ſame hands.

So repeated, ſo loud and vehement were the clamours of the people, and of all perſons, high and low, againſt the pilots of the helm, that at length they reached the royal ear. His majeſty, ever glad of an occaſion to convince his Britiſh ſubjects that he had their intereſt, glory, and advantage at heart, ſuperior to all other conſiderations, proceeded as far as he in prudence thought adviſable, to make ſuch alterations in the miniſtry as might pleaſe his people. Accordingly, in November the duke of Devonſhire was appointed firſt commiſſioner of the Treaſury, in the room of the duke of Newcaſtle; the right honourable Henry Bilſon Legge was made chancellor of the Exchequer, inſtead of ſir George Lyttleton. By another commiſſion for the marine department, the place of firſt lord of the admiralty, filled by lord Anſon, was given to earl Temple, brother-in-law to Mr. Pitt; and the right honourable George Grenville was made treaſurer of the navy. Lord-chancellor Hardwicke having reſigned the ſeals, they were put in commiſſion; and, laſtly, to the infinite joy of the whole nation, who now began to idolize Mr. Pitt, that gentleman was appointed one of his majeſty's ſecretaries of ſtate, in the room of Mr. Fox. The fears of an invaſion being now perfectly ſubſided, and Hanover thought in more danger than Great Britain, orders were iſſued for ſending home the Hanoverian and Heſſian troops, whoſe abode here had occaſioned great diſturbance and uneaſineſs.

A few days after the adopting theſe agreeable meaſures, his majeſty, on the ſecond of December, met his parliament, and by a gracious ſpeech from the throne, in great meaſure obviated all applications which the repreſentatives of the people had been inſtructed by their conſtituents to make.

He began "by expreſſing his hope, that, under the guidance of Divine Providence, the union, fortitude, and affection of his people, would enable him to ſurmount all difficulties, and vindicate the dignity of his crown and the rights of his ſubjects againſt the ancient enemy of Great Britain. He aſſured them that the ſuccour and preſervation of America conſtituted a main object of his attention and ſolicitude; and obſerved, that the growing dangers to which the Britiſh colonies might be expoſed, from the late loſſes in that country, demanded reſolutions of vigour and diſpatch. He ſaid, that an adequate and firm defence at home ſhould maintain the chief place in his thoughts; and that in this great view he had nothing ſo much at heart as to remove all grounds of diſſatisfaction from his people: that for this end, he earneſtly recommended to the care and diligence of the parliament the framing of a national militia, planned and regulated with equal regard to the juſt rights of his crown and people; an inſtitution which might become one good reſource in times of general danger. He obſerved, that the unnatural union of councils abroad; the calamities which, in conſequence of this unhappy conjunction, might, by irruptions of foreign armies into the empire, ſhake its conſtitution, overturn turn its ſyſtem, and threaten oppreſſion to the proteſtant intereſt on the continent, were events which muſt ſenſibly affect the minds of the Britiſh nation; and had fixed the eyes of Europe on this new and dangerous criſis. He then informed them, that the body of his electoral troops, which were brought hither at the deſire of his parliament, he had now directed to return to his dominions in Germany, relying with pleaſure on the ſpirit and zeal of his people in defence of his perſon and realm. He ſaid, that he fully confided in the wiſdom of his parliament, for preferring more vigorous efforts, though more expenſive, to a leſs effectual, and therefore leſs frugal, plan of war: that he had placed before them the dangers and neceſſities of the public; and it was their duty to lay the burdens they ſhould judge unavoidable, in ſuch a manner as would leaſt diſtreſs and exhauſt his people; and concluded with theſe remarkable words, "Unproſperous events of war in the Mediterranean have drawn from my ſubjects ſignal proofs how dearly they tender the honour of my crown; and they cannot therefore, on my part, fail to meet with juſt returns of unwearied care, and unceaſing endeavours for the glory, proſperity, and happineſs of my people."

Moſt affectionate and loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes in return to this ſpeech; after which the legiſlature proceeded to diſpatch the national buſineſs.

In the courſe of this year a ſcarcity of corn, and dearneſs in conſequence, of all ſorts of proviſions, was ſeverely felt in moſt parts of England, owing in great meaſure to the iniquitous practice of engroſſing, and had occaſioned many tumults and riſings among the lower ſort of people. His majeſty had in his ſpeech recommended this matter to the conſideration of his parliament, deſiring they would take ſuch meaſures as they ſhould judge moſt proper to remedy the abuſe complained of, and relieve the diſtreſſes of the poorer claſs of his ſubjects. The commons therefore had no ſooner diſcuſſed the form of their addreſs, than the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee to deliberate on this matter; and a bill was immediately framed to prohibit, for a limited time, the exportation of all kinds of corn, either in the grain or meal; and an embargo was laid on all ſhips laden with that commodity for foreign parts.

The committee of ſupply and of ways and means were next appointed, who proceeded to conſider the public eſtimates, when it was reſolved to ſtrengthen the hands of government, by making the moſt ample proviſion for the proſecution of the war. The land forces were augmented from thirty-five thouſand to forty-nine thouſand ſeven hundred forty-nine effective men, including four thouſand and eight invalids. The ſeamen were ſettled at fifty-five thouſand men, including eleven thouſand four hundred and nineteen marines, with ſufficient to proviſion for their maintenance. His majeſty was alſo enabled to perform his agreement with and provide for his Heſſian and Hanoverian forces. Beſides which, they granted ample ſums for garriſons, for the ordnance, for levying new regiments, for forming and maintaining an army of obſervation in Germany, and fulfilling his majeſty's engagements with the king of Pruſſia; for the ſupport of the Britiſh forts on the coaſt of Africa; for the relief of South Carolina and Virginia; the ſupport of Nova Scotia and Georgia; for enabling the Eaſt India company to keep a military force in their ſettlements; and for ſeveral other uſes and contingencies: which ſupplies in the whole amounted to eight millions three hundred and fifty thouſand three hundred and twenty-five pounds ſome odd ſhillings and pence. Immenſe as this ſum was, they who granted it found means to eſtabliſh funds for the payment thereof to more than the amount, in order to prevent any deficiency that might happen in any branch of the ways and means.

The Heſſian troops having been denied winter-quarters by the publicans, who could not be compelled to receive them by law (as being foreigners) and theſe troops having ſuffered extremely by the ſeverity of the winter, the parliament thought proper to paſs a bill to make proviſion for quartering foreign forces, which received the royal aſſent by commiſſion on the ſeventeenth of December. By this act, foreign troops were in every reſpect to be treated as the native troops of this kingdom, till their return home.

The next object that engaged the attention of the legiſlature was a bill for the eſtabliſhment of a national militia; a meaſure that promiſed infinite advantages to the public. This ſcheme had frequently been attempted in former ſeſſions, but had always been attended with ſuch a train of difficulties, and ſuch a claſhing of intereſts, as had hitherto rendered it abortive. It had been a conſtant ſource of diſpute and contention between the crown and the commons; but now both appeared to concur in rendering it ſerviceable to the community. This bill was mentioned ſo early in this ſeſſion of parliament as the fourth day of December, by colonel George Townſhend, eldeſt ſon to the lord viſcount Townſhend, a gentleman alike diſtinguiſhed by the abilities of his head and the virtues of his heart. The motion being approved, the taſk of preparing the bill was conſigned to the propoſer; and a conſiderable number of the moſt able members in the houſe: but, by the many difficulties which this committee had to encounter, and the competitions of intereſts they had to reconcile, it was the twenty-ſeventh of January, 1757, before it was ready for the firſt reading. After mature deliberations and various alterations, it was carried through the lower houſe, and ſent to the lords for their concurrence. There it underwent ſeveral conſiderable alterations; the moſt diſagreeable of which was, the reducing the number of militiamen to one half of what the commons had propoſed, viz. to thirty-two thouſand three hundred and forty men for England and Wales, inſtead of ſeventy thouſand. This amendment occaſioned ſome warm debates in the lower houſe, when the bill was returned, and ſeveral conferences were held with their lordſhips. At length, however, the two houſes agreed to every article, and the bill was ſoon confirmed by the royal ſanction.

A violent oppoſition, however, was raiſed to this conſtitutional bill without doors, chiefly occaſioned by the intrigues of ſome diſcarded people in power, who, diſappointed in their endeavours to get it thrown out by the parliament, reſolved to make uſe of every art to prevent its being carried into execution: in a word, ſuch a diſlike to this new ſervice was every-where propagated amongſt the lower and middling claſs of people, that in counties whoſe lieutenants were well diſpoſed and well officered, it was the utmoſt difficulty to raiſe the common men by ballot; and ſcarce any where could it be performed for ſome time, without great diſcontent, and even riots. The farmers and landholders were frightened with an opinion that the militia would rob them of their ſervants; and the labouring men were terrified with the ſuggeſtion that they would be miſuſed, and ſent to fight the battles of ſome foreign prince or ſtate, or be tranſported like felons to the plantations of America. Prejudices were thus formed in their minds, which could be hardly removed by ſome length of time, and the moſt ſerious and laboured repreſentations of the expediency of the act, and of the evil deſigns of thoſe who had ſet them againſt ſo ſalutary a law; and, after all, the nation would have been deprived of the advantages of a ſerviceable militia, had not the ſame ſpirit which carried the bill through the parliament, exerted itſelf in the execution of it.

Though a national militia is of too much importance to this kingdom to render any thing that can enforce or explain it unneceſſary, yet as the act now eſtabliſhed for that purpoſe is of too great a length to be inſerted entire, I have therefore ſubſtituted the following abſtract thereof for the information of my readers; which, for its brevity and plainneſs, at the ſame time that it includes every eſſential part of the ſaid act, is ſuperior to any other I have met with. It was printed and diſtributed throughout the city of York, by the direction and at the expence of George Fox Lane, eſq. member for that city, for the better information of perſons choſen by lot to ſerve in the militia for that county.

The PAY, PRIVILEGES, and DUTY, of a MILITIA-MAN.

PAY.

A private man, for each day he is employed in the militia, ſhall receive one ſhilling. There ſhall be one corporal to every twenty private men, who ſhall be paid one ſhilling and ſix-pence every day he is employed.

Out of the private men, vacancies, on the death or removal of ſerjeants, may be filled up, in the proportion of one to every twenty private men;

Who are in that caſe diſcharged from ſerving as ſuch,

And ſhall have the pay of a ſerjeant, viz. every day in the year one ſhilling.

The ſerjeant-major muſt be made out of the ſerjeants, and ſhall be paid two ſhillings and ſix-pence more a week.

PRIVILEGES.

No militia-man can be compelled to march out of the kingdom;

Nor be obliged to go above ſix miles from home, to perform exerciſe, in companies or half companies;

Nor be detained, on days of exerciſe, longer than ſix hours; or under arms, without refreſhment, more than two hours.

He ſhall be dieted and billeted at public houſes, paying for diet and ſmall beer, four-pence each day.

Having ſerved three years, he may retain his cloaths.

He ſhall be exempted from doing any highway duty, or ſerving as a peace officer, or pariſh officer.

He ſhall not be liable to ſerve, unleſs by conſent, in any of his majeſty's land or ſea forces.

Having been called out into actual ſervice, and being a married man, he may ſet up any trade in any town. Diſabled by ſickneſs on a march, or at a place of annual exerciſe, he ſhall be provided for (by an order from one juſtice of the peace, or magiſtrate) by the officers of the pariſh where he ſhall then be, who ſhall be reimburſed by the officers of the pariſh for which he ſhall ſerve.

If ordered out on actual ſervice, he ſhall receive a guinea before the day he is ordered to march.

If ordered out, leaving a family not of ability to ſupport themſelves, the pariſh officers where ſuch family reſides ſhall relieve them by a weekly allowance, until his return, and be reimburſed out of the county ſtock.

Having ſerved three years, he ſhall not be liable to ſerve again, until by rotation it comes to his turn.

Being thirty-five years of age, and having ſerved two years, or on ſhewing juſt cauſe, he may be diſcharged;

And at any time he may be diſcharged by ſubdiviſion meetings.

If maimed or wounded in actual ſervice, he ſhall be equally entitled to Chelſea-hoſpital with any other ſoldier belonging to his majeſty's other forces.

Pariſhes may offer, and deputy-lieutenants may accept volunteers, inſtead of thoſe choſen by lot.

DUTY.

Every militia-man ſhall appear at the ſubdiviſion-meeting, on notice, and be inrolled to ſerve for three years, or find a ſubſtitute.

He ſhall be exerciſed in half companies, on the firſt Mondays in the months of March, April, May, June, July, Auguſt, September, and October.

In whole companies, on the third Monday in the ſaid months.

And if they cannot be exerciſed in half companies, by reaſon of the diſtance, then in ſmaller bodies; and

In regiments, or battalions, on Tueſday, Wedneſday, Thurſday, and Friday, in Whitſun-week.

The days of exerciſe may be altered to any other day in the ſame week, Sunday excepted.

The two days in any one month, in harveſt, may be changed to Tueſday and Wedneſday in Eaſter-week.

If any day is inconvenient, on account of fairs and markets, it may be altered to any other day in the ſame week, except Sundays.

Notice of the ſeveral places of exerciſe ſhall be fixed on the church or chapel doors of the pariſhes reſpectively; or, in caſe of no church or chapel, on the door of ſome church or chapel next adjoining.

After exerciſe, every man ſhall clean and return his arms, cloaths, and accoutrements.

Changing his reſidence, he ſhall ſerve in the diviſion he ſhall remove to, on giving previous notice to the deputy-lieutenants, and receiving a certificate from them.

And, in case of invasion, imminent danger thereof, or a rebellion, he may be drawn out for actual service, and in such case only, and in this kingdom only, and not elsewhere.

By the numerous armies which the French were now preparing to send into Germany, to assist the empress-queen against the king of Prussia, it was apparent that the electorate of Hanover would be exposed to their hostilities: to prevent which it was judged necessary to form an army of observation, to act as occasion should require on the frontiers of his majesty's German dominions, to protect them from the insults of the enemy. Accordingly, a message was delivered, February 15, by the king to Mr. secretary Pitt, to be by him presented to the house of commons, signifying, "that it was always with reluctance his majesty asked any extraordinary supply of his people; but that as the united counsels and formidable preparations of France and her allies threaten with the most alarming consequences Europe in general; and that as these most unjust and vindictive designs were particularly and immediately bent against his majesty's electoral dominions, and those of his good ally the king of Prussia, his majesty does confide in the experienced zeal and affection of his faithful commons, that they would chearfully assist him in forming and maintaining an army of observation for the just and necessary defence and preservation thereof, and to enable his majesty to fulfil his engagements with the king of Prussia for the security of the empire against the irruption of foreign armies, and for the support of the common cause."

This message met with as favourable a reception as could possibly have been wished. It was read in the house of commons, with a copy of the treaty between his majesty and the king of Prussia, which was approved, and his majesty's request granted, two hundred thousand pounds being appropriated for the relief of the king of Prussia, and maintaining the army of observation. Smoothly as this measure passed down with the legislature, it was by no means relished by the bulk of the nation, who could not without regret behold us thus hurrying into a continental war, which might embarrass our operations by sea, take off our attention to the capital object of America, and tend to increase the enormous load of taxes and debts under which the people and the kingdom already groaned: but the popularity of the new secretary, and the vigorous opposition he and his colleagues had ever made to German connections, charmed the nation into a compliance with a measure, the bare suspicion of which would have lost any other ministry all the confidence of the people.

His royal highness the duke of Cumberland having been appointed, by his majesty, commander in chief of the army to be raised in Germany to observe the motions of the French, he set out accordingly for Hanover in the beginning of April.

The change in the ministry which had taken place at the close of the last year, had been generally considered as an act of prudence, and a just regard to the general voice, which was heard from all quarters of the kingdom, exclaiming against the mal-administration of those in power. The public was pleased with the change, especially when it was observed what measures the new ministry took to correct and amend the false steps of their predecessors, to restore the honour and credit of the nation, to lessen public expences, by reducing the enormous salaries of the great officers of state, and the vast number of useless places; and put the national affairs upon such a footing as to give lustre to the crown, and safety to the people. This was visible in all their proceedings.

In the very beginning of this year a design was formed for reducing the important fortress of Louisbourg under our dominion; and eleven ships of the line, a fire-ship, a bomb-ketch, and fifty transports, were ordered, under the command of sir Edward Hawke, to get ready for North America. The admiral was to take on board six thousand two hundred effective men, exclusive of officers, to be commanded by general Hopson, assisted by lord Charles Hay. Admiral Osborn was sent with another squadron to reinforce that already in the Mediterranean under admiral Saunders. A squadron was also dispatched to the East Indies under the command of commodore Stephens; and our interest in the West Indies was consulted by sending a fleet to Jamaica, under the command of admiral Coates.

But as faction is ever restless, and envy ever blind to merit, these gentlemen, whose views carried with them all the appearances of a noble disinterestedness, as well in the senate as in the cabinet, could not escape the common lot of patriots. Those of the old ministry who had been displaced to make room for these, were too much concerned, both in interest and reputation, to sit down quiet under their dismission, especially when the conduct of their successors gave daily opportunities for drawing comparisons so very humiliating to their administration; and so well were they versed in the intrigues of a court, that they found it no difficult matter to poison the royal ear, by the most injurious representations of the new ministers, whom they set forth as obstinate, imperious, ignorant, and even lukewarm in their loyalty. In these endeavours they were powerfully assisted by such of their faction as had been still continued in places of power about the crown. Add to this, that as they still sat in the same senate and council with their antagonists, they to the utmost of their power combated every scheme that was proposed by them. Thus, by clogging the wheels of state, and distracting our councils, the good purposes of the ministry were frustrated, and the government put into such an agitation, that his majesty was in a manner forced into a new change of administration. Accordingly, on the ninth of April Mr. Pitt, by the royal command, resigned the seals of secretary of state for the southern department. In the room of Mr. Legge, the king was pleased to grant the office of chancellor of the Exchequer to the right honourable lord Mansfield, chief-justice of the court of King's Bench, whom we have formerly mentioned by the name of Mr. Murray, and who had been lately ennobled in consideration of his eminent services. Mr. Pitt's dismission was accompanied with those of several of his friends. The board of admiralty was changed, and the earl of Winchilsea put at its head; and some other removals were made, all of the same tendency. Mr. Fox, ſervice was every-where propagated amongſt the lower and middling claſs of people, that in counties whoſe lieutenants were well diſpoſed and well officered, it was the utmoſt difficulty to raiſe the common men by ballot; and ſcarce any where could it be performed for ſome time, without great diſcontent, and even riots. The farmers and landholders were frightened with an opinion that the militia would rob them of their ſervants; and the labouring men were terrified with the ſuggeſtion that they would be miſuſed, and ſent to fight the battles of ſome foreign prince or ſtate, or be tranſported like felons to the plantations of America. It was read in the house of commons, with a copy of the treaty between his majesty and the king of Prussia, which was approved, and his majesty's request granted, two hundred thousand pounds being appropriated for the relief of the king of Prussia, and maintaining the army of observation. Smoothly as this measure passed down with the legislature, it was by no means relished by the bulk of the nation, who could not without regret behold us thus hurrying into a continental war, which might embarrass our operations by sea, take off our attention to the capital object of America, and tend to increase the enormous load of taxes and debts under which the people and the kingdom already groaned: but the popularity of the new secretary, and the vigorous opposition he and his colleagues had ever made to German connections, charmed the nation into a compliance with a measure, the bare suspicion of which would have lost any other ministry all the confidence of the people.

His royal highness the duke of Cumberland having been appointed, by his majesty, commander in chief of the army to be raised in Germany to observe the motions of the French, he set out accordingly for Hanover in the beginning of April.

The change in the ministry which had taken place at the close of the last year, had been generally considered as an act of prudence, and a just regard to the general voice, which was heard from all quarters of the kingdom, exclaiming against the mal-administration of those in power. The public was pleased with the change, especially when it was observed what measures the new ministry took to correct and amend the false steps of their predecessors, to restore the honour and credit of the nation, to lessen public expences, by reducing the enormous salaries of the great officers of state, and the vast number of useless places; and put the national affairs upon such a footing as to give lustre to the crown, and safety to the people. This was visible in all their proceedings.

In the very beginning of this year a design was formed for reducing the important fortress of Louisbourg under our dominion; and eleven ships of the line, a fire-ship, a bomb-ketch, and fifty transports, were ordered, under the command of sir Edward Hawke, to get ready for North America. The admiral was to take on board six thousand two hundred effective men, exclusive of officers, to be commanded by general Hopson, assisted by lord Charles Hay. Admiral Osborn was sent with another squadron to reinforce that already in the Mediterranean under admiral Saunders. A squadron was also dispatched to the East Indies under the command of commodore Stephens; and our interest in the West Indies was consulted by sending a fleet to Jamaica, under the command of admiral Coates.

But as faction is ever restless, and envy ever blind to merit, these gentlemen, whose views carried with them all the appearances of a noble disinterestedness, as well in the senate as in the cabinet, could not escape the common lot of patriots. Those of the old ministry who had been displaced to make room for these, were too much concerned, both in interest and reputation, to sit down quiet under their dismission, especially when the conduct of their successors gave daily opportunities for drawing comparisons so very humiliating to their administration; and so well were they versed in the intrigues of a court, that they found it no difficult matter to poison the royal ear, by the most injurious representations of the new ministers, whom they set forth as obstinate, imperious, ignorant, and even lukewarm in their loyalty. In these endeavours they were powerfully assisted by such of their faction as had been still continued in places of power about the crown. Add to this, that as they still sat in the same senate and council with their antagonists, they to the utmost of their power combated every scheme that was proposed by them. Thus, by clogging the wheels of state, and distracting our councils, the good purposes of the ministry were frustrated, and the government put into such an agitation, that his majesty was in a manner forced into a new change of administration. Accordingly, on the ninth of April Mr. Pitt, by the royal command, resigned the seals of secretary of state for the southern department. In the room of Mr. Legge, the king was pleased to grant the office of chancellor of the Exchequer to the right honourable lord Mansfield, chief-justice of the court of King's Bench, whom we have formerly mentioned by the name of Mr. Murray, and who had been lately ennobled in consideration of his eminent services. Mr. Pitt's dismission was accompanied with those of several of his friends. The board of admiralty was changed, and the earl of Winchilsea put at its head; and some other removals were made, all of the same tendency. Mr. Fox, who had been ſecretary of ſtate, but diſplaced to make room for Mr. Pitt, was gratified with the lucrative office of paymaſter-general of the forces; but no gentleman could be prevailed upon to ſucceed Mr. Pitt in his employment; and indeed it was at this time a very tickliſh poſt: the ſtrain of popular favour ran with ſuch vehemence on the ſide of the latter, and his colleague Mr. Legge, that it required a perſon of the moſt diſtinguiſhed abilities to give common ſatisfaction in the management of national affairs. In the mean time, the people, who idolized the now diſplaced miniſters, ſeemed to vie in diſplaying their reſpect and affection for them, which was immediately ſhewn by preſentations of freedoms from a number of the moſt populous and opulent corporations, with addreſſes of thanks to Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge for their integrity and ſervices, incloſed in gold boxes, and other elegant materials, enriched with emblems conveying the ſentiments of national approbation. But as I ſhall have occaſion again to touch upon this head, I ſhall ſay no more at preſent, but reſume the account of parliamentary proceedings, and continue them to the end of the ſeſſion, to preſerve entire the connection of the many other intereſting events, as well foreign as domeſtic, that diſtinguiſhed this year.

It muſt be acknowleged, to the honour of this parliament, that they were in general extremely ready to adopt any ſcheme that ſeemed calculated for the intereſt of the nation. The ſociety of the Free Britiſh Fiſhery preſented a petition, importing, "That having been obliged, in the infancy of their undertaking, to incur a much larger expence than was at that time foreſeen, they now found themſelves ſuch conſiderable loſers, as to be utterly incapable of carrying on the fiſheries with any proſpect of ſucceſs, unleſs aſſiſted by farther bounty from parliament; that they therefore hoped, that, for the proſecution of the fiſheries, they might have liberty to make uſe of ſuch nets as they ſhould find beſt adapted to the ſaid fiſheries, each buſs carrying to ſea the ſame quantity and depth of netting which, by the fiſhery acts, they were then bound to carry; that the bounty of thirty ſhillings per ton, allowed by the ſaid acts on the veſſels employed in the fiſhery, might be increaſed; and that, inaſmuch as many of the ſtock-proprietors were unable to advance any farther ſum for carrying on this branch of commerce; and others unwilling, in the preſent ſituation, and under the preſent reſtraint, to venture any further ſum in the undertaking; that the ſtock of the ſociety, by the ſaid acts made unalienable, except in caſe of death or bankruptcy, for a term of years, might forthwith be made transferable; and that the petitioners might be at liberty, between the intervals of the fiſhing ſeaſons, to employ the buſſes in ſuch a manner as they ſhould find for the intereſt of the ſociety."

The houſe having taken the ſubſtance of this petition into conſideration, granted the ſeveral requeſts therein contained, and augmented the bounty of thirty ſhillings per ton to fifty. About the ſame time, and in conſequence of a petition preſented by the city of London, a bill was prepared and paſſed into a law, for the more effectual preſervation and improvement of the fry and ſpawn of fiſh in the river of Thames and water of Medway; and for the better regulating the fiſhery in theſe rivers. The two next meaſures adopted by the parliament which merit our notice were, firſt, a bill for the relief of the poor and diſtreſſed ſilk manufacturers, who were deprived of all employment, and conſequently of the means of ſubſiſtence, through the interruption of the Levant trade, occaſioned by the war, and the delay of the merchant ſhips from Italy. By this bill, therefore, liberty was given to any perſons to import from any place, in any ſhip or veſſel whatever, till the firſt day of December 1757, organzine thrown ſilk, of the growth or produce of Italy, to be brought to the cuſtom-houſe of London whereſoever landed; but that no Italian thrown ſilk coarſer than that of Bologna, nor any tram of the growth of Italy, nor any thrown ſilk of the growth or produce of Turky, Perſia, Eaſt India, or China, ſhould be imported by this act, on pain of forfeiting the commodity. This bill was doubtleſs a deviation from the famous act of navigation, and was remonſtrated againſt as ſuch by petitions from divers merchants and importers of raw ſilk, and others, who thought their intereſts hurt by it; but the parliament overlooked this temporary inconvenience, for the ſake of furniſhing a preſent ſupply to the poor manufacturers, who were actually reduced to the loweſt depth of diſtreſs.

Such were the miſeries which the poor had ſuffered, both the laſt year and this, by the exceſſive price of corn, that it had driven them into repeated riots in different parts of the kingdom; and in many inſtances the behaviour of the rioters had been deſtructive of all law and ſociety. Nevertheleſs, as it was notorious that the frauds of foreſtallers and engroſſers had in great meaſure occaſioned the ſcarcity, the government was very ſparing of puniſhment towards the ill-judging authors of theſe tumults; and the parliament taking this affair into their conſideration, reſolved to apply ſuch a remedy as appeared to them moſt likely to prevent the return of this national calamity; and a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, to explain and amend the laws againſt regrators, foreſtallers, and engroſſers of corn. Enquiry was alſo made into the abuſes of millers and bakers, with regard to bread, who were accuſed of having adulterated this indiſpenſible neceſſary of life with common whiting, lime, allum, and other ingredients pernicious to the human conſtitution.

But the moſt intereſting meaſure purſued by the houſe of commons during this ſeſſion, and that which at once moſt excited the attention, and flattered the wiſhes of the people, was the enquiry into the loſs of Minorca, which had raiſed ſuch univerſal clamour throughout the nation. Pretty early in the ſeſſion the commons addreſſed his majeſty, That he would be pleaſed to order to be laid before them copies of all the letters and papers, containing any intelligence received by the ſecretaries of ſtate, the commiſſioners of the admiralty, or any others of his majeſty's miniſters, in relation to the equipment of the French fleet at Toulon, or the deſigns of the French on Minorca, or any other of his majeſty's poſſeſſions in Europe, ſince the firſt day of January 1755, to the firſt day of laſt Auguſt. They likewiſe begged leave to peruſe a liſt of the ſhips of war that were equipped and made ready for ſea, from the 1ſt of Auguſt 1755, to the 30th day of April in the following year; with the copies of all ſailing orders ſent to the commanders during that period; as alſo the ſtate and condition of his majeſty's ſhips in the ſeveral ports of Great Britain, at the time of admiral Byng's departure, with the ſquadron under his command, for the relief of Fort St. Philip, during the period abovementioned, according to the monthly returns made to the admiralty, with the number of ſeamen muſtered and borne on board the reſpective ſhips. They demanded copies of all orders and inſtructions given to that admiral, and of letters written to and received from him, during his continuance in that command, either by the ſecretaries of ſtate or lords of the admiralty, relating to the condition of his ſquadron, and to the execution of his orders. In a word, they required the inſpection of all papers which could in any manner tend to explain the loſs of Minorca, and the miſcarriage of Mr. Byng's ſquadron.

To theſe addreſſes his majeſty moſt graciouſly gave his acquieſcence; but they whoſe ſafety depended upon intricacy, confuſion, and a majority, which they ſpared no arts of whatever kind to obtain, ſo managed, that this enquiry was committed to the whole houſe, and the papers were ſwelled into ſuch a prepoſterous number, that it required more time than a whole ſeſſion of parliament would allow. However, the proceedings of the miniſtry received the protection of a parliamentary approbation, though this could by no means ſilence the murmurings of the people, who expected at leaſt that the examinations that came before the committee, in the courſe of their enquiry into this important affair, and their proceedings in conſequence thereof, would have been made public; but in this they were all diſappointed. However, it muſt be confeſſed, that the readineſs his majeſty ſhewed to gratify his people by ſifting this ſhameful affair to the bottom, and the exemplary, though perhaps ſevere puniſhment inflicted upon the ſuppoſed author of our naval diſgrace in the Mediterranean, without any regard paid to family, former ſervices, or even favourable circumſtances, ſtruck terror into our commanders both by ſea and land, who were now clearly convinced, that they could hope for no countenance from their ſovereign, ſhould they betray a timorous or inactive conduct in the day of trial. Thus it was the means of reviving that courage and vigour for which Britons had been ſo long and ſo juſtly famous, and greatly damped the ſpirits of our boaſting enemy, whoſe valour had ariſen only from our timidity, and whoſe ſucceſs was owing to our negligence.

On the fourth day of July, the ſeſſion was cloſed with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein his majeſty was pleaſed to aſſure the parliament, that the ſuccour and preſervation of America had been his conſtant care, and, next to the ſecurity of his kingdoms, ſhould continue to be his great and principal object: that he had taken ſuch meaſures, as, he truſted, by the bleſſing of God, would effectually diſappoint the deſigns of the enemy in thoſe parts: that he had no farther view but to vindicate the juſt rights of his crown and ſubjects from the moſt injurious encroachments; to preſerve tranquility, as far as the circumſtances of things might admit; and to prevent the true friends of Britain, and the liberties of Europe, from being oppreſſed and endangered by any unprovoked and unnatural conjunction.

We now come to another change or rather ſettlement in the miniſtry; and indeed, it was high time that this material point ſhould be adjuſted, as our councils had been for ſome time in a continual fluctuation, ſo that no ſchemes could be purſued, no enterpriſe of moment undertaken for the good of the nation. Three months and upwards had elapſed in this uncertainty; the trading part of the kingdom in general wiſhed to ſee Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge replaced in their former ſtations; but the other party, I mean the old miniſtry, could not bear the thoughts of ſeeing the higheſt and moſt lucrative places of the ſtate occupied by thoſe who were the only means of turning them out. Long and warm was the conteſt betwixt them, which perhaps would not have ended without ſome terrible convulſion in the ſtate, had not ſome leading men, of moderate principles, interpoſed with their ſalutary advice, which was, for both parties to conſent to a compromiſe, and by taking in ſome of each, to form a coalition. This was a prudent and well-judged expedient, as it offered the only poſſible means of allaying the rage of faction, and healing thoſe diviſions which were likely to prove more pernicious to the public than were the miſtaken conduct and counſels that had been ſo much complained of. This expedient being approved of and adopted, his majeſty, in conſequence thereof, was pleaſed to reſtore the ſeals to Mr. Pitt, appointing him ſecretary of ſtate for the ſouthern department, on the twentieth day of June, and five days after, Mr. Legge was reinſtated in the office of chancellor of the exchequer, promotions that afforded univerſal ſatisfaction: ſir Robert Henley was made lord keeper of the great ſeal on the thirtieth day of June; the cuſtody of the privy ſeal was committed to lord Temple; a new board of Treaſury was appointed with the duke of Newcaſtle at the head; and lord Anſon was appointed the firſt lord of the admiralty; the earl of Thomond was made treaſurer of the king's houſhold, and Mr. Fox paymaſter general: in a word, the royal favour was ſo equally diſtributed, that all animoſities being now forgot, and former irregularities buried in oblivion, all parties ſeemed to harmonize in one view, the public good; which happy diſpoſition produced effects far exceeding the moſt ſanguine expectations, and this prudent arrangement was highly applauded by all who were not under the influence of violent attachment to party, or a narrow and excluſive ſpirit.

Having given this ſuccinct view of the ſtate of the adminiſtration at home, let us now turn our eyes to the continent, where we ſhall find the beginning of this year marked with a ſtriking inſtance of the dreadful effects of frantic enthuſiaſm, in the attempt made upon the life of the king of France, on the fifth day of January, at Verſailles, in preſence of his ſon the dauphin, and ſurrounded by his guards and all the great officers of the crown. This extraordinary affair happened in the following manner:

A wretch of the dregs of the people, named Robert Francis Damien, born in a little village in the neighbourhood of Arras, had lived a conſiderable time as a ſervant with ſeveral families in Paris, but had been ſucceſſively diſmiſſed from his places on account account of a paſſionate and gloomy diſpoſition, which approached to a degree of madneſs. The general murmurings which he had heard about the baniſhing the parliament, on account of the diſputes concerning the adminiſtring the ſacraments, had heated his indignation: it ſeems he had no deſign to kill the king, which indeed he might eaſily have done, but only to wound him, in order (to make uſe of his own words at the time of his trial) that God might touch his majeſty's heart, and work on him to reſtore them to their former footing. The archbiſhop of Paris, he ſaid, was the ſole cauſe of all theſe troubles; and that, for his part, the only motive that urged him to the commiſſion of this act was "for religion's ſake." All thoſe who have attempted the lives of chriſtian princes, have made uſe of this pretext: it is ſufficiently known that Henry III. and IV. of France fell by the hands of fanatics, but there was this difference between them and Lewis XV. that they were murdered becauſe they appeared to be enemies to the pope, and Lewis was ſtabbed for having ſeemed deſirous to oblige the pope.

The aſſaſſin had provided himſelf with a claſp knife, one ſide of which had a long ſharp-pointed blade, and the other was to cut pens with, and was about four inches long: he waited for the inſtant the king was to get into his coach to go to Trianon. It was near ſix o'clock in the evening, the day was ſhut in, the weather was exceſſively cold, ſo that almoſt all the court were wrapped up in large cloaks. The villain, who wore a large cloak alſo, puſhes through the guards, bruſhes the dauphin as he paſſes by him, gets in between the body guard and the king, who was juſt ſtepping into his coach, ſtrikes him with his penknife in the right ſide, between the fourth and fifth ribs, returns his knife into his pocket again, and remains upon the ſpot with his hat upon his head. The king finding himſelf wounded, turned about, and ſeeing a ſtrange man ſtanding cloſe by him, with his hat on, and his eyes ſtaring wildly, cried out, "I am wounded! ſtop that man, but do not hurt him."

Happily the king's wound was but ſlight; however, as there remained ſuſpicion that the inſtrument might have been poiſoned, ſeveral experiments were made upon animals, all of which ſerved to relieve the people from their apprehenſions. As for Damien, he made no attempt to eſcape, but ſuffered himſelf quietly to be ſeized; he was conveyed to priſon, and ſoon brought to his trial, when all his anſwers ſerved to diſcover that he was in an abſolute ſtate of inſanity, and what was the cauſe of his madneſs; it was evident, that the king's treatment of the parliament, and the complaints both they and the public made againſt the archbiſhop of Paris, had turned the brain of the criminal, and ſtirred him up to this attempt. The unhappy wretch was afterwards put to the torture, in order to extort a confeſſion, if he had any accomplices; but notwithſtanding every ſpecies of cruelty that human invention could deviſe was practiſed upon him, it had no effect; no ſufferings being ſufficient to make him break ſilence. To render his puniſhment more public, he was conveyed to Paris, there to undergo a repetition of all his former tortures, a relation of which would be equally foreign to our purpoſe and diſagreeable to our inclination; ſuffice it to ſay, that his miſeries were at length terminated by being drawn aſunder by four young and vigorous horſes; after which, his body and limbs were reduced to aſhes under the ſcaffold; his father, wife, daughter, and family, baniſhed the kingdom for ever; the name of Damien effaced and obliterated, and the innocent involved in the puniſhment of the guilty.

Lewis had no ſooner recovered, than in order the more effectually to fulfil his engagements with the empreſs queen, he raiſed two great armies. The firſt of theſe, conſiſting of eighty thouſand men, the choiceſt troops of France, were put under the command of M. d'Eſtrées, a general of great reputation, under whom ſerved M. de Contades, M. Chevert, the count de St. Germain, all officers of diſtinguiſhed bravery and abilities. This formidable army croſſed the Rhine early in the ſpring, marched by Weſtphalia, ſeized upon the town of Embden, and whatever belonged to the king of Pruſſia in Eaſt Frieſland, and by ſlow marches made the beſt diſpoſitions to over-run Hanover. M. d'Etrées fixed upon Munſter for his head-quarters.

The other army of the French conſiſted of twenty-five thouſand men, under the command of the prince de Soubiſe, and was deſtined to join the imperial army acting againſt the king of Pruſſia and his allies; and before Soubiſe paſſed the Rhine, he took poſſeſſion of ſeveral places belonging to the king of Pruſſia in the Low Countries.

In the mean time the empreſs of Ruſſia, true to her engagements with her imperial ſiſter, diſpatched one hundred and thirty thouſand of her troops to her aſſiſtance, under the command of general count Apraxin, who began his march in the month of November of the preceding year 1756, and advanced to the borders of Lithuania, with a view particularly to invade Ducal Pruſſia, while a very ſtrong fleet was equipped in the Baltic, to act in concert with this numerous army.

The Auſtrian army aſſembled in Bohemia, conſiſted of upwards of an hundred thouſand men, headed by prince Charles of Lorraine and marſhal Brown. The Swedes, though their king was allied in blood and inclination to his Pruſſian majeſty, were very inclinable to accede to the general confederacy againſt him; and the duke of Mecklenburgh embraced the ſame party, and engaged to join the Swediſh army, whenever it ſhould be aſſembled, with ſix thouſand men. The deſtruction of his Pruſſian majeſty now ſeemed ſo certain, that the Aulic council no longer kept any meaſures, but openly declared him to have incurred the ban of the empire in his quality of elector of Brandenburgh, and to have forfeited all his rights, privileges, immunities, &c.

Frederick, thus ſurrounded on all ſides by enemies, did not however loſe for an inſtant that courage and prudence which have ever diſtinguiſhed him in all his ſituations, and have gained him the admiration of all Europe. He ordered Mr. Henouin, the French miniſter at Dreſden, to depart that city; and having thrown two bridges over the Elbe, early in the ſpring he commanded the ſeveral diſtricts of the electorate of Saxony to furniſh him with great numbers of waggons, each drawn by four horſes; the circles of Miſnia and Leipſic were required to provide four hundred each, and the other circles in proportion: and as he was well informed, that the alarming progreſs of the Ruſſian troops was ſtopped, by the want of proviſions and of forage, he adhered to the wiſe maxim he had always adopted, of removing the ſeat of war as far as poſſible from his own dominions, and determined to carry it into Bohemia, there to attack the Auſtrians with his united force.

With this view he ordered his armies in Saxony, Miſnia, Luſatia, and Sileſia, to enter Bohemia in four different places at the ſame time; the firſt body or grand army he took under his own command, attended by marſhal Keith; the ſecond was commanded by prince Maurice of Anhalt Deſſau; the third by prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick Bevern; and the fourth by that gallant and experienced general marſhal Schwerin. All theſe armies began to move the ſame day, viz. April the eighth; and the deſign was ſo well concealed, and their ſeveral routes ſo wiſely directed, that they entered Bohemia almoſt without oppoſition, the Auſtrians never ſuſpecting the leaſt of ſuch a viſit, till the Pruſſians were conſiderably paſſed the frontiers.

To deceive the Auſtrians, the king diſpatched the prince of Bevern with his army towards Egra. From this appearance the enemy judged, that though he deſigned the Bevern and Schwerin armies ſhould penetrate into Bohemia, yet he did not intend to join them with his own; and ſeeing the Pruſſian troops thus divided, M. Brown ſent a conſiderable detachment, under the command of general Aremberg, to oppoſe the corps marching towards Egra. This event the king of Pruſſia had foreſeen, and was prepared for it; for by a ſudden motion towards the left, he cut off all communication between Aremberg's detachment and the main army. The Auſtrians, however, did not perceive the king's view, but exulted in an event which was the certain prelude to their own deſtruction. They miſtook this ſtroke of generalſhip for a retreat, and confidently gave out that the Pruſſians were fled.

Mean while, the prince of Bevern advancing at the head of his army from his quarters of cantonment near Zittau in Luſatia, made himſelf maſter without the leaſt oppoſition of the firſt poſt of Bohemia, at Krottau and Grottenſtein, drove away the enemy from Kratzow, and continued his route towards Reichemberg, where the enemy's army, conſiſting of twenty-eight thouſand men, commanded by count Koniglег, was poſted. This brought on an action on the twenty-firſt of April, which redounded highly to the honour of the prince of Bevern; for though there were many defiles in his way, and the enemy was in poſſeſſion of ſeveral advantageous eminences, he gained a complete victory, driving the enemy before him above a mile. This action began at ſix o'clock in the morning, and laſted five hours. The loſs of the enemy was ſaid to amount to 1000 killed and wounded, twenty of them officers; 400 ſoldiers were taken priſoners, and three ſtandards remained with the victors, who on their ſide had only ſeven ſubaltern officers, and one hundred rank and file, killed; one general, ſixteen other officers, and about one hundred and fifty rank and file, wounded.

Marſhal Schwerin's army marched with incredible expedition, and reached Koningſhorff, on the Elbe, the twentieth. He entered Bohemia in five different places at once, and found the inhabitants in the utmoſt conſternation. The enemy immediately filled the dangerous defile of Gulder Ouſſel with Pandours, to diſpute his progreſs in Bohemia; but they were defeated as ſoon as diſcovered. A conſiderable magazine, conſiſting of forty thouſand buſhels of oats, and two thouſand barrels of meal, was ſeized at Jung Buntzlau. The Auſtrians every where fled before him; and he joined the prince of Bevern almoſt without loſs, making himſelf maſter of the circle of Buntzlau; and the neighbouring country ſubmitted to the Pruſſians almoſt without oppoſition. The prince of Anhalt Deſſau with his corps drew near the king of Pruſſia's army.

Mean while the king, at the head of the principal army, moved along the Elbe, and after paſſing the Eger, advanced to Budin; whence the Auſtrians, who had an advantageous camp there, withdrew to Waſtwarn, half way between Budin and Prague; and as his majeſty thought, from the motions of count Brown, that the Auſtrians would make a ſtand at the plain of Giffchen, he paſſed the Moldau at the head of thirty thouſand men, leaving the command of the reſt of the army under the command of the prince of Anhalt Deſſau.

I have already obſerved, that by a ſudden and maſterly movement, his majeſty had cut off all communication between the detachment of twenty thouſand men, which had been ſent to watch his motions, under count Aremberg, and the main army of the Auſtrians. Having gained this advantage, to weaken the enemy, the latter became more cautious; and though they had been reinforced by an army from Moravia, by the remains of the troops lately defeated by the prince of Bevern, and by ſeveral regiments of the garriſon of Prague, ſo that they were now near one hundred thouſand ſtrong; yet, inſtead of marching in queſt of the invaders, to prevent their uniting, prince Charles of Lorraine and count Brown reſolved to wait their approach, having ſtrongly intrenched themſelves on the banks of the Moldau, to the north of Prague, in a camp ſo fortified by every advantage of nature and art, as to be deemed almoſt impregnable. The left wing of the Auſtrians was ſecured by the mountains of Ziſcka, and the right extended as far as Herboholi.

The vivacity of the Pruſſian hero was not, however, to be damped by theſe difficulties. Being joined, immediately on his croſſing the Moldau, by the troops under marſhal Schwerin and the prince of Bevern, according to the excellent diſpoſitions he had made for that purpoſe, he reſolved to attack the enemy in their camp with theſe united forces the ſame day, being the ſixth of May. Accordingly, orders were given for the army to file off on the left of Potſchernitz, in order to execute this deſign. Upon this motion of the Pruſſians, count Brown was obliged to wheel to the right, to avoid being flanked. The Pruſſians continued their march to Bichowitz, traverſing ſeveral defiles and moraſſes, which for a little while ſeparated the infantry from the reſt of the army; and they having begun the attack with too much precipitation, were at firſt repulſed. Here that brave general, marſhal Schwerin, received a mortal wound as he was encouraging the men, and died at the age of eighty-two, covered with military honour, and deeply regretted by his ſovereign and the whole army. The infantry which had been ſeparated in their march being now rejoined, made a freſh attack on the enemy's right wing, and entirely broke it; while the cavalry on the left, after three charges, compelled all the Auſtrian horſe in their right wing to retire in great confuſion; the Pruſſian troops in the center then attacked and entirely routed that of the enemy. The left wing of the Pruſſian army now advanced towards Michely, and being there joined by the horſe, renewed their attack on the Auſtrians, who were retreating towards Saſzawa. In the mean time, the troops on the right attacked the remains of the left wing of the Auſtrians, and made themſelves maſters of three batteries. But the behaviour of the infantry in the laſt attack was ſo courageous, as to leave little to be done by this part of the cavalry.

Prince Henry of Pruſſia and the prince of Bevern performed wonders, taking from the enemy, ſword in hand, two of their batteries; and prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic took the left wing of the Auſtrians in flank, while the king with his left, a body of cavalry, ſecured the paſſage of the Moldau. In a word, after a very long and obſtinate diſpute, and many ſignal examples of valour, the enemy was forced to abandon the field of battle, leaving behind them the greateſt part of their baggage, and indeed their whole camp. The remains of their left wing, to the amount of ten or twelve thouſand men, fled toward Benetſchau, where they were afterwards aſſembled by M. Pretlach, general of horſe. The infantry retired towards Prague, with their commanders prince Charles of Lorraine and marſhal Brown; but they were greatly harraſſed in their retreat by a detachment of the Pruſſians under M. Keith. The number of the priſoners taken on this occaſion by the victors amounted to four thouſand, thirty of whom were officers of diſtinction. Their loſs amounted to about two thouſand killed and three thouſand wounded. Among the former, beſides M. Schwerin, were the prince of Holſtein Beck, one other general, and three colonels; among the latter, five generals. The number of the killed and wounded on the ſide of the Auſtrians was much greater. Marſhal Brown received a wound which, from the chagrin he ſuffered, proved mortal ſoon after.

As the greateſt part of the Auſtrian army, ſoon after their defeat, retreated and took ſhelter in Prague, that large city was preſently inveſted by the victorious Pruſſians, commanded by their king on the ſide of the Moldau, and by marſhal Keith on the other. In four days the whole city was ſurrounded with lines and entrenchments, by which all communication from without was entirely cut off, and about forty-eight thouſand Auſtrians incloſed within the walls, with prince Charles of Lorraine, marſhal Brown, the two princes of Saxony, and moſt of their chief generals.

Every thing remained quiet on both ſides, ſcarce a ſingle cannon being fired for ſome time after the blockade was formed. The Auſtrian general, however, in order to eaſe the city of the multitude of forces cooped up uſeleſs within the walls, ſerving only to conſume the proviſions, formed a deſign to attack the Pruſſian army in the night, and, if poſſible, cut a way through the camp of the beſiegers. With this view, in the night between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of May, the Auſtrians made a furious ſally with 12,000 men, commanded by prince Charles of Lorraine in perſon, and attacked the Pruſſians on the ſide of marſhal Keith's quarters at Weiſſenberg. Happily his Pruſſian majeſty had received intelligence of the enemy's deſign by a deſerter that very afternoon, and was prepared for their viſit; ſo that the Auſtrians found the attack turned upon themſelves, and were forced to retreat into the town with very conſiderable loſs. On the twenty-ninth, the Pruſſian artillery being arrived, they began to batter and bombard the town in a moſt furious manner, which they continued without intermiſſion till the eighteenth of June, whereby the city was reduced to a heap of rubbiſh, and the inhabitants and numerous garriſon were reduced to ſuch diſtreſs for proviſions, that they were obliged to ſubſiſt upon horſe-fleſh. The Pruſſian monarch and his army now ſhared in imagination the ſpoils of the ancient and illuſtrious houſe of Auſtria, whoſe affairs were indeed in a moſt deſperate ſituation. The diſtance from Prague to the archduchy of Auſtria was not very conſiderable, and ſecured only by the Danube. Vienna trembled leſt ſhe ſhould next experience the horrors of a ſiege; and all the empreſs-queen's hereditary dominions lay open and expoſed.

In this critical ſtate of affairs the empreſs-queen appointed Leopold count Daun to the command of the Auſtrian forces. This general had never commanded in chief before, but had acquired great experience under the beſt officers in Europe, particularly the great Khevenhuller, who was extremely fond of him. He was cautious, ſteady, penetrating, and ſagacious: he never truſted that to hazard which could be effected by a prudent delay: he was circumſpect in all his meaſures, and impenetrable in his deſigns. Such was the general on whom the court of Vienna now caſt its eyes, as the propereſt perſon to ſtem the torrent of diſgrace that had well-nigh overwhelmed its arms, to ſave his country from ruin, and by his prudence and cautiouſneſs to check the fire and vigour of the Pruſſian monarch, who, ſetting no bounds to his ambition and arms, ſeemed to truſt all to his good fortune and military ſkill.

Count Daun arriving at Boemiſchrod, within a few miles of Prague, the day after the defeat of the grand army, he began to collect the fugitive corps that had fled from the fate of that day; and ſoon aſſembled a force ſo conſiderable as to attract the attention of his Pruſſian majeſty, who detached the prince of Bevern with twenty battalions and thirty ſquadrons to obſerve his motions, and with orders to attack him before his numbers ſhould become too formidable: but Daun acted on more ſure principles than to ſtake the ruin of a cauſe he was ſent to retrieve, on the chance of a battle, with troops that were ſunk in diſgrace, and in want almoſt of every neceſſary, againſt an army flushed with victory, and abounding with all conveniencies for ſubſiſtence and action. Accordingly, he no ſooner heard that the prince of Bevern was on his march towards him, than he retreated to the Elbe, and intrenched himſelf ſtrongly in a camp at Malleſchau near Kolin, opened a way for the daily ſupply of recruits ſent to his army, and by this conduct and ſituation inſpired the garriſon of Prague with freſh courage, who expected ſoon to be relieved.

In the mean time the king of Pruſſia, diſtracted with impatience at the length of the ſiege of Prague, whoſe ſurrender within a few days after being inveſted he had looked upon as certain; and finding that count Daun's army was daily increaſing, and would ſoon be able not only to oppoſe the detachment under the prince of Bevern, but even in a condition to raiſe the ſiege; reſolved to march and give the count battle with one part of his army, while he kept Prague blocked up with the other. Marſhal Keith remonſtrated earneſtly againſt this meaſure, and adviſed him to wait for the Auſtrians attempting to raiſe the ſiege, as thirty-two thouſand men, which was the whole number ſet apart by the king for that ſervice, was a very inadequate force to attack an army of ſixty thouſand men (for ſo many did Daun by this time count under him) commanded by a brave and experienced general. Impetuous in valour, and blinded with his amazing ſucceſſes, Frederic rejected this ſage counſel, bid defiance to all oppoſition, and on the thirteenth of June quitted the camp before Prague, eſcorted by a few battalions and ſquadrons, with which he joined the prince of Bevern's army at Milkowitz. After this junction the king advanced on the eighteenth towards Kolin, in the neighbourhood of which count Daun had his camp, defended by a prodigious train of artillery which he had cauſed to be brought from Olmutz, and had placed on redoubts and batteries erected on the moſt advantageous poſts, with lines and heavy pieces of cannon at every acceſſible part of the camp.

When the Pruſſians came in ſight of the enemy, they found them drawn up in three lines, on a very high ground, between Genlitz and St. John the Baptiſt, which was rendered almoſt inacceſſible by ſeveral difficult defiles that ran along the foot of the hills. Notwithſtanding this advantageous poſition, his majeſty began the attack between two and three in the afternoon, and made himſelf maſter of two eminences, on which were the enemy's principal batteries, and two villages defended with infantry; but could not force the third poſt, the fire of the enemy was ſo violent, though they returned ſeven times ſucceſſively to the charge, led on by that valiant ſoldier and great general prince Ferdinand: but as their cavalry could not act in their ſupport, they were obliged to give it up. The king was now in an agony of deſpair at the fatal conſequences that were likely to attend his precipitate reſolution, taken contrary to the good advice of a faithful ſervant, whoſe valour was tutored by experience. He reſolved, however, to make one more furious effort to retrieve, if poſſible, the diſgrace he had ſuſtained. With this reſolution, he put himſelf at the head of his cavalry, and attacked the left wing of the enemy with the greateſt bravery, expoſing his perſon in the moſt perilous ſituations, in order to animate his men: but his was a loſt cauſe; the enemy repulſed all his efforts. Fortune however befriended him ſo far, that he drew off his forces, with all his baggage and artillery, in good order, in ſight of the enemy, without their making one attempt to purſue him. Thus ended an action that might more properly be called a carnage than a battle, both armies loſing a prodigious number of men. The Pruſſians had upwards of eight thouſand killed and wounded, and a great number were made priſoners or deſerted. The Auſtrians had above ten thouſand killed and wounded.

Having ſeen his army make good their retreat, the king of Pruſſia's next and immediate care was to prevent the bad effects of this day's work, ſhould the news thereof reach Prague before he could take proper meaſures to ſecure that part of his troops, artillery, &c. employed in the ſiege of that city. Therefore, though he had been on horſeback all day, and preſent at every attack, he left his army at Nimburg, under the command of the prince of Bevern, and with an eſcort of twelve or fourteen huſſars only ſet out for Prague, where he arrived next morning, and immediately gave orders for ſending off all his artillery, ammunition, and baggage, which were all ſafely withdrawn; and the troops had begun their retreat before the Auſtrians in the city heard of the battle; but when they ſaw the Pruſſians retiring, a large body of them ſallied out under the command of prince Charles of Lorraine (marſhal Brown being by this time dead of his wounds) and came up with the rear of the Pruſſians, but found it ſo well covered that they could do very little execution.

Count Daun now entered the city of Prague, amidſt the loud acclamations of the impriſoned Auſtrians, who received him as their deliverer; and the united forces of the imperial generals being now greatly ſuperior to thoſe of the king of Pruſſia, that prince was in a ſhort time obliged to evacuate Bohemia and retire into Saxony. The king attributed the loſs of the battle of Kolin wholly to himſelf. The candour with which he acknowleged his miſtake is ſo extraordinary in a king and a conqueror, that I am perſuaded the reader will not be diſpleaſed to hear it in his majeſty's own words, in a letter to the earl Mariſchal, which alſo gives the beſt narrative and proof of this affair. He firſt does juſtice to the valour of his enemy: "The imperial grenadiers, ſays he, are a noble corps: one hundred companies defended a riſing ground which my beſt infantry could not carry. Ferdinand, who commanded them, returned ſeven times to the charge; but to no purpoſe. At firſt he maſtered a battery, but could not hold it. The enemy had the advantage of a numerous and well-ſerved artillery. It did honour to Lichtenſtein who had the direction. Only the Pruſſian army can diſpute it with him. My infantry were too few. All my cavalry were preſent, and idle ſpectators, excepting a bold puſh by my houſhold troops and ſome dragoons. Ferdinand attacked without powder; the enemy, in return, were not ſparing of theirs. They had the advantage of a riſing ground, of intrenchments, and of a prodigious artillery. Several of my regiments were repulſed by their muſquetry. Henry performed wonders. I tremble for my worthy brothers: they are too brave. Fortune turned her back on me this day. I ought to have expected it: ſhe is a female, and I am no gallant. In fact, I ought to have had more infantry. Succeſs, my dear lord, often occaſions a deſtructive confidence. Twenty-four battalions were not ſufficient to diſlodge ſixty thouſand men from an advantageous poſt. Another time we will do better. I have no reaſon to complain of the bravery of my troops, or the experience of my officers: I alone was in fault, and I hope to repair it." Then, after taking notice of the formidable confederacy againſt him, he concludes thus: "I know not whether it will be a diſgrace

to me to ſubmit; but I am ſure there will be no glory in vanquiſhing me."

He ſupported his diſaſter, however, with a magnanimity that did him infinite honour; and notwithſtanding his ſevere trial, and the melancholy proſpect that ſurrounded him, he ſoon roſe above his misfortunes, and by an amazing viciſſitude of events, turned his diſgrace upon his enemies with ample retaliation. We ſhall leave him, however, for the preſent, and turn our eyes to the other ſide of Germany, which we ſhall find involved in the general bloodſhed and confuſion that now began to deſolate the whole empire.

When the deſigns of the French upon the electorate of Hanover became too obvious to admit of the leaſt doubt, it was thought high time for his Britannic majeſty to take ſuch ſteps as might moſt effectually conduce to the defence and preſervation of his paternal dominions: therefore, very early in the ſpring of this year, orders were ſent thither to recruit the troops that had been ſent back from England, to augment each company, to remount the cavalry with the utmoſt expedition, and not to ſuffer any horſes to be conveyed out of the electorate; as alſo to provide the magazines in that country with all things neceſſary for fifty thouſand men, who were to form an army of obſervation.

But ſuch was the equity of his Britannic majeſty, and his precaution to avoid the leaſt apparent cauſe of provocation to any power to invade his German dominions, that he would not bring an army into the field until he had publiſhed to the world the juſt motives that had compelled him to have recourſe to thoſe means Providence had put in his power to repel the hoſtile deſigns of his enemies. Accordingly, he emitted the following declaration or manifeſto, dated at Hanover, in the month of April:

"His Britannic majeſty, elector of Brunſwic-Lunenbourg, did his utmoſt to prevent the war which hath ariſen between him, as king, and the crown of France, and to regulate in an amicable manner the differences which occaſioned it. His majeſty's endeavours for this end having proved ineffectual, he made it his ſtudy to hinder the war from ſpreading, and the peace of his German dominions in particular, and that of the empire in general, from being involved in diſturbances, in the motives whereof they had no concern.

"For theſe reaſons, and in conſideration of the great probability in the autumn of 1755, that the crown of France, in reſentment of thoſe differences, meditated an attack upon the king's German dominions, his majeſty in the beginning of the following year concluded a treaty with the king of Pruſſia; the intention whereof was, to compel that crown to drop its deſigns, which it was natural to expect would be the conſequence. And another war having, contrary to his majeſty's expectation, broke out ſoon after in the heart of Germany, his majeſty has carefully avoided taking any part in it.

"It is impoſſible for the impartial world, after conſidering his Britannic majeſty's conduct on this occaſion, which manifeſtly tended only to the aforeſaid ends, not to ſee the injuſtice of the motives and pretexts which the court of France would allege to juſtify their invaſion of the electoral territories of Brunſwic, which are under the protection of the empire. If they build their pretext on the war that has broke out between England and France, it is evident that this war, both in its riſe and object, are entirely foreign to his majeſty, as elector, and to his German territories. As to the ſecond war, namely, that which hath been lighted up in Germany, the crown of France, as guarantee of the peace of Weſtphalia, hath not, on one hand, the leaſt pretext to act againſt the aforeſaid ſtates, whilſt they cannot convict his majeſty of any contravention of the ſaid peace: and, on the other hand, France cannot, as the ally and auxiliary of the empreſs-queen of Hungary and Bohemia, act againſt a member of the empire, who is not at war, nor hath the leaſt difference with her imperial and royal majeſty.

"Whereas, nevertheleſs, a numerous French army hath entered the empire by Weſtphalia, which, after putting a garriſon in the imperial city of Cologn, is advancing towards the electoral dominions of Brunſwic, hath already penetrated into the biſhopric of Munſter, and there exacted contributions; by which their views and deſigns againſt the ſaid electoral dominions of Brunſwic are clearly manifeſted: his Britannic majeſty, as elector of Brunſwic Lunenbourg, ſees himſelf unwillingly reduced to the indiſpenſible neceſſity of aſſembling an army, and ordering it to march, in order to divert, with the aſſiſtance of the Moſt High, all violence, injuſtice, and uſurpation from his own dominions, and thoſe of his neighbours.

"In order to prevent any perſon from being deceived by a groundleſs ſuſpicion, his majeſty would not omit this opportunity of declaring, in the face of the whole empire, that he is very far from deſigning to act offenſively againſt any of his co-eſtates in the empire, nor even againſt the crown of France: and that by the armament and march of his forces, to which ſtep he has been forced, he ſeeks only to divert, as has been ſaid, with the Divine Bleſſing, all invaſion, violence, and hoſtility; and do in that event, as a principal member of the empire, what is juſt in the ſight of God and man, and what he owes to the ſafety of the country which God hath entruſted to him.

"He reſts aſſured, that no perſon will miſconſtrue or miſinterpret the juſtice of this ſelf-defence to which he is forced: in particular, he truſts to the amicable confidence of his co-eſtates in the empire, that they will not counteract his views, which are favourable to themſelves, and tend to remove war and its calamities from their frontiers; but that they will rather concur with and promote them: that, knowing that his majeſty's forces will obſerve the moſt rigorous diſcipline, they will, in return, give them proofs of their good-will, particularly, by ſupplying them, for ready money, with what proviſions and forage they may ſtand in need of; and, in fine, that they will not furniſh to the adverſe party the ſmalleſt thing that may be prejudicial to his dominions or to their own."

This declaration was immediately followed by aſſembling the army of obſervation, which conſiſted of Hanoverians, Heſſians, and the troops of ſome leſs reſpectable ſtates, to the amount of forty-ſeven thouſand men, to be joined by a body of three thouſand Pruſſians; the whole to be under the command of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, who, as we have already obſerved, ſet out from England in the month of April to put himſelf at their head.

As ſoon as his royal highneſs arrived at Hanover, he immediately put the troops in motion, and ordered them to repair to the camp marked out between Hamelen and Nienburg. In a few days after the army paſſed the Weſer, and arrived at the camp at Bielefeldt, and took poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Retberg, which the French had abandoned. Here the duke fixed his head-quarters, to be at hand to learn the diſpoſition of the French army, and act in conſequence. Hither alſo the generals appointed to command the ſeveral diviſions repaired, to concert the plan of operations with their royal commander.

His royal highneſs's army was poſted in the following manner: at Bielefeldt, ſix battalions and ſix ſquadrons, under the command of lieutenant-general baron de Sporcken; ſix battalions under lieutenant-general de Block, at Hervorden; ſix battalions and four ſquadrons, under major-general Ledebour, between Hervord and Minden; ſeven battalions and ten ſquadrons, under lieutenant-general d'Oberg, in the neighbourhood of Hamelen; and five battalions and four ſquadrons, under major-general de Hauſs, near Nienburg.

This was certainly a moſt admirable diſpoſition; but his highneſs ſoon receiving intelligence that the French army aſſembled on the Lower Rhine and the duchy of Cleves, conſiſting at that time of ſeventy battalions (of ſix hundred men each) forty ſquadrons (of three hundred men each) and fifty-two pieces of cannon, under the command of the marſhals d'Etrées and Contades, had received orders to march forward, and that the deſign of this march muſt be to get between him and the Weſer, he determined at length to break up his camp at Bielefeldt, and remove to a more advantageous and ſafe ſituation, as it was impoſſible on that ground to withſtand the vaſt ſuperiority of men the French generals were bringing againſt him. Accordingly, on the thirteenth of June he ordered his army to proceed towards Hervorden; and on the fourteenth the allies encamped at Cofeldt, and ſtaid there the next day. Theſe motions of his royal highneſs induced the French generals to march forward with their army, and either oblige the duke to repaſs the Weſer or to ſtand a battle: but being too weak for the latter, he choſe to retire as the French approached; and on the twentieth of June repaſſed the Weſer, and encamped his troops between Minden and Oldendorp, in a moſt advantageous ſituation, having the Weſer in front, and the right and left covered with eminences and moraſſes. In the mean time, the French fixed their head-quarters at Bielefeldt, which the allies had abandoned.

It was univerſally believed that, in this ſituation, the army of the allies would have vigorouſly diſputed with the French the paſſage of the Weſer, which ſecures Hanover againſt foreign attacks; but how greatly was the world diſappointed in its expectations, when they were informed by authority that the French, after poſſeſſing themſelves of Embden, had paſſed that river on the tenth and eleventh of July with their whole army, without the loſs of a ſingle man! By the accounts tranſmitted of this affair, we find, that while marſhal d'Etrées, by feigned marches, concealed from the duke of Cumberland the real diſpoſitions that were made for paſſing the Weſer, the marquis d'Armentieres, who had laid his bridges between Hoxter and Blanckenow, in the diſtrict of the abbey of Corby, paſſed that river with ten battalions, twelve ſquadrons, and ten pieces of cannon. The duke of Cumberland could not oppoſe it, as he lay with his army below Hamelen, extending towards the Lower Weſer; and the duke de Broglio and M. de Chevert, each with a body of troops, drew his attention towards Minden and Rintelen. The laſt-mentioned town was defended by a fort, in which were three hundred Heſſians, who ſurrendered priſoners of war. The French abandoned that fort, after taking out of it twelve iron cannon, two culverins, two mortars, and what ſtores they found in it.

By the afternoon of the eleventh the whole of the French army had effected its paſſage; and having ſeized the important paſs of Stadt Oldendorff, they pitched their camp upon the fine plain of that name. The French proceeded immediately to raiſe heavy contributions in Hanover, their general ſending to the regency of that electorate a requiſition, demanding that deputies ſhould be ſent to his head-quarters to treat about the matter; with which they were obliged to comply.

His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland having no longer any reaſon to doubt that the French were bent upon attacking him, he drew up his little army on the heights between the Weſer and the woods; with his right towards the river, and his left cloſe to the woods; on the point of which he erected a battery of twelve pounders and haubitzers, ſupported by the hunters and two battalions of grenadiers, poſted in the corner of the wood, upon the left of the battery, under the command of major-general Schulemberg, with the village of Haſtenbeck in his front. There was a hollow way from the left of the village to the battery, and a continual moraſs on the other ſide of Haſtenbeck to his right. In the evening of the twenty-fourth of July he called in all his out-poſts, and kept the whole army on their arms all night.

On the twenty-fifth in the morning the French army was ſeen advancing in columns, and ſoon began to cannonade the allies very ſeverely, which they continued the whole day, and made ſeveral feints as if they intended to attack the right, the left, and the center; but nothing was done that day. The duke's army continued on their arms all the next night. The battery at the end of the wood was repaired, and count Schulemberg reinforced with ſix battalions of grenadiers, under major-general Hardenberg, and two pieces of twelve pounders. His royal highneſs alſo gave orders for erecting a battery of twelve and ſix pounders behind the village of Haſtenbeck; and, in fine, took all the precautions that the beſt general could poſſibly do to give the foe a warm reception; and as ſoon as it was day-light got on horſeback to reconnoitre their poſition, which he found to be the ſame as on the preceding day. At a little after five the French began a very ſmart cannonading upon the battery behind the village that was ſupported by the Heſſian infantry and cavalry, whoſe countenance and ſteadineſs, amidſt ſo ſevere a fire, was truly admirable. Between ſeven and eight the firing of ſmall arms began on the left of the allies, when his royal highneſs ordered major-general Behr, with three battalions of Brunſwickers, to ſupport the grenadiers in the wood if their aſſiſtance ſhould be wanted. The cannonading went on all the time, rather augmenting than decreaſing; but it did not create the leaſt diſorder in the confederate troops.

The fire of the ſmall arms on the left increaſed, and the French ſeemed rather to gain ground; whereupon the duke detached three Hanoverian battalions and ſix ſquadrons round the wood by Afforde, who towards the cloſe of the day drove ſeveral ſquadrons of the enemy back to their army. The grenadiers in the wood, however, apprehenſive of being ſurrounded, from the great numbers of the enemy that appeared there, and were marching round on that ſide, thought it adviſeable to retire nearer the left of their own army; by which unfortunate motion the French got poſſeſſion of the Hanoverian battery on the left without oppoſition. On this occaſion the hereditary prince of Brunſwick diſtinguiſhed himſelf, at the head of a battalion of Wolfenbuttle guards, and another of Hanoverians, who with their bayonets fixed retook the battery from a much ſuperior force of the enemy: but the French being in poſſeſſion of a height that commanded and flanked both our lines of infantry and our battery; which attack they could ſupport under cover of a hill, and his royal highneſs could not diſpute without expoſing his flank both to the artillery and muſquetry; and finding it was impoſſible to diſlodge them without expoſing his own troops to too great a hazard, he ordered a retreat, which was effected in the greateſt order, to Hamelen, without the leaſt moleſtation on the part of the enemy, whether it was owing to what they had ſuffered, or to the firm countenance of the allied troops. The loſs of the allies in this engagement, which may be ſaid to have laſted three days, was five hundred and forty-ſeven killed and miſſing, and nine hundred and ſeven wounded. The French, according to their own accounts, loſt two thouſand and upwards; but they gave out that it would not have have exceeded ſeven or eight hundred killed and wounded, had it not been for a miſtake between a regiment of Beauce and that called the Little Switzers, which fired upon each other ſo long and ſo furiouſly, that the latter was almoſt deſtroyed. Wherever the blame of this blunder lay, it certainly was of great advantage to the duke in making his retreat unobſerved, and without purſuit.

The duke of Cumberland made but a ſhort ſtay at Hamelen; and leaving a ſmall detachment for its defence, continued his route to Nienburg, where he encamped. As for Hamelen, it ſoon ſubmitted to the French, who diſmantled the walls, and carried off ſixty pieces of braſs cannon, ſeveral mortars, with large quantities of proviſion and ammunition, and even part of the equipage of the allied army. Here the French halted for ſome time; and here it was that M. d'Etrées was, by the order of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, obliged to reſign the command in chief of the French forces to the duke de Richelieu, who had been raiſed to that poſt by court intrigue, through the means of madame de Pompadour, Lewis's female favourite. Two days after Richelieu's arrival at the French camp, which was in the beginning of Auguſt, he detached the duke de Chevreuſe to take poſſeſſion of the city of Hanover, with the title of governor of that city. The regency finding that all the meaſures taken for their defence were now of no uſe, enjoined the inhabitants to remain quiet, and receive the French within their walls without oppoſition: upon which the Hanoverian garriſon, after being diſarmed, was left at liberty to go where they pleaſed; but an ordonnance was publiſhed by the new governor, enjoining the inhabitants to diſpoſe of their fire-arms, of what kind ſoever, under ſevere penalties.

About the ſame time marſhal Contades, who had been ſent with a detachment to reduce the territories of Heſſe Caſſel, was met at Warburg by the prince of Heſſe's maſter of the horſe, who declared in his maſter's name, that the French ſhould be furniſhed with every thing the country could afford; and the magiſtrates of Caſſel preſented the marſhal with the keys of the city gates. The marquis d'Armentieres, another French general, ordered Gottingen to ſupply him, within a limited time, under pain of military execution, with four thouſand pounds of white bread and two thouſand buſhels of oats, which was more than the whole country could afford, an hundred loads of hay, and other proviſions.

The duke of Cumberland continued all this time retreating from Nienburg: he retired into the duchy of Verden, and from thence to Stade, where the archives and many valuable effects of the electorate of Hanover had been depoſited. His royal highneſs reinforced the garriſon of this city with two regiments, and a camp was marked out on the glacis for the army. All the proviſions and forage which he had at Verden were brought hither, his royal highneſs being made to believe that he ſhould be able to maintain his ground between the Aller and the Elbe, and be effectually ſupported by four Engliſh men of war which at that time lay off the port of Stade, in caſe the French ſhould attempt to attack him.

It muſt be confeſſed that his royal highneſs made the wiſeſt diſpoſitions for a defence; but what could avail the greateſt generalſhip without an army capable of diſputing the ground with an enemy that was in a condition, and determined to force their way? Richelieu followed the duke ſtep by ſtep with his whole army, as far as the Aller. He hemmed the allied army in on every ſide; and notwithſtanding the four Engliſh men of war juſt mentioned, got poſſeſſion of a fort at the mouth of the Zwinga, which cut off the duke's communication with the Elbe.

The two armies being now very near each other, many ſkirmiſhes happened, and ſeveral places were taken and retaken. But the duke's army, though in a ſtrong ſituation, was by far too weak to think of holding out againſt the numerous forces of the French, which, as I have already obſerved, almoſt ſurrounded him. Under this preſſure of untoward circumſtances, not in a condition to fight, nor in a ſituation, there appeared no other poſſible means of preventing the total deſtruction of the allied army but by coming to ſome ſort of terms with the enemy. The king of Denmark opportunely ſtept forth and interpoſed his mediation, which was accepted by the commanders in chief of both armies; and on the eighth of September, 1757, the duke of Cumberland ſigned a convention for a neutrality with the French, well known by the name of the Convention of Cloſter Seven, from the place where it was ſigned, and by which thirty-eight thouſand Hanoverians laid down their arms, and were diſperſed into different quarters of cantonment.

The overtures for this convention, it ſeems, were made by the regency of Hanover, without the participation of the Britiſh court. Now, as by this ſtep the king of Pruſſia's dominions were expoſed to the whole power of France on that ſide, it was but natural to ſuppoſe that ſuch a procedure might perhaps be a means of leſſening, if not diſſolving, that confidence and mutual friendſhip which ſubſiſted between their Pruſſian and Britannic majeſties: and indeed his Pruſſian majeſty no ſooner was appriſed of the convention of Cloſter Seven being ſigned with the French marſhal, than he wrote a very ſharp letter with his own hand to the king of England on that ſubject, in which he complained bitterly of being made a ſacrifice; and peremptorily inſiſted upon his majeſty's not liſtening to any engagement in which he was not comprehended. His Britannic majeſty, in anſwer to this letter, thought proper to order a declaration to be communicated to all foreign miniſters reſiding at the Britiſh court, on the ſixteenth of September, in which he diſclaimed any ſhare in making the ſaid convention, and declared his reſolution to act in conſtant concert with the king of Pruſſia, in employing the moſt efficacious means to fruſtrate the unjuſt and oppreſſive deſigns of their common enemies; promiſing at the ſame time punctually to fulfil all his engagements with his Pruſſian majeſty, and to ſupport him with firmneſs and vigour.

The convention of Cloſter Seven, however, was attended with the moſt fatal conſequences to the king of Pruſſia, who was thereby not only deprived of the aſſiſtance of near forty thouſand good troops, but alſo actually invaded by his numerous enemies on all ſides, the duke de Richelieu ſoon after entering the Pruſſian territories, near Wolfenbuttle, with one hundred and ten battalions, one hundred and fifty ſquadrons, and one hundred pieces of cannon; and penetrating into Halberſtadt and Brandenburg-Pruſſia, plundering the towns, exacting contributions, and committing ſuch exceſſes that would give horror in the relation. Nor were the French the only enemy let looſe upon his Pruſſian majeſty. The Ruſſians, who for a long time had proceeded but ſlowly, all at once quickened their march, and entered Ducal Pruſſia, under marſhal Apraxin and general Fermor, marking their progreſs by every inhumanity that could be expected from an army of lawleſs barbarians. A large body of Auſtrians entering Sileſia, advanced as far as Breſlau; then turning back, they laid ſiege to Schweidnitz, the key to Sileſia. Another body entered Luſatia, another quarter of the Pruſſian territories, and made themſelves maſters of Zittau. Twenty-two thouſand Swedes penetrated into Pruſſian Pomerania, reduced the towns of Anclam and Demmin, and laid the whole country under contribution. The army of the empire, reinforced by that of prince Soubiſe, was preparing to enter Saxony, and thus left the Auſtrians under count Daun at liberty to turn the greateſt part of their forces to the reduction of Sileſia. Another body of Auſtrians piercing through Luſatia, paſſed by the Pruſſian armies, and ſuddenly preſenting itſelf before the gates of Berlin, laid the whole country under contribution.

The total ruin of his Pruſſian majeſty was now generally prognoſticated; but he met with effectual reſources in the fidelity and bravery of his troops, and his own courage and policy. The Ruſſians were the firſt object that drew his attention: he therefore detached field-marſhal Lehwald into Pruſſia with an army of thirty thouſand men, to endeavour to ſtop the inhuman ravages of thoſe ſavage invaders, during the abſence of his maſter. This general was encamped at Velau, when the Ruſſians, to the number of eighty thouſand, after taking Memel, the firſt town in Ducal Pruſſia, in the month of July, pitched their camp in a well-fortified ſituation, near Nertutten. Notwithſtanding their great ſuperiority, M. Lehwald, provoked by the diſtreſſes of a country he was not able to defend or deliver from the cruel invaders by any other means, determined to attack them in their intrenchments with his little army. Having ſent colonel Malachowſki with a party to reconnoitre the poſition of the enemy, he gave orders for beginning the attack the next day, being the 30th of Auguſt.

The Ruſſian army was formed in four lines, each line defended by a numerous artillery, and with batteries erected on all the eminences, containing in all two hundred pieces of cannon. The Pruſſians began the attack at five in the morning, which was carried on with ſo much vigour, that the whole firſt line of the enemy was entirely broken, and they were driven from all their batteries. The duke of Holſtein Gottorp, brother to the king of Sweden, at the head of his regiment of dragoons, routed the Ruſſian cavalry, and afterwards fell upon a regiment of grenadiers, which he cut in pieces; but when the Pruſſians came to the ſecond intrenchment, M. Lehwald, ſeeing he could not attempt it without expoſing his whole army, took the reſolution to retire, which he did in the beſt manner, and without the enemy's daring to ſtir out of their intrenchments to purſue him. The Pruſſian army returned to its camp at Velau.

The loſs of the Pruſſians did not exceed three thouſand killed and wounded; whereas that of the Ruſſians amounted to upwards of ten thouſand. General Lapuchin was wounded and taken priſoner, but was ſent back upon his parole. The Pruſſian army had at firſt made themſelves maſters of above eighty pieces of cannon; but theſe they were obliged to abandon, with eleven of their own, for want of carriages. Three Ruſſian generals were killed, but the Pruſſians loſt no general nor officer of diſtinction.

After this engagement, M. Lehwald altered the poſition of his army, by drawing towards Peterſwald; and the Ruſſians, after remaining quite inactive till the thirteenth of September, on a ſudden, to the great ſurprize of every one, retreated out of Pruſſia with ſuch precipitation, that they left all their ſick and wounded behind them, to the amount of fifteen or ſixteen thouſand, together with eighty pieces of cannon, and a conſiderable part of their military ſtores. They made their retreat in two columns, one of which bent its courſe towards Memel, whilſt the other took the neareſt way through the bailiwick of Abſternen. Both columns burnt every village they paſſed through without diſtinction, and ſtrewed the roads with the mangled bodies of the wretched inhabitants. M. Lehwald detached prince George of Holſtein with ten thouſand horſe in purſuit of theſe barbarians; but he was ſtopped in his courſe, by the bridges thrown over the river Memel having been broke down by the violence of the ſtream.

It does not at this time appear what could be the real cauſe of this ſudden retreat of the Ruſſians; but as the czarina was about this time ſeized with an apoplectic fit, it was given out that the army was ordered home, to ſupport the regulations ſhe had made about a ſucceſſor, in caſe of a vacancy in the throne. It is moſt probable they wanted ſubſiſtence. However this might be, his Pruſſian majeſty was by this turn delivered from the powerful diverſion made to his arms by the Ruſſians in favour of Auſtria: but his affairs were ſtill in a very deplorable condition. He had no troops to ſpare for the defence of his territories invaded by the French, nor to give them battle; wherefore the French marſhal revelled with impunity in the open country, collecting the public revenues, and fattening on the contributions which he drew from thence and the electorate of Hanover, and other conqueſts which defrayed the expences of the war. Gueldres was reduced, after a long blockade, on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt; ſo that the whole country was expoſed to the enemy as far as Magdebourg.

Juſt before the retreat of the Ruſſians, the Swedes, who had now reſolved upon an open rupture with his Pruſſian majeſty, invaded Pruſſian Pomerania with an army of twenty-two thouſand men, ſeized upon Anclam and Demmin, and prepared to do the ſame by Stetin, the capital of the duchy of that name. While every one was greatly at a loſs to account for the reaſon of this invaſion, the Swediſh commander, count Hamilton, publiſhed the following declaration in vindication of his maſter's conduct: "That the king of Sweden, as guarantee of the treaty of Weſtphalia, could not help ſending his troops into the upper part of the duchy of Pomerania belonging to the king of Pruſſia; and that therefore all the officers appointed to receive the public revenue in that country, muſt pay what money they had in their hands to general Hamilton, who was commiſſioned to receive the ſame for his Swediſh majeſty: that, moreover, an exact account was required within eight days of the revenues of the country; but that no more than ordinary contributions would be demanded of the inhabitants, who might reſt aſſured that the Swediſh troops ſhould be made to obſerve the ſtricteſt diſcipline."

To this declaration his Pruſſian majeſty replied, by his general Manteuffel (who had a command of twelve thouſand men in Pomerania, to cover Stetin from any ſurprize) "That the crown of Sweden could not, upon any legal foundation, lay any thing to his charge, to make it appear that he really diſturbed the peace of Weſtphalia; and enjoined his vaſſals, magiſtrates, and ſubjects, in the Anterior Pomerania, not to pay any regard to the Swediſh declarations, but to preſerve their fidelity and allegiance to him their lawful ſovereign, upon pain of incurring his moſt rigorous indignation."

While both ſides were thus employed in defending their reſpective meaſures, M. Lehwald finding himſelf at liberty by the drawing off of the Ruſſians, detached prince George of Holſtein Gottorp to the relief of Pomerania with ſixteen thouſand men, and ſoon after followed with the reſt of his army. The Swedes were in expectation of being joined by fifteen thouſand French and ſix thouſand Mecklenburgers; but M. Lehwald coming upon them ſo opportunely prevented this junction; and the Swediſh general was reduced to ſuch ſtraits that he retired with the utmoſt precipitation. In a word, the Pruſſian general not only recovered all the country the enemy had ſeized upon, and drove them entirely away, but, by the end of the year, added to his maſter's dominions all Swediſh Pomerania, except the fortified town of Stralſund. Thus ended the Swediſh campaign, after their army, without fighting a ſingle battle, had been reduced by ſickneſs, deſertion, and other accidents, to one half the number it conſiſted of when they firſt took the field.

It may not be improper to take notice here of ſome events, which could not eaſily be introduced before without breaking the thread of my narration.

Towards the beginning of July the empreſs-queen recalled her miniſters, count Coloredo and monſieur Zohern, from London; in conſequence of which, Mr. Keith, our miniſter at the imperial court, ſet out from Vienna; as did alſo Mr. Dayrolles, our reſident at Bruſſels, about the latter end of the ſame month.

Much about the ſame time an order was iſſued by the imperial court for all communication with England to be broke off; and our vice-conſul at Oſtend was deſired to order the pacquet-boats and Britiſh ſhipping at Oſtend, Bruges, and Nieuport, to depart in twenty-four hours, and not to return into any of the ports of the empreſs-queen till farther meaſures ſhould be concerted; which order was immediately obeyed. In this ordonnance the following reaſons were aſſigned by the court of Vienna, for thus excluding the Engliſh from ports that had been procured for that houſe by Engliſh arms and treaſures, viz. "That her Imperial majeſty, the empreſs-queen, could not with indifference behold England, inſtead of giving the ſuccours due to her by the moſt ſolemn treaties, enter into an alliance with her enemy the king of Pruſſia, and actually afford him all manner of aſſiſtance, aſſembling armies to oppoſe thoſe which the moſt Chriſtian king, her ally, had ſent to her aid; and ſuffering privateers to exerciſe open violence in her roads, under the cannon of her ports and coaſts, without giving the leaſt ſatisfaction or anſwer to the complaints made on that account; and the king of Great Britain himſelf, at the very time ſhe was offering him a neutrality for Hanover, publiſhing by a meſſage to his parliament, that ſhe had formed, with the moſt Chriſtian king, dangerous deſigns againſt that electorate: therefore her majeſty, deſirous of providing for the ſecurity of her ports, judged it expedient to give the fore-mentioned orders; and at the ſame time to declare, that ſhe could no longer permit a free communication between her ſubjects and the Engliſh, which had hitherto been founded upon treaties that Great Britain had, without ſcruple, openly violated."

But notwithſtanding theſe orders, they ſuffered our packet-boats with letters to paſs as uſual to and from Oſtend, as the poſtage of our letters brought in a good revenue to the poſt-office of the Auſtrian Netherlands. Oſtend and Nieuport, however, by order of her Imperial majeſty, admitted each of them a French garriſon, though the empreſs ſtill reſerved to herſelf in both of them the full and free exerciſe of all her rights of ſovereignty, an oath being adminiſtered to the French commandant for this purpoſe. The magiſtracy of Hamburgh had likewiſe notice given them, in the names of their Imperial and French majeſties, not to admit any Engliſh men of war or tranſports into their harbour, on pain of having a French garriſon ſent to take poſſeſſion of their city. Laſtly, before the end of the year, the Aulic council iſſued a decree againſt the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, on account of his conduct in the preſent conjuncture of affairs.

I will now reſume the hiſtory of military tranſactions, beginning with thoſe conducted by his Pruſſian majeſty.

Upon that monarch's quitting Bohemia, after the unfortunate battle of Kolin, he retired, as we have already obſerved, towards Saxony, when he pitched his camp at Leitmeritz, on the river Elbe. Various ſkirmiſhes, and ſome diſadvantageous actions, followed the loſs at Kolin. Gabel, an important paſs, and well garriſoned with four battalions, under the command of major-general Putkammer, ſituate between Boemiſh-Leypa and Zittau, was ſurpriſed and taken by a ſtrong detachment of Auſtrians, under the command of the duke of Aremberg and M. Macguire, on the eighteenth of June. Prince Henry of Pruſſia, the king's brother, who had been ſent with a detachment to watch their motions, was ſoon after in danger of being ſurrounded by the enemy, who followed him, laid Zittau, a ſtrong trading town in Upper Saxony, in aſhes, by a dreadful bombardment, and obliged the garriſon to ſurrender. This called for immediate relief. His Pruſſian majeſty did not heſitate a moment to quit his camp, with part of his army; and leaving the remainder under M. Keith, to guard the paſſes of the mountains of Bohemia, he by forced marches came ſuddenly upon the Auſtrians near Bautzen, obliged them to retire, and delivered his brother's army. The king was ſoon after joined, between Bautzen and Gorlitz, by M. Keith, whom he had ordered to quit the mountains of Bohemia, when the united force of theſe two armies amounted to ſixty thouſand men, beſides twelve battalions and ten ſquadrons which were ſtationed at Pirna, under the prince of Anhalt Deſſau, to prevent any ſurprize from Dreſden.

By this time his Pruſſian majeſty had received undoubted intelligence that the army of the empire, commanded by the prince of Saxe Hildeburghauſen, and that of the French under the prince de Soubiſe, making together about ſixty thouſand men, were advancing towards Saxony, in order to recover that electorate from him. He determined, if poſſible, to force the Auſtrians to a battle, before the imperial army ſhould have time to effect its deſigns. With this view, he transferred his head quarters to Bernſtedel, and on the fifteenth day of Auguſt came in ſight of the Auſtrian camp, and within cannot-ſhot of it. In this poſition the king continued five days, trying every expedient to bring the Auſtrians to a battle, who as conſtantly declined it, notwithſtanding their prodigious ſuperiority, being at leaſt one hundred and thirty thouſand ſtrong, which was more than double the forces of the king of Pruſſia. The king, finding all his art and ſtratagem could not bring his deſign to bear; and hearing that the army of execution were now advanced as far as Erfurth in Saxony, he ſet out from Luſatia, accompanied by M. Keith and thirty thouſand men, leaving the reſt of his army in a ſtrong camp near Gorlitz, under the prince of Bevern, to obſerve the enemy's motions. He now made a quick march by the way of Leipſic towards Erfurth, to give battle to the combined army of the French and the empire; but by the time he arrived at Erfurth, which was on the fourteenth of September, the combined army had retreated to Gotha; and it was generally ſuppoſed they would retreat farther back, until they could be joined by a large detachment which they expected from Richelieu's army, who, after the ſigning of the convention of Cloſter Seven, had entered the country of Halberſtadt. Againſt him the king of Pruſſia detached prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, who ſcoured the country, beat up the quarters of the French at Egelin, and made twenty officers and four hundred ſoldiers priſoners; but when the grand army advanced againſt him, he retired to Wanſleben, where he ſo poſted himſelf as to cut off all ſupplies of proviſion from the enemy.

After the king of Pruſſia had left Luſatia, the Auſtrians came out of their camp; and after a bloody ſkirmiſh, in which they had conſiderably the advantage, obliged the prince of Bevern to retreat with the Pruſſian army from Gorlitz to Rothenberg; from whence he proceeded to Buntzlau in Sileſia, and by a forced march reached Breſlau on the firſt of October, without ſuffering any farther loſs, though the numerous Auſtrian army was for ſome days always in his rear. The prince choſe a very ſtrong camp on the river Oder, where he intrenched himſelf, and in that poſition remained to cover the laſt-mentioned city. In the mean time, the Auſtrians made themſelves maſters of Lignitz, and a conſiderable part of Sileſia.

From Gotha the combined army, on the approach of his Pruſſian majeſty, retreated towards Eyſenach, where they intrenched themſelves in a very ſtrong camp. By the nineteenth of September the Pruſſian army was advanced to the neighbourhood of Gotha; on which day a ſkirmiſh happened between the advanced parties of the two armies, in which general Seydelitz defeated a large corps of the enemy, conſiſting of two regiments of Auſtrian huſſars, one regiment of French huſſars, and a detachment made up of French grenadiers, beſides a numerous body of Croats and Pandours; obliged them to abandon the town and caſtle of Gotha, of which they had poſſeſſed themſelves, and to retire with great precipitation to their main army. In this action the Pruſſian general took ſeveral officers priſoners, and killed about three hundred men. Soon after this ſkirmiſh the king of Pruſſia advanced to Eyſenach, with a deſign to attack the combined army; but they were ſo ſtrongly intrenched that it was impracticable; and as he found he could not provoke or draw them out of their camp, he was obliged, by ſcarcity of proviſions, to return back to Erfurth, and ſoon after towards Naumburg: whereupon the combined army marched, and again took poſſeſſion of Gotha, Erfurth, and Weimar.

The king of Pruſſia, finding that all his attempts to draw the enemy from their intrenchments to engage him in the open field were fruitleſs, had recourſe to one of thoſe maſterly ſtrokes by which a general is better ſeen than even by the gaining a victory. He made a feint about the beginning of October, as if he intended to march to Berlin with the greateſt part of his army, leaving general Keith with only ſeven or eight thouſand men to defend Leipſic. Upon this the French and German generals, believing their paſſage was now open; and knowing how much the Pruſſian forces were divided, and at great diſtances from each other, they reſolved to ſeize the opportunity of making themſelves maſters of the courſe of the river Sala, of Leipſic, and of the Pruſſian magazines at Torgau. Accordingly, having advanced to the Sala, they croſſed that river, preſented themſelves before Leipſic, and ſummoned M. Keith to ſurrender. To which that gallant general anſwered, That the king his maſter had ordered him to defend the place to the laſt extremity, and he would obey his command. The enemy then thought of laying ſiege to the town; but before they could make any one preparation for that purpoſe, they were alarmed by the approach of the king of Pruſſia, who, wiſely foreſeeing the effect of his feint, had by previous and private orders collected together all his diſtant detachments, ſome of which were twenty leagues aſunder. The Pruſſian army arrived near Leipſic on the twenty-ſeventh day of October, and remained the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth, when every body expected that a battle would be fought in the plains of Lutzen: but the enemy, who ſtill continued baſhful, had, on advice of the king's approach, repaſſed the Sala, and burnt down the bridges over that river; but they were ſoon repaired, and the whole Pruſſian army croſſed over, and on November 3, in the evening, drew up over-againſt the enemy. This brought on the ever-memorable battle of Roſbach, fought on the fifth of November, 1757. The king was going to make the attack on the fourth, but deferred it on perceiving that the enemy had changed the poſition of their camp. That whole day, therefore, was ſpent in a cannonade, which did no great execution on either ſide. The king of Pruſſia, in the mean time, made the neceſſary diſpoſitions, agreeable to what he had reconnointred of the enemy.

This delay of the Pruſſian army ſeems to have miſled the enemy into a notion, that they had no diſpoſition to riſque an action with the combined army, who were very advantageouſly poſted; and to determine them not only to wait for the Pruſſians, but to attack them in their camp at Roſbach: for on the fifth of November, about nine o'clock in the morning, the infantry of the combined army, which had drawn nearer upon the riſing grounds towards the Pruſſian camp, filed off to the right, and the whole army was put in motion. It was two o'clock at noon, however, before the king of Pruſſia could form any certain judgment of the intention of the enemy's movements, which were various and complicated. At length, however, it was manifeſt that they intended to attack him, and that their diſpoſitions were made with a view to ſurround the Pruſſian army, and to open the action by an attack on its rear. His Pruſſian majeſty, however, with that preſence of mind and military ſkill peculiar to himſelf, caught them in their own ſnare. He drew up his army in order of battle, and by a half turn to the right marched parallel with the enemy.

In this poſition, and juſt before the battle began, the king made the following ſpeech to his army: "My dear friends! the hour is come, in which all that is, or ought to be dear to us, depends upon the ſwords which are now drawn for the battle. Time permits me to ſay but little; nor is there occaſion to ſay much. You know, that there is no labour, no hunger, no cold, no watching, no danger, that I have not ſhared with you hitherto; and you now ſee me ready to lay down my life with you, and for you. All I aſk is the ſame pledge of fidelity and affection that I give. And let me add, not as an incitement to your courage, but as a teſtimony of my own gratitude, that, from this hour, until you go into quarters, your pay ſhall be doubled. Acquit yourſelves like men, and put your confidence in God." The effect of this ſpeech may be more readily conceived than deſcribed. An univerſal ſhout proclaimed the general emotion. An heroic phrenzy ſeemed to take poſſeſſion of every individual; and to this diſpoſition the victory that enſued may perhaps be in a great meaſure aſcribed, ſince we want not many inſtances in hiſtory, where prodigious ſuperiority of numbers have been forced to give way before the martial enthuſiaſm of a handful of men.

The following is the account of this famous battle, as publiſhed by authority, from the beſt relations tranſmitted from the ſcene of action:

"The king of Pruſſia having taken the reſolution to march up to the enemy and attack them, had determined to begin the charge with one wing only; and the diſpoſition of the enemy made it neceſſary that it ſhould be with the left wing: but the very inſtant the battle was going to begin, his majeſty ordered the general who commanded the right wing to decline it, to take a proper poſition in conſequence thereof, and above all, to prevent being ſurrounded. All the cavalry of the right wing, except two or three ſquadrons, had already marched to the left, which was done at full gallop; and being arrived at the place aſſigned them, they formed over-againſt that of the enemy. The cavalry moved on immediately; the enemy's advanced to meet them, and the charge was very fierce, ſeveral regiments of the French coming on with great reſolution. The advantage, however, was entirely on the ſide of the Pruſſians. The enemy's cavalry being routed, were purſued for a conſiderable time with the greateſt ſpirit; but having afterwards reached an eminence which gave them an opportunity of rallying, the Pruſſian cavalry fell upon them afreſh, and gave them ſo thorough a defeat, that they betook themſelves to flight in the utmoſt diſorder. This happened at four in the afternoon.

"Whilſt the cavalry charged, the infantry opened themſelves. The enemy cannonaded them very briſkly during this interval, and did ſome execution; but the Pruſſian artillery was not behind hand with them. This cannonade having continued on both ſides a full quarter of an hour, without the leaſt intermiſſion, the fire of the in-ſantry began. The enemy could not ſtand it, nor reſiſt the valour of the foot, who gallantly marched up to their batteries. Theſe batteries were carried one after another, and the enemy were forced to give way, which they did in great confuſion. As the left wing advanced, the right changed its poſition; and having ſoon met with a ſmall riſing ground, they availed themſelves of it, by planting ſixteen heavy pieces of artillery on it. The fire from thence was partly pointed at the enemy's right, to increaſe the diſorder there, and took their left wing in front, which was exceſſively galled thereby.

"At five the victory was decided, the cannon ceaſed, and the enemy fled on all ſides. They were purſued as long as there was any light to diſtinguiſh them; and it may be ſaid that the night alone was the preſervation of this army, which was ſo formidable in the morning. They took the benefit of the darkneſs to hurry on to Freyburg, and there to repaſs the Unſtrut, which they did on the morning of the ſixth, after a whole night's march.

"The king ſet out early in the morning with all his cavalry to purſue them, ſupported by four battalions of grenadiers, the whole infantry following them in two columns. The enemy had paſſed the Unſtrut at Freyburg, when the Pruſſians arrived on its banks; and as they had burnt the bridge, it became neceſſary to make another, which however was ſoon done. The cavalry paſſed firſt, but could not come up with the enemy till five in the evening, upon the hills of Eckerſberg. It was too late to force them there; and the king therefore thought proper to canton his army in the neareſt villages, and to be ſatisfied with the ſucceſs the huſſars had, in taking near three hundred baggage waggons, and every thing in them."

This glorious victory, glorious both in the action and in its conſequences, was more agreeable to his Pruſſian majeſty than any one he had ever gained, as it was obtained with ſo very inconſiderable loſs to his troops, of whom not above five hundred were killed and wounded. Amongſt the latter was prince Henry of Pruſſia and general Seydelitz, but their wounds were of no conſequence. As for the loſs ſuſtained by the enemy, it appears, from the accounts of their own officers, to have amounted to upwards of three thouſand killed upon the field of battle, and above ſix thouſand made priſoners; amongſt whom were eight French generals, beſides ſeveral German generals, and two hundred and fifty officers of different ranks; ſixty-four pieces of cannon, with kettle drums, ſtandards, and colours, in great number, fell alſo into the hands of the Pruſſians. General Revel, brother to the duke de Broglio, died of his wounds the day after the battle of Merſeburg. This heavy misfortune which befel the combined army was generally attributed to the injudicious diſpoſitions of the two commanders, and in part to the diſcontent of the men, who were not only unpaid, but had actually been without a morſel of bread for two days preceding the engagement. What renders this victory more remarkable on the ſide of the Pruſſians is, that the king having been obliged to leave ſome detachments to ſecure certain poſts, and to cover the baggage during the battle, the whole force he brought into the field ſcarcely amounted to eighteen thouſand effective men; whereas the enemy boaſted that they were ſeventy thouſand ſtrong; but admit that they were no more than fifty thouſand, it was a vaſt ſuperiority to be thus ſhamefully beat.

The French under the duke de Richelieu were preparing to go into winter-quarters; but hearing of the defeat of the combined army, they again put themſelves in motion, and a large body of them advanced as far as Duderſtadt, to favour the retreat of their countrymen under the prince of Soubiſe, who with great precipitation made the beſt of their way from Erfurth to the county of Hohenſtein, and from thence bent their march towards Halberſtadt. Of the remains of the imperial army, which was almoſt entirely diſperſed, whole battalions deſerted, and went over to the victor of Roſbach.

While things went on thus ſucceſsfully for his Pruſſian majeſty in Germany, his troops were cloſely preſſed by the Auſtrians in Sileſia. Schweidnitz, the only town of ſtrength in that duchy, was cloſely beſieged by a ſuperior force under general Nadaſti, and the little army of the prince of Bevern cut off from its relief by the main army of the enemy, under the command of prince Charles of Lorraine and count Daun, who, while Nadaſti was employed in the above ſiege, had inveſted Breſlau on the left of the Oder, while the prince covered it on the right. Schweidnitz ſurrendered after a ſiege of near three weeks; during which time it ſuſtained a furious bombardment. Nadaſti having ſupplied it with a ſufficient garriſon, marched with the remainder of his troops and joined the Auſtrian main army.

In the mean time, his Pruſſian majeſty, while he was improving the victory he had gained over the French and Imperial armies, received advice of the ſiege of Schweidnitz, and the ſituation of the prince of Bevern. Senſible of the danger, and firmly perſuaded of the fidelity of his generals and the bravery of his troops, and that they would defend themſelves to the laſt extremity, he formed the reſolution of marching to their aſſiſtance with a conſiderable part of the victorious army; though, what is almoſt incredible to relate, part of them had been aſſembled but a few days before from places more than an hundred miles diſtance. The king ſet out from Leipſic on the twelfth of November for Sileſia, and in a few days attacked Naumburg, on the Queiſs, having in his route detached M. Keith with a conſiderable part of the army to clear Saxony from all the Auſtrian parties, and then to make an irruption into Bohemia; which he did ſo effectually, as to raiſe large contributions in the circles of Sartz and Leitmeritz, and even to ſtrike terror into Prague itſelf. His majeſty continued his march with the reſt of the army with unparalleled rapidity, and by the twenty-eighth of November got to Barchwitz, near the Oder, where his vanguard ſurpriſed a detachment of one thouſand one hundred Auſtrians, fifty of whom were ſlain, and one hundred and fifty made priſoners. After detaching M. Keith, as before obſerved, the king had left himſelf only 15,000 men, but on his march was reinforced by the late garriſon of Schweidnitz, which by a ſurpriſing effort of courage had made their eſcape from the Auſtrians.

This

This garriſon, which conſiſted of about four thouſand men, had ſeen with the utmoſt indignation the capitulation which the general who commanded at Schweidnitz had made, not only againſt their conſent, but even in ſpite of their repeated offers to force their way through the beſiegers, or periſh every man. Being at laſt, however, obliged to ſubmit, as the Auſtrians were conducting them into Bohemia, where they were to be confined, they learnt by chance the great victory their monarch had obtained near Roſbach; which news animated them ſo far, that they unanimouſly roſe upon the eſcort that guarded them, which was not very ſtrong, and put them entirely to flight. Thus freed, they marched on without very well knowing their way; but fortune ſtill continuing to favour them, they came directly upon the army commanded by their king, to whom their junction added a conſiderable ſtrength.

The whole army of the Auſtrians being now united; and advice having been received not only of the king of Pruſſia's late victory over the combined army, but alſo that he was advancing to the relief of the prince of Bevern, the Auſtrian generals took a reſolution to attack this laſt in his intrenchments, and if poſſible to diſlodge him. Accordingly, on the twenty-ſecond of November, about nine o'clock in the morning, they put their reſolves in execution, with a force three times ſuperior to that of the prince of Bevern. The Pruſſians, however, with ſurpriſing intrepidity, ſtood two of the moſt violent attacks that could be made; but at the third, overpowered with numbers, and aſſailed on all ſides, and night coming on, the prince of Bevern, to prevent a total defeat, withdrew the greateſt part of his army to a riſing ground on the banks of the Oder, whilſt the reſt of the troops threw themſelves into Breſlau, which in all probability they might have defended till the king had come up to its relief; but on the twenty-fourth, the prince of Bevern going to take a view of the poſition of the enemy, with only a ſingle groom to attend him, fell in with a party of Croats, who took him priſoner. In conſequence of this misfortune, his army decamped that ſame night, leaving in Breſlau only four battalions, under the command of lieutenant-general Leſwitz, who, unable to maintain himſelf in a place ſo extenſive and ſo ill fortified, capitulated the next day, on condition that the garriſon ſhould march out with all military honours, but that they ſhould not act againſt the empreſs-queen during the courſe of the war.

When an account of the battle before Breſlau was brought to Vienna, the news at firſt occaſioned great joy at court; but it was much abated by the particulars of the action, one of the moſt bloody that hiſtory can furniſh an inſtance. The Auſtrians owned that ſuch another victory would annihilate their army, for it coſt them the lives of twenty thouſand men; a number almoſt equal to the whole of the prince of Bevern's army before the battle. This will not appear exaggerated, when it is conſidered that the heat of the action laſted from eleven o'clock in the morning till five in the evening; and that four almoſt impregnable intrenchments were to be forced, planted thick with cannon, which fired cartridge-ſhot for ſeven hours ſucceſſively. The Pruſſians were never put into confuſion, and retreated in good order. Their loſs was not above four thouſand men killed, wounded, and taken priſoners.

The prince of Bevern's army having paſſed the Oder at Glogau, joined the king of Pruſſia at Barchwitz on the ſecond of December. He had alſo been reinforced on his march by a body of troops which he had ordered from Saxony, and the garriſon of Schweidnitz, as before related. Hearing that prince Charles of Lorraine had left Breſlau with his army, and that he had taken poſt at Liſſa, a village about ſixteen miles diſtance from that city, the king, who, with Cæſar, thought "Nihil actum dum aliquid agendum," determined, notwithſtanding the inferiority of his forces, to attack the Auſtrians in their intrenchments, whoſe right wing was covered by the village of Neerpen, and their left by that of Golau, with the rivulet of Schweidnitz in their rear.

On the fourth of December the Pruſſian army marched to Neumarck, where they ſeized upon the enemy's ovens, and upon a conſiderable magazine, and made priſoners ſix thouſand Pandours and huſſars that guarded them. After this ſeizure, and after having diſtributed to his army the proviſions he had taken, his Pruſſian majeſty reſumed his march towards Liſſa.

General Zithen, who led the vanguard of light horſe, about ſeven in the morning of the fifth fell in with a body of Auſtrian huſſars, and three regiments of Saxon dragoons, which had been detached by the Auſtrian generals, in order to retard the king's march, and conceal their own motions; for they held the ſmall number of Pruſſians in ſuch contempt, that their intention was to have met the king, and to have ſaved him two German miles to come at them. The Pruſſians, however, drove this advanced party back to their camp, took ſix officers and about five hundred men priſoners. As ſoon as the Pruſſian army had got to the high grounds about Liſſa, general Zithen perceived that the enemy's whole army was forming. He immediately acquainted the king with what he had diſcovered, who, after having himſelf ſurveyed their diſpoſition, made his own with that quickneſs and true judgment that has always rendered him ſo juſtly celebrated.

He gave orders for his troops to extend themſelves to the right as far as the rivulet of Schweidnitz, and to charge the left wing of the enemy. The action began in a wood, where the enemy had poſted ſome regiments of infantry, with forty pieces of cannon. The Pruſſians carried this battery, tho' with a conſiderable loſs; drove the Auſtrians out of the wood, and turning the enemy's cannon upon themſelves, plied them with a moſt furious fire. The Auſtrians hereupon were obliged to change their poſition; they had loſt the poſt that covered their right wing, which put them under the neceſſity of taking precipitately to the firſt poſt that came in their way, in order to prevent the Pruſſians raking their whole army from wing to wing. They poſted ſome brigades of foot on an eminence that lay behind the wood, which was ſoon attacked by the right of the Pruſſians, and carried, after an obſtinate reſiſtance. The enemy then formed a new line near the village of Lenten, where they defended themſelves for ſome time with great bravery, but were at length obliged to give way, the Pruſſians continuing to advance with that ſlow and regular pace for which they were remarkable, without once ſtopping or giving ground a ſingle inſtant. During all theſe different attacks, the right of the Auſtrian cavalry and infantry came up, when the left of the Pruſſian cavalry charged theirs, and broke them; after which the regiment of Bareut took the Auſtrian infantry, which was poſted on an eminence, in the rear, at the ſame time that the left of our infantry attacked them in front.

At length the enemy gave way on all ſides; and after having by a quick retreat got at ſome diſtance, recovered themſelves three times, animated by their officers and by the ſuperiority of their numbers. Every time they made a ſtand, the Pruſſians attacked them with freſh vigour, and every time with ſucceſs. Towards night the Auſtrians fell into diſorder: their two wings fled in confuſion: one of them, cloſely preſſed by the king, ran towards Breſlau, and took ſhelter under the cannon of that city: the other, purſued by the greateſt part of the light cavalry, fled towards Canth and Schweidnitz. The action began at one o'clock in the afternoon, and ended at four. If day-light had laſted another hour, the defeat of the enemy would have been ſtill greater: as it was, ſix thouſand Auſtrians fell in this engagement; and the Pruſſians, who had only five hundred men killed and two thouſand wounded, made twenty-one thouſand of the enemy priſoners, among whom were two hundred and ninety officers; took one hundred and ſixty-eight cannon, fifty-one colours and ſtandards, and four thouſand waggons of ammunition and baggage. In ſhort, ſo great was the conſternation of the fugitives, that a cornet of Ziethen's regiment, with a party of ten men only, took, diſarmed, and brought one hundred of them priſoners to the king of Pruſſia's head-quarters; for which gallant action his majeſty advanced him to the rank of a captain, and honoured him with the Order of Merit. Never was a more complete, a more deciſive victory; and future times cannot but read with aſtoniſhment, that the ſame man who, on the fifth of November, triumphed over France and the empire at Roſbach, was on the fifth of December at Liſſa, where he defeated likewiſe the whole force of Auſtria.

The conſequences that followed this victory ſufficiently declared the greatneſs of it. The ſiege of Breſlau was immediately undertaken, and with ſuch ſucceſs, that it ſurrendered on the twentieth of the ſame month. The garriſon, conſiſting of thirteen thouſand men, were made priſoners of war. Among theſe were fourteen officers of diſtinction. The military cheſt, a vaſt treaſure, with eighty pieces of cannon, fell into the hands of the victors, who loſt only about twenty men in their approaches. The ſeaſon being now far advanced, and the weather too ſevere to undertake any enterprize of conſequence, his Pruſſian majeſty contented himſelf with retaking ſome few towns of which the Auſtrians had poſſeſſed themſelves in Sileſia; and having fixed his head-quarters at Breſlau, put the reſt of his army which was not out upon excurſions into winter-quarters, where we ſhall leave them till the next campaign brings them into the field again.

As to the remains of the Auſtrian army under prince Charles of Lorraine and count Daun, ſoon after their defeat at Liſſa they returned into Bohemia, where they entered into quarters of cantonments, the head-quarters being fixed at Koniggratz; and as ſoon as every poſſible meaſure was taken for their ſecurity, prince Charles repaired to Vienna.

The reader will eaſily recollect, that upon the ſigning of the convention of Cloſter Seven with the French, and the negociating a neutrality for the electorate of Hanover, the king of Pruſſia wrote a letter to his Britannic majeſty, complaining of ſuch a ſtep as abandoning him to the mercy of his enemies, &c. &c. and that the king of Great Britain, in anſwer to this remonſtrance, publiſhed a declaration, diſavowing the ſaid convention, and all thoughts of a neutrality, and promiſing vigorouſly to ſupport the king of Pruſſia. This inclination to afford aſſiſtance to an ally in ſuch diſtreſs he was ſoon enabled effectually to gratify, by the ſhameful conduct of the French in Hanover, who, if not by the expreſs order, at leaſt by the apparent countenance, of the duke de Richelieu, their commander, exerciſed every imaginable act of pillage, rapacity, and inſolence; and perceiving that the Hanoverians, though ſubjected to the yoke of the capitulation, were ſtill formidable, in order to prevent any reſiſtance on their part to the oppreſſions laid upon them, the French general reſolved to add one violation more to the many they had already committed of the late treaty, and actually attempted to deprive the Hanoverians and Heſſians of their arms. In this diſtreſſed ſituation, into which they had undoubtedly been brought ſolely by their connections with England, the regency of Hanover demanded immediate ſuccours from the Britiſh nation.

The court of London did not pretend to contravert the juſtice of the Hanoverian plea, but were willing to try, before they had recourſe to extremities, what might be effected by pacific meaſures, and propoſed an extenſion of the convention of Cloſter Seven to a general armiſtice, and to found thereon a negociation for a general peace: but this could not be brought about, the French being reſolved to keep territories ſo dear to his Britannic majeſty in their poſſeſſion, to turn to their advantage, according as the occurrences of the war ſhould direct. Theſe tentatives towards a compromiſe failing, it was reſolved that the Hanoverian army ſhould immediately aſſemble, reſume their arms, and ſtand in the defence of their country againſt all invaders: and it was farther reſolved, to put in motion, maintain, and keep together, an army of obſervation, and to recommend a vigorous execution of this meaſure to the enſuing parliament.

By this time his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, diſguſted with the treatment he had received from Mr. Pitt and his colleagues in the miniſtry, who had abſolutely refuſed, to his moſt earneſt ſolicitations, the tranſporting ſix thouſand troops to Hanover to ſtrengthen the army of obſervation, had quitted the command of that army and returned to England, and, determined never more to engage in public affairs, reſigned into the hands of his royal father all his military employments. Hereupon his Britannic majeſty immediately, at the inſtance of his Pruſſian majeſty, nominated and appointed prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic (brother to the duke of Brunſwic) already diſtinguiſhed for his military abilities, commander in chief of the army of obſervation. This promotion was followed with a declaration of his majeſty's motives for breaking the convention of Cloſter Seven on his part, as elector of Hanover; which, as it contains a candid and impartial relation of the facts on which this reſolution of the king of Great Britain was founded, I ſhall here inſert in the words and order as it ſtood.

"It is notorious, that in September of this preſent year, 1757, a convention was reſpectively agreed upon at Bromervorde and Cloſter Seven, between his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, and the marſhal duke de Richelieu; but the court of France was no ſooner informed of this, than ſhe plainly ſignified that ſhe neither could nor would acknowlege the validity of the ſaid convention, but on this condition only, namely, that the Hanoverian troops ſhould formally engage not to ſerve again, during the preſent war, againſt France or her allies. And not content even with this claim, ſhe poſitively inſiſted, that the auxiliary troops ſhould, upon returning into their own country, be diſarmed.

"His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, who had on his part honeſtly fulfilled all the conditions of the convention, and cauſed part of the troops deſtined for the county of Lawenbourg to begin their march, could not conſider this new demand otherwiſe than as a manifeſt contravention; the marſhal duke de Richelieu having not only engaged to let the auxiliary troops depart freely, but the convention alſo ſetting forth in expreſs terms, that they ſhould not be regarded as priſoners of war, under which quality alone the condition of laying down their arms could take place. Upon this his royal highneſs ſent orders to the ſaid troops to halt.

"Every method was tried to reconcile the difference. Expedients were propoſed, which left no ſhadow of pretext to the oppoſite party; but all in vain: the French would never be brought to give up their mortifying demand: it is but lately they begun to ſoften their language a little. In the mean time the troops, pent up in the narrow diſtrict which was aſſigned them, were expoſed to the rigour of the ſeaſon, and deprived of neceſſaries and conveniences of any kind.

"The French, at preſent, pretend to treat the convention as a military regulation only. And indeed it was at firſt, and originally, nothing more. But on account of the above declaration of the court of France, which expreſsly ſuſpended its validity, and in conſequence of the negociation for diſarming the auxiliaries, in which the French general would never anſwer categorically, but waited always for an anſwer from the court of Verſailles; the nature of that act is totally changed, and what was at firſt a matter between general and general, is now become an affair of ſtate between the two courts.

"However hard the conditions of the convention might be for the troops of his Britannic majeſty, as elector of Hanover, the king would have acquieſced in them, had not the French glaringly diſcovered their deſign of totally ruining his army and his dominions. It is they themſelves who, by the moſt evident contraventions, and moſt outrageous conduct, have ſet the king free from every obligation under which he was laid by the convention.

"The great end of the conventional act (an end in itſelf of the very nature and eſſence of every proviſional armiſtice) was to pave the way for entering immediately on a negociation of peace, in order to prevent the total ruin of the countries which compoſed the electorate of Brunſwick-Lunebourg, and procure an accommodation for his majeſty's allies. The court of France yielding a deaf ear to the propoſitions offered for that end, not only declared, time after time, that ſhe would not lend a hand towards a definitive pacification with his majeſty, in quality of elector, but has ſhewed too plainly, by her continual violences, exceſſes, and inſupportable exactions ſince the ſigning of the convention, that her reſolution is to complete the ruin of the king's electoral eſtates, as well as thoſe of his allies.

"In the midſt of a truce, the moſt open hoſtilities have been committed. The caſtle of Schartztels has been forcibly ſeized and pillaged, and the garriſon made priſoners of war. The priſoners made by the French before the convention, have not been reſtored, though this was a point expreſly ſtipulated between the generals who ſettled the detail, and was exactly fulfilled on our part, by the immediate releaſe of the French priſoners. The bailies of thoſe diſtricts, into which the French troops were on no pretence to enter, have been ſummoned, under pain of military execution, to appear before the French commiſſary, in order to compel them to deliver up the public revenue in their hands. The French have appropriated to themſelves part of theſe magazines, which by expreſs agreement were to be left to the electoral troops; and they ſtill go on with ſeizing the houſes, revenues, and corn belonging to his majeſty, in the city of Bremen, in ſpight of the reciprocal engagement entered into, to conſider that city as a place abſolutely free and neutral. And, laſtly, they have proceeded to menaces, unheard of among a civilized people, of burning, ſacking, and deſtroying all before them, if at preſent, when they find their account in executing the convention, the leaſt heſitation be made about obſerving it.

"All theſe violent and unjuſt proceedings, (which are ſo many inconteſtable proofs, that the French will not admit the convention as obligatory, any farther than as it may prove ruinous to his Britannic majeſty; whilſt they pretend to be tied to nothing, and claim a power of acting at will) have been carried to an inſupportable height, and exhauſted the king's patience, who holds himſelf, before God and the whole impartial world, not only entitled, but obliged, without further regard to the convention, ſo often and ſo openly violated by the French, to have recourſe to arms, as the means which the Almighty has put into his hands for delivering his faithful ſubjects and allies from the oppreſſions and vexations which they now groan under.

"As his majeſty (conformable to his ſolemn declaration made and repeated to all nations, and to the Germanic body in particular, from the very beginning of the preſent unhappy war) has never thought of arming offenſively againſt any power whatever, but ſolely with a view of defending himſelf and his allies, he repoſes his confidence in God, and hopes for his benediction on the juſtneſs of his enterprizes."

The duke de Richelieu no ſooner was appriſed of the king of Great Britain's reſolutions, and that the Hanoverians were in motion, and repairing to the command of prince Ferdinand, than he ſent a letter to that general, intimating his ſurprize at the late movements of the Hanoverians, which, he ſaid, ſeemed to indicate a deſign to break the articles of the convention of Cloſter Seven, which, for his own part, he was reſolved to fulfil exactly in all points; but at the ſame time declared, that if the Hanoverians ſhould proceed to take any ſtep contrary thereto, or commit any act of hoſtility, he ſhould inſtantly retaliate, by deſtroying every dwelling in the electorate by fire, from the royal palace to the ſmalleſt cabin, and make this country feel all the moſt dreadful horrors of war.

To this letter, which was inforced by the count de Lynar, the Daniſh ambaſſador, who had mediated the convention, prince Ferdinand returned a very laconic anſwer, importing, that he would give the duke de Richelieu an anſwer in perſon at the head of his army.

Every thing now beſpoke a renewal of the war between the two parties. The Hanoverians, ſpirited up with reſentment for the oppreſſive treatment they had experienced, were eager to come to blows with the French, and deliver their country from theſe mercileſs invaders. About the latter end of November they were wholly aſſembled at Stade, under the gallant leader prince Ferdinand, who immediately took the field, and marched with all expedition againſt the enemy, to drive them out of the electorate. Indeed no conjuncture could have been more favourable than the preſent to the Hanoverians, for taking revenge on theſe open violators of the moſt ſolemn treaties, and recovering their own liberty: for Richelieu, intent only on increaſing his own fortune by the indiſcriminate plunder of friends and foes, had extended his oppreſſion to the very army which he commanded, whoſe pay, ſubſiſtence, and cloathing, he is ſaid to have convered into money for his own uſe; ſo that thoſe troops which were in ſo fine and reſpectable a condition, when M. d'Etrées reſigned the command, were now diminiſhed in their numbers, decayed in their health and ſpirits, deſtitute of neceſſaries, without arms, and without order.. Add to this, that Richelieu had been guilty of a capital error in dividing his forces into ſuch diſtant quarters of cantonment, that they might eaſily be attacked ſeparately, and reduced by a much inferior army, before they could give each other any aſſiſtance.

Hoſtilities were now commenced, by the Hanoverians ſeizing upon ſome waggons of wood deſigned for the French garriſon of Harbourg: ſoon after which there were ſeveral ſkirmiſhes between them and the enemy; the moſt conſiderable of which was that on the fourth of December, when a diviſion of prince Ferdinand's army, under count Schuylemberg, came up with two thouſand of the French, who were marching back to Zell, whom he attacked in the bailiwic of Ebſtorff, and entirely defeated, twelve of their officers and one hundred and eighty ſoldiers being made priſoners, and about one hundred and thirty killed and wounded. There was another on the fourteenth of the ſame month upon the Aller, between a body of ſeven or eight thouſand Hanoverians, and one of about ten thouſand French; wherein the former, under general Zaſtrow, remained maſters of the field of battle.

Theſe ſkirmiſhes and advantages animated the Hanoverian army, and ſtruck ſuch a panic into the enemy, that they offered little or no reſiſtance; ſo that the former recovered poſſeſſion of Lunenburg, Zell, and all that part of the Brunſwic dominions next to Pruſſia; but their operations were conſiderably retarded by the reſolute defence of the French governor of Harbourg. When the Hanoverian troops made themſelves maſters of the town, he retired into the caſtle, which he continued to defend againſt a conſiderable detachment of the allied army, by whom it was inveſted, till at length, the fortifications being entirely deſtroyed, he ſubmitted by capitulation. This delayed the march of the Hanoverians, and gave the French time to recall their diſtant parties. The ſeverity of the ſeaſon, however, now forced both parties to put their forces into winter-quarters, prince Ferdinand occupying Ultzen and Lunenburgh, and the duke de Richelieu retreating into Hanover, in whoſe capital he fixed his head-quarters; though there continued to be frequent ſkirmiſhes, with various ſucceſs, between the out parties.

Richelieu, who by no means expected ſo vigorous an exertion on the part of the oppreſſed Hanoverians, gave a cloſe to the moſt inhuman and unmanly ſentiments of revenge: he not only delivered up the city of Zell to be plundered by his troops, againſt all the rules of war, but alſo reduced the ſuburbs to aſhes, and even gave orders to ſet fire to the orphan houſe of helpleſs children, who miſerably periſhed amongſt the flames. Theſe were, however, but a ſmall part of the calamities that the poor inhabitants ſuffered in the countries in ſubjection to the conquerors in the late war: wherever the French, the Auſtrians, or Ruſſians had gained the aſcendancy, the moſt horrible barbarities were committed by them: the French troops in particular have, on divers occaſions, acted in a manner which is not eaſily reconcileable to the character of a nation famed for ſentiment and civility.

The empreſs-queen was no ſooner informed of theſe tranſactions, which ſhe conſidered as infractions of the treaty of neutrality, than ſhe ſent a meſſenger to the baron de Steinberg, miniſter to the king of Great-Britain as elector of Hanover, acquainting him, that he ſhould appear no more at court, or confer with her miniſters; and that his reſiding at Vienna, he might eaſily conceive, could not be very agreeable: in conſequence of which intimation he retired, after having procured the neceſſary paſſports for his departure.

The conduct of the Dutch, during the whole courſe of the war that now raged in Europe, was puſillanimous to the laſt degree. They had, with ſurprizing facility, granted the French a free paſſage through Namur and Maeſtricht, for their proviſions, ammunition, and artillery, in the beginning of this very campaign; and they had beheld the towns of Oſtend and Nieuport put into the hands of the ſame nation, with the moſt perfect indifference. The former ſtep had already expoſed them to a ſharp remonſtrance from the court of London; and the latter now drew upon them another repreſentation no leſs ſpirited from the ſame quarter, delivered by colonel Yorke, his Britannic majeſty's miniſter at the Hague. It was conceived in the following terms.

"Con-

" Conſidering the critical ſituation which Europe has been in during the courſe of this year, in conſequence of meaſures concerted to embroil all Europe, the king of Great Britain was willing to flatter himſelf, that the courts of Vienna and Verſailles, out of regard to the circumſpect conduct obſerved by your High Mightineſſes, would have at leaſt informed you of the changes they have thought proper to make in the Auſtrian Netherlands.

" It was with the utmoſt ſurprize the king heard, that, without any previous conſent of yours, and almoſt without giving you any notice, the court of Vienna had thought proper to put the towns of Oſtend and Nieuport into the hands of the French troops, and to withdraw her own, as well as her artillery and ſtores, whilſt France continues to ſend thither a formidable quantity of both.

" The conduct of the court of Vienna towards his majeſty, is indeed ſo unmerited, and ſo extraordinary, that it is difficult to find words to expreſs it: but whatever fallacious pretexts ſhe may have made uſe of to palliate her behaviour towards England, it doth not appear that they can be extended ſo far as to excuſe the infringement, in concert with France, of the moſt ſolemn treaties between her and your High Mightineſſes.

" The king never doubted, that your High Mightineſſes would have made proper repreſentations to the two courts, newly allied, to demonſtrate the injuſtice of ſuch a proceeding, and the danger that might afterwards reſult from it.

" Your High Mightineſſes will have perceived, that your ſilence on the firſt ſtep, encouraged the two courts, newly allied, to attempt others; and who can ſay where they will ſtop? The pretext at firſt was, the need which the empreſs-queen ſtood in of the troops for the war kindled in the empire, and the neceſſity of providing for the ſafety of thoſe important places, and afterwards of their imaginary danger from England.

" But, high and mighty lords, it is but too evident, that the two powers, who have taken theſe meaſures in concert, have other projects in view, and have made new regulations with regard to that country, which cannot but alarm the neighbouring ſtates.

" The late demand made to your High Mightineſſes, of a paſſage for a large train of warlike implements thro' ſome of the barrier towns, in order to be ſent to Oſtend and Nieuport, could not fail to awaken the king's attention. The ſincere friendſhip, and parity of intereſts, of Great Britain and Holland, require that they ſhould no longer keep ſilence, leſt in the iſſue, it ſhould be conſidered as a tacit conſent, and as a relinquiſhment of all our rights.

" The king commands me, therefore, to recall to your High Mightineſſes the two-fold right you have acquired to keep the Auſtrian Netherlands under the government of the houſe of Auſtria; and that no other has a title to make the leaſt alteration therein, without the conſent of your High Mightineſſes; unleſs the new allies have reſolved to ſet aſide all prior treaties, and to diſpoſe at pleaſure of every thing that may ſuit their private intereſt.

" In the treaty between your High Mightineſſes and the crown of France, ſigned at Utrecht on the eleventh of April, 1713, in the fifteenth article, are theſe words: " It is alſo agreed that no province, fort, town, or city of the ſaid Netherlands, or of thoſe which are given up by his Catholic majeſty, ſhall ever be ceded, transferred, or given, or ſhall ever devolve to the crown of France, or any prince or princeſs of the houſe or line of France, either by virtue of any gift, exchange, marriage contract, ſucceſſion by will, or by any other title whatever, to the power and authority of the moſt Chriſtian king, or of any prince or princeſs of the houſe or line of France."

" In the barrier-treaty theſe very ſtipulations are repeated in the firſt article: " His Imperial and Catholic majeſty promiſes and engages, that no province, city, town, fortreſs, or territory of the ſaid country ſhall be ceded, transferred, given, or devolved to the crown of France, or to any other but the ſucceſſor of the German dominions of the houſe of Auſtria, either by donation, ſale, exchange, or marriage-contract, heritage, teſtamentary ſucceſſion, nor under any other pretext whatſoever; ſo that no province, town, fortreſs, or territory of the ſaid Netherlands ſhall ever be ſubject to any other prince, but to the ſucceſſor of the ſtates of the houſe of Auſtria alone, excepting what has been yielded by the preſent treaty to the ſaid lords the States-general."

" A bare reading of theſe two articles is ſufficient to evince all that I have juſt repreſented to your High Mightineſſes: and whatever pretext the courts of Vienna and Verſailles may allege, to cover the infraction of theſe treaties, the thing remains nevertheleſs evident, while theſe two courts are unable to prove, that the towns of Oſtend and Nieuport are not actually in the power of France. If their deſigns are juſt, or agreeable to thoſe treaties, they will doubtleſs not ſcruple, in the leaſt, to make your High Mightineſſes eaſy on that head, by openly explaining themſelves to a quiet and pacific neighbour, and by giving you indiſputable proofs of their intentions to fulfil the ſtipulations of the ſaid two treaties, with regard to the Netherlands.

" The king hath ſo much confidence in the good ſenſe, prudence, and friendſhip of your High Mightineſſes, that he makes not the leaſt doubt of your taking the moſt efficacious meaſures to clear up an affair of ſuch importance; and of your being pleaſed, in concert with his majeſty, to watch over the fate of a country, whoſe ſituation and independence have, for more than a century, been regarded as one of the principal ſupports of your liberty and commerce."

However ſtrong theſe arguments, ſo powerful was the French faction in Holland, that no regard was paid to them by the States-general. It ſhould ſeem indeed, that they were not only unprepared for a rupture with France. but unwilling to forego the comermcial advantages they continued to derive from obſerving a neutrality.

The intrigues of the French miniſtry ſeem to have been no leſs ſucceſsful at the court of Spain, which at this time diſcovered ſuch evident marks of partiality for that nation, as convinced the more diſcerning part of the Engliſh, that the Spaniards would ſeize the firſt favourable opportunity of joining with their enemies. In the courſe of this year the Antigallican, a private ſhip of war, equipped by a ſociety of gentlemen who aſſumed that name, took the Duke de Penthievre Indiaman off the port of Corunna, and carried her into Cadiz. The prize was eſtimated worth two hundred thouſand pounds; and immediate application was made by France to the court of Spain for reſtitution, while the proprietors of the Antigallican were ſquandering in mirth, feſtivity, and riot, the imaginary wealth ſo eaſily and unexpectedly acquired. Such were the remonſtrances made to his Catholic majeſty, with reſpect to the illegality of the prize, which the French Eaſt India company aſſerted was taken within ſhot of a neutral port, that the Penthievre was firſt violently wreſted out of the hands of the captors, then detained as a depoſit with ſealed hatches, and a Spaniſh guard on board till the claims of both parties could be examined, and at laſt adjudged to be an illegal capture, and conſequently reſtored to the French, to the great diſappointment of the owners of the privateer.

I ſhall now proceed to lay before the reader the other tranſactions of this year, in which the nation was more immediately intereſted.

The accumulated loſſes and diſappointments of the preceding year having made it abſolutely neceſſary to retrieve the credit of the Britiſh arms and councils by ſome vigorous and ſpirited enterprize, Mr. Pitt and his friends, willing to approve themſelves worthy of the honours the people had conferred on them, determined to make a vigorous deſcent on the coaſt of France. They imagined, that ſhould ſuch a meaſure prove ſucceſsful, it would probably give a deciſive blow to the marine of that kingdom; and at the ſame time effect a powerful diverſion in favour of the Pruſſian monarch and our other allies in Germany, by converting the attention of the French to the defence and protection of their own coaſts. The Engliſh miniſtry likewiſe foreſaw, that by deſtroying the enemy's ſhipping, all ſuccours would be cut off from America, whither they were daily tranſporting troops; the Britiſh commerce ſecured, without thoſe convoys ſo inconvenient to the board of admiralty, and to the merchants; and thoſe ideal fears of an invaſion, that had in ſome meaſure affected the public credit, wholly diſpelled. From theſe conſiderations a powerful fleet was ordered to be got in readineſs to put to ſea on the ſhorteſt notice, and ten regiments of foot were marched to the Iſle of Wight. The naval armament, conſiſting of eighteen ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fire-ſhips, bomb-ketches, and tranſports, was put under the command of ſir Edward Hawke, an officer whoſe faithful ſervices recommended him, above all others, to this command. Sir John Mordaunt was preferred to take the command of the land forces; and both ſtrictly enjoined to act with the utmoſt unanimity and harmony.

Europe beheld with aſtoniſhment theſe mighty preparations. The deſtination of the armament was wrapped in the moſt profound ſecurity: it exerciſed the penetration of politicians, and filled France with very ſerious alarms. Various were the impediments which obſtructed the embarkation of the troops for ſeveral weeks, while Mr. Pitt expreſſed the greateſt uneaſineſs at the delay, and repeatedly urged the commander in chief to expedite his departure; but a ſufficient number of tranſports, owing to ſome blunder in the contractors, had not yet arrived. The troops expreſſed an eager impatience to ſignalize themſelves againſt the enemies of the liberties of Europe; but the ſuperſtitious drew unfavourable preſages from the dilatorineſs of the embarkation.

At laſt the tranſports arrived, the troops were put on board with all expedition, and the fleet got under ſail on the eighth day of September, attended with the prayers of every man warmed with the love of his country, and ſolicitous for her honour. The public, big with expectation, dubious where the ſtroke would fall, but confident of its ſucceſs, were impatient for tidings from the fleet; but it was not till the fourteenth that even the troops on board began to conjecture that a deſcent was meditated on the coaſt of France near Rochfort, or Rochelle.

On the evening of the fifteenth orders were iſſued that confirmed their ſuſpicions, and ſpread the utmoſt joy and alacrity among the men. Regulations were made with reſpect to the manner of landing; and the corps directed to attack, had injunctions to march up vigorouſly to the enemy, reſerving their fire till they came very near, and then running in upon them with thir bayonets: orders which had all the air of a reſolution to do buſineſs.

The ſeventeenth farther orders, reſpecting the debarkation, were iſſued; but on the nineteenth the whole fleet was ſurprized with a ſignal to lay-to, though the wind was fair, the night clear, and the headland diſtance about twenty leagues; in which ſituation eight hours, a ſpace of time invaluable in ſuch a conjuncture, were loſt, before the ſignal was made to proceed on their courſe.

On the twentieth the fleet made the Iſle of Oleron, and then ſir Edward Hawke ſent an order to vice-admiral Knowles, requiring him, if the wind permitted the fleet, to proceed to Baſque road, to ſtand in as near to the Iſle of Aix as the pilot would carry him, with ſuch ſhips of his diviſion as he thought neceſſary for the ſervice, and to batter the fort till the garriſon ſhould either abandon or ſurrender it. But the immediate execution of this order was fruſtrated by a French man of war's ſtanding in to the very middle of the fleet, and continuing in that ſtation for ſome time before ſhe diſcovered her miſtake, or any of the captains had a ſignal thrown out to give chace. Admiral Knowles, when too late, ordered the Magnanime, captain Howe, and Torbay, captain Keppel, on that ſervice, and thereby retarded the attack upon which he was immediately ſent.

While the above ſhips, with the addition of the Royal William, were attending the French man of war ſafe into the river Garonne, the remainder of the fleet was beating to the windward off the Iſle of Oleron; and the commander in chief publiſhing orders and regulations which did credit to his judgment, and would have been highly uſeful had there ever been occaſion to put them in execution.

On the twenty-third, the van of the fleet, led by captain Howe in the Magnanime, ſtood towards Aix, a ſmall iſland ſituated in the mouth of the river Charente, leading up to Rochfort, the fortifications half finiſhed, and mounted with about thirty cannon and mortars, the garriſon compoſed of ſix hundred men, and the whole iſland about five miles in circumference. As the Magnanime approached, the enemy fired briskly upon her; but captain Howe, regardleſs of their faint endeavours, kept on his courſe, till having gained the length of the fort, he dropt his anchors cloſe to the walls, and poured out ſo inceſſant a fire as ſoon ſilenced them. It was, however, near an hour before the fort ſtruck, when ſome forces were landed to take poſſeſſion of ſo important a conqueſt, with orders to demoliſh the fortifications, the care of which was entruſted to vice-admiral Knowles.

Inconſiderable as this ſucceſs might appear, it greatly elated the troops, and was deemed an happy omen of further advantages; but inſtead of embarking the troops that night, as was univerſally expected, ſeveral ſucceſſive days were ſpent in councils of war, ſoundings of the coaſt, and deliberations whether the king's expreſs orders were practicable, or to be complied with. Eight days were elapſed ſince the firſt appearance of the fleet on the coaſt, and the alarm was given to the enemy. Sir Edward Hawke, indeed, propoſed laying a ſixty gun ſhip againſt Fouras, and battering that fort, which it was thought would help to ſecure the landing of the troops, and facilitate the enterprize on Rochfort. This, a French pilot on board (Thierry) undertook; but after the ſhip had been lightened for that purpoſe, vice-admiral Knowles reported that a bomb ketch had run aground at above the diſtance of two miles from the fort; upon which the project of battering or bombarding the fort was abandoned. The admiral likewiſe propoſed to bombard Rochelle; but this overture was over-ruled for reaſons which we need not mention. It was at length determined in a council of war, held on the eighth, to make a deſcent, and attack the forts leading to and upon the mouth of the river Charente. An order, in conſequence of this reſolution, was immediately iſſued for the troops to be ready to go from the tranſports to the boats preciſely at twelve o'clock at night. A number of men of war's boats, under the command of a lieutenant, were appointed to attend each regiment, and to receive the grenadiers picquet companies, and in a number proportioned to their bulk; but with great caution not to overcrowd the boats. The colonel of each regiment was directed to land with the firſt detachment, if it amounted to three companies. The troops were ordered to proceed ſilently and quietly to the place of rendezvous appointed for the diviſion, and then to receive their commands from a captain of a ſhip of war, which they were enjoined ſcrupulouſly to obey. It was ſtrongly recommended to the ſoldiers to imitate the example ſo lately before them, the cool and determined valour that appeared in the attack of the Iſle of Aix. They were required to form and attack whatever appeared before them on their firſt landing; and colonel, now general Kingſley, was directed to march with the grenadiers on their landing; with lieutenant-colonel ſir William Boothby, and major Farquhar.

However judicious and agreeable to military rules theſe orders might appear, they did not fail to raiſe aſtoniſhment in the troops. The tranſports were at that time above four miles from ſhore, the enemy alarmed for eight days, and putting themſelves in a poſture of defence; ſeveral battalions had been ſeen marching along the coaſt from Rochelle; the ſhore, it was probable, was now lined with batteries; the ſea was rough and the weather boiſterous; the firſt body of men landed, which could not amount to eighteen hundred, muſt defend themſelves for the ſpace of ſix hours before a ſecond diſembarkation could be effected, and that without the hopes of a retreat, as the boats were ordered immediately to row back to the tranſports to take in more forces. All theſe, with a variety of other difficulties, were too obvious to eſcape the moſt unobſerving ſoldier on board. Notwithſtanding the dangers, but too apparent, there was the utmoſt alacrity among the troops; and every thing was purſued with ſo much ſpirit and expedition, that all the boats were filled an hour ſooner than the time appointed. Here they remained beating againſt each other, and the ſides of the ſhips, for the ſpace of four hours, while the council were determining whether, after all the trouble given, they ſhould land: when at length an order was publiſhed for the troops to return to their reſpective tranſports, and all thoughts of a deſcent, to appearance, wholly abandoned.

The ſucceeding days were employed, in blowing up and demoliſhing the fortifications of Aix; after which, in conſequence of a letter from ſir Edward Hawke, the land officers took the final reſolution of returning to England without any farther attempts, fully ſatisfied they had done all in their power to execute the deſigns of the miniſtry, and chuſing rather to oppoſe the frowns of an angry ſoverign, the murmurings of an incenſed nation, and the contempt of mankind, than fight a handful of daſtardly militia. Such was the iſſue of an expedition that raiſed the expectation of all Europe, threw the coaſts of France into the utmoſt confuſion, and coſt the people of England little leſs than a million of money!

The fleet was no ſooner returned than the whole nation was in a ferment. The public expectation had been wound up to the higheſt pitch, and now the diſappointment was proportioned to the ſanguine hopes conceived that the pride of France would have been humbled by ſo formidable an armament. The miniſtry, and with them the national voice, exclaimed againſt the commanding officers, and the military men retorted the calumny, by laying the blame on the projectors of the enterprize, who had put the nation to great expences before they obtained the neceſſary information. Certain it was, the blame muſt fall ſomewhere, and the miniſtry reſolved to acquit themſelves, and fix the accuſation, by requeſting his majeſty to appoint a board of officers of character and ability to enquire into the cauſes of the late miſcarriage. This alone it was that could appeaſe the public clamours, and afford general ſatisfaction.

The enemies of Mr. Pitt endeavoured to wreſt the miſcarrage of the expedition to his prejudice; but the whiſpers of faction were ſoon drowned in the voice of the whole people of England, who never could perſuade themſelves that a gentleman, raiſed to the height of power and popularity by mere dint of ſuperior merit, integrity, and diſintereſtedneſs, would now ſacrifice his reputation by a mock armament; or hazard incurring the deriſion of Europe, by neglecting to obtain all the neceſſary previous information, or doing whatever might contribute to the ſucceſs of the expedition. It was asked, whether reaſon or juſtice dictated, that a late unfortunate admiral ſhould be capitally puniſhed for not trying and exerting his utmoſt ability to relieve Fort St. Philip's, inveſted by a powerful army, and ſurrounded with a numerous fleet, while no charge of negligence or cowardice was brought againſt thoſe who occaſioned the miſcarriage of a well-concerted and well-appointed expedition? The people, they ſaid, were not to be quieted with the reſolutions of a council of war, compoſed of men whoſe inactivity might frame excuſes for declining to expoſe themſelves to danger. It was publicly mentioned that ſuch backwardneſs appeared among the general officers before the fleet reached the iſle of Oleron, as occaſioned the admiral to declare with warmth, that he would comply with his orders, and go into Baſque road, whatever might be the conſequence. It was aſked why the army did not land on the night of the twenty-third or twenty-fourth; and whether the officers ſent out to reconnoitre had returned with ſuch intelligence as ſeemed to render a deſcent impracticable? It was asked, whether the commander in chief had complied with his majeſty's orders, "To attempt, as far as ſhould be found practicable, a deſcent on the coaſt of France, at or near Rochefort, in order to attack, and, by a vigorous impreſſion, force that place; and to burn and deſtroy, to the utmoſt of his power, all docks, magazines, arſenals, and ſhipping, as ſhall be found there?" Such rumours as theſe, every where propagated, rendered an enquiry no leſs neceſſary to the reputation of the officers on the expedition, than to the miniſter who had projected it.

Accordingly a board, conſiſting of three officers of rank, reputation, and ability, were appointed by his majeſty, purſuant to the following warrant, to inquire into the reaſons why the fleet ſhould have returned without having executed his majeſty's orders. "Whereas we were pleaſed, in Auguſt laſt, to ſend a number of troops on an expedition againſt France, with orders and inſtructions to attempt, as far as ſhould be found practicable, a deſcent on the French coaſt, at or near Rochefort; in order to attack, if practicable, and by a vigorous impreſſion, force that place; and to burn and deſtroy, to the utmoſt of their power, all docks, magazines, arſenals, and ſhipping, that ſhould be found there; and to exert ſuch other efforts as ſhould be judged moſt proper for annoying the enemy, as by our ſeveral inſtructions to the commander of the ſaid forces does more fully appear: and whereas the troops ſent for theſe purpoſes are returned to Great Britain, no attempt having been made to land on the coaſt of France; concerning the cauſes of which inaction, we think it neceſſary that enquiry ſhould be made by the general officers herein after named, in order that they may report thoſe cauſes to us, for our better information: our will and pleaſure is, and we do hereby nominate and appoint our right truſty and entirely beloved couſin and counſellor Charles duke of Marlborough, lieutenant-general; our truſty and well-beloved George Sackville, commonly called lord George Sackville, and John Waldegrave, major-generals of our forces, to examine and inquire touching the matters aforeſaid. And you are to give notice to the ſaid general-officers when and where they are to meet for the ſaid examination: and the ſaid general officers are hereby directed to cauſe you to ſummon ſuch perſons (whether the generals or other officers employed in the expeditions or others) as are neceſſary to give information touching the ſaid matters, or ſhall be deſired by thoſe who were employed in the expedition. And the ſaid general-officers are hereby farther directed to hear ſuch perſons as ſhall offer to give them information touching the ſame: and they are authorized, impowered, and required, ſtrictly to examine into the matters before mentioned, and to report a ſtate thereof as it ſhall appear to them, together with their opinion thereon. All which you are to tranſmit to our ſecretary at war, to be by him laid before us for our conſideration."

This warrant, dated on the firſt day of November, was directed to Thomas Morgan, eſq. his majeſty's judge-advocate; and in conſequence of it, the three general-officers met on the twenty-firſt of the ſame month. To judge of the practicability of executing his majeſty's orders, it was neceſſary to inquire into the nature of the intelligence upon which the expedition was projected. The firſt and moſt important was a letter ſent to ſir John, now earl Ligonier, by lieutenant-colonel Clarke. This letter had been frequently examined in the privy council, and contained in ſubſtance, That colonel Clark, in returning from Gibraltar in the year 1754, had travelled along the weſtern coaſt of France, to obſerve the condition of the fortifications, and judge how far a deſcent would be practicable, in caſe of a rupture between Great Britain and France. On his coming to Rochefort, where he was attended by an engineer, he was ſurpriſed to find the greateſt part of a good rampart, with a revetment flanked only with redans; no outworks, no covert way, and in many places no ditch, ſo that the bottom of the wall was ſeen at a diſtance. He remembered, that in other places, where the earth had been taken out to form the rampart, there was left round them a conſiderable height of ground, whence an enemy might draw great advantage: that for above the length of a front, or two or three hundred yards, there was no rampart, or even entrenchment, but only ſmall ditches, in the low and marſhy grounds next the river, which however were dry at low water; yet the bottom remained muddy and ſlimy. Towards the river no rampart, no batteries, no parapet, on either ſide, appeared; and on the land ſide he obſerved ſome high ground, within the diſtance of one hundred and fifty or two hundred yards of the town; in which condition, the colonel was told by the engineer, the place had remained for above ſeventy years. To prevent giving umbrage, he drew no plan of the place, and even burnt the few ſketches he had by him: however, as to utility, the colonel declared himſelf as much ſatisfied as if he had got a plan. He could not aſcertain the direct height of the rampart; but thought it could not exceed twenty-five feet, including the parapet. The river might be about one hundred and thirty broad, and the entrance defended by two or three ſmall redoubts. As to forces, none are ever garriſoned at Rochfort, except marines, which, at the time the colonel was on the ſpot, amounted to about one thouſand.

This was the firſt intelligence the miniſtry received of the ſtate of Rochefort, which afforded ſufficient room to believe, that an attack by ſurprize might be attended with happy conſequences. It was true, that colonel Clarke made his obſervations in time of peace; but it was likewiſe probable, that no great alterations were made, on account of the war, as the place had remained in the ſame condition during the two or three laſt wars with with France, when they had the ſame reaſons as now to expect their coaſt would be inſulted.

The next information was obtained from Joſeph Thierry, a French pilot, of the proteſtant religion, who paſſed ſeveral examinations before the privy council. This perſon declared, that he had followed the buſineſs of a pilot on the coaſt of France for the ſpace of twenty years, and ſerved as firſt pilot in ſeveral of the king's ſhips: that he had, in particular, piloted the Magnanime, before ſhe was taken by the Engliſh, for about twenty-two months, and had often conducted her into the road of the Iſle of Aix; and that he was perfectly acquainted with the entrance, which, indeed, is ſo eaſy as to render a pilot almoſt unneceſſary. The road, he ſaid, afforded a good anchorage in twelve or fourteen fathom water, as far as Bayonne; the channel between the iſlands of Oleron and Rhe was three leagues broad, and the banks neceſſary to be avoided near the land, except one called the Boiard, which is eaſily diſcerned by the breakers. He affirmed, that the largeſt veſſels might draw up cloſe to the fort of Aix, which he would undertake the Magnanime alone could deſtroy: that the largeſt ſhips might come up to the vigerot, two miles diſtant from the mouth of the river, with all their cannon and ſtores: that men might be landed to the north of fort Fouras, out of ſight of the fort, upon a meadow, where the ground is firm and level, under cover of the cannon of the fleet. This landing place he reckoned at about five miles from Rochefort, the way dry, and no where intercepted by ditches and moraſſes. Great part of the city was encompaſſed by a wall; but towards the river on both ſides, for about ſixty paces, it was incloſed only with palliſades, without a foſſe.

To the intelligence of colonel Clark and Thierry, the miniſtry added a ſecret account obtained of the ſtrength and diſtribution of the French forces; whence it appeared highly probable, that not more than ten thouſand men could be allowed for the defence of the whole coaſt, from St. Valery to Bourdeaux.

In conſequence of the above information the ſecret expedition was planned; inſtructions given to ſir John Mordaunt and admiral Hawke to make a vigorous impreſſion on the French coaſt, and all the other meaſures projected, which it was imagined would make an effectual diverſion, by obliging the enemy to employ a great part of their forces at home, diſturb and ſhake the credit of their public loans, impair the ſtrength and reſources of their navy, diſconcert their extenſive and dangerous operations of war, and finally, give life, ſtrength, and luſtre to the common cauſe and his majeſty's arms.

The board of enquiry took next into conſideration the ſeveral letters and explanatory inſtructions ſent to ſir John Mordaunt, in conſequence of ſome difficulties which might poſſibly occur, ſtated by that general in letters to the miniſter, previous to his ſailing. Then they examined the report made to ſir Edward Hawke by admiral Broderick, and the captains of men of war ſent to ſound the French ſhore from Rochelle to fort Fouras, dated September the twenty-ninth; the reſult of the councils of war on the twenty-fifth and twenty-eighth; ſir Edward Hawke's letter to ſir John Mordaunt on the twenty-ſeventh, and the general's anſwer on the twenty-ninth: after which ſir John Mordaunt was called upon to give his reaſons for not putting his majeſty's inſtructions and orders in execution. This he did in ſubſtance as follows: The attempt on Rochefort, he underſtood, was to have been on the footing of a coup-de-main, or ſurprize, which it would be impoſſible to execute, if the deſign was diſcovered, or the alarm taken. He alſo underſtood that an attempt could not be made; nay, that his majeſty did not require it ſhould, unleſs a proper place for debarking, and a ſafe retreat for the troops, was diſcovered; particularly where the ſhips could protect them, and a ſafe communication with the fleet, and conveyance of ſupplies from it, was found. His ſentiments, he ſaid, were confirmed by a paper to this purpoſe, delivered to him by ſir John Ligonier, on his firſt being appointed to command the expedition. It was likewiſe probable, he thought, that although Rochefort ſhould have remained in the ſituation in which colonel Clark and the pilot Thierry had ſeen it three years before, yet that a few days preparation could make it ſufficiently defenſible againſt a coup de main. Judging, therefore, the dependance on ſuch an operation alone improper, he applied to the miniſtry for two more old battalions, and artillery for a regular attack to force the place, which from its conſtruction appeared as difficult to be made defenſible againſt the latter, as eaſily ſecured againſt the former. But this requeſt being refuſed, he ſtill thought it his duty to obey his orders on the footing the expedition was planned, eſpecially as he underſtood his inſtructions were diſcretionary, regarding the circumſtances of the time, the condition of the place, and the nature of the ſervice. He recited the poſitive and credible intelligence received, as well before the embarkation as during the voyage, of the alarm given to France, and the preparations made along the French coaſts from Breſt and St. Malo's to Rochefort: the accidents that kept the fleet hovering along the coaſts, and prevented the poſſibility of an attempt by ſurprize: the reports of all the gentlemen employed in ſounding the coaſts, ſo contrary to the intelligence given by Thierry the pilot: the opinion of the council of war, by which he was enjoined to act, and with which his own judgment concurred: the endeavours uſed, after the twenty-ſixth, to find out ſome expedient for annoying the enemy, and executing his majeſty's inſtructions: the attempt made to land, in conſequence of the reſolution of the ſecond council of war, which was prevented by boiſterous and ſtormy weather: and, laſtly, the reaſons that determined him, in concert with the other land-officers, to return to England.

Having conſidered all theſe circumſtances, and examined ſeveral officers who ſerved in the expedition, the court of enquiry gave in the following report to his majeſty; a report, at that time, deemed equivocal, artful, and unſatisfactory.

"It appears to us, that one cauſe of the expedition having failed, is the not attacking fort Fouras by ſea, at the ſame time that it could have been attacked by land, agreeable to the firſt deſign, which certainly muſt have been of the greateſt utility towards carrying your majeſty's inſtructions into execution. It was at firſt reſolved by admiral Hawke (Thierry the pilot having undertaken the ſafe conduct of a ſhip to fort Fouras for that purpoſe) poſe) but afterwards laid aſide, upon the repreſentation of vice-admiral Knowles, that the Barfleur, the ſhip deſigned for that ſervice, was on ground, at the diſtance of between four and five miles from the ſhore: but as neither ſir Edward Hawke or the pilot could attend to give any information upon that head, we cannot preſume to offer any certain opinion thereupon.

"We conceive another cauſe of the failure of the expedition to have been, that inſtead of attempting to land, when the report was received, on the twenty-fourth of September, from rear-admiral Broderick, and the captains who had been ſent out to ſound and reconnoitre, a council of war was ſummoned and held on the twenty-fifth; in which it was unanimouſly reſolved not to land, as the attempt on Rochefort was neither adviſeable nor practicable: but it does not appear to us, that there were then, or at any time afterwards, either a body of troops or batteries on ſhore ſufficient to have prevented the attempting a deſcent, in purſuance of the inſtructions ſigned by your majeſty: neither does it appear to us that there were any reaſons ſufficient to induce the council of war to believe that Rochefort was ſo changed, in reſpect of its ſtrength, or poſture of defence, ſince the expedition was firſt reſolved on in England, as to prevent all attempts of an attack upon the place, in order to burn and deſtroy the docks, magazines, arſenals, and ſhipping, in obedience to your majeſty's command.

"And we think ourſelves obliged to remark, in the council of war on the twenty-eighth of September, that no reaſon could have exiſted ſufficient to prevent the attempt of landing the troops, as the council then unanimouſly reſolved to land with all poſſible diſpatch.

"We beg leave alſo to remark, that after its being unanimouſly reſolved to land, in the council of war of the twenty-eighth of September, the reſolution was taken of returning to England, without any regular or general meeting of the ſaid council: but, as the whole operation was of ſo inconſiderable a nature, we do not offer this to your majeſty as a cauſe of the failure of the expedition; ſince we cannot but look upon the expedition to have failed from the time the great object of it was laid aſide, in the council of war of the twenty-fifth."

However vague, and even inconſiſtent, this report, ſigned by the general officers Marlborough, Sackville, and Waldegrave, might appear to many perſons, it probably laid the foundation for the court-martial which ſat ſoon after, upon the conduct of the commander in chief of the expedition. The enemies of the miniſter made a handle of it, to leſſen him in the eſteem of the public, by laying the whole blame on his forming a project ſo expenſive to the nation, on intelligence not only ſlight at the firſt view, but falſe upon farther examination. But the people were ſtill his advocates: they diſcerned ſomething myſterious in the whole conduct of the commander in chief. They plainly perceived that caution took place of vigour, and that the hours for action were ſpent in deliberations and councils of war. Had he debarked the troops, and made ſuch an attack as would have diſtinguiſhed his courage, the voice of the people would have acquitted him, however unſucceſsful, though prudence perhaps might have condemned him. Even Braddock's raſhneſs they deemed preferable to Mordaunt's inactivity: the loſs of ſo many brave lives was thought leſs injurious and diſgraceful to the nation, than the too ſafe return of the preſent armament. The one demonſtrated that the Britiſh ſpirit ſtill exiſted; the other ſeemed to indicate the too powerful influence of wealth, luxury, and thoſe manners which tend to debauch and emaſculate the mind. A public trial of the commander in chief was expected by the people, and it was graciouſly granted by his majeſty. It is even thought that ſir John Mordaunt himſelf demanded to have his conduct ſcrutinized, by which method alone he was ſenſible his character could be reeſtabliſhed. His majeſty's warrant for holding a court-martial was accordingly ſigned on the third day of December. The court was compoſed of nine lieutenant-generals, nine major-generals, and three colonels, who ſat on the fourteenth, and continued by ſeveral adjournments to the twentieth.

Lieutenant-general ſir John Mordaunt came priſoner before the court, and the following charge was exhibited againſt him; namely, "That he being appointed by the king commander in chief of his majeſty's forces ſent on an expedition to the coaſt of France, and having received orders and inſtructions relative thereto from his majeſty, under his royal ſign manual, and alſo by one of his principal ſecretaries of ſtate, hath diſobeyed his majeſty's ſaid orders and inſtructions." The proceedings of this court were nearly ſimilar to thoſe of the court of enquiry. The ſame evidences were examined, with the addition of ſir Edward Hawke's depoſition; and a defence, differing in no eſſential point from the former, made by the priſoner; but the judgment given was clear and explicit. Sir John Mordaunt was unanimouſly found Not guilty, and therefore acquitted, while the public opinion remained unaltered; and many perſons inveighed as bitterly againſt the lenity of the preſent court-martial, as they had formerly againſt the ſeverity of the ſentence paſſed upon a late unfortunate admiral. The evidence of one gentleman in particular drew attention: he was accuſed of tergiverſation, and of ſhewing that partial indulgence which his own conduct required. He publicly defended his character: his performance was cenſured, and himſelf diſmiſſed the ſervice by his ſovereign.

The operations at ſea during the courſe of this year were neither numerous nor important. The commerce of Great Britain ſuſtained conſiderable damage from the activity and ſucceſs of French privateers, of which a great number had been fitted out in the iſlands of Martinique and Guadalupe. The Greenwich ſhip of war, mounted with fifty guns, and a frigate of twenty, fell into the hands of the enemy, together with a very conſiderable number of trading veſſels.

Theſe loſſes, however, were more than compenſated by the advantages obtained by the Engliſh commanders. The Duc d'Aquitaine, a large ſhip of fifty guns, was taken in the month of June by two Britiſh ſhips of war, after an obſtinate engagement; and about the ſame time the Aquilon, of nearly the ſame force, was driven on ſhore and deſtroyed near Breſt by the Antelope, one of the Britiſh cruiſers. A French frigate of twenty-ſix guns, called the Emeraude, was taken in the Channel, after a warm engagement, by an Engliſh ſhip of inferior force, under the command of captain Gilchriſt, a brave and active officer, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſequel by very extraordinary feats of valour. All the ſea officers ſeemed to be animated with a noble emulation to outvie each other in the ſervice of their country; and the ſpirit deſcended even to the captains of privateers, who, inſtead of imitating the former commanders of that claſs, in avoiding ſhips of force, and converting their whole attention to advantageous prizes, now attacked the armed ſhips of the enemy, and fought with the moſt obſtinate valour in the purſuit of national glory.

Hiſtory perhaps cannot furniſh a more remarkable inſtance of deſperate courage than that which was exhibited in December of the preceding year, by the officers and crew of an Engliſh privateer, called the Terrible, under the command of captain William Death, armed with twenty-ſix carriage guns, and manned with two hundred ſailors. On the twenty-third day of the month he engaged and took a large French ſhip from St. Domingo, after an obſtinate battle, in which he loſt his fourth lieutenant and three ſeamen: then he ſecured with ſixteen men his prize, which contained a valuable cargo, and directed his courſe towards England; but in a few days he had the misfortune to fall in with the Vengeance, a privateer of St. Malo, carrying thirty-four large cannon, with a complement of three hundred and fifty men.

Their firſt ſtep was to retake the prize, which was eaſily effected; then the two ſhips bore down upon the Terrible, whoſe main-maſt was ſhot away by the firſt broadſide. Notwithſtanding this diſaſter, ſhe maintained ſuch a furious and deſperate engagement againſt both as can hardly be equalled in the annals of Britain. The firſt and third captains of the Frenchman were killed, with two thirds of their company; but the gallant captain Death, with the greater part of his officers, and almoſt his whole crew, having met with the ſame fate, his ſhip was boarded by the enemy, who found no more than twenty-ſix perſons alive, ſixteen of whom were mutilated by the loſs of leg or arm, and the other ten grievouſly wounded. The ſhip itſelf was ſo ſhattered that it could ſcarce be kept from ſinking, and the whole diſplayed a moſt dreadful ſcene of blood, carnage, and deſolation. Even the victor lay a wreck on the ſurface; and in this condition made ſhift, with great difficulty, to tow the Terrible into St. Malo, where ſhe was not beheld without aſtoniſhment and terror. This adventure was no ſooner known in England than a liberal ſubſcription was raiſed for the ſupport of Death's widow, and that part of the crew which ſurvived the engagement.

In the month of November captain Lockhart, a young gentleman who had already rendered himſelf a terror to the enemy, as commander of a ſmall frigate, now added conſiderably to his reputation, by taking the Melampe, a French privateer of Bayonne, greatly ſuperior to his ſhip in number of men and weight of metal. This exploit was followed by another of the ſame nature, in his conqueſt of another French adventurer, called the Counteſs of Gramont; and a third large privateer of Bayonne was taken by captain Saumarez, commander of the Antelope. In a word, the Narrow Seas were ſo well guarded, that in a little time ſcarce a French ſhip durſt ſtir out of their harbours, while the Britiſh traders carried on their traffic without moleſtation.

Let us now turn our eyes to the continent of America, where we ſhall ſee as diſagreeable and diſgraceful ſcenes as thoſe exhibited, during the courſe of this year, by the Britiſh arms in Europe.

Whatever reaſons the government had to expect the campaign ſhould be vigorouſly puſhed in America, almoſt every circumſtance turned out contrary to expectation. Not all the endeavours of the earl of Loudon to quiet the diſſenſions among the different provinces, and to eſtabliſh unanimity and harmony, could prevail. Circumſtances required, that he ſhould act the part of a mediator, in order to raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies for proſecuting the war, without which it was impoſſible he could appear in the character of a general.

The enemy, in the mean time, were purſuing the blow given at Oſwego, and taking advantage of the diſtraction that appeared in the Britiſh councils. By their ſucceſſes, in the preceding campaign, they remained maſters of all the lakes. Hence they were furniſhed with the means of practiſing on the Indians in all the different diſtricts, and obliging them, by rewards, promiſes, and menaces, to act in their favour. Every acceſſion to their ſtrength was a real diminution of that of the Britiſh commander; but then the ignorance or puſillanimity of ſome of the inferior officers in our back ſettlements was, in effect, more beneficial to the enemy than all the vigilance and activity of Montcalm. In conſequence of the ſhameful loſs of Oſwego, they voluntarily abandoned to the mercy of the French general the whole country of the Five Nations, the only body of Indians who had inviolably performed their engagements, or indeed that had preſerved any ſincere regard for the Britiſh government. The communication with theſe faithful allies was now cut off, by the imprudent demolition of the forts we poſſeſſed at the great Carrying-place. A ſtrong fort indeed was built at Wincheſter, and called Fort Loudon, after the commander in chief, and four hundred Cherokee Indians joined the Engliſh forces at Fort Cumberland: but this by no means counterbalanced the loſſes ſuſtained in conſequence of our having imprudently ſtopped up Wood Creek, and filled it with logs. Every perſon the leaſt acquainted with the country, readily perceived the weakneſs of theſe meaſures, by which our whole frontier was left open and expoſed to the irruption of the ſavages in the French intereſt, who would not fail to profit by our blunders, too notorious to eſcape them. By the removal of theſe barriers, a path was opened to our fine ſettlements on thoſe grounds called the German Flats, and along the Mohawk's river, which the enemy deſtroyed with fire and ſword before the end of the campaign.

In the mean time, lord Loudon was taking the moſt effectual ſteps to unite the provinces, and raiſe a force ſufficient to give ſome deciſive blow. The attack on Crown Point, which had been ſo long meditated, was laid aſide, as of leſs importance than the intended expedition to Louiſbourg, now ſubſtituted in its place, and undoubtedly a more conſiderable object in itſelf. Admiral Holbourn arrived at Hallifax with the ſquadron and tranſports under his command on the ninth of July; and it was his lordſhip's intention to repair thither with all poſſible diligence, in order to take upon him the command of the expedition; but a variety of accidents interpoſed. It was with the utmoſt difficulty he at length aſſembled a body of ſix thouſand men, with which he inſtantly began his march to join the troops lately arrived from England. When the junction was effected, the whole forces amounted to twelve thouſand men; an army that raiſed great expectations. Immediately ſome ſmall veſſels were ſent out to examine and reconnoitre the condition of the enemy, and the intermediate time was employed in embarking the troops, as ſoon as the tranſports arrived. The return of the ſcouts totally altered the face of affairs: they brought the unwelcome news, that M. de Bois de la Mothe, who ſailed in the month of May from Breſt with a large fleet of men of war and tranſports, was now ſafe at anchor in the harbour of Louiſbourg. Their intelligence was ſupported by the teſtimony of ſeveral deſerters; yet ſtill it wanted confirmation, and many perſons believed their account of the enemy's ſtrength greatly magnified. Such advices, however, could not but occaſion extrordinary fluctuations in the councils of war at Halifax. Some were for ſetting aſide all thoughts of the expedition for that ſeaſon; while others, more warm in their diſpoſitions, and ſanguine in their expectations, were for proſecuting it with vigour, in ſpite of all dangers and difficulties. Their diſputes were carried on with great vehemence, when a packet, bound from Louiſbourg for France, was taken by one of his majeſty's ſhips ſtationed at Newfoundland. She had letters on board, which put the enemy's ſuperiority beyond all doubt, at leaſt by ſea. It clearly appeared there were at that time in Louiſbourg ſix thouſand regular troops, three thouſand natives, and one thouſand three hundred Indians, with ſeventeen ſhips of the line, and three frigates moored in the harbour; that the place was well ſupplied with ammunition, proviſion, and every kind of military ſtores; and that the enemy wiſhed for nothing more than an attack, which it was probable would terminate to the diſgrace of the aſſailants, and ruin of the Britiſh affairs in America. The commanders at Halifax were fully apprized of the conſequences of an unſucceſsful attempt: it was therefore almoſt unanimouſly reſolved to poſtpone the expedition to ſome more convenient opportunity, eſpecially as the ſeaſon was now far advanced, which alone would be ſufficient to fruſtrate their endeavours, and render the enterprize abortive.

This reſolution ſeems indeed to have been the moſt eligible in their circumſtances, whatever conſtructions might afterwards be given, with intention to prejudice the public againſt the commander in chief. Lord Loudon's departure from New York, with all the forces he was able to collect, afforded the marquis de Montcalm the faireſt occaſion of improving the ſucceſſes of the former campaign. That general had, in the very commencement of the ſeaſon, made three different attacks on Fort William-Henry, in all which he was repulſed by the vigour and reſolution of the garriſon. But his diſappointment here was balanced by an advantage gained by a party of regulars and Indians at Ticonderoga. Colonel John Parker, with a detachment of near four hundred men, went by water, in whale and bay-boats, to attack the enemy's advanced guard at that place. Landing at night on an iſland, he ſent before dawn three boats to the main land, which the enemy way-laid and took. Having procured the neceſſary intelligence from the priſoners of the colonel's deſigns, they contrived their meaſures, placed three hundred men in ambuſh behind the point where he propoſed landing, and ſent three battoes to the place of rendezvous. Colonel Parker, miſtaking theſe for his own boats, eagerly put to ſhore, was ſurrounded by the enemy, reinforced with four hundred men, and attacked with ſuch impetuoſity, that, of the whole detachment, only two officers and ſeventy private men eſcaped. Fluſhed with this advantage, animated by the abſence of the Britiſh commander in chief, then at Halifax, and fired with a deſire to revenge the diſgrace he had lately ſuſtained before Fort Henry, Montcalm drew together all his forces, with intention to lay ſiege to that place. Fort William-Henry ſtands on the ſouthern coaſt of Lake George. It was built with a view to protect and cover the frontiers of the Engliſh colonies, as well as to command the lake. The fortifications were good, defended by a garriſon of near three thouſand men, and covered by an army of four thouſand, under the conduct of general Webb, poſted at no great diſtance. When the marquis de Montcalm had aſſembled all the forces at Crown Point, Ticonderoga, and the adjacent poſts, together with a conſiderable body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in the whole to near ten thouſand men, he marched directly to the fort, made his approaches, and with a good train of artillery began playing on the garriſon.

On the very day he inveſted the place, he ſent a letter to colonel Monro, telling him, he thought himſelf obliged, in humanity, to deſire he would ſurrender the fort, and not provoke the great number of ſavages in the French army by a vain reſiſtance. "A detachment of your garriſon has lately, ſays he, experienced their cruelty: I have it yet in my power to reſtrain them, and oblige them to obſerve a capitulation, as none of them hitherto are killed; which will not be in my power in other circumſtances. Your perſiſting in the defence of your fort can only retard its fate a few days, and muſt of neceſſity expoſe an unfortunate garriſon, who can poſſibly receive no relief, conſidering the precautions taken to prevent it. I demand a deciſive anſwer, for which purpoſe I have ſent the ſieur Funtbrune, one of my aid-de-camps. You may credit what he will inform you of, from Montcalm."

General Webb beheld his preparations with an indifference and ſecurity bordering on infatuation. It is credibly reported, that he had private intelligence of all the French general's deſigns and motions; yet, either deſpiſing his ſtrength, or diſcrediting the information, he neglected collecting the militia in time, which, in conjunction with his own forces, would probably have obliged Montcalm to relinquiſh the attempt, or at leaſt have rendered his ſucceſs very doubtful and hazardous. The enemy, meeting with no diſturbance from the quarter they moſt dreaded, proſecuted the ſiege with with vigour, and were warmly received by the garriſon, who fired with great ſpirit, till they had burſt almoſt all their cannon, and ſpent their ammunition. Neither Montcalm's promiſes or threats could prevail upon them to ſurrender, while they were in a condition to defend themſelves, or could reaſonably expect aſſiſtance from general Webb: they even perſiſted to hold out after prudence dictated they ought to ſurrender. Colonel Monro was ſenſible of the importance of his charge, and imagined that general Webb, though ſlow in his motions, would ſurely make ſome vigorous efforts either to raiſe the ſiege, or force a ſupply of ammunition, proviſion, and other neceſſaries into the garriſon. At length neceſſity obliged him, after ſuſtaining a ſiege from the third to the ninth day of Auguſt, to hang out a flag of truce, which was immediately anſwered by the French commander. Hoſtages were exchanged, and articles of capitulation ſigned by both parties; whereby the garriſon of Fort William-Henry, and the troops in the retrenched camp, ſhould march out with their arms, the baggage of the officers and ſoldiers, and all the uſual neceſſaries of war; eſcorted by a detachment of French troops, or interpreters attached to the ſavages. It was agreed, that the gate of the fort ſhould be delivered to the troops of the moſt Chriſtian king, immediately after ſigning the capitulation; and the retrenched camp, on the departure of the Britiſh forces: that the artillery, warlike ſtores, proviſion, and in general every thing, except the effects of the ſoldiers, and officers, ſhould, upon honour, be delivered to the French troops; for which purpoſe it was agreed there ſhould be delivered, with the capitulation, an exact inventory of the ſtores, and other particulars ſpecified: that the garriſon of the fort, the troops in the retrenchment, and dependencies, ſhould not ſerve for the ſpace of eighteen months, from the date of the capitulation, againſt his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, or his allies: that with the capitulation there ſhould be delivered an exact ſtate of the troops, ſpecifying the names of the officers, engineers, artilleriſts, commiſſaries, and all employed: that the officers and ſoldiers, Canadians, women, and ſavages made priſoners by land ſince the commencement of the war in North America, be delivered in the ſpace of three months at Carrilon; in return for which an equal number of the garriſon of Fort William ſhould be capacitated to ſerve, agreeable to the return given by the Engliſh officer, and the receipt of the French commanding officers, of the priſoners ſo delivered: that an officer remain as an hoſtage, till the ſafe return of the eſcort ſent with the troops of his Britannic majeſty: that the ſick and wounded, not in a condition to be tranſported to Fort Edward, ſhould remain under the protection of the marquis de Montcalm; who engaged to uſe them with tenderneſs and humanity, and to return them as ſoon as recovered: that proviſion for two days ſhould be iſſued out for the Britiſh troops: that in teſtimony of his eſteem and reſpect for colonel Monro and his garriſon, on account of their gallant defence, the marquis de Montcalm ſhould return one cannon, a ſix pounder.

Whether the marquis de Montcalm was really aſſiduous to have theſe articles punctually executed, we cannot pretend to determine; but certain it is, that they were perfidiouſly broke, in almoſt every inſtance. The ſavages, in the French intereſt, either paid no regard to the capitulation, or were permitted, from views of policy, to act the moſt treacherous, inhuman, and inſidious part. They fell upon the Britiſh troops as they marched out, deſpoiled them of the few remaining effects, dragged the Indians in the Engliſh ſervice out of their ranks, ſcalping, tomohawking, and again acting the tragedy at Oſwego, with a thouſand additional outrages and barbarities. The throats of many women, we are told, were cut, their bodies ript open, bowels torn out, and inſultingly thrown in their faces, with ſuch ſavage marks of rage and horrible cruelty, as, for the ſake of humanity, ought to be diſcredited. Can poſterity be brought to believe, that two thouſand Britons, with arms in their hands, could be tame ſpectators of theſe, and more ſhocking barbarities? That they would permit a rabble of brutiſh ſavages to ſeize infants and children by the heels, and wantonly beat out their brains againſt trees and ſtones! Yet were theſe and other enormities, equally diſgraceful to humanity, committed in ſight of the French and Britiſh forces, if we may credit the teſtimony of credible evidences. However, the greateſt part of the Britiſh garriſon got ſafe, though in a miſerable condition, to Fort Edward, after being purſued for ſeven miles by the Indians; and the reſt, flying for protection to the marquis de Montcalm, were by him ſent home. A little time after the enemy demoliſhed the fort, carried off the effects, proviſion, artillery, and every thing elſe left by the garriſon, together with the veſſels preſerved in the lake, and departed, without purſuing their ſucceſs by any other attempt.

Thus ended the third campaign in America, where, with a vaſt increaſe of forces, a clear ſuperiority over the enemy, an army of twenty thouſand regular troops, a great number of provincial forces, and a prodigious naval power, not leſs than twenty ſhips of the line, we abandoned our allies, expoſed our people, ſuffered them to be cruelly maſſacred, in ſight of our troops, and relinquiſhed a large and valuable tract of country, to the eternal reproach and diſgrace of the Britiſh name.

We could not, without interrupting the principal operations, take notice of two occurrences which ought to have been mentioned.

In the month of July a ſtratagem, contrived by the enemy, had very nearly occaſioned the loſs of Fort Johnſon. They propoſed ruſhing into the fort in the evening, when the gate was open to admit the Negroe women, ſent out every day to milk the cattle. Happening to be a few minutes too late, the gates were fortunately ſhut before their arrival: upon which they knocked for admiſſion, were challenged, and fired upon by the centinel. Immediately the cannon were fired to alarm the country, and the enemy, perceiving their ſcheme baffled, retired with precipitation.

The other occurrence we mention is of a civil nature. The governor and council of Nova Scotia, taking into conſideration the moſt expedient methods for carrying into execution thoſe parts of his majeſty's commiſſion and inſtructions, relative to the manner of holding the general aſſembly of that province, came to a reſolution, that a houſe of repreſentatives of the province ſhould conſtitute the legiſlature of Nova Scotia, in conjunction with his majeſty's governor and commander in chief for the time being, and his majeſty's council of the ſaid province. It was further reſolved, that the general aſſembly be elected and convened in the manner following, viz. Twelve members to be elected for the province at large, till ſuch time as it is divided into counties. Halliſax was appointed to ſend four members, and other towns and corporations in proportion to their bulk and value to the province, making in all twenty-two; the number of repreſentatives to ſit in the houſe.

As to the naval tranſactions in this country, though leſs infamous, they were not leſs unfortunate. Immediately on lord Loudon's departure from Hallifax, admiral Holbourn, now freed from the care of the tranſports, ſet ſail for Louiſbourg, with fifteen ſhips of the line, one ſhip of fifty guns, three ſmall frigates, and a fire ſhip. What the object of this cruize might have been, can only be conjectured. Some imagine curioſity was the admiral's ſole motive, and the deſire of informing himſelf with certainty of the enemy's ſtrength; while others perſuaded themſelves, that he was in hopes of drawing M. de la Mothe to an engagement, notwithſtanding his ſuperiority in number of ſhips and weight of metal. Be this as it may, the Britiſh ſquadron appeared off Louiſbourg on the twentieth day of Auguſt; and approaching within two miles of the batteries, ſaw the French admiral make the ſignal to unmoor. Mr. Holbourn was greatly inferior in ſtrength; and it is obvious, that his deſign was not to fight the enemy, as he immediately made the beſt of his way to Hallifax. About the middle of September, being reinforced with four ſhips of the line, he again proceeded to Louiſbourg, probably with intention, if poſſible, to draw the enemy to an engagement; but he found de la Mothe too prudent to hazard an unneceſſary battle, the loſs of which would have greatly expoſed all the French colonies. Here the Engliſh ſquadron continued cruizing until the twenty-fifth, when they were overtaken in a terrible ſtorm from the ſouthward. When the hurricane began, the fleet was about forty leagues diſtant from Louiſbourg; but were driven in twelve hours within two miles of the rocks, and breakers on that coaſt. Here the wind providentially ſhifting ſaved the whole ſquadron, except the Tilbury, ſhipwrecked upon the rocks, and half her crew drowned. Eleven ſhips were diſmaſted; others threw over their guns; and all returned in a very ſhattered condition to England, at a very unfavourable ſeaſon of the year.

In this manner ended the expedition to Louiſbourg, more unfortunate to the nation than the preceding deſigns upon Rochefort; leſs diſgraceful to the commanders, but equally the occaſion of ridicule and triumph to our enemies. Indeed, the unhappy conſequences of the political diſputes at home, the inſtability of the adminiſtration, and the frequent revolutions in our councils, were ſtrongly manifeſted by that languor infuſed into all our military operations, and general unſteadineſs in our purſuit. Faction in the mother country, produced diviſions and miſconduct in the colonies. No ambition to ſignalize themſelves appeared among the officers, from the uncertainty whether their ſervices were to be rewarded or condemned. Their attachment to particular perſons weakened the love they ought to have entertained for their country in general, and deſtroyed that ſpirit of enterprize, that firmneſs and reſolution, which conſtitutes the commander, and without which the beſt capacity, joined to the moſt uncorruptible integrity, can effect nothing.

In the Eaſt Indies the ſcene was changed greatly to the honour and advantage of Great Britain. Here the commanders acted with that harmony, ſpirit, and unanimity becoming Britons, zealous for the credit of their king and the intereſt of their country. We left admiral Watſon and colonel Clive advancing to Calcutta, to revenge the cruel tragedy acted upon their countrymen the preceding year. On the thirty-firſt of January the admiral with two ſhips appeared before the town, and was received by a briſk fire from the batteries. This ſalute was returned ſo warmly that the enemy's guns were ſoon ſilenced; and in leſs than two hours the place and fort were abandoned. Colonel Clive, on the other ſide, inveſted the town, and made the attack with that vigour and intrepidity peculiar to himſelf, which greatly contributed to the ſudden reduction of the ſettlement. As ſoon as the fort was ſurrendered, the brave and active captain Coote, with his majeſty's troops, took poſſeſſion, and found ninety-one pieces of cannon, four mortars, abundance of ammunition, ſtores, and proviſions, with every requiſite for ſuſtaining an obſtinate ſiege. Thus the Engliſh were reeſtabliſhed in the two ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in the Ganges, with the inconſiderable loſs of nine ſeamen killed, and three ſoldiers. A few days after, Hughly, a city of great trade, ſituated higher up the river, was reduced with as little difficulty, but infinitely greater prejudice to the nabob, as here his ſtore-houſes of ſalt, and vaſt granaries for the ſupport of his army, were burnt and deſtroyed. Incenſed at the almoſt inſtantaneous loſs of all his conqueſts, and demolition of the city of Hughly, the viceroy of Bengal aſſembled an army of ten thouſand horſe and fifteen thouſand foot, fully reſolved to expel the Engliſh out of his dominions, and take ample vengeance for the diſgraces he had lately ſuſtained. He was ſeen marching by the Engliſh camp in his way to Calcutta on the ſecond of February, where he encamped, about a mile from the town. Colonel Clive immediately made application to the admiral for a reinforcement; and ſix hundred men under the command of captain Warwick, were accordingly draughted from the different ſhips, and ſent to aſſiſt his little army. Clive drew out his forces, advanced in three columns towards the enemy, and begun the attack ſo vigorouſly, that the viceroy retreated, after a feeble reſiſtance, with the loſs of a thouſand men killed, wounded, and taken priſoners, five hundred horſes, great numbers of draught bullocks, and four elephants. Though this advantage was leſs deciſive than could be wiſhed, yet did it ſufficiently intimidate the Nabob into conceſſions much to the honour and advantage of the company. He promiſed not to diſturb the Engliſh in any of thoſe privileges or poſſeſſions ſpecified in the phirmand granted by the Mogul: and that all merchandize belonging to the company ſhould paſs and repaſs in every part of the province of Bengal, free of duty: that all the Engliſh factories ſeized the preceding year, or ſince, would be reſtored, with the money, goods, and effects appertaining; that all damages ſuſtained by the Engliſh ſhould be repaired.

with vigour, and were warmly received by the garriſon, who fired with great ſpirit, till they had burſt almoſt all their cannon, and ſpent their ammunition. Neither Montcalm's promiſes or threats could prevail upon them to ſurrender, while they were in a condition to defend themſelves, or could reaſonably expect aſſiſtance from general Webb: they even perſiſted to hold out after prudence dictated they ought to ſurrender. He was ſeen marching by the Engliſh camp in his way to Calcutta on the ſecond of February, where he encamped, about a mile from the town. Colonel Clive immediately made application to the admiral for a reinforcement; and ſix hundred men under the command of captain Warwick, were accordingly draughted from the different ſhips, and ſent to aſſiſt his little army. Clive drew out his forces, advanced in three columns towards the enemy, and begun the attack ſo vigorouſly, that the viceroy retreated, after a feeble reſiſtance, with the loſs of a thouſand men killed, wounded, and taken priſoners, five hundred horſes, great numbers of draught bullocks, and four elephants. Though this advantage was leſs deciſive than could be wiſhed, yet did it ſufficiently intimidate the Nabob into conceſſions much to the honour and advantage of the company. He promiſed not to diſturb the Engliſh in any of thoſe privileges or poſſeſſions ſpecified in the phirmand granted by the Mogul: and that all merchandize belonging to the company ſhould paſs and repaſs in every part of the province of Bengal, free of duty: that all the Engliſh factories ſeized the preceding year, or ſince, would be reſtored, with the money, goods, and effects appertaining; that all damages ſuſtained by the Engliſh ſhould be repaired.

paired, and their loſſes repaid: that the Engliſh ſhould have liberty to fortify Calcutta, in whatever manner they thought proper, without interruption: that they ſhould have the liberty of coining all the gold and bullion they imported, which ſhould paſs current in the province: that he would remain in ſtrict friendſhip and alliance with the Engliſh, uſe his utmoſt endeavours to heal up the late diviſions, and reſtore the former good underſtanding between them. All which ſeveral articles were ſolemnly ſigned and ſealed with the Nabob's own hand.

Such were the terms obtained for the company by the ſpirited and gallant conduct of the two Engliſh commanders. They had, however, too much diſcernment to rely on the promiſes of a barbarian, who had ſo perfidiouſly broke former engagements: but they prudently diſſembled their ſentiments, until they had thoroughly reinſtated the affairs of the company, and reduced the French power in this province. The chief object of their deſigns was the reduction of Chandenagore, a French ſettlement, higher up the river than Calcutta, of conſiderable ſtrength, and the chief in importance of any poſſeſſed by that nation in the bay. Colonel Clive, being reinforced by three hundred men from Bombay, began his march to Chandenagore, at the head of ſeven hundred Europeans and one thouſand ſix hundred Indians, where on his firſt arrival, he took poſſeſſion of all the out-poſts, except one redoubt mounted with eight pieces of cannon, which he left to be ſilenced by the admiral. On the eighteenth of March the admirals Watſon and Pocock arrived within two miles of the French ſettlement, with the Kent, Tiger, and Saliſbury men of war; and found their paſſage obſtructed by booms laid acroſs the river, and ſeveral veſſels ſunk in the channel. Theſe difficulties being removed, they advanced early on the twenty-fourth, and drew up in a line before the fort, which they battered with great fury for three hours; while colonel Clive was making his approaches on the land ſide, and playing vigorouſly from the batteries he had raiſed. Their united efforts ſoon obliged the enemy to ſubmiſſion. A flag of truce was waved over the walls, and the place ſurrendered by capitulation. The keys were delivered to captain Latham of the Tiger, and in the afternoon colonel Clive with the king's troops took poſſeſſion. Thus the reduction of a ſtrong fortreſs, garriſoned by five hundred Europeans, and one thouſand two hundred Indians, defended by one thundred and twenty-three-pieces of cannon, and three mortars, well provided with all kinds of ſtores and neceſſaries, and of very great importance to the enemy's commerce in India, was accompliſhed with a loſs not exceeding forty men on the ſide of the conquerors.

By the treaty of capitulation the director, counſellors, and inferior ſervants of the ſettlement, were allowed to depart with their wearing apparel: the Jeſuits were permitted to take away their church-ornaments, and the natives to remain in the full exertion of their liberties; but the garriſon were to continue priſoners of war. The goods and money found in the place were conſiderable; but the principail advantage aroſe from the ruin of the head ſettlement of the enemy on the Ganges, which could not but interfere with the Enliſh commerce in theſe parts.

I

Succeſs had hitherto attended all the operations of the Britiſh commanders, becauſe they were concerted with foreſight and unanimity; and executed with that vigour and ſpirit which have deſervedly raiſed them high in the eſteem of their country. They reduced the Nabob to reaſonable terms of accommodation, before they alarmed the French; and now, when the power of the latter was deſtroyed, they entered upon meaſures to oblige the treacherous viceroy to a ſtrict performance of the treaty he had ſo lately ſigned. However ſpecious his promiſes were, they found him extremely dilatory in the execution of ſeveral articles of the treaty, which, in effect, was the ſame to the Engliſh commerce as if none had been concluded. The company's goods were loaded with high duties, and ſeveral other infractions of the peace committed, upon ſuch frivolous pretences as evidently demonſtrated that he ſought to come to an open rupture as ſoon as his projects were ripe for execution. As recommencing hoſtilities againſt ſo powerful a prince was in itſelf dangerous, and, if poſſible, to be avoided, the affair was laid before the council of Calcutta, and canvaſſed with all the circumſpection and caution that a meaſure required, on which depended the fate of the whole trade of Bengal. During theſe deliberations a moſt fortunate incident occurred, that ſoon determined the council to come to an open rupture. The leading perſons in the viceroy's court found themſelves oppreſſed by his haughtineſs and inſolence. The ſame ſpirit of diſcontent appeared among the principal officers of his army: they were well acquainted with his perfidy, ſaw his preparations for war, and were ſenſible that the peace of the country could never be reſtored, unleſs either the Engliſh were expelled, or the Nabob depoſed. In conſequence, a plan was concerted for diveſting him of all his power; and the conſpiracy was conducted by Jaffier Ali Khan, his prime miniſter and chief commander, a nobleman of great influence and authority in the province. The project was communicated by Ali Khan to Mr. Watts, ſecond in council at Calcutta, and ſo improved by the addreſs of that gentleman as in a manner to inſure ſucceſs.

When the plan was fully concerted between the diſaffected Indians and the council, colonel Clive was ordered to take the field with his little army. Admiral Watſon undertook the defence of Chandenagore, and the garriſon was detached to reinforce the colonel, together with fifty ſeamen, to be employed as gunners, and in directing the artillery. On the nineteenth of June a detachment was ſent to attack Cutwa fort and town, ſituated on that branch of the river forming the iſland Caſſimbuzar. This place ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons; and here the colonel halted with the army for three days, expecting advices from Ali Khan. Diſappointed of the hoped-for intelligence, he croſſed the river on the twenty-ſecond, and the ſame day attacked the viceroy at the head of twenty thouſand men with his own forces only, Ali Khan declining as yet to declare himſelf openly. After a ſhort conteſt the enemy were put to flight, the Nabob's camp, baggage, and fifty pieces of cannon taken, and a moſt complete victory obtained. The colonel, purſuing his advantage, marched to Muxadavat, the capital of the province, and was there joined by Ali Khan and the malcontents.

It

It was before concerted, that this nobleman ſhould be inveſted with the dignity of Nabob: accordingly, the colonel proceeded ſolemnly to depoſe the Sulajud Dowla, and, with the ſame ceremony, to ſubſtitute Ali Khan in his room, who was publicly acknowleged by the people as ſuba, or viceroy of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orixa. Soon after the late viceroy was taken, and put to death by his ſucceſſor, who readily complied with all the conditions of his elevation. He conferred on his allies ſuch liberal rewards, and granted the company ſo extraordinary privileges, as fully demonſtrated how juſtly he merited their aſſiſtance. By this alliance, and the reduction of Chandenagore, the French were entirely excluded the commerce of Bengal and its dependencies; the trade of the Engliſh company was reſtored, and encreaſed beyond the moſt ſanguine hopes; a new ally was acquired, whoſe intereſt obliged him to remain firm to his engagements; above two millions ſterling paid to the company and the ſufferers at Calcutta, to indemnify their loſſes; the ſoldiers and ſeamen gratified with the ſum of ſix hundred thouſand pounds, as a reward for the courage and intrepidity they exerted; and a variety of other advantages gained, which it would be unneceſſary to enumerate. In a word, in the ſpace of fourteen days a great revolution was effected, and the government of a vaſt country, ſuperior in wealth, fertility, extent, and number of inhabitants, to moſt European kingdoms, transferred by a handful of troops, conducted by an officer untutored in the art of war, and a general rather by intuition than inſtruction and experience. But the public joy at theſe ſignal ſucceſſes was, however, conſiderably diminiſhed by the death of admiral Watſon, and the loſs of Vizagapatam, an Engliſh ſettlement on the Coromandel coaſt. The admiral fell a victim to the unwholeſomeneſs of the climate on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, univerſally eſteemed and regretted; and the factory and fort at Vizagapatam were ſurrendered to the French a few days after colonel Clive had defeated the Nabob.

Having now particularized all the foreign tranſactions of this year, I ſhall, previous to my entering upon the hiſtory of the next ſeſſion of parliament, as well as to prevent the narrative of parliamentary affairs being interrupted, mention a few domeſtic occurrences which happened during the year 1757, and which deſerve to be recorded, however deſultory, unconnected, and incapable of hiſtorical embelliſhment they may appear. Among the moſt intereſting we may reckon thoſe tumults and riots of the populace in Kent, Hertfordſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Lincolnſhire, Bedfordſhire, York city and county, to oppoſe the execution of the militia bill. Many diſorders were committed on theſe occaſions; and the people, incenſed at the irregularity of the proceedings of thoſe gentlemen appointed to carry the act into execution, and with certain defects in the act, ſeemed wholly to neglect the real advantages which in time muſt neceſſarily flow from a meaſure the moſt conſtitutional and ſalutary that can be imagined, for the defence and protection of public liberty.

His majeſty having taken into conſideration the incredible damage ſuſtained by the commerce of theſe kingdoms, for want of proper harbours and forts on the weſtern coaſt to receive and protect merchantmen, was graciouſly pleaſed to order that a temporary ſecurity ſhould be provided for the ſhipping which might touch at Milford-haven, until the fortifications voted in parliament could be erected. How far his majeſty's directions have been complied with, the number of merchantmen taken by the enemy's privateers upon that coaſt, ſufficiently indicates. His majeſty likewiſe, reflecting on the late hardſhips ſuſtained by the innholders in the county of Kent, by the conſtant quartering of ſoldiers in their houſes, was pleaſed to direct the ſum of three thouſand pounds to be tranſmitted to them, and diſtributed by Mr. Auſten, clerk of the peace for that county: a well-timed act of liberality, that fully evinced his majeſty's extreme affection and tender regard for the intereſt and happineſs of his people.

On the firſt day of December his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech, in which he declared, that it would have given him a moſt ſenſible pleaſure to acquaint them, at the beginning of the ſeſſion, that his ſucceſs in carrying on the war had been equal to the juſtice of his cauſe, and the extent and vigour of the meaſures formed for that purpoſe: that, for his own part, he had the firmeſt confidence that the ſpirit and bravery of the nation, ſo renowned in all times, and which had formerly ſurmounted ſo many difficulties, were not to be abated by a few diſappointments which, he truſted, might be retrieved, by the bleſſing of God, and the zeal and ardour of his parliament for his majeſty's honour and the advantage of their country: that it was his determined reſolution to apply his utmoſt efforts for the ſecurity of his kingdoms, and for the recovery and protection of the poſſeſſions and rights of his crown in America, and elſewhere, as well by the ſtrongeſt exertion of his naval force as by all other methods: that another great object which he had at heart was, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion and the liberties of Europe; and, with that view, to encourage and adhere to his allies: that, for this cauſe, he would decline no inconveniencies; and, in this cauſe, he confidently expected their hearty concurrence and vigorous aſſiſtance: that the late ſignal ſucceſs in Germany had given a happy turn to affairs, which it was incumbent on them to improve; and that, in ſuch a critical conjuncture, the eyes of all Europe were upon them: that he hoped they would be of opinion, that his good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia ought to be ſupported in ſuch a manner as his magnanimity and active zeal for the common cauſe deſerved: that it gave him, indeed, the moſt ſenſible concern, that the large ſupplies they had already granted had not produced all the good fruits they had reaſon to expect; but he had ſo great a reliance on their wiſdom, as not to doubt of their perſeverance: that he deſired only ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be neceſſary for the public ſervice; and they might reſt aſſured that the beſt and moſt faithful œconomy ſhould be uſed: that, notwithſtanding his firm conviction of the loyalty and good affections of his faithful ſubjects, he could not help taking notice of that ſpirit of diſorder which had lately ſhewn itſelf among the common people in ſome parts of the kingdom; he hoped they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours for diſcouraging and ſuppreſſing ſuch abuſes, and for maintaining the laws and lawful authority:

authority: and, finally, that nothing would ſo effectually conduce to the defence of all that was dear to the nation, as well as to the reducing their enemies to reaſon, as union and harmony among themſelves."

Addreſſes of thanks having been preſented by both houſes, the commons proceeded to ſettle the ſupply. They granted for the ſea-ſervice of the enſuing year ſixty thouſand men, including fourteen thouſand eight hundred and forty-five marines; and the ſtanding army, comprehending four thouſand invalids, was fixed at fifty-three thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-ſeven effective men, commiſſion and non-commiſſion officers included. For the maintenance of theſe forces, by ſea and land, the charge of guards and garriſons at home and abroad, the expence of the ordnance, and in order to make good the ſum which had been iſſued by his majeſty's orders, in purſuance of the addreſs from the commons, they now allotted four millions twenty-two thouſand eight hundred and ſeven pounds ſeven ſhillings and three-pence. They unanimouſly granted, as a preſent ſupply in the then critical exigency, towards enabling his majeſty to maintain and keep together the army formed laſt year in his electoral dominions, and then again put in motion, and actually employed againſt the common enemy, in concert with the king of Pruſſia, the ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds: for the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to the ſea-officers, they allowed two hundred twenty-four thouſand four hundred twenty-one pounds five ſhillings and eight-pence: towards the building and ſupport of the three hoſpitals for ſeamen at Goſport, Plymouth, and Greenwich, thirty thouſand pounds: for the reduced officers of the land-forces and marines, penſions to the widows of officers, and other ſuch military contingencies, forty thouſand nine hundred and twenty-ſix pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and eleven pence: towards building, rebuilding, and repairs of his majeſty's ſhips for the enſuing year, the ſum of two hundred thouſand pounds: for defraying the charge of two thouſand one hundred and twenty horſe, and nine thouſand nine hundred infantry, together with the general and ſtaff-officers, the officers of the hoſpital and the train of artillery, being the troops of the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel in the pay of Great Britain for ſixty days, together with the ſubſidy for the ſaid time, purſuant to the treaty, they aſſigned thirty-eight thouſand three hundred and ſixty pounds nineteen ſhillings and ten pence three farthings.

To the Foundling-hoſpital they gave forty thouſand pounds, for the maintenance and education of deſerted young children, as well as for the reception of all ſuch as ſhould be preſented under a certain age, to be limited by the governor and guardians of that charity. Three hundred thouſand pounds were given towards diſcharging the debt of the navy; and two hundred eighty-four thouſand eight hundred and two pounds for making up the deficiency of the grants for the ſervice of the preceding year. The landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel was, moreover, gratified with the further ſum of two hundred and three thouſand five hundred and thirty-ſix pounds four ſhillings and nine pence one farthing for the maintenance of his forces, and the remainder of his ſubſidy.

They granted ſix hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds for enabling his majeſty to make good his engagements with the king of Pruſſia, purſuant to a convention lately concluded with that potentate. For defraying the charge of thirty-eight thouſand men of the troops of Hanover, Wolfenbuttle, Saxe Gotha, and the count of Buckbourg, together with that of general and ſtaff-officers, actually employed againſt the common enemy, in concert with the king of Pruſſia, from the twenty-eighth day of November in the laſt, to the twenty-fourth day of December in the preſent year incluſive, to be iſſued in advance every two months, they allotted the ſum of four hundred and ſixty-three thouſand eighty-four pounds ſix ſhillings and ten pence: and furthermore, they granted three hundred and eighty-ſix thouſand nine hundred and fifteen pounds thirteen ſhillings and two pence, to defray the charges of forage, bread-waggons, train of artillery, proviſions, wood, ſtraw, and all other extraordinary expences, contingencies, and loſſes whatſoever incurred, or to be incurred on account of his majeſty's army, conſiſting of 38,000 men, actually employed againſt the common enemy, in concert with the king of Pruſſia, from November laſt to next December incluſive.

For the extraordinary expences of the land forces, and other ſervices, incurred in the courſe of the laſt year, and not provided for by parliament, they allowed one hundred forty-five thouſand four hundred and fifty-four pounds fifteen ſhillings and one farthing. They provided eight hundred thouſand pounds to enable his majeſty to defray the like ſum raiſed in purſuance of an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, and charged upon the firſt aids and ſupplies to be granted in the current ſeſſion. Twenty-ſix thouſand pounds were beſtowed on the out-penſioners of Chelſea-hoſpital; above twenty thouſand for the expence of maintaining the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia: for reimburſing to the province of Maſſachuſet's Bay and the colony of Connecticut, their expence in furniſhing proviſions and ſtores to the troops raiſed by them for his majeſty's ſervice in the campaign of the year 1756, the ſum of forty-one thouſand one hundred ſeventeen pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and ſixpence halfpenny; to be applied towards the rebuilding of London-bridge, carrying on the works for fortifying and ſecuring the harbour of Milford, and repairing the pariſh-church of St. Margaret in Weſtminſter, they allotted twenty-nine thouſand pounds.

The Eaſt India company were indulged with twenty thouſand pounds upon account, towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their ſettlements, to be maintained by them in lieu of the battalion of his majeſty's forces withdrawn from thoſe ſettlements: the ſum of ten thouſand pounds was given, as uſual, for maintaining and ſupporting the Britiſh forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa: and eleven thouſand four hundred and fifty pounds were granted as an augmentation to the ſalaries of the judges in the ſuperior courts of judicature. They likewiſe provided one hundred thouſand pounds for defraying the charge of pay and cloathing to the militia; and advanced eight hundred thouſand pounds to enable his majeſty to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred, or to be incurred for the ſervice of the the current year; and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary to diſappoint or defeat any enterprizes or deſigns of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs might require. The whole ſupplies of this ſeſſion amounted to the ſum of ten millions four hundred eighty-ſix thouſand four hundred fifty-ſeven pounds and one penny.

The funds eſtabliſhed by the committee of ways and means, in order to make good theſe liberal grants, conſiſted of the malt-tax, the land-tax at four ſhillings in the pound, ſums remaining in the Exchequer produced from the ſinking fund, four millions five hundred thouſand pounds to be raiſed by annuities, at three pounds ten ſhillings per cent. per ann. and five hundred thouſand pounds by a lottery, attended with annuities redeemable by parliament, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum: theſe ſeveral annuities to be transferable at the Bank of England, and charged upon a fund to be eſtabliſhed in this ſeſſion of parliament for payment thereof, and for which the ſinking fund ſhould be a collateral ſecurity; one million ſix hundred and ſix thouſand ſeventy-ſix pounds five ſhillings and one penny farthing, iſſued and applied out of ſuch monies as ſhould or might ariſe from the ſurpluſſes, exceſſes, and other revenues compoſing the ſinking fund; a tax of one ſhilling in the pound to be annually paid from all ſalaries, fees, and perquiſites of offices and employments in Great Britain, and from all penſions and other gratuities payable out of any revenues belonging to his majeſty in Great Britain, exceeding the yearly value of one hundred pounds; an impoſition of one ſhilling annually upon every dwelling-houſe inhabited within the kingdom of Great Britain, over and above all other duties already chargeable upon them, to commence from the fifth day of April; an additional tax of ſixpence yearly for every window or light in every dwelling-houſe inhabited in Britain, which ſhall contain fifteen windows or upwards; a continuation of certain acts near expiring, with reſpect to the duties payable on foreign ſail-cloth imported into Great Britain, the exportation of Britiſh gun powder, the ſecuring and encouraging the trade of his majeſty's ſugar colonies in America, and the impowering the importers and proprietors of ſpirits from the Britiſh ſugar plantations, to land them before payment of the duties of exciſe, and to lodge them in warehouſes at their own expence; an annual tax of forty ſhillings for a licence to be taken out by every perſon trading in, ſelling, or vending gold or ſilver plate, in lieu of the duty of ſix-pence per ounce on all ſilver plate, made or wrought, or which ought to be touched, aſſayed, or marked in this kingdom, which duty now ceaſed and determined; a ceſſation of all drawbacks payable on the exportation of ſilver plate; a law prohibiting all perſons from ſelling by retail any ſweets or made wines, without firſt having procured a licence for that purpoſe; and a loan, by Exchequer bills, for eight hundred thouſand pounds, to be charged on the firſt aids to be granted in the next ſeſſion of parliament. Theſe proviſions amounted to the ſum of eleven millions ſeventy nine thouſand ſeven hundred and twenty-two pounds ſix ſhillings and ten-pence, exceeding the grants in the ſum of five hundred and ninety-three thouſand two hundred and ſixty-five pounds ſix ſhillings and nine-pence; the ſurplus being intended to ſupply the deficiencies that might happen in collecting the ſeveral duties.

The ſupply granted by the commons for maintaining the Hanoverian army was, in conſequence of a meſſage, communicated by Mr. ſecretary Pitt, intimating, that the king had ordered his electoral army to be put again into motion, that it might act with vigour againſt the common enemy, in concert with his good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia; and that the exhauſted and ruined ſtate of the electorate, having rendered it incapable of maintaining that army, until the further neceſſary charge thereof, as well as the more particular meaſures then concerting for the effectual ſupport of his Pruſſian majeſty, could be laid before the houſe, the king relying on the conſtant zeal of his faithful commons, for the ſupport of the proteſtant religion, and of the liberties of Europe, againſt the dangerous deſigns of France and her confederates, found himſelf, in the mean time, under the abſolute neceſſity of recommending to the houſe the ſpeedy conſideration of ſuch a preſent ſupply as might enable his majeſty in this critical conjuncture to ſubſiſt and keep together the ſaid army. This meſſage was no ſooner read by the ſpeaker than it was referred to the committee of ſupply, who immediately granted the ſum above-mentioned.

At the ſame time, in order the more effectually to provide for the ſecurity of Hanover, and the ſupport of the proteſtant cauſe in Germany, the miniſtry concluded a new treaty or convention with his Pruſſian majeſty; which, that it might have the firmer conſiſtence and the greater authority, was, on the part of Great Britain, tranſacted and ſigned by almoſt all the privy-counſellors who had any ſhare in the adminiſtration *. This treaty, which was ſigned at Weſtminſter on the eleventh day of April, imported, That the contracting powers having mutually reſolved to continue their efforts for their mutual defence and ſecurity, for the recovery of their poſſeſſions, the protection of their allies, and the ſupport of the liberties of the Germanic body; his Britannic majeſty had, from theſe conſiderations, determined to grant to his Pruſſian majeſty an immediate ſuccour in money, as being the moſt ready and efficacious method; and their majeſties having judged it proper, that thereupon a convention ſhould be made for declaring and fixing their intentions upon this head, they had nominated and authoriſed their reſpective miniſters, who, after having communicated their full powers to one another, agreed to the following ſtipulations: that the king of Great Britain ſhould pay in the city of London, to ſuch perſon as ſhould be authorized to receive it by his Pruſſian majeſty, the ſum of four millions of German crowns, amounting to ſix hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds ſterling, to be payed at once, and in one whole ſum, immediately after the exchange of ratifications, upon being demanded by his Pruſſian majeſty: that this prince, on his part, ſhould apply that ſum to the maintaining and augmenting his forces, which ſhould act in the beſt manner for the good of the common cauſe, and for the purpoſe of reciprocal defence and mutual ſecurity propoſed by their ſaid majeſties: that the high contracting parties ſhould conclude no treaty of peace, truce, or neutrality, nor any other ſort of convention or agreement, with the powers engaged in the preſent war, but in concert and by mutual agreement, wherein both ſhould be nominally comprehended: and, finally, that this convention ſhould be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged on both ſides, within the terms of ſix weeks, to be computed from the day of ſigning this preſent convention, or ſooner, if poſſible.

* Theſe were, ſir Robert Henley, lord-keeper of the privy-ſeal; John earl Granville, preſident of the council; Thomas Holles, duke of Newcaſtle, firſt commiſſioner of the Treaſury; Robert earl of Holderneſſe, one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate; Philip earl of Hardwicke; and William Pitt, eſq. another of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate. In the name and on the part of his Pruſſian majeſty, the ſieurs Dado Henry, baron of Knyphauſen, his privy-counſellor of embaſſy, and miniſter-plenipotentiary at the court of London; and Lewis Michel, his reſident and chargè d'affaires.

All the reſolutions to which the committee of ways and means agreed were executed by bills, or clauſes in bills, which afterwards received the royal aſſent. The militia ſtill continued to be an object of parliamentary care and attention; but the ſcheme was not yet proſecuted with any kind of ſpirit, becauſe ſeemingly diſcouraged by the remnant of the old miniſtry, which ſtill enjoyed a conſiderable ſhare in the government, and indeed almoſt wholly ingroſſed the diſtribution of penſions and places.

The commons having preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, with reſpect to the harbour of Milford-haven, a book of plans and eſtimates for fortifying that harbour was laid before the houſe, and a committee appointed to examine the particulars. They gave it as their opinion, that the mouth of the harbour was too wide to admit of any fortification or effectual defence; but that the paſſage called Nailand-point, lying higher than Hubberſtone-road, might be fortified ſo as to afford ſafe riding and anchorage to the trade and navy of Great Britain: that, if it ſhould be thought proper hereafter to form a yard and dock for building and equipping fleets at Milford, no place could, from the ſituation, nature, ſoil, and a general concurrence of all neceſſary local circumſtances, be more fitted for ſuch a deſign: that if proper uſe were made of this valuable, though long-neglected, harbour, the diſtreſsful delays, ſo often embarraſſing and diſappointing the nation in her naval operations, might be in a great meaſure happily removed, to the infinite relief and advantage of the kingdom in the means of improving its naval force; the neceſſary progreſs and free execution of which was now ſo unhappily and frequently reſtrained and fruſtrated, by the want of an harbour like that of Milford-haven, framed by nature for ſuch a convenience. This report appeared to be ſo well founded, in fact, that a bill was prepared and paſſed into a law, for granting ten thouſand pounds towards carrying on the works for fortifying and ſecuring the harbour of Milford in the county of Pembroke.

Other laws of national importance were enacted in the courſe of this ſeſſion, with little or no oppoſition. On the very firſt day of their ſitting, the commons received a petition from the mayor, magiſtrates, merchants, and inhabitants of Liverpool, complaining of the high price of wheat and other grain; expreſſing their apprehenſion that it would continue to riſe, unleſs the time for the importation of foreign corn, duty free, ſhould be prolonged, or ſome other ſalutary meaſure taken by parliament, to prevent dealers from engroſſing corn; ſubmitting to the wiſdom of the houſe a total prohibition of diſtilling and exporting grain, while the high price ſhould continue; and praying they would take the premiſes into conſideration, and grant a ſeaſonable relief to the petitioners, by a continuance of a free importation, and taking ſuch other effectual means to reduce the growing price of corn, as to them ſhould ſeem neceſſary and expedient.

This being a public grievance that equally affected the nation in general, and the manufacturers in particular, it was canvaſſed and diſcuſſed with remarkable diſpatch. In a few days a bill was paſſed through both houſes, and enacted into a law, continuing till the twenty-fourth day of December, in the preſent year, the three acts of laſt ſeſſion; prohibiting the exportation of corn, reſtraining the diſtillation of ſpirits, and permitting the importation of corn duty free.

A ſecond law was eſtabliſhed, regulating the price and aſſize of bread, and ſubjecting thoſe to ſevere penalties who ſhould be concerned in its adulteration. In conſequence of certain reſolutions taken in a committee of the whole houſe, a bill was prepared for prohibiting the payment of the bounty upon the exportation of corn, unleſs ſold at a lower price than is allowed in an act paſſed in the firſt year of the reign of king William and queen Mary: but this bill, after having been twice read and committed, was firſt poſtponed and finally let fall.

In purſuance of a motion made by Mr. Grenville, a humane bill was framed and brought in for the encouragement of ſeamen employed in the royal navy, eſtabliſhing a regular method for the punctual, frequent, and certain payment of their wages; enabling them more eaſily and readily to remit money for the ſupport of their wives and families, and preventing frauds and abuſes attending ſuch payments. This bill being paſſed by the commons, was ſent up to the lords, who examined the matter with great attention, and, by divers meſſages to the lower houſe, deſired the attendance of ſeveral of its members. Theſe meſſages were no ſooner communicated than ſeveral precedents were produced; and a debate aroſe about the propriety of complying with their contents.

The houſe therefore unanimouſly reſolved, that a meſſage ſhould be ſent to the lords, acquainting them, that the houſe of commons, not being ſufficiently informed by their meſſages upon what grounds, or for what purpoſes, their lordſhips deſired the houſe would give leave to ſuch of their members as were named in the ſaid meſſages to attend the houſe of lords, in order to be examined upon the ſecond reading of the bill; the commons hoped their lordſhips would make them acquainted with their intention.

The lords, in anſwer to this requeſt, gave the commons to underſtand, that they deſired the attendance of the members mentioned in their meſ-

ſages, that they might be examined as witneſſes upon the ſecond reading of the bill. This explanation being deemed ſatisfactory, the members attended the houſe of lords, where they were carefully and fully examined, as perſons converſant in ſea affairs, touching the inconveniencies which had formerly attended the ſea-ſervice, as well as the remedies now propoſed; and the bill having paſſed through their houſe, though not without warm oppoſition, was finally confirmed by the royal ſanction.

The militia act, as it paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion, being found upon trial defective, Mr. Townſhend moved for leave to bring in a new bill to explain, amend, and enforce it: this was accordingly allowed, prepared, and paſſed into a law, which ſtill continues in force.

The great number of houſes upon London-bridge, and the narrowneſs of the paſſage as well over as under it, had frequently been the cauſe of many accidents, and had always been conſidered as a public nuiſance. Some ſteps had already been taken, and certain ſums of money allotted for removing this inconvenience; but theſe being deemed by no means ſufficient, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, alledging, that the toll upon loaded veſſels, and other craft paſſing through the arches of London-bridge, granted by a former act paſſed in the year 1750, for improving, widening, and enlarging the paſſage both under and over the ſaid bridge, was altogether precarious and inſufficient to defray the expence, including that of a temporary wooden bridge already erected; and praying that a bill might be prepared for explaining and rendering that act effectual.

A committee was appointed to examine the contents, and a bill brought in according to their requeſt. This, however, was oppoſed by a petition from ſeveral perſons, owners of barges and other craft navigating the river Thames, who affirmed, that if the bill ſhould paſs into a law as it then ſtood, it would be extremely injurious to the petitioners in particular, and to the public in general. Theſe were heard by their counſel before the committee, but no report was yet given, when the temporary bridge was reduced to aſhes.

Then the mayor, aldermen, and commons of London, delivered another petition, repreſenting, that, in purſuance of the powers veſted in them by act of parliament, they had already demoliſhed a good number of the houſes on London-bridge, and directed the reſt that were ſtanding to be taken down with all convenient expedition, that two of the arches might be laid into one for the improvement of the navigation; that they had, at a very great expence, erected a temporary wooden bridge, to preſerve a public paſſage to and from the city, until the great arch could be finiſhed; which temporary bridge being conſumed by fire, they muſt rebuild it with the greateſt expedition, at a farther conſiderable expence: that the ſum neceſſary for carrying on and completing this great and uſeful work, including the rebuilding of the ſaid temporary bridge, was eſtimated at fourſcore thouſand pounds; and as the improving, widening, and enlarging London-bridge, was calculated for the general good of the public, for the advancement of trade and commerce, for making the navigation upon the river Thames more ſafe and ſecure; they therefore prayed the houſe to take the premiſes into conſideration.

This petition being recommended by his majeſty to the conſideration of the houſe, was referred to the committee of ſupply, and produced the reſolution of granting fifteen thouſand pounds towards the rebuilding of London-bridge. A bill was prepared, under the title of, An act to improve, widen, and enlarge the paſſage over and through London-bridge, enforcing the payment of the toll impoſed upon loaded veſſels, which had been found extremely burthenſome to trade; but this incumbrance was prevented by another petition of ſeveral merchants, tradeſmen, and other inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, taking notice of the fifteen thouſand pounds granted towards the repair of London-bridge, and, as they were informed, intended to make the ſaid bridge free for all his majeſty's ſubjects: they ſaid, they hoped to partake of this public bounty; but afterwards, hearing that the bill then depending was confined to the tolls formerly granted for repairing the ſaid bridge, they repreſented the hardſhips which they and all traders would continue to labour under.

They alleged, that the ſurveyors and workmen then employed upon this work had diſcovered the true principles on which the bridge was built: that the foundation of the piers conſiſted of hard durable ſtone, well cemented together, and now as ſtrong and firm as when firſt built: that when the bridge ſhould be finiſhed, great ſavings would be made in keeping it in repair, from the ſums formerly expended, on a miſtaken opinion that the foundation was of wood: that there were very conſiderable eſtates appointed ſolely for the repairs of the bridge, which they apprehended would be ſufficient to maintain it without any toll; or if they ſhould not be thought adequate to that purpoſe, they hoped the deficiency would not be made up by a toll upon trade and commerce, but rather by an impoſition on coaches, chariots, chaiſes, and ſaddle-horſes. This remonſtrance made ſuch an impreſſion on the houſe, that ſeveral amendments were made to the bill, and an expreſs clauſe added, that none of the tolls impoſed by the act of the twenty-ninth year of his preſent majeſty ſhould be exacted after next Midſummer. Thus altered and amended, it paſſed through both houſes, and obtained the royal aſſent.

The intereſt of the manufactures was promoted by an act encouraging the growth of madder, a plant eſſentially neceſſary in dying and printing callicoes, which may be raiſed in England without the leaſt inconvenience. It was found upon enquiry, that the moſt effectual means to encourage the growth of this commodity would be to aſcertain the tythe of it; and a bill was brought in for that purpoſe. The rate of the tythe was eſtabliſhed at five ſhillings an acre; and it was enacted that this law ſhould continue in force for fourteen years, and to the end of the ſeſſion of parliament next enſuing after the expiration of that term.

The laws relating to the poor, though equally numerous and oppreſſive to the ſubject, having been found defective, a new clauſe relating to the ſettlement of ſervants and apprentices, was now added to an act paſſed in the twentieth year of the preſent preſent reign, intitled, An act for the better adjuſting and more eaſy recovery of the wages of certain ſervants and of certain apprentices.

No country in the world can boaſt ſuch a number of laws made in behalf of the poor, as thoſe that are daily enacted in England: in no other country is there ſo much money raiſed for their ſupport, by private charity as well as by public taxation; yet this, as much as any country, ſwarms with vagrant beggars, and teems with objects of miſery and diſtreſs; a ſure ſign either of the inſufficiency of the laws, or the moſt ſhameful neglect in the execution of them.

Such ſcenes of corruption, perjury, riot, and intemperance, had lately been acted at all the elections for members of parliament, that it was found abſolutely neceſſary to provide ſome remedy for this growing evil. Accordingly, ſir John Philips, a gentleman of Wales, who had long diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his free and independent ſpirit, moved for leave to bring in a bill that ſhould obviate any doubts which might ariſe concerning the electors of knights of the ſhire to ſerve in parliament for England, and further regulate the proceedings of ſuch elections. He was permitted to bring in ſuch a bill, in conjunction with Mr. Townſhend, Mr. Cornwall, the lords North and Carysfort: and in the uſual courſe the bill being prepared, was enacted into a law under the title of "An act for further explaining the laws touching the electors of knights of the ſhire to ſerve in parliament for that part of Great Britain called England."

The preamble declared, That though, by an act paſſed in the eighteenth year of the preſent reign, it was provided, that no perſon might vote at the election of a knight or knights of a ſhire, within England and Wales, without having a freehold eſtate in the county for which he votes, of the clear yearly value of forty ſhillings, over and above all rents and charges, payable out of or in reſpect to the ſame; nevertheleſs, certain perſons who hold their eſtates by copy or court-roll, pretend to a right of voting, and have at certain times preſumed to vote at the election of any knight or knights of a ſhire within England or Wales; but every ſuch vote ſhould be void, and the perſon ſo voting ſhould forfeit fifty pounds to any candidate for whom ſuch vote ſhould not have been given, and who ſhould firſt ſue for the ſame, to be recovered with full coſts, by action of debt, in any court of judicature. For the more eaſy recovery of this forfeit, it was enacted, That the plaintiff in ſuch action might only ſet forth in the declaration or bill, that the defendant was indebted to him in the ſum of fifty pounds, alledging the offence for which the ſuit ſhould be brought, and that the defendant had acted contrary to this act, without mentioning the writ of ſummons to parliament, or the return thereof; and upon trial of any iſſue, the plaintiff ſhould not be obliged to prove the writ of ſummons to parliament, or the return thereof, or any warrant or authority to the ſheriff upon any ſuch writ: that every ſuch action ſhould be commenced within nine months after the fact committed; and that if the plaintiff ſhould diſcontinue his action, or be nonſuited, or have judgment given againſt him, the defendant ſhould recover treble coſts.

So far the act, thus procured, may be attended with ſalutary conſequences; but, in all probability, the intention of its firſt movers and patrons was not fully anſwered, inaſmuch as no proviſion was made for putting a ſtop to that ſpirit of licence, drunkenneſs, and debauchery, which prevails at almoſt every election, and throws the whole nation, at the commencement of a parliament, into a ſtate of the moſt brutal intoxication.

The proprietors of the privateer called the Antigallican, which had taken a rich French ſhip homeward-bound from China, and carried her into Cadiz, where the Spaniſh government had wreſted her by violence from the captors, and reſtored her to the French owners, now preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, complaining of this interpoſition as an act of partiality and injuſtice; repreſenting the great expence at which the privateer had been fitted out, the legality of the capture, the loſs and hardſhips which they the petitioners had ſuffered, and imploring ſuch relief as to the houſe ſeem reaſonable.

Though theſe allegations were ſupported by a number of concurrent evidences, and it might be thought incumbent on the parliament to vindicate the honour of the nation, when thus inſulted by a foreign power, the houſe, upon this occaſion, paid little or no regard to the petition, either diſbelieving the aſſertions it contained, or unwilling to take any ſtep which might at this juncture embroil the nation with the court of Spain on ſuch a frivolous ſubject. True it is, the Spaniards alleged, as an excuſe for their own conduct, that the prize was taken under the guns of Corunna, inſomuch that the ſhot fired by the privateer entered that place, and damaged ſome houſes; but this circumſtance was never ſufficiently proved, and the prize was certainly condemned as legal by the court of admiralty at Gibraltar.

The African trade being juſtly conſidered as a matter of great importance to the nation, an annual ſum had for ſome years been granted for the ſupport of the ſettlements in that part of the world, and for the maintenance and repairs of caſtles and factories. While a committee was employed in peruſing the accounts relating to the ſum granted in the preceding ſeſſion for this purpoſe, a petition from the African company, recommended in a meſſage from his majeſty, was preſented to the houſe, ſoliciting farther aſſiſtance for the enſuing year.

In oppoſition to this petition, a remonſtrance was offered by certain planters and merchants intereſted in and trading to the Britiſh ſugar colonies in America, alleging, that the price of negroes was greatly advanced ſince the forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa had been under the direction of the committee of the company of merchants trading to that coaſt; a circumſtance that greatly diſtreſſed and alarmed the petitioners, prevented the cultivation of the Britiſh colonies, and was of great detriment to the trade and navigation of the kingdom: that this misfortune, they believed, was in ſome meaſure owing to the ruinous ſtate and condition of the forts and ſettlements: that, in their opinion, the moſt effectual method for maintaining the intereſt of that trade on a reſpectable footing, next to that of an incorporated joint-ſtock company, would be the putting thoſe forts and ſettlements under the ſole direction of the comcommiſſioners for trade and plantations: that the preſervation or ruin of the American ſugar colonies went hand in hand with that of the ſlave-trade to Africa; and that, by an act paſſed in the year 1750, for extending and improving this trade, the Britiſh ſubjects were debarred from lodging their ſlaves and merchandize in the forts and ſettlements on the coaſt.

They therefore prayed that this part of the act might be repealed: that all commanders of Britiſh and American veſſels, free merchants, and all other of his majeſty's ſubjects who were ſettled, or might at any time thereafter ſettle in Africa, ſhould have free liberty, from ſun-riſe to ſun-ſet, to enter the forts and ſettlements, and to depoſit their goods and merchandize in the warehouſes thereunto belonging; to ſecure their ſlaves or other purchaſes, without paying any conſideration for the ſame; but the ſlaves to be victualled at the proper coſt and charges of their reſpective owners. The houſe having taken this petition into conſideration, enquired into the proceedings of the company, and reviſed the act for extending and improving the trade to Africa, reſolved, That the committee of the African company had faithfully diſcharged the truſt repoſed in them; and granted ten thouſand pounds for maintaining the Britiſh forts and ſettlements in that part of the world.

Some attempts were made in the courſe of this ſeſſion to revive the act for triennial parliaments; but as this meaſure had been found, by former experience, to be attended with more bad than good conſequences, it was rejected, on a diviſion, by a conſiderable majority.

Several committees were likewiſe appointed to enquire into the expence incurred by new lines and fortifications raiſed at Gibraltar; to examine the original ſtandards of weights and meaſures uſed in England, conſider the laws relating to them, and report their obſervations, together with their opinion of the moſt effectual means for aſcertaining and enforcing uniform ſtandards, to be uſed for the future. The commons were perfectly ſatisfied with the new works which had been raiſed at Gibraltar; and with reſpect to the weights and meaſures, the committee agreed to certain reſolutions; but no further progreſs was made in this enquiry except an order for printing theſe reſolutions, with the appendix: however, as the boxes containing the ſtandards were ordered to be locked up by the clerk of the houſe, it ſeemed as if they had ſome intention to reſume the ſubject in the enſuing ſeſſion.

On the ninth day of June ſeveral bills received the royal aſſent by commiſſion, his majeſty being indiſpoſed; and on the twentieth day of the ſame month the lords commiſſioners cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, expreſſing his majeſty's deep ſenſe of their loyalty and good affection demonſtrated in their late proceedings; in their zeal for his honour and real intereſt in all parts; in their earneſtneſs to ſurmount every difficulty; and their ardour to maintain the war with the utmoſt vigour: circumſtances which muſt convince mankind, that the ancient ſpirit of the Britiſh nation ſtill ſubſiſted in its full force. They were given to underſtand, that the king had taken all ſuch meaſures as appeared the moſt conducive to the accompliſhment of their public-ſpirited views and wiſhes: that, with their aſſiſtance, crowned by the bleſſing of God upon the conduct and bravery of the combined army, his majeſty had been enabled not only to deliver his dominions in Germany from the oppreſſions and devaſtations of the French, but alſo to puſh his advantages on this ſide the Rhine: that he had cemented the union between him and his good brother the king of Pruſſia, by new engagements: that the Britiſh fleets and armies were now actually employed in ſuch expeditions as appeared likely to annoy the enemy in the moſt ſenſible manner, to promote the welfare and proſperity of theſe kingdoms; in particular, to preſerve the Britiſh rights and poſſeſſions in America, and to make France feel in thoſe parts the real ſtrength and importance of Great Britain. The commons were thanked for the ample ſupplies which they had ſo freely and unanimouſly given; and aſſured on the part of his majeſty, that they ſhould be managed with the moſt frugal œconomy. They were deſired, in conſequence of the king's earneſt recommendation, to promote harmony and good agreement amongſt his faithful ſubjects; to make the people acquainted with the rectitude and purity of his intentions and meaſures; and to exert themſelves in maintaining the peace and good order of the country, by enforcing obedience to the laws and lawful authority.

The king, it muſt be owned, had great reaſon to be ſatisfied with the conduct of his miniſters, and the ſpirit of his people. The whole nation repoſed the moſt unlimited confidence in the courage and diſcretion, as well as in the integrity of the miniſter, who ſeemed bent upon proſecuting the war with ſuch vigour and activity as might ſoon bring the enemy to reaſonable terms. New levies were made, new ſhips equipped, freſh expeditions planned, and freſh conqueſts projected. Such was the credit of the adminiſtration, that people ſubſcribed to the government loans with ſurpriſing alacrity. An uncommon ſpirit of courage and intrepidity ſeemed to animate all the individuals that compoſed the army and navy; and the paſſion for military fame diffuſed itſelf through all ranks in the civil department of life, even to the very loweſt of the populace. Such a remarkable change from indolence to activity, from indifference to zeal, from timorous caution to undaunted reſolution, was effected by the influence and example of an intelligent and intrepid miniſter, who, chagrined at the loſſes and diſgraces of the preceding campaign, had on a very ſolemn occaſion lately declared his belief, that there was a fixed reſolution, both in the naval and military commanders, againſt any vigorous exertion of the national power in the ſervice of their country.

He affirmed, that though his majeſty appeared ready to embrace every meaſure propoſed by his miniſters for the honour and intereſt of his Britiſh dominions, yet ſcarce a man could be found with whom the execution of any one plan, in which there was the leaſt appearance of danger, could with confidence be truſted. He mentioned in particular, the inactivity of one general in North America, from whoſe abilities and perſonal bravery the nation had conceived the greateſt expectations. He complained, that this commander had expreſſed the moſt contemptuous diſregard for the civil power, from which he derived his authority, by neglecting to tranſmit, for a conſiderable length of time, any other advice of his proceedings but what appeared on a written ſcrap of paper. He obſerved, that, with a force by land and ſea greater than ever the nation had heretofore maintained; with a king and miniſtry ardently deſirous of redeeming her glory, ſuccouring her allies, and promoting her true intereſt; a ſhameful diſlike to ſervice every where prevailed; and few ſeemed affected with any other zeal than that of aſpiring to the higheſt poſts, and graſping the largeſt ſalaries.

The cenſure pointed at the commander in America ſeems, in a great meaſure, to have been founded on miſtake: the inactivity of that able general was principally, if not entirely, owing to the ſpirit of diſcord and diſſenſion that prevailed among the Engliſh provinces in America; and which, while it continued to ſubſiſt in its full force, effectually prevented the accompliſhment of any enterprize of importance.

Having thus brought the hiſtory of this ſeſſion of parliament to a concluſion, I ſhall now, agreeable to the method I have hitherto purſued, open the military tranſactions of this year with recording the progreſs of the war in Germany; obſerving, firſt, however, that the beginning of the year was a little clouded by a general concern for the death of his majeſty's third daughter, the princeſs Caroline, a lady of the moſt exemplary virtue and amiable endowments, who died at the age of forty-five, ſincerely regretted as a pattern of unaffected piety and unbounded benevolence.

When the Ruſſian general, Apraxin, retreated from Pomerania, mareſchal Lehwald, who commanded the Pruſſians in that country, was left at liberty to turn his arms againſt the Swedes; and he accordingly drove them before him almoſt without oppoſition. By the beginning of January they were entirely expelled from the Pruſſian Pomerania, and Lehwald, in his turn, invaded their dominions. He in a little time ſubdued all the Swediſh Pomerania, except Stralſund and the iſle of Rugen, and poſſeſſed himſelf of ſeveral magazines which the enemy had eſtabliſhed.

The Auſtrian army, after their defeat at Breſlau, had retired into Bohemia, where they were cantoned, the head quarters being fixed at Koningſgratz. The king of Pruſſia having recovered all his part of Sileſia, except the town of Schweidnitz, which he ſtraitened with a blockade, ſent detachments from his army cantoned in the neighbourhood of Breſlau, to invade the Auſtrian or ſouthern part of that province, where they reduced Troppau and Jaggornſdorf; while he himſelf remained at Breſlau, entertaining his officers with concerts of muſic: not that he ſuffered theſe amuſements to divert his attention from more important objects. He laid Swediſh Pomerania under contribution, and made a freſh demand of five hundred thouſand crowns from the electorate of Saxony. Having received information that the duke of Mecklenbourg was employed in providing magazines for the French army, he detached a body of troops into that country, who not only took poſſeſſion of the magazines, but levied conſiderable contributions; and the duke retired to Lubeck, accompanied by the French miniſter.

In order to give the reader a more diſtinct idea of the tranſactions of this campaign in Germany, it may not be improper to acquaint him, that the forces brought into the field by the empreſs-queen of Hungary, the ſtates of the empire, the czarina, and the kings of France and Sweden, fell very little ſhort of three hundred thouſand men; whereas the armies maintained by the kings of Great Britain and Pruſſia, the only powers that acted on the other ſide, did not amount to above two hundred and twenty thouſand. The conſequence of this inequality was, that the confederates of the former party gained many advantages over thoſe of the oppoſite ſide, by invading, and even conquering their dominions, particularly Hanover, the government of which was now entirely changed.

In the month of December of the preceding year, a farmer of the revenues from Paris arrived at Hanover, where he eſtabliſhed his office, in order to act by virtue of powers from one John Faidy, to whom the French king had granted the direction, receipt, and adminiſtration of all the duties and revenues of the electorate. This director was, by a decree of the council of ſtate, impowered to receive the revenues not only of Hanover, but alſo of all other countries that ſhould be ſubjected to his moſt Chriſtian majeſty in the courſe of the campaign; and to remove the receivers who had been employed in any part of the direction, receipt, and adminiſtration of the duties and revenues of Hanover, and appoint others in their room.

The French king, by the ſame decree, ordained, that all perſons who had been intruſted under the preceding government with titles, papers, accounts, regiſters, or eſtimates, relating to the adminiſtration of revenues, ſhould communicate them to John Faidy or his attornies; that the magiſtrates of the towns, diſtricts, and commonalties, as well as thoſe who directed the adminiſtration of particular ſtates and provinces, ſhould deliver to the ſaid John Faidy, or his attornies, the produce of ſix years of the duties and revenues belonging to the ſaid towns, diſtricts, and provinces, reckoning from the firſt of January in the year 1751, together with an authentic account of the ſums they had paid during that term to the preceding ſovereign, and of the charges neceſſarily incurred.

It appears from the contents of this decree, which was dated on the eighteenth day of October, that immediately after the conventions of Cloſter Seven and Bremeworden *, the court of Verſailles had determined to change the government and ſyſtem of the electorate, contrary to an expreſs article of the capitulation granted to the city of Hanover, when it ſurrendered on the ninth day of Auguſt; and that the crown of France intended to take advantage of the ceſſation of arms, in ſeizing places and provinces which were not yet ſubdued; for, by

* Six days after the convention was ſigned at Cloſter Seven, another act of accommodation was concluded at Bremeworden, between the generals Sporcken and Villemur, relating to the releaſe of priſoners, and ſome other points omitted in the convention.

the decree above-mentioned, the adminiſtration of John Faidy extended to the countries which might hereafter be conquered. With what regard to juſtice, then, could the French government charge the king of Great Britain, as elector of Hanover, with the infraction of articles? or what reſpect to good faith and humanity did the duke de Richelieu obſerve, in the order iſſued from Zell, towards the end of the year, importing, that as the treaty made with the country of Hanover had been rendered void by the violation of the articles ſigned at Cloſter Seven, all the effects belonging to the officers, or others employed in the Hanoverian army, ſhould be confiſcated for the uſe of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty?

The landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, being deſirous of ſecuring his dominions againſt the like calamities, not only promiſed to renounce all connection with the kings of Great Britain and Pruſſia, but even ſolicited the court of France to receive him into the number of its dependants; for, on the eighteenth day of October, the miniſter of the duc de Deuxponts delivered at Verſailles, in the name of the landgrave, the plan of a treaty, to be founded on the following conditions: That the landgrave ſhould enter into no engagement againſt the French king and his allies, nor give any aſſiſtance, directly or indirectly, to the enemies of his majeſty and the other confederates: that he ſhould never give his vote, in the general or particular aſſemblies of the empire, againſt his majeſty's intereſt; but, on the contrary, employ his influence, jointly with France, to quiet the troubles of the empire; and that, for this end, his troops which had ſerved in the Hanoverian army ſhould engage in the ſervice of France, on condition that they ſhould not act in the preſent war againſt his Britannic majeſty: that, immediately after the ratification of the treaty, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty ſhould reſtore the dominions of the landgrave in the ſame condition they were in when ſubdued by the French forces: that theſe dominions ſhould be exempted from all further contributions, either in money, corn, forage, wood, or cattle, though already impoſed on the ſubjects of Heſſe; and the French troops pay for all the proviſion with which they might be ſupplied; in which caſe the landgrave ſhould exact no toll for warlike ſtores, proviſions, or other articles of that nature which might paſs through his dominions: that the king of France ſhould guaranty all his eſtates, all the rights of the houſe of Heſſe Caſſel, particularly the act of aſſurance, ſigned by his ſon the hereditary prince, with regard to religion; uſe his intereſt with the emperor and the empreſs-queen, that, in conſideration of the immenſe loſſes and damages his moſt ſerene highneſs had ſuffered ſince the French invaded his country, and of the great ſums he ſhould loſe with England in arrears and ſubſidies by this accommodation, he might be excuſed from furniſhing his contingent to the army of the empire, as well as from paying the Roman months granted by the diet of the empire; and if, in reſentment of this convention, the eſtates of his ſerene highneſs ſhould be attacked, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty ſhould afford the moſt ſpeedy and effectual ſuccours.

This treaty, it muſt be confeſſed, exhibits but a very indifferent ſpecimen of the fidelity of a German ally. The landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel had been retained as a ſubſidiary of England, even in time of peace, when his friendſhip could not avail, nor his enmity prejudice, the intereſts of Great Britain: but he had been retained in that ſeaſon of tranquillity as a friend, on whoſe ſervices the moſt implicit dependence might be placed in any future ſtorm or commotion. How little he merited this confidence and favour appeared too plainly by his preſent conduct, when the cauſe of Hanover ſeemed to be on the decline; and his own dominions having ſuffered ſo much by the fate of war, he not only diſcovered an inclination to abandon his benefactor and ally, but even ſued to be enliſted into the ſervice of his adverſary. This intended defection was, however, prevented by a ſudden turn of fortune which he could not poſſibly foreſee; and his troops continued to act in conjunction with the Hanoverians.

Nor was the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel the only prince that acted this ungrateful and diſingenuous part towards the king of Great Britain. The duke of Brunſwic, ſtill more nearly connected with that monarch, uſed ſuch uncommon expedition in detaching himſelf from the ſinking fortune of Hanover, that, in ten days after the convention of Cloſter Seven, he concluded a treaty with the courts of Vienna and Verſailles; ſo that, in all probability, the negociation muſt have been begun before that convention took place. On the twentieth day of September his miniſter at Vienna, by virtue of full powers from the duke of Brunſwic, accepted and ſigned the conditions which the French king and his Auſtrian ally thought proper to preſcribe.

Theſe imported, That his moſt Chriſtian majeſty ſhould keep poſſeſſion of the cities of Brunſwic and Wolfenbuttle during the war, and make uſe of the artillery, arms, and military ſtores depoſited in their arſenals: that the duke's forces, on their return from the camp of the duke of Cumberland, ſhould be diſbanded and diſarmed; and take an oath that they ſhould not, during the preſent war, ſerve againſt the king or his allies: that the duke ſhould be permitted to maintain a battalion of foot, and two ſquadrons of horſe, for the guard of his perſon and caſtles; but the regulations made by the mareſchal Richelieu and the intendant of his army ſhould ſubſiſt on their preſent footing: that the duke ſhould furniſh his contingent in money and troops, agreeably to the laws of the empire: that his forces ſhould immediately join thoſe which the Germanic body had aſſembled; and that he ſhould order his miniſter at Ratiſbon to vote conformably to the reſolutions of the dyet, approved and confirmed by the emperor.

In return for all theſe conceſſions the duke was reſtored to the favour of the French king, who graciouſly promiſed that neither his revenues nor his treaſure ſhould be touched, nor the adminiſtration of juſtice invaded; and that nothing further ſhould be demanded but winter-quarters for the regiments which ſhould paſs that ſeaſon in the country of Brunſwic.

How faithfully ſoever the duke might have intended to perform the articles of this treaty, his intentions were defeated by his brother prince Ferdinand, who, being inveſted with the command of the Hanoverian army, and ordered to reſume the operations of war againſt the enemy, detained the troops of Brunſwic, as well as his nephew the hereditary prince, notwithſtanding the treaty which his brother had ſigned, and the injunctions which he had laid upon his ſon to retire from the army, and make a tour to Holland. The duke either was, or affected to be, ſo offended at this ſtep in his brother, that he wrote him with his own hand the following letter:

"SIR,

"I know you too well to doubt that the ſituation in which we ſtand at preſent, with reſpect to each other, gives you abundance of uneaſineſs: nor will you doubt that it gives me equal concern: indeed it afflicts me greatly. Mean while, I could never, my deareſt brother, have believed that you would be the perſon who ſhould carry away from me my eldeſt ſon. I am exceedingly mortified to find myſelf under the hard neceſſity of telling you, that this ſtep is contrary to the law of nations and the conſtitutions of the empire; and that, if you perſiſt in it, you will diſgrace your country, which you pretend to ſerve.

"The hereditary prince, my ſon, was at Hamburgh by my order, and you have carried him to Stade. Could he diſtruſt an uncle? an uncle who hath done ſo much honour to his family? Could he believe that this uncle would deprive him of liberty, a liberty never refuſed to the loweſt officer? I ordered him to make a tour to Holland: could not the loweſt officer have done as much? Let us ſuppoſe, for a moment, that my troops, among whom he ſerved, were to have ſtayed with the Hanoverians; would it not ſtill have been in my power to give an officer leave of abſence, or even leave to reſign his commiſſion? and would you hinder your brother, the head of your family, and of ſuch a family as ours, to exerciſe this right with regard to a ſon, who is the hereditary prince, of whoſe rights and prerogatives you cannot be ignorant? It is impoſſible you could have conceived ſuch deſigns, without the ſuggeſtion of others. Thoſe who did ſuggeſt them have trampled on the rights of nature, of nations, and of the princes of Germany: they have induced you to add to all theſe the moſt cruel inſults on a brother whom you love, and who always loved you with the warmeſt affection.

"Would you have your brother lay his juſt complaints againſt you before the whole empire, and all Europe? Are not your proceedings without example? What is Germany become? What are its princes become, and our houſe in particular? Is it the intereſt of the two kings, the cauſe of your country, and my cauſe, that you pretend to ſupport? I repeat it, brother, that this deſign could never have been framed by you. I again command my ſon to purſue his journey; and I cannot conceive you will give the leaſt obſtruction: if you ſhould (which I pray God avert) I ſolemnly declare that I will not be conſtrained by ſuch meaſures, nor ſhall I ever forget what I owe to myſelf.

"As to my troops, you may ſee what I have written on that head to the Hanoverian miniſtry. The duke of Cumberland, by the convention of Cloſter Seven, diſmiſſed them, and ſent them home: the ſaid miniſtry gave me notice of this convention, as a treaty by which I was bound. The march of the troops was ſettled; and an incident happening, they halted: that obſtacle being removed, they were to have continued their march. The court of Hanover will be no longer bound by the convention; while I not only accepted their word, but have alſo, in conformity with their inſtructions, negociated at Verſailles and at Vienna. After all theſe ſteps, they would have me contradict myſelf, break my word, and entirely ruin my eſtate, as well as my honour. Did you ever know your brother guilty of ſuch things?

"True it is, I have, as you ſay, ſacrificed my all; or rather, I have been ſacrificed. The only thing left me is my honour; and, in the unhappy contraſt of our ſituations, I lament both you and myſelf, that it ſhould be from you, my dear brother, I ſhould receive the cruel advice to give up my honour. I cannot liſten to it: I cannot recede from my promiſe. My troops therefore muſt return home, agreeably to what the duke of Cumberland and the Hanoverian miniſtry ſtipulated with regard to me in the ſtrongeſt manner. I am afraid that the true circumſtances of things are concealed from you. Not to detain your expreſs too long, I ſhall ſend you, by the poſt, copies of all I have written to the Hanoverian miniſtry. It will grieve your honeſt heart to read it. I am, with an heart almoſt broken, yet full of tenderneſs for you, your, &c."

Notwithſtanding this warm remonſtrance, prince Ferdinand detained the troops and the hereditary prince, who being fond of the ſervice, in a little time diſtinguiſhed himſelf by very extraordinary acts of bravery and conduct; and means were found to reconcile his father to meaſures that were more contrary to his engagements than his inclinations."

The defeat of the French army at Roſbach, and the retreat of the Ruſſians from Pomerania, had entirely altered the face of affairs in Germany. The French king was ſoon obliged to abandon his conqueſts on that ſide of the Rhine, and his threats ſounded no longer terrible in the ears of the Hanoverian and Pruſſian allies. As little formidable were the denunciations of the emperor, who had, by a decree of the Aulic council, communicated to the dyet certain mandates, iſſued in the month of Auguſt in the preceding year, on pain of the ban of the empire, with avocatory letters annexed, againſt the king of Great Britain, elector of Hanover, and the other princes acting in concert with the king of Pruſſia.

The French court publiſhed likewiſe a ſcurrilous memorial, after the convention of Cloſter Seven had been violated and ſet aſide, drawing an invidious compariſon between the conduct of the French king and the proceedings of his Britannic majeſty; in which the latter is charged with breach of faith, and almoſt every meanneſs that could ſtain the character of a monarch. In anſwer to the emperor's decree, and this virulent charge, baron Gimmengen, the electoral miniſter of Brunſwic Lunenbourg, preſented to the dyet, in November, a long memorial, recapitulating the important ſervices his ſovereign had performed to the houſe of Auſtria, and the ungrateful returns he had reaped, in the queen's refuſing to aſſiſt him when his dominions were threatened with an invaſion. merated many inſtances in which ſhe had countenanced, encouraged, and even joined the enemies of the electorate, in violation of her former engagements, and directly contrary to the conſtitution of the empire. He refuted, to the ſatisfaction of the whole world, every article of the charge which the French court had brought againſt him in their virulent libel, retorted the imputations of perfidy and ambition, and, with reſpect to France, juſtified every particular of his own conduct.

While the French and Hanoverian forces continued in their winter-quarters, the former at Zell, and the latter at Lunenbourg, divers petty rencounters happened between the detached parties of the two armies. The Hanoverian general, Juncheim, having taken poſt at Halberſtadt and Quedlimburg, from whence he made excurſions even to the gates of Brunſwic, and kept the French army in continual alarm, he was attacked by a large body of the enemy, who compelled him to retire to Ackerſleben, committed great outrages in the town of Halberſtadt and its neighbourhood, and carried off hoſtages for the payment of contributions.

General Hardenberg, another Hanoverian officer, having diſlodged the French detachments that occupied Burgh, Voglesack, and Ritterhude, and cleared the whole territory of Bremen, in the month of January the duke of Broglio collected a conſiderable corps of troops that were cantoned at Otterſburg, Rothenburg, and the adjacent country; and advancing to Bremen, demanded admittance, threatening that, in caſe of a refuſal, he would proceed to extremities, and puniſh the inhabitants ſeverely, ſhould they make the leaſt reſiſtance. When their deputies waited upon him to deſire a ſhort time for deliberation, he anſwered, "Not a moment; the duke de Richelieu's orders are peremptory, and admit of no delay"

He accordingly ordered the cannon to be brought up, the wall was ſcaled, and the gates would have been forced open, had not the magiſtrates, at the earneſt importunity of the people, reſolved to comply with his demand. A ſecond deputation was immediately diſpatched to the duke of Broglio, ſignifying their ſubmiſſion; and the gates being opened, he marched into the city at midnight, after having promiſed, upon his honour, that no attempt ſhould be made to the prejudice of its rights and prerogatives, nor any outrage offered to the privileges of the regency, to the liberty, religion, or commerce of the inhabitants.

This conqueſt, however, was of ſhort duration. Prince Ferdinand being joined by a body of Pruſſian horſe, under the command of prince George of Holſtein Gottorp, the whole army began its march, and advanced to the country of Bremen about the middle of February. The enemy were driven from Rottenburg, Otterſburg, and Verden; and they abandoned the city of Bremen at the approach of the Hanoverian general, who entered it without oppoſition.

By this time the court of Verſailles, being diſſatisfied with the conduct of the duke de Richelieu, had recalled that general from Germany, and beſtowed the command of the army upon the count de Clermont, to the general ſatisfaction of the army, as well as to the joy of the Hanoverian ſubjects, among whom Richelieu had committed many flagrant acts of cruelty and oppreſſion. The new commander found his maſter's forces reduced to a deplorable condition, by the accidents of war, the relaxation of diſcipline, the ſeverity of the weather, and the want of almoſt every neceſſary. As he could not pretend with ſuch a ruined army to oppoſe the deſigns of prince Ferdinand in the field, or even preſerve the ground which his predeceſſor had gained, he found himſelf under the neceſſity of retiring with all poſſible expedition towards the Rhine. As the allies advanced, his troops retreated from their different quarters with ſuch precipitation as to leave behind them all their ſick, together with a great part of their baggage and artillery, beſides a great number of officers and ſoldiers that fell into the hands of thoſe parties by whom they were purſued.

The inhabitants of Hanover, hearing that the French intended to evacuate their city, were filled with apprehenſions of being ſubjected to every ſpecies of violence and abuſe: but their fears were happily diſappointed, by the honour and integrity of the duke de Randan, the French governor, who not only took effectual meaſures for reſtraining the ſoldiers within the bounds of the moſt rigid diſcipline, but likewiſe exhibited a noble proof of generoſity and moderation. Inſtead of deſtroying his magazine of proviſions, according to the uſual practice of war, he ordered the whole to be either ſold at a low price, or diſtributed among the poor of the city, who had been long expoſed to the horrors of famine: an act of godlike humanity, which ought to dignify the character of that worthy nobleman above all the titles that military fame can deſerve, or arbitrary monarchs beſtow.

The two grand diviſions of the French army, quartered at Zell and Hanover, retired in good order to Hamelen, where they aſſembled all their forces, except thoſe that were left in Hoya, and about four thouſand men placed in garriſon at Minden, to intercept the progreſs of the combined army. Towards the latter end of February, prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic having received intelligence that the count de Chabot was poſted with a conſiderable body of troops at Hoya upon the Weſer, detached the hereditary prince of Brunſwic with four battalions, and ſome light troops and dragoons, to oblige him to retire from that neighbourhood. This enterprize was executed with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs. The hereditary prince croſſed the Weſer at Bremen with part of his detachment, while the reſt advanced on this ſide of the river; and the enemy, being attacked in front and rear, were in a little time forced and thrown into confuſion.

The bridge being abandoned, and near ſeven hundred men taken priſoners, the count de Chabot threw himſelf with two battalions into the caſtle, where he reſolved to defend himſelf in hope of being ſupported. The regiment of Bretagne and ſome detachments of dragoons were actually on the march to his aſſiſtance. The hereditary prince being informed of this circumſtance, being alſo deſtitute of heavy artillery to beſiege the place in form, and apprehending at the ſame time that he ſhould not be able to maintain the poſt after it might be taken, thought proper to liſten to the terms of capitulation propoſed by the French general, whoſe garriſon was ſuffered to march out with the honours of war; but their cannon, ſtores, and ammunition, were delivered to the victor. This was the firſt exploit of the hereditary prince, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many ſubſequent occaſions by the moſt ſignal acts of valour and activity. He had no ſooner ſubdued Hoya than he advanced to the attack of Minden, which he inveſted on the fifth of March, and on the fourteenth the garriſon ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war.

After the reduction of this city, the allied army proceeded towards Hamelen, where the French general had eſtabliſhed his head quarters: but theſe he abandoned at the approach of the allies; and leaving behind him all his ſick and wounded, with part of his magazines, retreated without halting to Paderborn, and from thence to the Rhine, recalling in his march the troops that were in Embden, Caſſel, and the landgraviate of Heſſe, all which places were now evacuated. The French were terribly annoyed in their march by the Pruſſian huſſars and a body of light horſe, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Hanoverian hunters, who took a great number of priſoners, together with many baggage-waggons, and ſome artillery. Such was the precipitation of the enemy's retreat, that they could not find time to deſtroy all their magazines of proviſion and forage, and even forgot to call in the garriſon of Vechte, a ſmall fortreſs in the neighbourhood of Diepholt, who were made priſoners of war; and here was found a complete train of battering cannon and mortars.

The count de Clermont having arrived on the banks of the Rhine, diſtributed his forces into quarters of refreſhment in Weſel and the adjoining country, while prince Ferdinand quartered the allied army in the biſhopric of Munſter. Here however he did not long remain inactive. In the latter end of May he detached colonel Scheither acroſs the Rhine with a ſmall detachment, which attacked and defeated three battalions of the enemy, and took five pieces of cannon. In the beginning of June the whole army paſſed the Rhine on a bridge built for the purpoſe, defeated a body of French cavalry, and obtained ſeveral other advantages in their march towards Weſel. Keiſerworth was ſurpriſed, the greater part of the garriſon either taken or killed; and prince Ferdinand began to make preparations for the ſiege of Duſſeldorp. In the mean time the count de Clermont, being unable to ſtop the rapidity of his progreſs, was obliged to ſecure his troops with ſtrong entrenchments until he ſhould be properly reinforced.

The court of Verſailles was equally mortified and confounded at this ſudden turn of their affairs in Germany. Their miniſters had been long the ſport of female caprice: it was their power of pleaſing a miſtreſs, who governed their king, that alone enabled them to obtain poſts under the government. Some of the moſt able men were turned out of their employments with diſgrace; others retired from the public ſervice with indignation; and a certain low character had, for a long time, appeared in all the proceedings of the French, both in the field and the cabinet.

Even in their domeſtic diſputes, where ſomething of a free and manly ſpirit appeared, this ſpirit evaporated, and ſpent itſelf upon unworthy and deſpicable objects. Theſe conteſts, which involved the church, the law, and the crown, weakened the whole nation; and the ſtate felt all the ill effects of a diſunion of its orders, without ſeeing an augmentation of power thrown into the ſcale of any.

But now, taught by their misfortunes and diſgraces, they were obliged to adopt an alteration in their conduct: they were forced to call men to the public ſervice upon public principles; at a time, indeed, when in many reſpects things could only be altered, not mended; and when wiſe and able miniſters could do little more by their penetration and public ſpirit than to ſee and lament the ruin cauſed by the want of thoſe virtues in their predeceſſors.

The duke de Belleiſle, known to all Europe for his great abilities and his great exploits, was at length placed at the head of the military department, as ſecretary at war. On this occaſion he delivered himſelf in the preſence of his ſovereign in council, with a ſpirit of patriotiſm that does honour to his name.

"I know, ſaid he, the ſtate of our armies. It gives me great grief, and no leſs indignation: for, beſides the real evil of the diſorder in itſelf, the diſgrace and infamy which it reflects on our government and on the whole nation is more to be apprehended. The choice of officers ought to be made with mature deliberation. I know but too well to what length the want of diſcipline, pillaging and robbing have been carried on by the officers and common men, after the example ſet them by their generals.

"It mortifies me to think I am a Frenchman: my principles are known to be very different from thoſe which are now followed. I had the ſatisfaction to retain the eſteem, the friendſhip, and regard of all the princes, noblemen, and even of all the common people, in all parts of Germany, where I commanded the king's forces. They lived there in the midſt of abundance: every one was pleaſed: it fills my ſoul with anguiſh to find, that at preſent the French are held in execration; that every body is diſpirited; and that many officers publicly ſay things that are criminal and highly puniſhable.

"The evil is ſo great that it demands immediate redreſs. I can eaſily judge, by what paſſes in my own breaſt, of what our generals feel from the ſpeeches they muſt daily hear in Germany, concerning our conduct: which indeed would loſe much to be compared with that of our allies. I muſt particularly complain of the delays and irregularity of the poſts; a ſervice for which there has not yet been made any ſufficient proviſion. I am likewiſe diſpleaſed with the negligence of our generals in returning anſwers, which is a manifeſt breach of their duty.

"Had I commanded the army, a thouſand things which are done would not have been done; and others which have been neglected would have been executed. I would have multiplied my communications; I would have had ſtrong poſts on the right, on the left, and in the center, lined with troops. I would have had magazines in every place. The quiet and ſatisfaction of the country people ſhould have been equal to their preſent diſſatisfaction at being harraſſed and plundered; and we ſhould have been as much beloved as we are at preſent abhorred. The conſequences are too apparent to need being mentioned. I muſt inſiſt on theſe things, becauſe late redreſs is better than the continuation of the evil."

This

This ſpirited harangue was followed by no leſs ſpirited reſolutions. A large body of troops was aſſembled at Hanau, under the direction of the prince of Soubiſe, who, it was ſaid, had orders to penetrate by the way of Donawert, Ingoldſtadt, and Arneberg, into Bohemia. The army on the Rhine was likewiſe augmented; troops were every-where drawn from the interior parts of the kingdom, towards the ſeat of action; and the fortifications on the frontiers were put into the beſt poſture of defence that the diſordered ſtate of the finances could poſſibly admit.

At the ſame time the duke de Belleiſle wrote a letter, directed to all the colonels of infantry, threatening them, in the king's name, with the loſs of their regiments, ſhould they connive any longer at the ſcandalous practice of buying commiſſions; an abuſe which had crept into the ſervice under various pretexts, to the diſcouragement of merit, the relaxation of diſcipline, and the total extinction of laudable emulation.

The prince of Clermont having abandoned his ſtrong camp at Rhinefeldt, retired to Nuys a little higher up the river, and detached a conſiderable corps, under the command of the count de St. Germain, to take poſt at Crevelt, ſituated in a plain between his army and the camp of the allies, which fronted the town of Meurs. After ſeveral motions on both ſides, prince Ferdinand determined to attack the enemy, and forthwith made a diſpoſition for this purpoſe.

He aſſigned the command of the whole left wing, conſiſting of eighteen battalions and twenty-eight ſquadrons, to lieutenant-general Sporcken; the conduct of the right wing, compoſed of ſixteen battalions and fourteen ſquadrons, was intruſted to the hereditary prince and major-general Wangenheim; the ſquadrons, with the addition of two regiments of Pruſſian dragoons, were under the immediate direction of the prince of Holſtein; while the hereditary prince commanded the infantry. The light troops, conſiſting of five ſquadrons of huſſars, were divided between the prince of Holſtein and lieutenant-general Sporcken. Major Luckner's ſquadron, together with Scheither's corps, were ordered to obſerve the flank of the enemy's right, and with this view were poſted in the village of Papendeick; and a battalion of the troops of Wolfembuttle were left in the town of Hulſte, to cover the rear of the army. Prince Ferdinand's deſign was to attack the enemy on their left flank; but the execution was rendered extremely difficult by the woods and ditches that encumbered the road, and the numerous ditches that interſected this part of the country.

On the twenty-third day of June, at four in the morning, the army began to move; the right advancing in two columns as far as St. Anthony, and the left marching up within half a league of Crevelt. The prince having ſurveyed the ſituation of the enemy from the ſteeple of St. Anthony, procured guides; and having obtained all the neceſſary hints of intelligence, proceeded to the right, in order to charge the enemy's left flank by the villages of Worſt and Anrath; but, in order to diſtract their attention, and keep them in ſuſpence with regard to the nature of his principal attack, he directed the generals Sporcken and Oberg to advance againſt them by the way of Crevelt and St. Anthony, and in particular to ply with vigour their artillery, that being employed in three different places at once, they might be prevented from ſending any reinforcement to the left, where the chief attack was intended.

This diſpoſition being made, prince Ferdinand putting himſelf at the head of the grenadiers of the right wing, proſecuted his march in two columns to the village of Anrath, where he fell in with an advanced party of the French, which, after a few diſcharges of muſquetry, retired to their camp and gave the alarm. In the mean time, both armies were drawn up in order of battle; the troops of the allies in the plain between the villages of Anrath and Willich, oppoſite to the French forces, whoſe left was ſecured by a wood. The action began about one in the afternoon with a ſevere cannonading on the part of prince Ferdinand, which, though well ſerved, was not able to draw the enemy from their cover: he therefore determined to diſlodge them from the wood by dint of ſmall arms. The hereditary prince immediately advanced with the whole front, and a very obſtinate action enſued.

Mean while, the cavalry on the right in vain endeavoured to penetrate the wood on the other ſide, where the enemy had raiſed two batteries, which were ſupported by forty ſquadrons of horſe. After a terrible fire had continued on both ſides till five in the afternoon, the grenadiers forced the intrenchments in the wood, which were lined by the French infantry. Theſe giving way, abandoned the wood in the utmoſt diſorder; but the purſuit was checked by the conduct and reſolution of the enemy's cavalry, which, notwithſtanding a dreadful fire from the artillery of the allies, maintained their ground, and covered the foot in their retreat to Nuys.

The ſucceſs of the day was in a good meaſure owing to the artillery on the left and in the centre, under the direction of the generals Sporcken and Oberg, who plied the enemy with great vigour, and effectually employed their attention on that ſide, while prince Ferdinand proſecuted his attack on the other. It muſt be owned, however, that their right wing and centre retired in good order to Nuys, though the left was defeated with the loſs of ſeveral ſtandards, colours, and pieces of cannon, and ſix thouſand men, killed, wounded, or taken priſoners.

This victory, however important, was far from being deciſive. True it is, the enemy were obliged to take refuge under the cannon of Cologne, and tamely to behold the reduction of Duſſeldorp, which was ſubdued by prince Ferdinand after a ſiege of a few days: nevertheleſs, they were ſoon joined by ſuch a number of freſh troops as not only enabled them to make head againſt the allies, but even to ſend a conſiderable detachment to the aſſiſtance of Soubiſe.

It was at this period that the command of the French army was taken from the count de Clermont, and beſtowed upon M. de Contades, who ſeemed determined to attack prince Ferdinand in his turn, and even made ſome motions for that purpoſe. This ſcheme, however, he was prevented from carrying into execution, by the little river Erff, behind which the prince reſolved to lie quiet until he ſhould be joined by the body of Britiſh troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough, the firſt diviſion of which had juſt landed at Embden. He flattered himſelf that the prince of Yſenbourg, at the head of the Heſſian troops, would find employment for the prince de Soubiſe, who had marched from Hanau with a deſign to penetrate into the landgraviate of Heſſe-Caſſel: his vanguard had been already ſurpriſed and defeated by the militia of the country; and the prince of Yſenbourg was at the head of a conſiderable body of regular forces, aſſembled to oppoſe his further progreſs.

Prince Ferdinand therefore hoped that the operations of the French general would be effectually checked, until he himſelf, being reinforced by the Britiſh troops, ſhould be able to paſs the Meuſe, transfer the ſeat of the war into the enemy's country, thus make a diverſion from the Rhine, and perhaps oblige the prince of Soubiſe to come to the aſſiſtance of the principal French army, commanded by M. de Contades.

He had formed a plan which would have anſwered theſe purpoſes effectually, and in proſecution of it advanced to Ruremond on the Maeſe, when his meaſures were totally diſconcerted by a variety of incidents which he could not foreſee. The prince of Yſenbourg was, on the twenty-third day of July, defeated at Sangerſhauſen by the duke de Broglio, whom the prince de Soubiſe had detached againſt him with a number of troops greatly ſuperior to that which the Heſſian general commanded. The duke de Broglio, who commanded the vanguard of Soubiſe's army, having received intelligence that the Heſſian troops under the prince of Yſenbourg were retiring towards Munden, he marched on the twenty-third of July with a body of eight thouſand men to the village of Sangerſhauſen, where he found them drawn up in order of battle, and forthwith made a diſpoſition for the attack. At firſt his cavalry were repulſed by the Heſſian horſe, which charged the French infantry, and were broke in their turn.

The Heſſians, though greatly inferior in number to the enemy, made a very deſperate reſiſtance, by favour of a rock in the Fulde that covered their right, and a wood by which their left was ſecured. The diſpute was ſo obſtinate that the enemy's left was obliged to give ground; but the duke de Broglio ordering a freſh corps to advance, changed the fortune of the day. The Heſſians, overpowered by numbers, were forced to recoil; part plunged into the river, where many periſhed; and part threw themſelves into the wood, through which they eſcaped from the purſuit of the huſſars, who took above two hundred ſoldiers and fifty officers, including the count de Canitz, who was ſecond in command.

They likewiſe found on the field of battle ſeven pieces of cannon, and eight at Munden: but the loſs of the enemy was much greater than that of the allies, above two thouſand of the former being either killed or wounded in the action. The prince of Yſenbourg having collected the remains of his little army, took poſt at Eimbeck, where he ſoon was reinforced, and found himſelf at the head of twelve thouſand men; but, in conſequence of this advantage, the enemy became maſters of the Weſer, and opened to themſelves a free paſſage into Weſtphalia.

The operations of prince Ferdinand upon the Maeſe had been interrupted by a long ſucceſſion of heavy rains, which broke up the roads, and rendered the country impaſſable; and now the certain information of this unlucky defeat reduced him to the neceſſity of either retiring acroſs the Rhine, or of coming to a battle; the latter was carefully declined by the enemy: the firſt reſolution therefore he found himſelf unavoidably obliged to embrace. In his preſent poſition he was hemmed in by the French army on one wing, on the other by the fortreſs of Gueldre, the garriſon of which had been lately reinforced, as well as by divers other poſts, capable of obſtructing the convoys and ſubſiſtence of the combined army: beſides, he had reaſon to apprehend that the prince de Soubiſe would endeavour to intercept the Britiſh troops in their march from Embden.

Induced by theſe conſiderations, he reſolved to repaſs the Rhine, after having offered battle to the enemy, and made ſeveral motions for that purpoſe. Finding them averſe to an engagement, he made his diſpoſitions for forcing the ſtrong paſs of Wachtendonck, an iſland ſurrounded by the Niers, of very difficult acceſs, and ſituated exactly in his route to the Rhine. This ſcheme was executed by the hereditary prince of Brunſwic, who perceiving the enemy had drawn up the bridge, ruſhed into the river at the head of his grenadiers, who drove them away with their bayonets, and cleared the bridges for the paſſage of the army towards Rhinebergen.

At this place prince Ferdinand was informed that M. de Chevert, one of the beſt officers in the French ſervice, had croſſed the Lippe with fourteen battalions and ſeveral ſquadrons, to reinforce the garriſon of Weſel, and fall upon lieutenant-general Imhoff, who commanded a detached corps of the combined army at Meer, that he might be at hand to guard a bridge which the prince had thrown over the Rhine at Rees. His ſerene highneſs was extremely deſirous of giving ſome aſſiſtance to general Imhoff; but the troops were too much fatigued to begin this march before morning, and the Rhine had overflowed its banks in ſuch a manner as to render the bridge at Rees impaſſable; ſo that Mr. Imhoff was left to the reſources of his own conduct and the bravery of his troops, conſiſting of ſix battalions and four ſquadrons, already weakened by the abſence of different detachments.

This general having received intelligence, on the fourth day of Auguſt, that the enemy deſigned to paſs the Lippe that ſame evening with a conſiderable train of artillery, in order to burn the bridge at Rees, ſet out with a view to ſecure this place, and join two battalions which had paſſed the Rhine in boats, under the command of general Zaſtrow, who reinforced him accordingly; but the enemy, not appearing, he concluded the information was falſe, and determined to reſume his advantageous poſt at Meer. Of this he had no ſooner regained poſſeſſion than he ſaw his out-guards engaged with the enemy, who had marched to the attack from Weſel, under the command of lieutenant-general de Chevert, conſiſting of the whole corps intended for the ſiege of Duſſeldorp.

Imhoff's front was ſecured by coppices and ditches, there being a riſing ground on his right, from whence he could plainly perceive the whole force that advanced againſt him, together with the manner of their approach. Obſerving them engaged in that difficult ground, he poſted one regiment in a coppice, with orders to attack the left flank of the enemy, which appeared quite uncovered; and as ſoon as their fire began, he advanced with the reſt of his forces to charge them in front. The bayonet was uſed on this occaſion, and the attack made with ſuch impetuoſity and reſolution, that after a ſhort reſiſtance the enemy was thrown into confuſion, and fled towards Weſel, leaving on the ſpot eleven pieces of cannon, with a great number of waggons and other carriages. Beſides the killed and wounded, who amounted to a pretty conſiderable number, the victor took three hundred and fifty-four priſoners, including eleven officers; and this advantage was gained with little or no loſs on the ſide of the allies.

Immediately after this action general Wangenheim croſſed the Rhine with ſeveral ſquadrons and battalions to join general Imhoff, and enable him to improve the victory he had gained, while prince Ferdinand proceeded with the reſt of the army to Santen; from whence he continued his march to Rhineberg, where he intended to paſs; but the river had overflowed its banks to ſuch a degree, that here, as well as at Rees, the ſhore was inacceſſible; ſo that he found it neceſſary to march farther down the river, and lay a bridge at Griethuyzen. The enemy had conſtructed four veſſels for the deſtruction of this bridge; but they were all happily taken before they could be executed, and the whole army paſſed on the tenth day of Auguſt, without any loſs or further interruption. At the ſame time the prince withdrew his garriſon from Duſſeldorp, of which the French immediately took poſſeſſion. Soon after his paſſage he received a letter from the duke of Marlborough, informing him that the Britiſh troops had arrived at Lingen, in their way to Coesfeldt; to which place general Imhoff was ſent with a ſtrong detachment to receive them: but notwithſtanding this junction, the two armies on the Rhine were ſo equally matched, that no ſtroke of importance was ſtruck on either ſide during the remaining part of the campaign.

M. de Contades ſeeing no proſpect of gaining any advantage over prince Ferdinand, detached prince Xaverius of Saxony with a ſtrong body of troops to reinforce the prince de Soubiſe, who had ſeized Gottingen, and ſeemed reſolved to attack the prince of Yſenbourg at Eimbeck. That this officer might be the better able to ſtand his ground, prince Ferdinand detached general Oberg with ten thouſand men to Lipſtadt; from whence, ſhould occaſion require, they might continue their march, and join the Heſſians. The whole body, when thus united, did not exceed twenty thouſand men, of whom general Oberg now aſſumed the command; whereas the troops of Soubiſe amounted to no leſs than thirty thouſand.

The allies had intrenched themſelves upon the river Fulde at Sanderſhauſen, where they hoped the French would attack them; but the deſign of Soubiſe was firſt to diſlodge them from that advantageous ſituation. With this view he made a motion as if he had intended to paſs the camp of the allies by the road of Munden. In order to prevent the execution of this ſuppoſed deſign, general Oberg decamped on the tenth of October, and, paſſing by the village of Landwernhagen, proceeded towards Luttenberg, where, being informed the enemy were at his heels, he forthwith drew up his troops in order of battle, his right to the Fulde, and his left extending to a thicket upon an eminence, where he planted five pieces of artillery. The cavalry covered the wings in a third line, the village of Luttenberg was in the rear, and four pieces of cannon were mounted on a riſing ground that flanked this village.

The French having likewiſe paſſed Landwernhagen, poſted their left towards the Fulde, their right extending far beyond the left of the allies, and their front being ſecured by above thirty pieces of cannon. At four in the afternoon the enemy began the battle with a ſevere cannonading, and at the ſame time the firſt line of their infantry attacked major-general Zaſtrow, who was poſted on the left wing of the allies. This body of the French was repulſed; but in the ſame moment a conſiderable line of cavalry advancing, charged the allies in front and flank. Theſe were ſuſtained by a freſh body of infantry with cannon, which, after a warm diſpute, compelled the confederates to give ground; and general Oberg, in order to prevent a total defeat, made a diſpoſition for a retreat, which was performed in tolerable order; not but that he ſuffered greatly, in paſſing through a defile, from the fire of the enemy's cannon, which was brought up and managed under the direction of the duke de Broglio. Having marched through Munden by midnight, the retiring army lay till morning under arms in the little plain near Grupen, on the other ſide of the Weſer; but at day-break continued their march, after having withdrawn the garriſon from Munden, until they arrived in the neighbourhood of Guntersheim, where they encamped.

In this engagement about fifteen hundred of the allies were either killed or wounded, though the loſs of the enemy was much more conſiderable. General Oberg, however, was obliged to abandon a magazine of hay and ſtraw at Munden, and leave part of his wounded men in that place to the humanity of the victor. Nevertheleſs, the French general reaped very little advantage from his victory.

By this time prince Ferdinand had retired into Weſtphalia, and fixed his head-quarters at Munſter, while M. Contades encamped near Ham upon the Lippe: ſo that, notwithſtanding the great increaſe of the French army, they were not able to make any farther progreſs during the remaining part of the ſeaſon. The Britiſh troops had joined the allies ſo late in the year, that they had no opportunity to diſtinguiſh themſelves in the field; yet the fatigues of the campaign, which they ſeverely felt, proved fatal to their commander the duke of Marlborough, who died of a dyſentery at Munſter, univerſally regretted.

Having thus related the operations of the allied army during this campaign, we ſhall now endeavour to trace the ſteps of the king of Pruſſia, from the period at which his army was aſſembled for action. Having collected his forces as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, he inveſted the town of Schweidnitz in form on the twenty-firſt day of March, and carried on his attacks with ſuch unremitting vigour, that in thirteen days the garriſon ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, after having loſt one half of their number in the defence of the place.

While one part of his troops were employed in this ſervice, he himſelf at the head of another advanced to the eaſtern frontier of Bohemia, and detached a ſtrong body as far as Trawtenaw, garriſoned by a party of Auſtrians, who, after an obſtinate defence, abandoned the place and retreated towards their grand army. By this conqueſt he opened to himſelf a paſſage into Bohemia, by which he poured in detachments of light troops, to levy contributions and annoy the out-poſts of the enemy. At the ſame time the baron de la Mothe Fouquet marched with another body againſt the Auſtrian general Jahnus, poſted in the county of Glatz, whom he compelled to abandon all the places he poſſeſſed in that country, and purſued as far as Nachod, within twenty miles of Koningſgratz, where the grand Auſtrian army was encamped, under the command of marſhal Daun, who had lately arrived from Vienna.

Over and above theſe operations, the king ordered a body of thirty thouſand men to be aſſembled, to act under the command of his brother prince Henry, an accompliſhed general, againſt the army of the empire, which the prince of Deuxponts had with great difficulty made ſhift to collect once more in the diſtrict of Franconia.

The king of Pruſſia being bent upon proſecuting the campaign with the utmoſt vigour, reſolved to change the theatre of the war, and penetrate into Moravia, a fertile country, which had hitherto been kept free from all kinds of hoſtility. Having formed an army of fifty thouſand choice troops near Neiſs in Sileſia, he divided them into three columns; the firſt commanded by marſhal Keith, the ſecond by himſelf in perſon, and the third conducted by the prince of Anhalt Deſſau.

In the latter end of April they began their march towards Moravia; and general De la Ville, who commanded a body of Auſtrians in that country, retired as they approached, after having reinforced the garriſon of Olmutz, which the king was determined to beſiege. The place accordingly was immediately inveſted; orders were iſſued to haſten up the heavy artillery; and marſhal Keith was appointed to ſuperintend and direct the operations of the ſiege.

Mean while, count Daun being informed of his Pruſſian majeſty's motions and intentions, decamped with his army from Leutomyſſel in Bohemia, and entered Moravia by the way of Billa. Being ſtill too weak to oppoſe the Pruſſians in the field, he extended his troops in the neighbourhood of the king's army, between Gewitz and Littau, in a mountainous ſituation, where he ran little or no riſque of being attacked. Here he continued for ſome time in quiet, with the fertile country of Bohemia in his rear, from whence he received ſupplies of proviſion, and was daily joined by freſh reinforcements.

His deſign was to relieve the beſieged occaſionally, to annoy the beſiegers, and to cut off their convoys from Sileſia; and this ſcheme ſucceeded to his wiſh. Olmutz is ſo extenſive in its works, and ſo advantageouſly ſituated on the river Morava, that it could not be completely inveſted without weakening the poſts of the beſiegers, by extending them to a prodigious circuit; ſo that in ſome parts they were eaſily forced by detachments in the night, who fell upon them ſuddenly, and ſeldom failed to introduce into the place ſupplies of men, proviſion, and ammunition. The forage in the neighbourhood having been previouſly deſtroyed, the Pruſſian horſe were obliged to make excurſions at a diſtance for this neceſſary article; by which means they were expoſed to fatigue, and liable to ſurprize.

Count Daun knew how to take advantage of theſe circumſtances, without trying the chance of a battle, to which the king provoked him in vain. While the garriſon by repeated ſallies interrupted the operations of the beſieged, the Auſtrian general annoyed their foraging parties, fell upon different quarters of their army in the night, and kept them in continual alarm. Nevertheleſs the king completed his firſt parallel; and proceeded with ſuch vigour as ſeemed to promiſe a ſpeedy reduction of the place, when his deſign was entirely defeated by one untoward incident.

Marſhal Daun having received intelligence that a large convoy had ſet out from Sileſia for the Pruſſian camp, determined to lay hold of this opportunity to compel the king to relinquiſh his enterprize. For this purpoſe he ſent general Jahnus with a ſtrong body of troops towards Bahrn, and another detachment to Stadtoliebe, with inſtructions to attack the convoy on different ſides, while he himſelf marched up to the beſiegers, as if he intended to give them battle. The king of Pruſſia, far from being deceived by this feint, could eaſily, from the motion of the Auſtrian general, diſcover his deſign, and immediately diſpatched general Ziethen with a ſtrong reinforcement to protect the convoy, which was eſcorted by eight battalions, and about four thouſand men who had been ſick and were juſt recovered. Before this officer had joined them, the convoy had been attacked on the twenty-eighth day of June; but the aſſailants were repulſed with conſiderable loſs.

Marſhal Daun, however, took care that they ſhould be immediately reinforced; and the next day the attack was renewed with redoubled vigour. Four hundred waggons, guarded by four battalions and about one thouſand troopers, had juſt paſſed the defiles of Domſtadt, when the Auſtrians charged them furiouſly on every ſide: the communication between the head and the reſt of the convoy was cut off; and general Ziethen, after having exerted all his efforts for its preſervation, being obliged to abandon the waggons, retired to Troppau. Thus the whole convoy fell into the hands of the enemy, who took above ſix hundred priſoners, together with general Putkammer; and the king of Pruſſia was obliged to abandon his enterprize.

This was a mortifying neceſſity to a prince of his high ſpirit, at a time when he ſaw himſelf on the point of reducing the place, notwithſtanding the gallant defence made by the garriſon under general Marſhal, the governor. Nothing now remained but to raiſe the ſiege, and retire without loſs in the face of a vigilant enemy, prepared to ſeize every opportunity of advantage: a taſk which, however difficult and dangerous, he executed with a wonderful dexterity. Inſtead of withdrawing into Sileſia, he reſolved to avert the war from his own dominions, nions, and take the route of Bohemia, the frontiers of which were left quite open by marſhal Daun's laſt motion, when he advanced with his troops to Poſnitz, in order the more effectually to relieve Olmutz.

After the king had concerted his meaſures, he carefully concealed his deſign from the enemy, and notwithſtanding the loſs of his convoy, continued the operations of the ſiege with redoubled vigour till the firſt day of July, when he decamped in the night, and began his march to Bohemia. He himſelf with one diviſion took the road of Konitz; and marſhal Keith having brought away all the artillery, except four mortars and one diſabled cannon, purſued his march by the way of Littau to Muglitz and Tribau.

Although his Pruſſian majeſty had gained an entire march upon the Auſtrians, their light troops, commanded by the generals Buccow and Laudohn, did not fail to harraſs him in his retreat; but their endeavours were in a great meaſure defeated by the conduct and circumſpection of the Pruſſian commanders. After the rear of the army had paſſed the defiles of Krenau, general Laſci, who was poſted at Gibau with a large body of Auſtrians, took poſſeſſion of the village of Krenau with a detachment of grenadiers, who were ſoon diſlodged; and the Pruſſians continued their march by Zwittau to Leutomyſſel, where they ſeized a magazine of meal and forage. In the mean time, general Retzow, who conducted the proviſions and artillery, found the hills of Hollitz occupied by the enemy, who cannonaded him as he approached; but marſhal Keith advancing, ordered them to be attacked in the rear, and they fled into a wood with precipitation, with the loſs of ſix officers and three hundred men, who were taken priſoners.

While the marſhal was thus employed, the king proceeded from Leutomyſſel to Koningſgratz, where general Buccow, who had got the ſtart of him, was poſted with ſeven thouſand Auſtrians behind the Elbe, and in the intrenchments which they had formed all around the city. The Pruſſian troops immediately croſſed the little river Adler; and as the enemy had deſtroyed the bridges over the Elbe, the king ordered them to be repaired with all expedition, being firmly reſolved to force the Auſtrian intrenchments: but general Buccow did not wait his approach. He abandoned his intrenchments, and withdrew with his troops to Clumetz; ſo that the king took poſſeſſion of the moſt important poſt of Koningſgratz without farther oppoſition.

An Auſtrian corps having taken poſt between him and Hollitz, in order to interrupt the march of the artillery, he advanced againſt them in perſon; and having diſlodged them from the place, all his cannon, military ſtores, proviſion, with fifteen hundred ſick and wounded men, arrived in ſafety at Koningſgratz, where the whole army encamped. His intention was to remove the ſeat of war from Moravia to Bohemia, where he ſhould be able to preſerve a more eaſy communication with his own dominions; but a more powerful motive ſoon obliged him to alter his reſolution.

After the Ruſſian troops, under marſhal Apraxin, had retired from Pomerania in the courſe of the preceding year, and the czarina ſeemed inclined to adopt new meaſures, the courts of Vienna and Verſailles had, by dint of ſubſidies, promiſes, preſents, and intrigues, attached her in all appearance more firmly than ever to the confederacy, and even prevailed with her to increaſe the number of troops deſtined to act againſt the Pruſſian monarch. She not only ſigned her acceſſion in form to the quadruple alliance with the empreſs-queen and the kings of France and Sweden; but, in order to demonſtrate her zeal for the common cauſe, ſhe diſgraced her chancellor count Beſtuchef, who was thought to be averſe to the war: ſhe divided her troops into ſeparate bodies, under the command of the generals Fermer and Brown, and ordered them to begin their march in the middle of winter.

Fermer accordingly put his army in motion in the beginning of January, and on the twenty-ſecond his light troops took poſſeſſion of Koningſberg, the capital of Pruſſia, without oppoſition; for the king's forces had left that country, in order to proſecute the war in the weſtern parts of Pomerania. They did not, however, continue long in this part of the country; but after having pillaged ſome diſtricts, returned to the main body, which halted on the Viſtula, to the no ſmall diſturbance of the city of Dantzick, where the reſident of the czarina actually demanded that the magiſtrates ſhould admit a Ruſſian garriſon: a demand which they not only peremptorily refuſed, but ordered all the citizens to arms, and took every other method to oppoſe force by force.

At length, after ſome negociation with general Fermer, the affair was compromiſed; he deſiſted from the demand, and part of his troops croſſed the Viſtula, ſeemingly with a view to invade Pomerania, in the eaſtern part of which count Dohna had collected a ſtrong body of Pruſſians to put a ſtop to their progreſs. But after they had plundered the open country, they rejoined their main body; and general Fermer returning to the left, proceeded towards Sileſia, in order to act in concert with the other Ruſſian army commanded by Brown, who had taken his route through Poland, and already paſſed the Poſna. By the firſt of July both armies had reached the frontiers of Sileſia; and ſome of the Coſſacks penetrating into that province, had committed dreadful ravages, and filled the inhabitants with terror and conſternation.

Count Dohna, with the Pruſſian army under his command, had carefully obſerved their motions, and even croſſed the Oder at Frankfort, as if he intended to attack them: but he was too much inferior in number to hazard ſuch a ſtep, which became an object of his ſovereign's own perſonal attention.

With this view the king made his diſpoſitions for retreating from Bohemia, and on the twenty-fifth day of July quitted the camp of Koningſgratz. He was harraſſed in his march by three thouſand Auſtrian light troops detached by count Daun, who had followed him into Bohemia: but notwithſtanding theſe impediments, he paſſed the Mittau, proceeded on his route, and on the ninth day of Auguſt arrived at Landſhut.

From thence he haſtened with a detachment towards Franckfort on the Oder, and joined the army commanded by lieutenant-general Dohna at Gorgas. Then the whole army croſſed the Oder by a bridge laid over it at Gataviſe; and having reſted one day, advanced to Dertmitzel, where they encamped. The Ruſſians under general Fermer were poſted on the other ſide of the little river Mitzel, their right reaching to the village of Zwicker, and their left to Quertchem.

The king being determined immediately to attack them, croſſed the Mitzel on the twenty-fifth in the morning, and paſſing the left flank of the enemy, drew up his army in order of battle in the plain between the little river and the town of Zorndorf. The Ruſſians, who were ſuperior to him in number, did not decline the engagement; but as the ground would not allow them to extend themſelves in length, they were ranged in four lines, forming a front on every ſide, defended by cannon and chevaux de friſe, their right flank being ſecured by the village of Zwicker. After a ſevere cannonade, the Pruſſian infantry were ordered to attack the village, and a body of grenadiers advanced to the aſſault; but this brigade unexpectedly giving way, occaſioned a conſiderable opening in the line, and left the whole left flank of the infantry uncovered.

Before the enemy could profit by this diſorder, the interval was filled up by the cavalry under the command of general Seydelitz; and the king with his uſual preſence of mind, ſubſtituted another choice body of troops to carry on the attack. This began about noon, and continued for ſome time, during which both ſides fought with equal courage and perſeverance: at length, general Seydelitz having routed the Ruſſian cavalry, attacked the flank of the infantry with ſuch impetuoſity, that being alſo dreadfully annoyed by the Pruſſian artillery, they abandoned the village, together with their military cheſt and great part of their baggage. Notwithſtanding this loſs, which had greatly diſordered their right wing, they continued to ſtand their ground; and dreadful havock was made among them, not only with the ſword and bayonet, but alſo by the cannon, which was loaded with grape-ſhot, and being excellently ſerved, did great execution.

Towards evening they were thrown into ſuch terrible confuſion, that in all probability they would have been intirely routed, had they not been favoured by the approaching darkneſs, as well as by a particular operation which was performed with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs. One of the Ruſſian generals perceiving the fortune of the day turned againſt them, rallied a ſelect body of troops, and made a vigorous impreſſion on the right wing of the Pruſſians. This effort diverted their attention ſo ſtrongly to that quarter, that the right of the Ruſſians enjoyed a reſpite, during which they retired in tolerable order, and occupied a new poſt in the night, where the reſt of their forces were the more eaſily aſſembled.

In this battle they are ſaid to have loſt above twenty thouſand men, thirty-ſeven colours, five ſtandards, twelve mortars, the greater part of their baggage, and above one hundred pieces of cannon. Among the priſoners that fell into the hands of the victor, there were ſeveral general officers, and a good number loſt their lives on the field of battle. The loſs of the king did not amount to above two thouſand men, including ſome officers of diſtinction, particularly two aids-du-camp, who attended his own perſon, which he expoſed without ſcruple in the hotteſt parts of the battle. The carnage in all probability would not have been ſo great, had not the Pruſſians been in a peculiar manner exaſperated againſt this enemy, becauſe they had laid waſte the country, burned the villages, ruined the peaſants, and committed many other horrid acts of barbarity which the practice of war could not authorize.

The Pruſſian army remained all night under arms, and next morning renewed the cannonading againſt the enemy, who nevertheleſs maintained their poſt without flinching. On the twenty-ſeventh they ſeemed determined to hazard another action, and even to attack the conquerors in their turn: inſtead of advancing, however, they took the route of Landſberg; but afterwards wheeled off towards Vietzel, and intrenched themſelves in a ſtrong camp between the river Warta and that village.

Never was prince involved in greater difficulties than was his Pruſſian majeſty at this juncture; and though no prince ever exerted himſelf with greater ſpirit and activity, yet was he not able to guard againſt the dangers which threatened him from every quarter. At his departure from Bohemia, marſhal Daun, with the Auſtrian army, and the prince de Deux-ponts, who commanded the forces of the empire, advanced to the Elbe, in order to ſurround the king's brother prince Henry, who, without immediate aſſiſtance, muſt have been entirely ruined. The Pruſſian monarch therefore determined to ſupport him with equal vigour and expedition. In a few days after the battle of Zorndorff, he began his march from Cuſtrin with a reinforcement of twenty-four battalions and great part of his cavalry, and proſecuted his route with ſuch uncommon celerity, that by the fifth of September he arrived at Torgau, and on the eleventh joined his brother.

Marſhal Daun had taken poſt at Stolpen, to the eaſtward of the Elbe, in order to maintain a free communication with the army of the empire, encamped in the neighbourhood of Konigſtein; to favour the operations of general Laudohn, who had advanced through the Lower Luſatia to the frontiers of Brandenburgh; to draw the attention of the Ruſſians from the ſouthern parts of Sileſia, where a body of Auſtrian troops acted under the command of the generals Harrache and de Ville; and to interrupt the communication between prince Henry and the capital of Saxony. On the fifth day of September the ſtrong fortreſs of Konigſtein ſurrendered, after a very feeble reſiſtance, to the prince de Deux-ponts, who immediately took poſſeſſion of the advantageous camp at Pirna. When the king of Pruſſia therefore arrived at Dreſden, he found the army of the empire in this poſition, and marſhal Daun in a ſtill ſtronger ſituation at Stolpen, with bridges of communication thrown over the Elbe; ſo that he could not attack them without the moſt imminent danger of a repulſe.

He had no other reſolution to take but that of endeavouring to intercept their ſupplies of proviſion; and with this view he advanced to Bautzen, which he immediately ſeized. This motion obliged the Auſtrian general to abandon his poſt at Stolpen; but he choſe another of equal ſtrength at Libau; yet he afterwards proceeded to Rittlitz, that he might be at hand to take the firſt opportunity tunity of executing the reſolution he had formed to attack the Pruſſians. The king having detached general Retzow on his left to take poſſeſſion of Weiſſenberg, advanced with the main body of his army, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Hochkirchen, after having diſlodged the Auſtrians from that village. Matters were now brought to ſuch a criſis, that a battle ſeemed altogether unavoidable, and indeed was equally deſired by both parties, as an event that would determine whether the Auſtrians ſhould be obliged to retreat for winter quarters into Bohemia, or be enabled to preſerve their footing in Saxony.

In this ſituation marſhal Daun reſolved to act offenſively, and formed a ſcheme for attacking, by ſurprize, the right flank of the Pruſſians. This meaſure was ſuggeſted to him by an overſight of the Pruſſians, who had neglected to ſecure the heights that commanded the village of Hochkirchen, which was only poſſeſſed by a few free companies. He determined to take the advantage of a very dark night, and to employ the flower of his whole army on this important ſervice; fully convinced that, ſhould they ſucceed in this attempt, the deſigns of his Pruſſian majeſty would be diſconcerted, and in all probability entirely defeated.

Having taken his meaſures with equal ſecrecy and expedition, he began his march in the night between the thirteenth and fourteenth of October, favoured by a thick fog, which contributed greatly to increaſe the darkneſs. His firſt care was to make himſelf maſter of the hill that commanded Hochkirchen, from whence his troops poured down upon the village, of which they took poſſeſſion, after having cut in pieces the free companies poſted there. The action began in this quarter about four in the morning, and continued ſeveral hours with great fury: for notwithſtanding the impetuoſity of the Auſtrian troops, and the confuſion occaſioned among the Pruſſians by the ſurprize, a vigorous ſtand was made by ſome general officers, who with wonderful ſpirit and preſence of mind, aſſembled and marſhalled the troops as they could take to their arms, and led them up to the attack without diſtinction of regiment, place, or precedence.

While the action was deſperately maintained in this quarter, the king exerted himſelf in the other parts of the field with uncommon vigour and activity, in drawing order from confuſion, arranging the different corps, altering poſitions, reinforcing weak poſts, encouraging the ſoldiery, and oppoſing the efforts of the enemy; for although they made their chief impreſſion upon the right by the village of Hochkirchen, marſhal Daun, in order to divide the attention of the king, made another attack on the left, which was very hard preſſed, and effectually prevented him from ſending reinforcements to the right, where marſhal Keith, under the greateſt diſadvantages, bore the brunt of the enemy's chief endeavours. Thrice was he repulſed from the village of Hochkirchen, and as often did he regain poſſeſſion of it; till at laſt, being overpowered by numbers, he was finally obliged to abandon it about nine in the morning, when, to the irreparable loſs of his ſovereign, he fell by a muſquet-ball. Prince Francis of Brunſwic had his head carried off by that of a cannon: prince Maurice of Anhalt was wounded and taken priſoner; and many others were either ſlain or diſabled.

As the right wing had been ſurpriſed, the tents continued ſtanding, and greatly incommoded them in their motions. The ſoldiers had never been properly marſhalled: the enemy ſtill perſevered in their attack with ſucceſſive reinforcements and redoubled fury; and a conſiderable ſlaughter was made by their artillery, which they had brought up to the heights of Hochkirchen. All theſe unhappy circumſtances could not fail to increaſe the confuſion and diſaſter of the Pruſſians; ſo that about ten the king was obliged to retire to Dobreſchutz, with the loſs of three thouſand men, though that of the enemy was much more conſiderable; nor could his Pruſſian majeſty be ſaid to have ſuſtained any damage which he could not eaſily repair, except the death of marſhal Keith, which was doubtleſs an irreparable misfortune.

He took poſt with his army about half a league from the field of action, where he continued ten days; during which he endeavoured to bring the enemy to a freſh engagement. This invitation, however, the Auſtrian general thought proper to decline, and kept his forces advantageouſly encamped on eminences planted with artillery. His deſign having been defeated at Hochkirchen, where he fought with many advantages on his ſide, he would not hazard another battle, upon equal terms, with ſuch an enterpriſing enemy, rendered more vigilant by the check he had ſuſtained, already reinforced from the army of prince Henry, and eager for an opportunity to wipe out the diſgrace which had been fixed upon his arms.

Count Daun having nothing farther to hope from the active operations of his own army, contented himſelf with amuſing the Pruſſian monarch in Luſatia; while the Auſtrian generals, Harſche and De Ville, ſhould carry on the ſiege of Neiſs and Coſel in Sileſia, which they now actually inveſted. As the Pruſſian monarch could not ſpare detachments to oppoſe every different corps of his enemies that acted againſt him in different parts of his dominions, he reſolved to make up in activity what he wanted in number, and, if poſſible, to relieve the city of Neiſs in perſon. With this view he ſet out from Dobreſchutz, and in ſight of the enemy advanced to Gorlitz without the leaſt interruption. From thence he continued his march towards Sileſia with his uſual rapidity, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of general Laudohn, who harraſſed the rear of the Pruſſians, and obtained over them ſome petty advantages.

Count Daun not only ſent this conſiderable corps to retard them in their march, but at the ſame time, by another route, detached a ſtrong body to reinforce the beſiegers. In the mean time, having received intelligence that the army of prince Henry in Saxony was greatly weakened, he himſelf marched thither, in hopes of driving the prince from that country, and reducing the capital in the king's abſence. Indeed his deſign was ſtill more extenſive; for he propoſed to reduce Dreſden, Leipſic, and Torgau, at the ſame time; the firſt, with the main body under his own command; the ſecond, by the army of the empire, under the prince de Deux Ponts; and the third, by a corps under general Haddick; while the forces conducted by Laudohn ſhould exclude the king from Luſatia.

In proſecution of this plan, he proceeded directly to the Elbe, which he croſſed at Pirna, and advanced to Dreſden, which he hoped he ſhould be able to take by aſſault. The army of prince Henry had already retired to the weſtward of this capital, before the prince de Deux-Ponts, who had found means to cut off his communication with Leipſic, and even inveſted that city. During theſe tranſactions, general Haddick advanced againſt Torgau.

The field-marſhal count Daun appearing on the ſixth day of November within ſight of Dreſden, at the head of ſixty thouſand men, encamped next day at Lockowitz, and on the eighth his advanced troops attacked the Pruſſian huſſars and independent battalions, which were poſted at Strieſſen and Gruenewieſe. Count Schmettau, who commanded the garriſon, amounting only to twelve thouſand men, was ſenſible, that conſidering the weakneſs and extent of the ſuburbs, it would be abſolutely impoſſible for him to prevent the enemy from making themſelves maſters of them by a ſingle aſſault; and that if they ſucceeded in this attempt, the great height of the houſes, which were generally ſix or ſeven ſtories, and entirely commanded the ramparts, would render the reduction of the body of the place equally eaſy and certain. Theſe conſiderations unavoidably determined him to ſet the ſuburbs immediately on fire.

The ſuburbs of Dreſden, it is well known, compoſe one of the fineſt towns in Europe, and are greatly ſuperior to that part of the city which lies within the walls. Here the moſt ſubſtantial inhabitants reſide, and here are carried on thoſe curious manufactures for which Dreſden is ſo deſervedly famous.

Count Daun, foreſeeing this conſequence of his attempt, endeavoured to intimidate the governor from a meaſure, to which he knew he would be neceſſarily driven by the cruel neceſſity of war. With this view he ſent a meſſenger to Schmettau, whom he threatened to make perſonally reſponſible for whatever ſteps he ſhould take; but the governor replied, with the firmneſs that became a man of honour and a ſoldier, that he would boldly anſwer for whatever he ſhould do; and in caſe marſhal Daun advanced, would not only burn the ſuburbs, but likewiſe defend the city itſelf from ſtreet to ſtreet, and at laſt even take ſhelter in the royal palace, ſhould he be reduced to that extremity.

The magiſtrates were no ſooner apprized of this reſolution than they fell at the feet of count Schmettau, and implored him to change his mind, and to have mercy on that devoted part of their city. Such of the royal family as remained in Dreſden joined their ſupplications to thoſe of the magiſtrates, beſeeching him to ſpare that laſt refuge of diſtreſſed royalty, and to allow at leaſt a ſecure reſidence to thoſe who had been deprived of every thing elſe.

All their entreaties were of no avail. Schmettau continued firm in his reſolution. He told them that their ſafety depended on themſelves and on marſhal Daun; that, if that general made no attempts, the ſuburbs ſhould be ſtill ſecure; but that if he took any farther ſteps, the neceſſity of his maſter's ſervice and his own honour would compel him to act in a manner very diſagreeable to the lenity of his diſpoſition. The magiſtrates retired in deſpair. Combuſtibles were laid in all the houſes.

Marſhal Daun renewing his attacks, the ſignal for firing the ſuburbs was given next morning; and in a moment, a place ſo lately the ſeat of eaſe and luxury, flouriſhing in traffic, in pleaſures, and in ingenious arts, was involved in flames. Dreadful however as was the calamity, it was attended with as little miſchief as the nature of the thing could poſſibly admit. Very few loſt their lives, but many their whole ſubſtance. The Pruſſian troops abandoned the flaming ſuburbs, and retired in good order into the city.

Marſhal Daun ſeeing the fire, which at once laid waſte the capital of his ally, and effectually prevented him from taking it by aſſault, ſent ſome empty threats to the governor. The Saxon miniſter too, at Ratiſbon, made grievous complaints to the diet of the empire, exclaiming loudly againſt the burning of the ſuburbs, as the moſt unparalleled act of wanton and unprovoked cruelty that had ever been committed. The emiſſaries of the court of Vienna ſpread the ſame reports; nor did they ſcruple to invent and alter facts in ſuch a manner as to excite the greateſt pity towards the ſufferers, and the higheſt indignation againſt his Pruſſian majeſty.

All theſe, however, were in a ſhort time abundantly refuted, by the authentic certificates of the magiſtrates of Dreſden, and of the officers of that court, who were perfectly acquainted with the tranſaction. From theſe certificates it appeared, that no more than two hundred and fifty houſes were conſumed; and though this, it muſt be owned, was a terrible calamity, yet was it nothing in compariſon of the accounts that were confidently publiſhed in the Auſtrian gazettes. It was likewiſe proved that the people were not ſurpriſed, as was falſely pretended; but that they had ſufficient notice of the governor's intentions, to enable them to provide for their ſafety. In a word, all the charges of cruelty alleged againſt the Pruſſian governor and garriſon were fully and ſatisfactorily overthrown.

While count Daun was employed in making this fruitleſs attempt upon the capital of Saxony, the king of Pruſſia proceeded in his march to Neiſs, which was completely inveſted on the third day of October. The operations of the ſiege were proſecuted with great vigour by the Auſtrian general, de Harſche, and the place was as gallantly defended by the Pruſſian governor, Theſkau, till the firſt day of November, when the Pruſſian monarch arrived, and compelled the beſiegers to relinquiſh their enterprize. M. de Harſche having raiſed the ſiege, the king detached general Fouquet with a body of troops acroſs the river Neiſs, and immediately the blockade of Coſel was likewiſe abandoned. De Harſche withdrew into Bohemia, and De Ville hovered about Jagernſdorf.

The fortreſs of Neiſs was no ſooner relieved, than the king of Pruſſia ſet out on his return to Saxony, where his preſence was become indiſpenſably neceſſary. At the ſame time the two bodies under the generals Dohna and Wedel entered by different routes into that country. The former had been left at Cuſtrin to attend the motions of the Ruſſians, who had by this time retreated to the Viſtula, and even paſſed that river at Thorn; the other had, during the campaign, made head againſt the Swedes, who had now entirely withdrawn from the Pruſſian territories; ſo that Wedel was at liberty to act in concert with his majeſty.

He accordingly advanced to Torgau, which had been lately inveſted by the Auſtrian general Haddick, who was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and even purſued to the neighbourhood of Eulenbourg. Wedel being afterwards joined by Dohna, drove him from thence with conſiderable loſs, and then relieved the city of Leipſic. Mean while the king continued his march towards the capital of Saxony, the Auſtrians flying before him with the utmoſt precipitation. On the tenth of November count Daun retired from Dreſden, and with the army of the empire fell back towards Bohemia; and on the twentieth the king arrived in that city, where he approved of the governor's conduct.

The Ruſſian general, apprehenſive that he ſhould not be able to preſerve his footing during the winter in Pomerania, unleſs he could ſecure ſome ſeaport on the Baltic, by which he might be ſupplied with proviſions, detached general Palmbach with fifteen thouſand men to beſiege the town of Colberg, an inconſiderable place, very poorly fortified. It was accordingly inveſted on the third day of October; but the beſiegers were either ſo totally deſtitute of proper implements, or ſo entirely ignorant of the art of attack, that the garriſon, though feeble, bid defiance to all the attempts of the enemy, who, after a ſiege of twenty-ſix days, relinquiſhed their enterprize, and cruelly ravaged the open country in their retreat. Thus by the activity and valour of the Pruſſian monarch, his generals and officers, ſix ſieges were raiſed almoſt at the ſame period, namely, thoſe of Colberg, Neiſs, Coſel, Torgau, Leipſic, and Dreſden.

The king of Pruſſia, at his firſt entrance into Saxony, declared that he had no deſign to make a conqueſt of the electorate, but only to keep it as a ſacred depoſitum for the ſecurity of his own dominions, until he could oblige his enemies to agree to reaſonable terms of accommodation: but upon his laſt arrival at Dreſden, he thought proper to adopt new maxims.

In the beginning of December the Pruſſian directory of war iſſued a decree to the deputies of the ſtates of the electorate, demanding a certain quantity of flour and forage, according to the convention formerly ſettled; at the ſame time ſignifying, that though the king of Pruſſia had hitherto treated the electorate as a country taken under his ſpecial protection, the face of affairs was now changed in ſuch a manner, that for the future he would conſider it in no other light than that of a conquered country.

The Ruſſians had ſeized in Pruſſia all the eſtates and effects belonging to the king's officers: a retaliation was now made upon the effects of the Saxon officers who ſerved in the Ruſſian army. Seals were put on all the cabinets containing papers belonging to the privy counſellors of his Poliſh majeſty, and they themſelves ordered to depart for Warſaw at a very ſhort warning. Though the city had been impoveriſhed by former exactions, and very lately ſubjected to military execution, the king of Pruſſia demanded freſh contributions, and even extorted them by dint of ſeverities, which can by no means be juſtified. He ſurrounded the exchange with ſoldiers, and confining the merchants to ſtraw beds and naked apartments, compelled them to draw bills for very large ſums on their foreign correſpondents.

Having related all the tranſactions of the campaign, except thoſe in which the Swedes were concerned, it now remains that I ſhould deſcribe the progreſs which was made in Pomerania by the troops of that nation, under the command of count Hamilton. I have already obſerved, that in the beginning of the year the Pruſſian general, Lehwald, had conſtrained them to evacuate the whole province, except Stralſund, which was likewiſe inveſted. This, in all probability, would have been beſieged in form, had not Lehwald reſigned the command of the Pruſſians, on account of his great age and infirmities, and his ſucceſſor count Dohna been obliged to retire from that quarter, in order to make head againſt the Ruſſian army on the other ſide of Pomerania.

The blockade of Stralſund being conſequently raiſed, and that part of the country entirely abandoned by the Pruſſians, the Swediſh troops advanced again from the iſle of Rugen, to which they had retreated: but the ſupplies and reinforcements they expected from Stockholm were delayed in ſuch a manner, either from a deficiency in the ſubſidies ſtipulated by France, or from the management of thoſe who were in the Pruſſian intereſt, that great part of the ſeaſon was elapſed before they undertook any thing of importance. Indeed, while they lay encamped under the cannon of Stralſund waiting for theſe ſupplies, their operations were retarded by the exploſion of a whole ſhip-load of gun-powder intended for their uſe; an event owing, in all likelihood, to accident, but maliciouſly imputed by the enemy to the practices of the Pruſſian party in Sweden, which at this period ſeemed to gain ground, and even threatened a change in the miniſtry. At length the reinforcement arrived about the latter end of June, and their general determined to reſume his operations.

In the beginning of July, his army being put in motion, he ſent a detachment to diſlodge the few Pruſſian troops that were left at Anclam, Demmin, and other places, to guard that frontier; and they retreated accordingly. Count Hamilton meeting with no farther reſiſtance in the field, recovered in a little time the whole of the Swediſh Pomerania, and even made frequent incurſions into the Pruſſian territories. Mean while, a combined fleet of thirty-three Ruſſian and ſeven Swediſh ſhips of war appeared in the Baltic, and anchored between the iſlands of Dragoe and Amagh; but they neither landed troops nor committed hoſtilities. The Swediſh general advanced as far as Fehrbellin, ſent out parties that raiſed contributions in the adjacent country, and even ſtruck terror into the capital of Brandenburgh.

The king of Pruſſia being appriſed of their progreſs, detached general Wedel from Dreſden with a body of troops that were augmented on their route; ſo that on the twentieth of September he found himſelf at Berlin with eleven thouſand effective men, at the head of whom he marched againſt count Hamilton, while the prince of Bevern with five thouſand advanced on the other ſide from Stetin. At their approach the Swediſh commander retired, after having left a garriſon of fourteen hundred men at Fehrbellin, in order to retard the Pruſſians, and ſecure the retreat of his army. The place was immediately aſſaulted by general Wedel; and though the Swedes made a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance, ſiſtance, he at laſt compelled them to ſurrender with the loſs of one half of their number either killed or taken priſoners. The body of the Swediſh army, without attempting any thing farther, immediately evacuated the Pruſſian territories, and returned to the neighbourhood of Stralſund, intending to take winter quarters in the iſle of Rugen. Count Hamilton, either diſſatisfied with the reſtrictions impoſed on him, or finding himſelf unable to act in ſuch a manner as might encreaſe his reputation, threw up his command, retired from the army, and reſigned all his other employments.

The cauſe of his Pruſſian majeſty was not only eſpouſed by a ſtrong party in Sweden, but was alſo ſupported by a great many in Poland, eſpecially by ſuch of the Palatines as had always oppoſed the meaſures of the reigning family. Theſe were now joined by ſeveral patriots, who dreaded the vicinity, and ſuſpected the deſigns of the Ruſſian army. The dyet of the republic was opened on the ſecond day of November, and after warm debates, M. Malachowſki was unanimouſly choſen marſhal; but no ſooner had the chamber of nuncios begun their deliberations, than a number of voices were raiſed againſt the encroachment of the Ruſſian troops, who had taken up their quarters in Poland, and heavy complaints were made of the damages occaſioned by their cruelty and rapine.

Great pains were taken to appeaſe theſe clamours, and many were perſuaded to refer their grievances to the king in ſenate: but when this difficulty ſeemed almoſt overcome, Padhorſki, the nuncio of Volhinia, ſtood up and declared, that he would not allow any other point to be debated in the dyet, while the Ruſſians preſerved the leaſt footing within the territories of the republic. The other courtiers exerted their utmoſt influence to cajole and mollify this ſtubborn patriot; but all their endeavours were abſolutely ineffectual. He ſolemnly proteſted againſt their proceedings, and withdrew; ſo that the marſhal was obliged to diſſolve the aſſembly, and recourſe was had to a ſenatus concilium, to concert ſuch meaſures as ſeemed at preſent neceſſary.

The ſcheme which his Poliſh majeſty had formed of procuring the dukedom of Courland for his ſon prince Charles, was likewiſe attended with great clamour and diſſenſion. He had been recommended by the court of Ruſſia, and even approved by the ſtates of that country; but two difficulties remained. The ſtates alleged, that they could not proceed to a new election during the life of their former duke, count Biron, who was ſtill alive, though a priſoner in Siberia, unleſs their duchy ſhould be declared vacant by the king and republic of Poland; and that, according to the laws of that country, no prince could be elected until he ſhould have ſolemnly ſubſcribed to the Augſbourg confeſſion of faith. His Poliſh majeſty, however, being determined to carry his point at all adventures, ordered count Malachowſki, high-chancellor of Poland, to deliver to prince Charles a diploma, by which the king granted permiſſion to the ſtates of Courland, to chuſe that prince for their duke; and appointed the day for his election and inſtalment, which accordingly took place in the month of January, notwithſtanding the clamour of many Poliſh grandees, who perſiſted in aſſerting that the king had no right to grant ſuch permiſſion without the conſent of the dyet.

The events of the campaign, however various, had produced no change in the political ſyſtems adopted by the ſeveral courts of Europe. The czarina, who in the month of June had expreſſed her ſentiments with regard to the king of Pruſſia, in a declaration delivered to all the foreign miniſters at Peterſburg, ſeemed now more bent than ever on proſecuting her deſigns againſt that monarch. The queen of Hungary diſtributed, among the imperial miniſters at the ſeveral courts of the empire, copies of a reſcript, explaining the conduct of her generals ſince the commencement of the campaign, and concluding with expreſſions of ſelf-approbation, to the following effect: "Though the iſſue of the campaign be not as yet entirely ſatisfactory, and ſuch as might be deſired, the imperial court enjoys at leaſt the ſincere ſatisfaction of reflecting, that, according to the change of circumſtances, it inſtantly took the moſt vigorous reſolutions; that it was never deficient in any thing that might contribute to the good of the common cauſe; and that it is now employed in making preparations from which the moſt happy conſequences may be expected."

I have already taken notice of a decree of the Aulic council, publiſhed in the month of Auguſt, enjoining all directors of circles, all imperial towns, and the nobleſſe of the empire, to tranſmit to Vienna an exact liſt of all thoſe who had diſobeyed the avocatoria of the empire, and ſupported the rebellion raiſed by the elector of Brandenburgh; that their revenues might be ſequeſtered, and themſelves puniſhed in their honours, perſons, and effects. As the king of Great Britain, in quality of elector of Hanover, was plainly pointed at, and indeed expreſsly mentioned in this decree, that prince, by the hands of baron Gemmegen, his electoral miniſter, preſented a memorial to the dyet of the empire in the month of November, enumerating the inſtances in which he had exerted himſelf, and even expoſed his life, for the preſervation and aggrandizement of the houſe of Auſtria.

In return for theſe important ſervices, he affirmed that the empreſs-queen had refuſed him the aſſiſtance ſtipulated in treaties, againſt an invaſion planned by France, whoſe hatred he had drawn upon himſelf by his friendſhip to that princeſs; and his Imperial majeſty even denied him the dictatorial letters which he ſolicited: that the court of Vienna had ſigned a treaty with the crown of France, in which it was ſtipulated, that the French troops ſhould paſs the Weſer, and invade the electorate of Hanover, where they were joined by the troops of the empreſs-queen, who ravaged his Britannic majeſty's dominions, with greater cruelty than even the French had practiſed; and the ſame duke of Cumberland who had been wounded at Dettingen, in defence of her Imperial majeſty, was obliged to fight at Haſtenbeck againſt the troops of that very princeſs, in defence of his father's dominions: that ſhe had ſent commiſſaries to Hanover, who ſhared with the crown of France the contributions extorted from that electorate; rejected all propoſals of peace, and diſmiſſed from her court the miniſter of Brunſwic Lunenburg: that his Imperial majeſty, who had ſworn to protect the empire, and oppoſe the entrance of foreign troops deſtined to oppreſs any of the ſtates of Germany, afterwards required the king of England to withdraw his troops from the countries which they occupied, that a French army might again have free paſſage into his German dominions: that the emperor had recalled theſe troops, releaſed them from their allegiance to their ſovereign, enjoined them to abandon their poſts, their colours, and the ſervice in which they were embarked, on pain of being puniſhed in body and eſtate; and that the king of England himſelf was threatened with the ban of the empire.

He obſerved, that in quality of elector, he had been accuſed of refuſing to concur with the reſolutions of the diet taken in the preceding year, of entering into alliance with the king of Pruſſia, joining his troops to the armies of that prince, employing auxiliaries belonging to the ſtates of the empire, ſending Engliſh forces into Germany, where they had taken poſſeſſion of Embden, and exacting contributions in different parts of Germany.

In anſwer to theſe allegations, he declared that he could not, conſiſtent with his own ſafety, or the dictates of common ſenſe, concur with a majority, in joining his troops, which were immediately neceſſary for his own defence, to thoſe which, from the arbitrary views of the court of Vienna, were led againſt his friend and ally the king of Pruſſia, by a prince who did not belong to the generality of the empire, and on whom the command had been conferred, without a previous concluſum of the Germanic body: that, with reſpect to his alliance with the king of Pruſſia, he had a right, when deſerted by his former allies, to ſeek aſſiſtance whereſoever it could be procured; and ſurely no juſt grounds of complaint could be offered againſt that which his Pruſſian majeſty lent, to deliver the electoral ſtates of Brunſwic, as well as thoſe of Brunſwic Wolfenbuttle, Heſſe, and Buckbourg, from the oppreſſions of their common enemy. Poſterity, he ſaid, would hardly believe, that at a time when the troops of Auſtria, the Palatinate, and Wirtemberg, were engaged to invade the counties of the empire, other members of the Germanic body, who employed auxiliaries in their defence, ſhould be threatened with outlawry and ſequeſtration.

He owned that, in quality of king, he had ſent over Engliſh troops to Germany, and taken poſſeſſion of Embden; ſteps for which he was accountable to no power on earth, although the conſtitutions of the empire permit the co-eſtates to make uſe of foreign troops, not indeed for the purpoſe of invaſion or conqueſt in Germany, but for their defence and preſervation. He alſo acknowleged that he had reſented the conduct, and puniſhed the injuſtice, of thoſe co-eſtates who had aſſiſted his enemies, and helped to ravage his dominions; inferring, that if the crown of France was free to pillage the eſtates of the duke of Brunſwic, and the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, becauſe they had ſupplied the king of England with auxiliaries; if the empreſs-queen had a right to appropriate to herſelf half of the contributions raiſed by the French king in theſe countries, ſurely his Britannic majeſty had an equal right to make thoſe feel the burden of the war who had favoured the unjuſt enterprizes of his enemies.

He expreſſed his hope that the dyet, after having duly conſidered theſe circumſtances, would, by way of advice, propoſe to his Imperial majeſty, that he ſhould annul his moſt inconſiſtent mandates, and not only take effectual meaſures to protect the electorate and its allies, but alſo give orders for commencing againſt the empreſs-queen, as archduchefs of Auſtria, the elector Palatine, and the duke of Wirtemberg, ſuch proceedings as ſhe wanted to enforce againſt his Britannic majeſty, elector of Brunſwic Lunenbourg.

Such was the ſubſtance of this famous memorial which the Hanoverian miniſter preſented to the dyet of the empire, and which made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion upon many of its members, that on the twenty-ninth of November the evangelic body publiſhed a concluſum, importing, that with reſpect to the ban of the empire, with which ſeveral princes were now threatened, they would never conſent to any innovation that ſhould be propoſed, contrary to the twentieth article of the capitulation, which the emperor had confirmed by oath at his election; and that whatever ſhould be done contrary to that agreement, ſhould be looked upon by them as null and void, and ſhould be treated accordingly.

Having thus particularized the moſt important events and tranſactions which attended the proſecution of the war on the continent of Germany and the northern parts of Europe, I ſhall now proceed to trace its progreſs, during the courſe of this year, in the other quarters of the globe, where we ſhall find the ſcenes as buſy, intereſting, and ſtriking, as thoſe already related.

I ſhall begin firſt with relating the ſucceſs of ſome naval atchievements performed by our fleets and cruizers at the beginning of the year, previous to the expedition againſt and deſcent made upon the coaſts of France.

The Britiſh cruizers kept the ſea during all the ſeverity of winter, in order to protect the trade of the kingdom, and diſtreſs that of the enemy. They exerted themſelves with ſuch diligence and ſucceſs, that a great number of prizes were taken, and the commerce of France almoſt entirely ruined. A very gallant exploit was performed by one captain Bray, commander of the Adventure, a ſmall armed veſſel in the government's ſervice. Falling in with the Machault, a large privateer of Dunkirk, near Dungeneſs, he ran her aboard, faſtened her boltſprit to his capſtan, and after a warm engagement compelled her to ſubmit. A French frigate of thirty-ſix guns was taken by captain Parker, in a new fir-ſhip of inferior force. Several privateers of the enemy were ſunk, burned, or taken; and a great number of merchant ſhips fell into the hands of the Engliſh.

Nor were the Engliſh ſhips of war leſs ſucceſsful in the American than in the European ſeas. About this time the board of admiralty received advice from admiral Cotes, in Jamaica, of an action which happened off the iſland of Hiſpaniola, in the month of October of the preceding year, between three Engliſh ſhips of war and a French ſquadron. Captain Forreſt, an officer of diſtinguiſhed abilities, had, in the ſhip Auguſta, ſailed from Port-Royal in Jamaica, accompanied by the Dreadnought and Edinburgh, under the command of the captains Suckling and Langdon. He was ordered to cruize off Cape François; and this ſervice he punctually performed, in the face of a French ſquadron of much greater force, lately arrived at that place from the coaſt of Africa. The commander, piqued at ſeeing himſelf thus inſulted by an inferior armament, reſolved to give them battle; and that he might either take them, or at leaſt drive them out of thoſe ſeas, ſo as to afford a free paſſage to a great number of merchant ſhips then lying at the Cape, bound for Europe, he took every precaution which he thought neceſſary to inſure ſucceſs. With this view he ſtrengthened his ſquadron with ſome ſtore ſhips, mounted with guns and armed for the occaſion, and ſupplied the deficiency in his complements by taking on board ſeamen from the merchant ſhips, and ſoldiers from the garriſon.

Thus equipped, he weighed anchor and ſtood out to ſea, having under his command four large ſhips of the line and three ſtout frigates. They were no ſooner perceived advancing than captain Forreſt held a ſhort council with his two captains. "Gentlemen (ſaid he) you know our own ſtrength, and ſee that of the enemy: ſhall we give them battle?" They replying in the affirmative, he added, "Then fight them we will; there is no time to be loſt: return to your ſhips, and get them ready for engaging."

After this laconic conſultation among theſe three gallant officers, they bore down upon the French ſquadron without further heſitation, and between three and four in the afternoon the action began with incredible fury. The enemy exerted themſelves with uncommon activity, conſcious that their honour was peculiarly at ſtake, and that they fought in ſight, as it were, of their own coaſt, which was lined with people, expecting to ſee them return in triumph. But notwithſtanding their moſt vigorous efforts, their commodore, after having ſuſtained a ſevere engagement that laſted two hours and a half, found his ſhip in ſuch a ſhattered condition that he made ſignal for one of his frigates to come and tow him out of the line. His example was followed by the reſt of his ſquadron, which by this means, with the favour of a land breeze and the approach of night, made ſhift to accompliſh their eſcape from the three Britiſh ſhips, that were too much diſabled in their maſts and rigging to proſecute their victory.

One of the French ſquadron was rendered altogether unfit for ſervice: their loſs in men amounted to three hundred killed, and as many wounded; whereas that of the Engliſh did not exceed one third of this number. Nevertheleſs they were ſo damaged, that being unable to keep the ſea, they returned to Jamaica; and the French commodore ſeized the opportunity of ſailing with a great convoy for Europe.

Captain Forreſt's bravery was not more remarkable in this engagement than his conduct and ſagacity in a ſubſequent adventure near Port-au-Prince, a French harbour ſituated at the bottom of a bay on the weſtern part of Hiſpaniola, behind the ſmall iſland of Gonave. After Mr. de Kerſin had ſet ſail from Cape François for Europe, admiral Cotes, beating up to windward from Port Royal in Jamaica with three ſhips of the line, received intelligence that there was a French fleet at Port-au Prince ready to ſail on their return to Europe. In conſequence of this advice, he ordered captain Forreſt to cruize off the iſland Gonave for two days only, enjoining him at the ſame time to return at the expiration of that period, and rejoin the ſquadron at Cape Nicholas.

Accordingly captain Forreſt, in the Auguſta, proceeded up the bay, between the iſland Gonave and Hiſpaniola, with a view to execute a plan which he had himſelf projected. Next day in the afternoon, though he perceived two ſloops, he forbore chaſing that he might not riſque a diſcovery: for the ſame purpoſe he hoiſted Dutch colours, and diſguiſed his ſhip with tarpaulins. At five in the afternoon he diſcovered ſeven ſail of ſhips ſteering to the weſtward, and hauled from them to avoid ſuſpicion, but at the approach of night gave chace with all the ſail he could carry. About ten he perceived two ſail, one of which fired a gun, and the other made the beſt of her way for Leoganne, another harbour in the bay.

At this time captain Forreſt reckoned eight ſail to leeward, near another port called Petit Goave: coming up with the ſhip which had fired the gun, ſhe ſubmitted without oppoſition, after he had hailed and told her captain what he was, produced two of his largeſt cannon, and threatened to ſink her if ſhe ſhould give the leaſt alarm. He forthwith removed the priſoners from this prize, and placed on board of her five and thirty of his own crew, with orders to ſtand for Petit Goave, and intercept any of the fleet that might attempt to get into that harbour. Then he made ſail after the reſt, and in the dawn of the morning finding himſelf in the middle of their fleet, he began to fire at them all in their turns, as he could bring his guns to bear. They returned the fire for ſome time; at length the Marguerite, the Solide, and the Theodore, ſtruck their colours. Theſe being ſecured, were afterwards employed in taking the Maurice, Le Grand, and La Flore; the Brilliant alſo ſubmitted, and the Mars made ſail in hope of eſcaping; but the Auguſta coming up with her about noon, ſhe likewiſe fell into the hands of the victor.

Thus, by a well-conducted ſtratagem, a whole fleet of nine ſail was taken by a ſingle ſhip, in the neighbourhood of four or five harbours, in any one of which they would have found immediate ſhelter and protection. The prizes, which happened to be richly laden, were ſafely conveyed to Jamaica, and there ſold at public auction for the benefit of the captors, who may ſafely challenge hiſtory to produce ſuch another inſtance of ſucceſs.

The miniſtry having reſolved to make vigorous efforts againſt the enemy in North America, admiral Boſcawen was appointed to the command of the fleet deſtined for that ſervice, and ſailed from St. Helen's on the nineteenth day of February, when the Invincible, of ſeventy-four guns, one of the beſt ſhips that compoſed his ſquadron, ran aground and periſhed; but her men, ſtores, and artillery were ſaved.

In the courſe of the enſuing month ſir Edward Hawke entered the Bay of Biſcay with another ſquadron, in order to intercept any ſupplies from France deſigned for Cape Breton or Canada; and about the ſame time the town of Embden, belonging to his Pruſſian majeſty, which had fallen into the hands of the enemy, was happily delivered by the conduct of commodore Holmes, ſtationed on that coaſt, who ſent up two of his ſmall ſhips to anchor in the river between Knok and the city. The garriſon, conſiſting of three thouſand ſeven hundred men, finding themſelves thus cut off from all all communication with the country below, evacuated the place with great precipitation; and ſome of their baggage being ſent off by water, was taken by the boats which the commodore detached for that purpoſe.

It was about the ſame time that the admiralty received information of another advantage by ſea, which had been gained by admiral Oſborne while he cruized between Cape de Gatt and Carthagena on the coaſt of Spain. On the twenty-eighth day of March he fell in with a French ſquadron, commanded by the marquis du Queſne, conſiſting of four ſhips, namely, the Foudroyant of eighty guns, the Orphée of ſixty-four, the Oriflamme of fifty, and the Pleiade frigate of twenty-four, in their paſſage from Toulon to reinforce M. de la Clue, who had for ſome time been blocked up by admiral Oſborne in the harbour of Carthagena.

The enemy no ſooner deſcried the Engliſh ſquadron than they diſperſed, and ſteered different courſes; then Mr Oſborne detached ſeveral ſhips in purſuit of each, while he himſelf with the body of his fleet ſtood off for the bay of Carthagena, to obſerve the motions of the French ſquadron which lay there at anchor. About ſeven in the evening the Orphée, having on board five hundred men, ſtruck to captain Stor in the Revenge, who loſt the calf of one leg in the engagement, during which he was ſupported by the ſhips Berwick and Preſton.

The Monmouth of ſixty-four guns, commanded by captain Gardiner, attacked the Foudroyant, one of the largeſt ſhips in the French navy, mounted with fourſcore cannon, and containing eight hundred men, under the conduct of the marquis du Queſne. This is the ſame Mr. Gardiner who, in the famous battle between the admirals Byng and Galiſſoniere in the Mediterranean, commanded the Ramillies, under the direction of the Britiſh admiral; and his courage having incurred ſome ſuſpicion on account of his behaviour in that action, he was determined to wipe off the diſgrace. He therefore maintained the engagement with incredible fury until he loſt his life by a muſket-ball: nevertheleſs the fight was continued with unabating vigour by his lieutenant Mr. Carkett, and the Foudroyant diſabled in ſuch a manner that her commander ſtruck, as ſoon as the other Engliſh ſhips, the Swiftſure and the Hampton-Court, appeared.

This laſt ſtep, however, he did not take until he ſaw his ſhip lie like a wreck upon the water, and the deck covered with dead carcaſſes. The Oriflamme was driven on ſhore under the caſtle of Aiglos by the ſhips Montagu and Monarque, commanded by the captains Rowley and Montague, who could not complete her deſtruction without violating the neutrality of Spain. As for the Pleiade frigate, ſhe made her eſcape by being a prime ſailor.

This was a ſevere blow to the enemy, who not only loſt two of their capital ſhips, but had the misfortune to ſee them added to the navy of Great Britain; and the diſaſter was followed by another, which they could not help feeling with an equal degree of ſenſibility. In the beginning of April ſir Edward Hawke ſteering with his ſquadron into Baſque-road, on the coaſt of Poictou, deſcried off the iſle of Aix a French fleet at anchor, conſiſting of five ſhips of the line, with ſix frigates and forty tranſports, having on board three thouſand troops, and a large quantity of ſtores and proviſion, intended as a reinforcement for their ſettlements in North America.

They no ſooner ſaw the Engliſh admiral advancing than they began to ſlip their cables and fly with the utmoſt precipitation. Some of them eſcaped to ſea, but the greater number ran into ſhallow water, where they could not be purſued; and next morning they appeared aground lying on their broadſides. Sir Edward Hawke, who had rode all night at anchor abreaſt of the iſle of Aix, furniſhed the ſhips Intrepid and Medway with truſty pilots, and ſent them farther in when the flood began to make, with orders to ſound a-head, that he might know whether there was any poſſibility of attacking the enemy; but the want of a ſufficient depth of water rendered this ſcheme impracticable.

In the mean time the French threw over board their cannon, ſtores, and ballaſt; and boats and launches from Rochefort were employed in carrying out warps to drag their ſhips through the ſoft mud, as ſoon as they ſhould be floated by the tide. By theſe means their large ſhips of war and many of their tranſports were conveyed into the river Charente; but their loading was loſt, and the end of their equipment totally defeated.

Another convoy of merchant ſhips, under the protection of three frigates, had a few days before been chaced by ſir Edward Hawke into the harbour of St. Martin's on the iſle of Rhé, where they ſtill remained, waiting an opportunity for hazarding a ſecond departure: and a third, conſiſting of 12 ſail, bound from Bourdeaux to Quebec, under convoy of a frigate and armed veſſel, was encountered at ſea by one Britiſh ſhip of the line and two fire-ſhips, which took the frigate and armed veſſel, and two of the convoy afterwards met with the ſame fate; but this advantage was dearly purchaſed by the loſs of captain James Hume, commander of the Pluto fire-ſhip, a brave accompliſhed officer, who, in an unequal combat with the enemy, refuſed to quit the deck even when he was diſabled, and fell glorioufly covered with wounds, exhorting the people with his lateſt breath to continue the engagement while the ſhip could ſwim, and acquit themſelves with honour in the ſervice of their country.

On the twenty-ninth day of May the Raiſonable, a French ſhip of the line, mounted with ſixty-four cannon, having on board ſix hundred and thirty men, commanded by the prince de Mombazon chevalier de Rohan, was, in her paſſage from Port l'Orient to Breſt, attacked by captain Dennis in the Dorſetſhire of ſeventy guns, and taken, after an obſtinate engagement, in which one hundred and ſixty men of the prince's complement were killed or wounded, and the ſails and rigging of his ſhip almoſt entirely deſtroyed.

The joy ariſing from theſe ſucceſſes was conſiderably damped by a lamentable diſaſter that befel the ſhip prince George, of eighty guns, commanded by rear admiral Broderick, in his paſſage to the Mediterranean. On the thirtieth day of April, between one and two in the afternoon, a dreadful fire broke out in the fore part of the ſhip, and raged with ſuch violence, that notwithſtanding all the efforts efforts of the officers and men for ſeveral hours, the flames increaſed; and the ſhip being conſumed to the water-edge, the remnant ſunk about ſix o'clock in the evening. The horror and conſternation of ſuch a ſcene are more eaſily conceived than deſcribed. When all endeavours proved ineffectual, and no hope of preſerving the ſhip remained, the barge was hoiſted out for the preſervation of the admiral, who entered it accordingly; but all diſtinction of perſons being now aboliſhed, the ſeamen ruſhed into it in ſuch crowds, that in a few moments it overſet. The admiral foreſeeing that this would be the caſe, ſtripped off his cloaths, and committing himſelf to the mercy of the waves, was ſaved by the boat of a merchant ſhip, after he had ſuſtained himſelf in the ſea a full hour by ſwimming.

Captain Payton, who was the ſecond in command, remained upon the quarter-deck as long as it was poſſible to keep that ſtation; and then deſcending by the ſtern-ladder, had the good fortune to be taken into a boat belonging to the ſloop Alderney. The hull of the ſhip, maſts, and rigging, were now in a blaze, burſting tremendous in ſeveral parts through horrid clouds of ſmoak: nothing was heard but the crackling of the flames, mingled with the diſmal cries of terror and diſtraction; nothing was ſeen but acts of frenzy and deſperation. The miſerable wretches, affrighted at the horrors of ſuch a conflagration, ſought a fate leſs dreadful, by plunging into the ſea; and about three hundred men were preſerved by the boats belonging to ſome ſhips that accompanied the admiral in the his voyage, but five hundred periſhed in ocean.

The king of Great Britain being firmly reſolved, notwithſtanding the ill ſucceſs, not to ſay diſgrace, which attended the expedition ſent the preceding year to annoy the coaſts of France, to renew his attempts upon that kingdom, ordered a very formidable armament to be equipped for that purpoſe. Two powerful ſquadrons by ſea were appointed for the ſervice of this expedition: the firſt, conſiſting of eleven great ſhips, was commanded by lord Anſon and ſir Edward Hawke: the other, compoſed of four ſhips of the line, ſeven frigates, ſix ſloops, two fireſhips, two bombs, ten cutters, twenty tenders, ten ſtoreſhips, and one hundred tranſports, was put under the direction of commodore Howe, who had ſignalized himſelf by his gallantry and conduct in the courſe of the laſt fruitleſs expedition.

The plan of a deſcent upon France having been projected by the miniſtry, a body of troops, conſiſting of ſixteen regiments, nine troops of light horſe, and ſix thouſand marines, was aſſembled for the execution of this deſign, and embarked under the command of the duke of Marlborough; a nobleman who, though he did not poſſeſs all the military genius of his grandfather, was yet confeſſedly a brave and gallant officer. On this occaſion he was aſſiſted by the counſels of lord George Sackville, ſecond in command, ſon to the duke of Dorſet.

The troops having for ſome time been encamped on the Iſle of Wight, were embarked in the latter end of May, and the two fleets ſailed in the beginning of June for the coaſt of Bretagne, leaving the people of England big with the expectations of the event of the enterprize.

The two fleets ſeparated at ſea: lord Anſon with his ſquadron bent his courſe to the Bay of Biſcay, in order to watch the motions of the enemy's ſhips, and interrupt their navigation; while commodore Howe with the land forces ſteered directly towards St. Malo, a ſtrong place of conſiderable commerce, ſituated on the coaſt of Bretagne, againſt which the preſent invaſion ſeemed to be chiefly levelled. The town, however, was ſo well fortified, both by art and nature, that no attempt by ſea could be made upon it with any proſpect of ſucceſs; and therefore it was reſolved to make a deſcent in the neighbourhood. After the fleet had been, by contrary winds, detained ſeveral days in ſight of the French coaſt, it arrived in the bay of Cancalle, about two leagues to the eaſtward of St. Malo; and Mr. Howe having ſilenced a ſmall battery which the enemy had occaſionally erected upon the beach, the troops were landed, without farther oppoſition, on the ſixth day of June.

The duke of Marlborough immediately began his march towards St. Servan, with a view to deſtroy ſuch ſhipping and magazines as might be in any acceſſible parts of the river; and this ſcheme was executed with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs. A great quantity of naval ſtores, two ſhips of war, ſeveral privateers, and about fourſcore veſſels of different ſorts, were ſet on fire, and reduced to aſhes, almoſt under the cannon of the place, which however they could not pretend to beſiege in form. His grace having received intelligence that the enemy were buſily employed in collecting forces to cut off his retreat, returned to Cancalle, where Mr. Howe had made ſuch a maſterly diſpoſition of the boats and tranſports, that the reimbarkation of the troops was accompliſhed with ſurpriſing eaſe and expedition. The forces, while they continued on ſhore, were reſtrained from all outrages by the moſt ſevere diſcipline; and the French houſes, which their inhabitants had deſerted, were left untouched.

Immediately after their landing, the duke of Marlborough, as commander in chief, publiſhed and diſtributed a manifeſto, addreſſed to the people of Bretagne, importing, That his deſcent upon the coaſt was not effected with a deſign to make war on the inhabitants of the open country, except ſuch as ſhould be found in arms, or otherwiſe oppoſing the operations of the Britiſh forces: that all who were willing to remain in peaceable poſſeſſion of their effects might ſtay unmoleſted in their reſpective dwellings, and follow their uſual occupations: that, beſides the cuſtoms and taxes they uſed to pay to their own king, nothing ſhould be required of them but what was abſolutely neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence of the army; and for all proviſions brought in they ſhould be paid in ready money: but that if, notwithſtanding theſe aſſurances of protection, they ſhould carry off their effects and proviſions, and abandon the places of their habitation, he would treat them as enemies, and deſtroy their houſes with fire and ſword.

To the magiſtracy of St. Malo he likewiſe ſent a letter, intimating, that as all the inhabitants of the town and villages between Dinant, Rennes, and Doll, now in his poſſeſſion, had deſerted their habitations, probably to avoid the payment of the uſual contributions; and as he was informed that the magiſtrates had compelled the people of the country to retire into the town of St. Malo, he now gave them notice, that if they did not immediately ſend them back to their houſes, and come themſelves to his head-quarters to ſettle the contributions, he ſhould think himſelf obliged to proceed to military execution. Theſe threats, however, were not put in force, although the magiſtrates of St. Malo did not think proper to comply with his injunction.

But it was found altogether impoſſible to prevent irregularities among troops employed in ſuch an expedition. Some houſes were plundered, and not without acts of cruelty: but thoſe offenders were brought to immediate juſtice; and it muſt be owned, as an inconteſtible proof of the general's humanity, that in deſtroying the magazines of the enemy at St. Servan, which may be termed the ſuburbs of St. Malo, he ordered one ſmall ſtore-houſe to be ſpared, becauſe it could not be ſet on fire without endangering the whole diſtrict.

The Britiſh forces being reimbarked, with the loſs of about thirty men miſſing, the fleet was detained by contrary winds in the bay of Cancalle for ſeveral days; during which a deſign ſeems to have been formed for attacking Granville, which had been reconnoitred by ſome of the engineers: but, in conſequence of their report, the ſcheme was laid aſide, and the fleet ſtood out to ſea, where it was expoſed to ſome rough weather.

In a few days, the wind blowing in a northern direction, they ſteered again towards the French coaſt, and ran in with the land near Havre de Grace, where the flat-bottomed boats provided for landing were hoiſted out, and a ſecond diſembarkation expected. But the wind blowing violently towards the evening, the boats were again hauled on board, and the fleet obliged to quit the land, in order to avoid the dangers of a lee ſhore. Next day the weather being more moderate, they returned to the ſame ſtation, and orders were given to prepare for a deſcent; but the duke of Marlborough having taken a view of the coaſt in an open cutter, accompanied by commodore Howe, thought proper to wave the attempt.

Their next ſtep was to bear away before the wind for Cherbourg, in the neighbourhood of which place the fleet came to anchor. Here ſome of the tranſports were ſaluted by the fire of ſix different batteries, and a conſiderable body of troops appeared in arms to oppoſe the landing: nevertheleſs, the general determined that the forts Querqueville and Gallet ſhould be attacked in the night by the firſt regiment of guards. The ſoldiers were actually diſtributed in the flat-bottomed boats, and every preparation made for this purpoſe, when the wind began to blow with ſuch violence, that the troops could not be landed without the moſt imminent danger; nor properly ſuſtained, in caſe of a repulſe, even if the diſembarkation could have been effected.

This attempt was therefore abandoned; but at the ſame time a reſolution taken to ſtand in towards the ſhore with the whole fleet, to cover a general landing. A diſpoſition was made accordingly; but the ſtorm increaſing, the tranſports ran foul of each other, and the ſhips were expoſed to all the perils of a lee ſhore; for the gale blew directly upon the coaſt: beſides, the proviſions began to fail, and the hay for the horſes was almoſt exhauſted. Theſe concurring reaſons induced the commanders to defer the diſembarkation to a more favourable opportunity. The fleet ſtood out to ſea, the tempeſt abated; they ſteered for the Iſle of Wight, and next day anchored at St. Helen's.

Such was the iſſue of an enterprize, which, tho' it did not anſwer the expectations of the public, was yet productive of infinite damage to the enemy; for the loſs they ſuſtained by the conflagration at St. Malo is ſaid to have amounted to twenty-four millions of livres.

The deſigns upon the coaſt of France, though interrupted by tempeſtuous weather, were not as yet laid aſide for the whole ſeaſon: but, in the mean time, the troops were diſembarked on the Iſle of Wight, and one brigade marched to the northward, to join a body of troops with which the government reſolved to reinforce the army of the allies in Germany, commanded by prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic. The duke of Marlborough and lord George Sackville being appointed to conduct this Britiſh corps upon the continent, the command of the marine expeditions devolved upon lieutenant-general Bligh, an old experienced officer who had ſerved with reputation; and his royal highneſs prince Edward, afterwards created duke of York, entered as a volunteer with commodore Howe, in order to learn the rudiments of the ſea-ſervice.

The remainder of the troops being reimbarked, and every thing prepared for the ſecond expedition, the fleet ſailed from St. Helen's on the firſt of Auguſt; and, after a tedious paſſage from calms and contrary winds, arrived on the ſeventh in the bay of Cherbourg. By this time the enemy had intrenched themſelves within a line, extending from the fort of Ecoeurdeville, which ſtands about two miles to the weſtward of Cherbourg, along the coaſt for the ſpace of four miles, fortified with ſeveral batteries at proper diſtances. Behind this retrenchment a large body of regular troops, reinforced by militia, appeared in good order; but as they did not advance to the open beach, the leſs riſque was run in landing the Britiſh forces.

At firſt a bomb-ketch had been ſent to anchor near the town and throw ſome ſhells into the place, as a feint to amuſe the enemy, and deceive them with regard to the place of diſembarkation; while the general had determined to land about a league to the weſtward of Querqueville, the moſt weſtern fort in the bay. The other bomb ketches being poſted along ſhore, did conſiderable execution upon the intrenchments, not only by throwing ſhells in the uſual way, but alſo by uſing ball-mortars, filled with great quantities of balls, which may be thrown to a great diſtance, and, by ſcattering as they fly, do abundance of miſchief.

While theſe ketches maintained a continual fire, the grenadiers and guards were conveyed regularly aſhore in the flat bottomed boats; and landing without oppoſition, inſtantly drew up in a ſmall open part of the beach, with a natural breaſtwork in their front, having on one ſide a hollow way, and a village riſing beyond it with a ſudden aſcent: on the other, the ground was interſected by hedges and covered with orchards; and from this quarter the enemy advanced in order. The Britiſh troops immediately quitted the breaſtwork, in order to meet them half way, and a ſtraggling fire began; but the French edging to the left, took poſſeſſion of the hill, from whence they piquered with the advanced poſts of the Engliſh.

In the mean time the reſt of the infantry were diſembarked, and the enemy at night retreated. As the light troops were not yet landed, general Bligh encamped that night at the village of Erville, on a piece of ground that did not extend four hundred paces, ſo that the tents were crowded together in a confuſed and irregular manner. Next morning, the general being informed that no parties of the enemy were ſeen moving on the hill or in the plain, and that fort Querqueville was entirely deſerted, made a diſpoſition for marching to Cherbourg. An advanced party took immediate poſſeſſion of Querqueville, and the lines and batteries along the ſhore were now abandoned by the enemy.

The Britiſh forces marching behind St. Aulne, Ecoeurdeville, Hommet, and la Gallet, found Cherbourg likewiſe undefended, and the gates being open, entered it without oppoſition. The citizens, encouraged by a promiſe of protection, received their new gueſts with a profuſion of civilities; notwithſtanding which the ſoldiers indulged themſelves in ſome irregularities; but theſe were no ſooner diſcovered than the offenders were brought to condign puniſhment, and the army kept to the moſt ſtrict diſcipline. Next morning the place being ſurveyed, the general determined to deſtroy the forts and the baſon; and the execution of this deſign was left to the engineers, aſſiſted by the officers of the fleet and artillery.

Great ſums of money had been expended upon the harbour and baſon of Cherbourg, which at one time was conſidered by the French court as an object of great importance, from its ſituation reſpecting the river Seine, as well as the oppoſite coaſt of England; but as the works were left unfiniſhed, in all probability the plan had grown into diſrepute. The enemy had raiſed ſeveral unconnected batteries along the bay, but the town itſelf was quite open and defenceleſs. While the engineers were employed in demoliſhing the works, the light horſe ſcoured the country, and detachments were every day ſent out towards Walloign, at the diſtance of four leagues from Cherbourg, where the enemy were encamped, and every hour received reinforcements. Several ſkirmiſhes were fought by the out-parties of each army; in one of which captain Lindſay, a gallant young officer, who had a conſiderable ſhare in training the light horſe, was mortally wounded.

The harbour and baſon of Cherbourg being deſtroyed, together with all the forts in the neighbourhood, and about twenty pieces of braſs cannon conveyed on board the Engliſh ſhips, a contribution, amounting to about three thouſand pounds ſterling, was exacted from the town, and a plan of reimbarkation concerted, as it appeared, from the reports of peaſants and deſerters, that the enemy were already increaſed to a formidable number. A ſlight intrenchment being raiſed, ſufficient to defend the laſt diviſion that ſhould be reimbarked, the ſtores and artillery were ſhipped, and the light horſe immediately carried on board their reſpective tranſports, by means of platforms laid in the flat-bottomed veſſels. On the ſixteenth day of Auguſt, at three o'clock in the morning, the forces marched from Cherbourg down to the beach, and reimbarked at Fort Gallet, without the leaſt diſturbance from the enemy.

This ſervice being happily performed, the fleet ſet ſail for the coaſt of England, and anchored in the road of Weymouth, under the high land of Portland. In two days it weighed and ſtood again to the ſouthward, but was obliged by contrary winds to return to the ſame ſtation. The ſecond effort, however, was more ſucceſsful. The fleet with ſome difficulty kept the ſea; and ſteering to the French coaſt, arrived in the bay of St. Lunaire, two leagues to the weſtward of St. Malo, upon which it was determined to make another attempt. The ſloops and ketches being poſted along-ſhore to cover the landing, the troops were debarked on a fair open beach, and a ſmall party detached to the harbour of St. Briac, above the town of St. Malo, where they deſtroyed about fifteen ſmall veſſels: but St. Malo itſelf being carefully reconnoitered, appeared to be impregnable either by the land-forces or the ſhipping.

The mouth of the river that forms its baſon extends above two miles in breadth at its narroweſt part, ſo as to be out of the reach of land-batteries; and the entrance is defended by ſuch forts and batteries as the ſhips of war could not pretend to ſilence, conſidering the difficult navigation of the channel: beſides fifty pieces of large cannon planted on theſe forts and batteries, the enemy had mounted forty on the weſt ſide of the town; and the baſon was, moreover, ſtrengthened by ſeven frigates or armed veſſels, whoſe guns might have been brought to bear upon any batteries that could be raiſed on ſhore, as well as upon ſhips entering by the uſual channel.

For theſe reaſons the deſign againſt St. Malo was relinquiſhed; but the general being unwilling to reimbark without having taken ſome ſtep for the further annoyance of the enemy, determined to penetrate into the country, regulating his motions, however, by thoſe of the fleet, which had by this time quitted the bay of St. Lunaire, where it could not ride with any ſafety, and anchored in the bay of St. Cas, about three leagues to the weſtward.

On the eighth of September general Bligh with his little army began his march for Guildo, at the diſtance of nine miles, which he reached in the evening. Next day he paſſed a little gut or inlet of the ſea, at low water; and his troops being harraſſed by the peaſants, who fired at him from hedges and houſes, he ſent a prieſt with a meſſage, importing, that if they would not deſiſt he would reduce their houſes to aſhes. No regard being paid to this intimation, the houſes were actually ſet on fire as ſoon as the troops had formed their camp, about two miles on the other ſide of the inlet. Next morning he advanced to the village of Matignon, where, after ſome irregular firing, the French piquets appeared, drawn up in order, to the number of two battalions; but having ſtood a few diſcharges of the Engliſh field-pieces, and ſeeing the grenadiers approach, they ſuddenly diſperſed.

General Bligh continuing his route through the village, encamped in the open ground about three miles from the bay of St. Cas, which was this day reconnoitred for reimbarkation; for he now received certain intelligence that the duke d'Aiguillon had advanced from Breſt to Lambale, within ſix miles of the Engliſh camp, at the head of twelve regular battalions, ſix ſquadrons, two regiments of militia, eight mortars, and ten pieces of cannon. The bay of St. Cas was covered by an intrenchment which the enemy had thrown up, the more effectually to prevent any diſembarkation; and on the outſide of this work there was a range of ſand hills extending along ſhore, which could have ſerved as a cover to the enemy, from whence they might have annoyed the troops in reimbarking. For this reaſon a propoſal was made, that the forces ſhould be reimbarked from a fair open beach on the left, between St. Cas and Guildo; but this advice was rejected, and indeed the ſubſequent operations of the army ſeem to have been conducted with little prudence or diſcretion.

Had the troops decamped in the night, without noiſe, in all probability they would have arrived at the beach before the French had received the leaſt intelligence of their motion; and in that caſe the whole army, amounting to about ſix thouſand five hundred men, might have been reimbarked without interruption: but inſtead of this cautious manner of proceeding, the drums were beaten at two o'clock in the morning, which could not fail to betray their intention to the enemy. The troops were in motion before three; and though the length of the march did not exceed three miles, the halts and interruptions were ſo numerous and frequent, that they did not arrive on the beach at St. Cas till nine. Then the embarkation was begun, and might have been happily accompliſhed, had the tranſports lain near the ſhore and received the men as faſt as the boats could have conveyed them on board without diſtinction; but many ſhips rode at a conſiderable diſtance, and every boat carried the men on board the reſpective tranſports to which they belonged; a punctilio of diſpoſition which in caſes of emergency, ought never to be regarded. The ſmall ſhips and bomb-ketches were brought near the ſhore to cover the reimbarkation; and a conſiderable number of ſea-officers were ſtationed on the beach to ſuperintend the boats crews, and regulate the ſervice; but notwithſtanding all their attention, ſome of the boats were employed in carrying off horſes and cows, and other booty. Had all the cutters and ſmall craft belonging to the fleet been properly occupied in the ſervice, the diſgrace and diſaſter of the day would in a great meaſure have been prevented.

The Britiſh forces had ſkirmiſhed a little on their march, but no conſiderable body of the enemy appeared until the embarkation was begun; then they took poſſeſſion of an eminence by a wind-mill, and forthwith opened a battery of ten cannon and eight mortars, from whence they fired with conſiderable effect upon the ſoldiers on the beach, and on the boats in their paſſage. They afterwards began to march down the hill, partly covered by a hollow way on their left, with deſign to gain a wood, where they might form and extend themſelves along the front of the Engliſh, and advance againſt them under ſhelter of the ſand-hills; but in their deſcent they ſuffered extremely from the cannon and mortars of the ſhipping, which made great havock, and threw them into confuſion. Their line of march down the hill was broken, and for ſome time continued in diſorder; then they turned off to one ſide, extended themſelves along a hill to their left, and advanced in a hollow way, from whence they ſuddenly ruſhed out to the attack.

Though the greater part of the Britiſh troops were already embarked, the rear-guard, conſiſting of all the grenadiers, and half of the firſt regiment of guards, remained on the ſhore, to the number of fifteen hundred, under the command of major-general Drury. This officer ſeeing the enemy advance, ordered his troops to form in grand diviſions, and march from behind the bank that covered them, in order to attack the enemy before they could be formed on the plain. This ſtep of Mr. Drury's has been generally condemned as raſh and imprudent; for had he kept behind the breaſtwork, he might either have defended himſelf till he could have been taken on board; or he might have retreated along the beach to a rock on the left, in which progreſs his right flank would have been ſecured by the intrenchment; and the enemy could not have purſued him along the ſhore without being expoſed to ſuch a fire from the ſhipping as, in all probability, they could not have withſtood.

The Engliſh line being drawn up in uneven ground, began the action with an irregular fire from right to left, which the enemy returned; but their uſual fortitude and reſolution ſeemed to forſake them on this occaſion. They ſaw themſelves in danger of being ſurrounded and cut in pieces; their officers dropped on every ſide; and all hope of retreat was now intercepted. In this cruel dilemma their ſpirits failed; they were ſeized with a panic; they faultered, they broke; and in leſs than five minutes after the engagement began, they fled in the utmoſt confuſion, purſued by the enemy, who no ſooner ſaw them give way than they fell in among them with their bayonets fixed, and made a terrible havock. General Drury being dangerouſly wounded, ran into the ſea, where he periſhed; and this was the fate of a great number, officers as well as ſoldiers. Many ſwam towards the boats and veſſels, which were ordered to give them all manner of aſſiſtance; but by far the greater number were either butchered on the beach or drowned in the water; a ſmall body, however, inſtead of throwing themſelves into the ſea, retired to the rock on the left, where they made a ſtand, until they had exhauſted all their ammunition, and then ſurrendered at diſcretion. The carnage was moreover increaſed by the ſhot and ſhells diſcharged from the battery which the enemy had raiſed on the hill: yet the ſlaughter would not have been ſo great, had not the French ſoldiers been exaſperated by the fire from the frigates, which, through the general confuſion that then prevailed, was ſtill maintained, even after the Engliſh troops were routed: but this was no ſooner ſilenced by a ſignal from the commodore, than the enemy granted quarter to the vanquiſhed. About one thouſand choſen men of the Engliſh army were killed and taken priſoners on this occaſion; though the loſs of the enemy is ſaid to have amounted to double the number.

This affair elated the French, and diſpirited the Engliſh, much more than could reaſonably be expected from a matter of ſo little conſequence. It was in fact no more than the cutting off a rear-guard. There was often more blood ſhed in ſome of the ſkirmiſhes in Germany, which were never thought worthy of a place in the Gazettes. So far from complaining of our bad fortune, we ought rather to think ourſelves extremely fortunate, that we were able to land three times on the coaſt of France without ſuffering any other or more conſiderable loſs. The French miniſtry indeed had reaſon to magnify our defeat, and this they did in a moſt extravagant manner: but ſome ſuch cordial was abſolutely neceſſary to conſole their people, who were filled with chagrin at the utter ruin which had ſeized their trade, and the diſgrace and calamities which had been brought upon their country.

After the action of St. Cas, ſome civilities by meſſage paſſed between the duke d'Aiguillon and the Engliſh commanders, who were favoured with a liſt of the priſoners, including four ſea-captains; and aſſured that the wounded ſhould receive all poſſible comfort and aſſiſtance. Theſe matters being adjuſted, commodore Howe returned with the fleet to Spithead, and the ſoldiers were diſembarked.

No further attempts were made upon the French coaſt during the remainder of this ſeaſon. The Engliſh cruizers, however, ſtill continued active and alert. Captain Hervey, in the ſhip Monmouth, deſtroyed a French ſhip of forty guns in the iſland of Malta; an exploit of which the Malteſe loudly complained as a violation of their neutrality. About twenty ſail of ſmall French veſſels were driven aſhore on the rocks of Bretagne by ſome cruizers belonging to the fleet commanded by lord Anſon, after a ſmart engagement with two frigates, under whoſe convoy they ſailed.

In the month of November the Belliqueux, a French ſhip of war mounted with ſixty-four guns, having by miſtake run up St. George's Channel, and anchored in Lundy road, captain Saumarez, of the Antelope, then lying in King's Road, immediately weighed and went in queſt of her, according to the advice he had received. When he appeared, the French captain heaved up his anchor and made a ſhew of reſiſtance; but ſoon hauled down his colours, and, without firing a ſhot, ſurrendered, with a compliment of four hundred and ſeventeen men, to a ſhip of inferior force, both in number of hands and weight of metal.

By this time the Engliſh privateers ſwarmed to ſuch a degree in the Channel, that ſcarce a French veſſel durſt leave their harbours, and conſequently there was little or no booty to be got. In this ſcarcity of legal prizes, ſome of the adventurers were tempted to commit acts of piracy, and actually plundered the ſhips of neutral nations. A Dutch veſſel, having on board the baggage and domeſtics belonging to the marquis de Pignatelli, ambaſſador from the court of Spain to the king of Denmark, was boarded three times ſucceſſively by the crews of three different privateers, who forced the hatches, rummaged the hold, broke open and rifled the trunks and boxes of the ambaſſador, and committed many other acts of violence. Complaints of theſe outrages being made to the court of London, the lords of the admiralty promiſed, in the Gazette, a reward of five hundred pounds, without deduction, to any perſon who ſhould diſcover the offenders concerned in theſe acts of piracy. Some of them were detected accordingly, and brought to condign puniſhment.
